The sheet of letterpress appended to the Parliamentary plan contained further description of this tramway:—"The centre line of the proposed way No. 6 will be throughout at the distance of 4 feet 6 inches from and he left-hand side (proceeding from the commencement to the termination of tramway) of the imaginary centre line of each of the streets and roads ugh which it is intended to pass, except that from a point one chain north he north end of the bridge carrying the street or road called North Bridge r the North British Railway the centre line of the tramway will gradually ge from the said imaginary centre line until at the north end of the said ge it attains the distance of 8 feet 6 inches from and on the left-hand side ceeding as aforesaid) of the imaginary centre line of the roadway of the ge, and thence to the south end of the said bridge (at a point immediately r the south side of Low Market Street), it will continue at the last-men- ed distance from and on the left-hand side (proceeding as aforesaid) of the ginary centre line of the said roadway, and thence will again gradually ap- ach until in the length of one chain it reaches the distance of 4 feet 6 inches m and on the left-hand side (proceeding as aforesaid) of the imaginary centre s of the street.

'The centre line of the proposed tramway No. 6A will be throughout at distance of 4 feet 6 inches from and on the right-hand side (proceeding m the commencement to the termination of the tramway) of the imaginary tre line of each of the streets and roads through which it is intended to s, except that (1) from a point one chain north of the north end of the bridge rying the street or road called North Bridge over the North British Railway, centre line of the tramway will gradually diverge from the said imaginary tre line, until, at the north end of the said bridge, it attains the distance of eet 6 inches from and on the right-hand side (proceeding as aforesaid) of the ginary centre line of the roadway of the bridge, and thence to the south end the said bridge (at a point immediately over the south side of Low Market eet) it will continue at the last-mentioned distance from and on the right- nd side (proceeding as aforesaid) of the imaginary centre line of the said road- y, and thence will again gradually approach until in the length of one chain eaches the distance of 4 feet 6 inches from and on the right-hand side (pro- ding as aforesaid) of the imaginary centre line of the street; and (2)," &c.

No. 74.
Feb. 21, 1873.
Black, &c. v. Edinburgh Tramways Co.

plans, from . . . . , and from the Edinburgh General Post-Office to New ington, and from Newington to Morningside, and from Morningside t Princes Street by way of the Lothian Road, and thereafter they shall pr ceed as speedily as possible to lay down, construct, and work the seve other tramways described in the said bill, and shewn on the said pl and the said whole tramways shall be completed within three years fr the passing of the said bill.

By the General Act, 33 and 34 Vict., cap. 78, entitled an "Act t Facilitate the Construction and Regulate the Working of Tramwa section 9, it is provided as follows:—"Every tramway in a town which hereby authorised by provisional order shall be constructed and ma tained as nearly as may be in the middle of the road; and no tram shall be authorised by any provisional order to be so laid that, for distance of 30 feet or upwards, a less space than 9 feet and 6 inches sh intervene between the outside of the footpath on either side of the ro and the nearest rail of the tramway, if one-third of the owners or o third of the occupiers of the houses, shops, or warehouses abutting up the part of the road where such less space shall intervene as aforesa shall in the prescribed manner and at the prescribed time express th dissent from any tramway being so laid." By section 3d the term "pr scribed" is declared to mean prescribed by any rules made in pursua of the said Act, and by section 64 the Board of Trade is empowered make such rules. The Board of Trade issued rules on 9th May 1870.

The General Act further contains provisions for publication of th order after it has been delivered by the Board of Trade to the pr moters; and then the 14th section provides,—"On proof to the satisfa tion of the Board of Trade of the completion of such publication aforesaid, the Board of Trade shall, as soon as they conveniently can af the expiration of seven days from the completion of such publicati procure a bill to be introduced into either House of Parliament, in re tion to any provisional order which shall have been published as afo said, not later than the 25th of April in any year, for an Act to confi the provisional order, which shall be set out at length in the schedu to the bill; and until confirmation, with or without amendment by Act Parliament, a provisional order under this Act shall not have any ope tion." Then it is provided that when a bill is introduced into Parliame it may be referred to a select committee, but when the bill is once pass then the Act of Parliament confirming the provisional order under th Act shall be deemed a public general Act.

The first objection by the suspenders was thus stated: Although th respondents are empowered by their Act to make and maintain a doubl line of tramway in the portion of North Bridge Street extending fro Princes Street to the north end of the North Bridge, they (the Tramwa Company) are not empowered to make any tramway or tramways in o along the other portion of North Bridge Street extending from the sou end of the North Bridge to the High Street of Edinburgh.

The answer to this was that the term North Bridge included Nort Bridge Street.

The suspenders further stated that they constituted one-third of th whole occupiers of houses and shops in the said section of North Brid Street, and that they objected to the formation of the line of tramwa nearer to the footpath than 9 feet 6 inches, in terms of section 9 of th General Act.

The suspenders pleaded;—(1) The respondents have no power und their Acts to make and maintain any tramway along the portion of Nor Bridge Street extending from the south end of the North Bridge to t

No. 74.

Feb. 21, 1873.
Black, &c. v. Edinburgh Tramways Co.

1 Street of Edinburgh. (2) Under their Act of Parliament, and the isions of the public Act incorporated therewith, the respondents are ained from making and maintaining the tramway or tramways to be tructed on the said portion of street, so or in such manner that, for a nce of 30 feet or upwards, a less space than 9 feet 6 inches shall in- me between the outside of the footpath and the nearest rail of the ways. (3) The complainers, constituting more than one-third of the piers of houses and other premises in North Bridge Street, are, in e of the statutes and agreement founded on, entitled to interdict and ration of possession as craved.

he respondents pleaded;—(2) The respondents being empowered by ial Act of Parliament to lay down and maintain a double line of way, as shewn in the plans referred to in the Act, along the portion he street in question, and the lines which the respondents proposed y down, and which they are in the course of laying down, being in t conformity therewith, the complainers are not entitled to interfere 1 the said operations, and the note should be refused. (3) The sections he Tramways Act, 1870, founded on by the complainers, being inap- able, the note should be dismissed. (4) The complainers are not parties he agreement founded on by them, and have no right or title to found he provisions thereof; said provisions, moreover, are inapplicable to present case. (5) The respondents having proved compliance with he standing orders to the satisfaction of Parliament, the complainers not entitled to insist in the present application.

he Lord Ordinary on the Bills (Gifford) pronounced this interlocutor: Passes the note of suspension and interdict without caution; further in the meantime interdicts, prohibits, and discharges the respondents, all others acting for them, from making or constructing on or along portion of the North Bridge Street, Edinburgh, referred to in the ver of the note of suspension, any of the line or lines of the tramway ramways to be constructed by the respondents on the said portion of et, so or in such manner that for a distance of 30 feet or upwards ss space than 9 feet and 6 inches shall intervene between the outside he footpath on either side of the road or street and the nearest line of tramway; quoad ultra and ad interim refuses the interdict craved."*

"NOTE.—The questions raised in the present suspension and interdict are reat importance both to the interests of the Tramways Company and of the enders, proprietors, and occupants of shops and property in North Bridge et; the questions also affect the interests of the public, and perhaps may rn the making of the tramways in other streets than those referred to in present suspension. The questions turn entirely upon the construction of statutes, and this is a matter of considerable difficulty, arising chiefly from mode in which certain agreements have been incorporated in the respondents' . This having been apparently done while their bill was passing through liament, some portions of the Act do not harmonise very well with the incor- ted agreements, having been originally framed without reference to these ements.

Both parties conceded that the note must be passed, with the view of having questions raised definitely settled, and the only matter debated before the d Ordinary was whether there should be any, and, if so, what interim inter- . The question of interdict, however, involves the whole merits of the case. The Lord Ordinary has given it the best consideration in his power.

The first portion of the prayer for interdict seeks to prohibit the Tramway ipany absolutely from making any tramway at all, either single or double, on portion of North Bridge Street in question. This demand is founded on an ed omission of section 5, par. 6 and 6A, in the description of the streets over ch the tramway is to be made. It is said that this portion of the street or

No. 74.

Feb. 21, 1873.

Black, &c. v. Edinburgh Tramways Co.

A record having been made up and closed the Lord Ordinary pronounced this interlocutor:—"Finds that, according to the sound construction of the line of road is not specified, and that, therefore, while the company may make their tramway up to the north end of the open portion of North Bridge, and may then begin again at the Tron Church, the intervening portion must be left unmade. Of course, this would be the grossest possible blunder in the Act, but it was urged that the Act must be strictly interpreted against the company whatever be the consequence.

"The Lord Ordinary cannot read the Act in the strict way contended for by the suspenders. He thinks he must put a fair interpretation on the Act, and the interpretation contended for by the suspenders is not only unfair, but manifestly nant. There is really, however, no reasonable room for doubt as to the meaning of the Act. The general title of the line of tramway in question is 'from the General Post-Office to Newington.' Of course the tramway must be continuous and the idea of a gap or a hiatus is absurd.

"The expression North Bridge, although sometimes used distinctively, fairly includes North Bridge Street as well as the open or central portion of the bridge. The expression roadway of the North Bridge may fairly be held as extending to the High Street, for, until close on the High Street, the roadway really runs on arches and on the bridge, although the arches are closed up by buildings, instead of being left open like the central arches. It is averred, and seems to be the case, that the total measurements, from terminus to terminus, specified in the statute, would not be made out without including the portion of street in question. On the whole, therefore, the Lord Ordinary has really no doubt whatever that the company are entitled to lay their tramway or tramways along the whole length of the North Bridge Street.

"The next point seemingly raised by the prayer is whether the company are entitled to make a double line of tramway at the place in question, or whether they can be compelled to confine themselves to a single line, which, it is urged, would be sufficient for traffic, and much more convenient for the occupants of shops. Here also the Lord Ordinary has no doubt. He thinks that, in terms of the statute, the company have power to make a double line, and that this cannot be ordained, at least directly, to make only a single line. The Parliamentary plan, which in this respect is part of the Act, distinctly shews a double line of tramway.

"The descriptive section (section 5) mentions two lines, the up line being called 'Tramway No. 6,' and the down line being called 'Tramway No. 5.' If, therefore, it is possible to construct a double line consistently with the other requirements of the Act the company have undoubtedly power to do so.

"And this brings the Lord Ordinary to the only point on which he has felt any difficulty. It appears that, in constructing a double line at the place in question, the company intend so to lay the rails that, for the greater portion, but not for the whole of the southern part of North Bridge Street, there will be less space than 9 feet 6 inches between the outside of the footpath and the nearest rail of the tramway; and the question is, whether this is or is not against the statute. It is important to note that the intention of the respondents so to construct their tramway, though fully admitted, was never in so many words intimated to the suspenders or the public. It is said it might have been discovered from the Parliamentary notices if anybody had taken the trouble to apply the measurements to the North Bridge. This may be so, but it required careful measurements and various calculations, which required some degree of skill; and the Lord Ordinary thinks that the suspenders are fairly entitled to say that it was only recently they became aware that the free space before the doors was to be so curtailed.

"The limitation to 9 feet 6 inches occurs in the 9th section of the General Tramways Act of 1870. Part 1st of that statute includes 'sections 4 to 12 inclusive.' Now, section 2 of the respondents' Act only incorporates 'part 2 and 3 of the General Act;' and if the matter had stood here, the respondents would have been no way bound by section 9 of the General Act, and this statute incorporating the respondents, being 'The Edinburgh Tramways Act, 1871,' and the statutes and agreements incorporated in the said Act, mainly their intention in promoting the Act. But pressure seems to have been applied in Parliament, and section 44 of the special Act was introduced, which makes certain agreements, and, inter alia, the agreement in schedule 1 of the statute 'part of the Act.' The agreement must now, therefore, be read as if it had been enacted in its terms.

No. 74.

Feb. 21, 1873.

Black, &c. v. Edinburgh Tramways Co.

"Now, section 1 of the agreement provides, besides giving certain powers to the 'local authority,' that the 'whole provisions' of the General Act shall apply to the respondents' special Act,' 'as fully in every respect as if the same were a provisional order obtained under 'The Tramways Act.' It seems plain, therefore, that not only parts 2 and 3 of the General Act are incorporated, but part 1 also. The 'whole provisions,' and still more the respondents' special Act, although an independent statute, is to be read in reference to the General Act 'as fully in every respect as if it were a provisional order.'

"It is true that part 1 of the General Act applies chiefly to the obtaining and granting of provisional orders, and to the conditions and powers which such orders must contain, and it was very forcibly urged that all these provisions can, in their very nature, have no application to a statute which is not, and never was, a provisional order, but which derives its force from the independent fiat of the Legislature. This is true, but then the Act is to be read just as if it were a provisional order, and a fair construction must be given to the enacted agreement. In truth, though it is now a statutory agreement, the rules of construction of agreements still apply, and what is to be sought for is, what was the true and real intention of the contracting parties.

"The Lord Ordinary holds that the meaning of the agreement substantially is that the company, although promoting an independent Act, were to be under the same fetters and restrictions as if they had been promoting a provisional order; and so, to come to the point in question, as they could not have got power in a provisional order to leave less sideway than 9 feet 6 inches, so they agreed they should not seek such power in their Act. Now, this is very important in construing the Act, for, although it may be true that if express power to contract the sideway at any particular place had been taken, that would overrule the general provisions, such power without express words will never be presumed.

"The Lord Ordinary is of opinion that no express power to contract the sideway to less than 9 feet 6 inches is given by the Act, and he thinks that such power cannot be presumed. The Parliamentary notices are not parts of the Act, and in strictness cannot be looked at, even if they were much more distinct than they are. There is no measurement prescribed by any of the statutes as to the space between the two lines of tramway, and, physically, there is nothing to prevent a double line of tramway being made, if the lines are kept only 3 or 4 feet apart. It may be that this proximity will involve danger, or an alteration in the construction of the cars, or the shutting of all access to the cars on the other side,—that is, the side next the adjoining tramway,—or some other precaution. All this is matter for the company to see to, and, if danger is unavoidable, they may be driven, ex necessitate, to a single line. In no case will they be entitled to cause danger to the lieges; but the rights of the occupants of shops, stipulated for in the agreement, and enacted by the Legislature, must not be disregarded merely for the company's convenience.

"It was urged that, although the statute does not in express words give a right to contract the sideway to less than 9 feet 6 inches, the Parliamentary plan shews such contraction, and that a nice measurement would shew so many inches less than 9 feet. In one view this is an engineer's question, but the Lord Ordinary cannot hold that the Parliamentary or deposited plan was intended for any such purpose. Its scale is too minute. The very thickness of the lines would interfere with the calculation, and the words of the Act seem to shew that it is only the general lines and directions which the deposited plans were intended to exhibit.

"Nor can the Lord Ordinary give effect to the plea that the incorporated

No. 74.

Feb. 21, 1873.
Black, &c. v. Edinburgh Tramways Co.

the respondents had and have no right to lay down or construc tramway upon that portion of North Bridge Street extending fr High Street of Edinburgh to the open part of said North Bridge, for a distance of 30 feet or upwards a less space than 9 feet and 6 shall intervene between the outside of the footpath on either side road and the nearest rail of the tramway; and this in respect th third of the owners or one-third of the occupiers of the houses, sh warehouses abutting upon the part of the road where such less spac intervene as aforesaid have timeously objected thereto: Finds t within the portion of North Bridge Street above mentioned, the re ents' tramways are so constructed that, for a distance of 30 feet or u a less space than 9 feet and 6 inches intervenes between the out the footpath and the nearest rail of the tramway, the suspenders titled to have the same lifted and removed; and with these fi appoints the cause to be enrolled, reserving in the meantime all qu of expenses."*

---

agreement can only be pleaded by the parties thereto. No doubt the Ma and Council made the agreement, and probably insisted on its incorp but when once made part of the statute, it is just like other parts, and be founded on by any one having interest. It contains stipulations as and tolls, and many other matters intended for the general or public beh

"On the whole, therefore, the Lord Ordinary thinks that the suspen entitled to the limited interdict now granted. The company strongly that if there was any doubt at all there should not be interim interdict, they should be allowed to take their own way in the meantime, of cours bound to reconstruct the whole disputed line in any way that may be ult fixed. There is force in this view, but the Lord Ordinary has come t that he cannot well sanction even an interim construction of the tramv manner which he thinks is against the statute. He may be quite mistak his view is that there will be less risk of the necessity of reconstruction i 6 inches are left than if that space is encroached on.

"At the bar parties waived all demand for caution."

* "NOTE.—When this case was argued before the present Lord Ordi the Bill-Chamber in April last, on the question of interim interdict, t documents produced to the Lord Ordinary, besides the statutes founded c a copy or tracing from the Parliamentary plan, No. 17 of process, and a the Parliamentary notice that the Act was applied for, the copy notic No. 19 of process.

"The copy of the Parliamentary notice of the intention to apply for was founded on by the respondents, but the Lord Ordinary was of opini it formed no part of the statute, and could not be referred to as explai controlling the words of the Act.

"Immediately before the closing of the record there was produced of the complete Parliamentary plans, prefixed to which, and numbere sheet of which, is a sheet of letterpress, containing a description of the p of the centre line of each tramway. This was seen by the Lord Ordin the first time at the debate on the closed record, and it certainly is a v portant part of the respondents' case, and meets to some extent the consid which, in the Bill-Chamber, induced the Lord Ordinary to grant interim in

"As the case now presents itself to the Lord Ordinary, he thinks it is a with very great difficulty. Indeed, the case is nearly one of contradic incompatibility between different parts of the respondents' statute; a question is, which portion shall be construed as overruling or controll other. This is always a nice and difficult question, but the peculiar the present case are such as greatly to enhance the delicacy of reach true construction of the statute as a whole.

"After much consideration, aided by the very able argument with he was favoured on both sides, the Lord Ordinary, though with much

The respondents reclaimed. They argued;—The company are bound, under their Act and relative agreements, to construct the tramways accord-

No. 74.

Feb. 21, 1873.

Black, &c. v. Edinburgh Tramways Co.

---

man, adheres substantially to the view which he expressed in his note in the Bill-Chamber, of date 13th April last. Although much shaken in his opinion of the production of the Parliamentary plan, and relative letterpress, he has not been displaced, and he has not been able to come to the opposite conclusion from that at which he arrived in the Bill-Chamber. The Lord Ordinary respectfully refers to his note of 13th April last, and, without repeating the views therein expressed, he will merely indicate the reasons which have led him, notwithstanding the Parliamentary plans and letterpress, to adhere to the results then arrived at.

"1. Beyond all doubt the agreement between the Lord Provost, Magistrates, and Council and the Tramway Company, dated 29th March 1871 and subsequent dates, forms part of the respondents' Act. It is expressly embodied therein, 'made part of the Act, and to be carried into effect accordingly.' It forms schedule No. 1 of the Act.

"Now, the first head of this agreement expressly provides that the whole provisions of the General Tramways Act, 1870, shall apply to the respondents' special Act, then passing through Parliament, 'as fully in every respect as the same were a provisional order obtained under the Tramways Act, 1870.'

"It is plain some effect must be given to this enactment, if at all possible. It must be held to mean something, and the most natural meaning which can be given is, that the respondents, although they were getting a special Act, should be held to be in no different or more favourable position than if they had obtained a provisional order confirmed by Act of Parliament. The respondents did not want this; they wanted something better than a confirmed provisional order, and, accordingly, they only proposed to embody in their Act parts 2 and 3 of the general statute, leaving out part 1, where the clause now founded on appears. But they were defeated, and compelled by the Parliamentary agreement to take the whole of the General Act, part 1 as well as parts 2 and 3, and in particular section 9 of the General Act, which is contained in part 1 thereof; and, as if to make sure that section 9 should not fail, it was stipulated that the whole of the General Act should apply to the respondents' special Act 'as fully in every respect as if the same were a provisional order.'

"It is thought that, in virtue of this provision, the respondents' special Act, with all its relative plans, and their embodied letterpress, must be read as if it were a provisional order enacted by Parliament; and this may afford a rule of interpretation to be applied if apparent contradictions appear. The special Act of 1871, though obtained as an Act, is to be read as if it had been obtained in the form of a provisional order.

"The respondents argue that part 1 of the General Act has no application at all, for it only regulates the mode of obtaining provisional orders. But this is a mistake; for, besides providing rules for obtaining provisional orders, it declares (section 9) what powers provisional orders shall confer, and prescribes a time (section 18) when such powers shall expire.

"The difficulty which the respondents have to meet is, that unless these clauses apply the first head of the agreement which is made part of the Act is absolutely meaningless. The provisions as to the method of obtaining a provisional order did not and could not possibly apply to the Act which the respondents were carrying through Parliament; and if the incorporation of the 1st meant nothing else, it would have no effect at all. But in reading a statute and agreement a conclusion like this is to be avoided, if another possible and reasonable interpretation presents itself. The Lord Ordinary feels himself compelled to adopt the view that the special Act must be read and interpreted as if it had been a confirmed provisional order.

"4. But even then the difficulty remains, raised by the terms of the Parliamentary plan, and the sheet of letterpress, that this is a provisional order shall intervene between the outside of the footpath on either side of and the nearest rail of the tramway, if one-third of the owners or object.' The question is, how are these apparently conflicting prov be interpreted or reconciled.

"5. Now, the Lord Ordinary feels himself compelled to give effect 9 of the General Act, even although it in one view overrules and co the Parliamentary plan, taken in connection with its sheet of letterp has come to this conclusion because the words of section 9 are express, w is only by implication that the Parliamentary plan and its letterpre rise the tramway to be laid nearer the curbstone than the prescribed di

"There is no ambiguity in the provision of section 9,—there is bility of misunderstanding it; and if it applies to the respondents' the Lord Ordinary thinks it does), then it is an express enactment a to every narrow street like the North Bridge at the parts embrace present suspension.

"Now, it is no answer to an express enactment that there is an power the other way, and the power given by the plans is merely a power. The plans do not shew that less space will be left outside the than 9 feet 6 inches. Even the letterpress does not mention this. Al tions is that the tramways are to be a certain distance from an imagina line; and it is only by a careful measurement on the ground of the self that any one could possibly discover that the space outside the would, at certain points, be less than the specified breadth. If it be mere implication must always yield to express enactment then the ex actment of section 9 must overrule the implication deducible by the aid mensuration from the plans and letterpress.

"If it had been intended to overrule section 9 in the case of th Bridge there should have been an express exception. For example, been enacted that section 9 shall not apply to the North Bridge, or been said in so many words that the space outside the rails at the Nor shall only be six or seven feet, instead of being 9 feet 6 inches, then would have been overruled by an express enactment. As the Act stan 9 is the leading enactment. The position of the rails deducible from must be held as subordinate thereto.

"6. It was admitted by both parties that if section 9 applied present suspension was timeous notice by the objecting owners and c for the rules of the Board of Trade were only issued 9th May 187

No. 74.

Feb. 21, 1873.
Black, &c. v. Edinburgh Tramways Co.

ard of Trade. The respondents' Act was to be read as a provisional ler which had passed the Board of Trade, and had been confirmed by rliament; no objections could now be taken as to notice.[1]

The complainers argued;—The special Act is only passed subject to e control and regulation of the General Act, and if there is any incon- tency between the two the special Act must give way. The plans are ly incorporated so far as to settle the directions and levels, and certainly not be held to override an express enactment. If the respondents nd that they were unable to comply with the terms of section 9 they ght to have obtained express special powers dispensing with them.

At advising,—

Lord Deas.—The complainers are occupiers of more than one-third of the ses, shops, and warehouses, in that portion of North Bridge Street of inburgh which extends from the open arches of the Bridge to the High Street, d in that character they claim the right which they say the Edinburgh Tram- ys Act, 1871, confers on them, to object to what admittedly has been done ex erso of their premises, viz., the laying of the nearest tramway rail for a space 30 feet or upwards within less than 9 feet 6 inches of the outside of the tpath on the sides of the street.

The complainers, in the record suggest a distinction between the rights con- red on the Tramway Company by their Act over the portion of North Bridge reet which is ex adverso of the complainers' premises, and that portion of the e street which extends from Princes Street to the south end of the open hes of the bridge. But I agree with the respondents that there is no such tinction. The respondents say, in their answer to article 3d of the record,— The terms 'North Bridge' and 'North Bridge Street' are used indiscriminately, d the former expression is well known to refer to and include the street ex- ding from Princes Street on the north to the South Bridge or South Bridge reet on the south; and thus refers to and includes the portions of street at the rth end of the North Bridge, and also at the south end of the said bridge, d extending to the High Street, as well as the bridge itself."

All your Lordships know that this is correct and consistent with the everyday nguage of the city. We cannot read that portion of the statute which occurs der the head of "Edinburgh General Post-Office to Newington" and doubt at it describes the tramway from Princes Street to High Street, and southward at the front of the College, &c., as one continuous line, including the roadway ross the open arches of both bridges, as well as those portions of the roadway hich are lined with buildings.

It is quite true, therefore, as the respondents say, that the question is a serious e for the interests of the company. Although the complainers have chosen limit their application for interdict to that portion of the tramway which is adverso of the premises occupied by them, the result of their success must cessarily be the discontinuance of the double line of rails acrosss the open hes of the North Bridge where the roadway is very much narrower than it is adverso of the complainers' premises, and consequently the continuity of the uble line of rails from Princes Street southward must be interrupted. That owever, will not relieve us from the duty of enforcing the Act, if the complainers' jection be well founded.

That is a question of construction of the Act and in deciding it we must keep mind that the Act bears to proceed upon, and incorporates with it, three agree- nts, to which the parties of the first part were respectively the Magistrates d Council of Edinburgh, the Road Trustees, and the Magistrates and Council f Leith,—and the parties of the second part were the promoters of the Edin- mways bill, then before Parliament, in whose place the respondents the mway Company, now come. The Act is thus nothing more nor less than a [1] Wauchope v. Edinburgh and Dalkeith Railway Company, Dec. 14, 1837, S. 227, 1 Bell's Appeals, 252.

No. 74.

Feb. 21, 1873.

Black, &c. v. Edinburgh Tramways Co.

Parliamentary agreement, and, like every other agreement, it is to be c according to its fair meaning, and in consistency with the probable i and good faith of the parties to it.

The three agreements are scheduled and referred to in the Act as p portions of it. Section 44 bears,—"The agreements which are respec forth in three schedules to this Act are hereby respectively confirmed a part of this Act, and the same shall be carried into effect accordingl first head of these agreements is the only one we have here directly to c and as it is the same in each of the three it will be sufficient to quote it first agreement in which the Magistrates and Council of Edinburgh a nated as the parties of the first part. It is in these words:—"First, th hereto of the first part, as the local authority foresaid, shall have t rights, powers, and privileges, which the 'Tramways Act, 1870,' or a General Act relating to tramways now in force, or which may herea during this or any future session of Parliament, confer or may hereaft upon the local authority of any district; and the whole provisions of Acts shall apply to the Act of Parliament which the said second part promoting, or to any Act of Parliament which they or the company r after obtain, as fully in every respect as if the same were a provisio obtained under the 'Tramways Act, 1870.'"

It is important to observe in the outset that this first head consists ex of stipulations by and in favour of the local authority. Two things are s for, viz.,—First, that the local authority shall have all the powers, & the existing or any future General Tramways Act had conferred or migl on any local authority. Second, that the whole provisions of these gen should apply to the Act which the second party was then promoting i ment, that is, to the Edinburgh Tramways Act, 1871, which has sinc or to any Act which the promoters or the company might "thereafter c fully in every respect as if the same were a provisional order obtained u 'Tramways Act, 1870.'"

This at once raises the question, what would have been the provisio Edinburgh Tramways Act, 1871, so far as regards the matter now ur sideration, if that Act had been a provisional order?

To solve this question we have only to turn to section 9 of the Ger of 1870, which, together with the other provisions of that Act, is decl of the special Act, and there we find that "no tramway shall be authc any provisional order to be so laid that for a distance of 30 feet or u less space than 9 feet and 6 inches shall intervene between the of the footpath, on either side of the road, and the nearest rail of the t if one-third of the owners or one third of the occupiers of the houses, warehouses abutting upon the part of the road where such less space sh vene as aforesaid shall in the prescribed manner at the prescribed time their dissent from any tramway being so laid."

If, therefore, the Act had been a provisional order, the complainer clearly have been entitled to object to the tramway rail coming so near to path or foot-pavement as it does ex adverso of their premises. A con no doubt added in section 9 that the objectors "shall in the prescribed and at the prescribed time express their dissent from any tramway laid." And by section 7 it is enacted that, in considering an applicati provisional order, the Board of Trade "shall consider any objection the may be lodged with them on or before such day as they from time to point, and shall determine whether or not the promoters may proceed application." But the Board of Trade appointed no time for objectin visional orders till 9th May 1871, when the regulations issued were su promoters themselves could not and did not attempt to comply with t the notices, on the one hand, which might have been met by objection other. Besides, as the respondents themselves plead (Ans. to Stat. rules as to notices and time for objections have no application as no pr order ever was applied for. It is not surprising, therefore, that, as t Ordinary states in his note, "it was admitted by both parties that if t

No. 74.

Feb. 21, 1873.
Black, &c. v.
Edinburgh
Tramways Co.

m the present suspension was timeous notice by the objecting owners rs," as the rules issued by the Board of Trade, so late as 9th May l not possibly apply, as regards this case, either to the one party or ot contended before us that any error had been committed in making ion, and I can see none. The question here is not one of time, but

e. There is nothing about time in the first head of the agreement s part of the local Act of 1870. It is there substantially agreed 1 9 of the General Act shall apply to the local Act as fully as if the ad been a provisional order. If the Act had been a provisional complainers would have had an opportunity of objecting to what ed to be done in front of their premises; and the question is, ccording to the fair meaning and good faith of the agreement n the Act, this portion of the agreement, or in other words, this e Act, can be held, as the respondents contended to us, and as the Lord ays they contended to him, to be "absolutely meaningless?" The 1 44, already quoted, incorporating the agreements with the Act, says ame" (that is, the agreements) "shall be carried into effect accord-it the contention now is, that this part of the agreement shall have t all, which is not, I think, a construction to be put upon any if by any reasonable reading such a result can be avoided.
ith the Lord Ordinary in the note to his last interlocutor, correcting, iew taken in the note to his previous interlocutor, that, taking the connection with the Parliamentary plan and relative letterpress, it d that the respondents are authorised, and indeed taken bound by o lay a double line of tramway from Princes Street southward along f North Bridge Street. But this does not create, in my mind, the lty which it appears to have done in the mind of the Lord Ordinary, authority and obligation, as I read the statute, are not absolute but —the condition in both cases being that no objection shall be made l either of the owners or occupiers of premises abutting upon that roadway where the nearest rail comes within the prescribed distance inches of the footpath. There is thus nothing contradictory between y and obligation on the one hand, and the right to object on the as quite consistent with the agreement that statutory authority should make the line, because otherwise the line could not have been made, whole owners and occupiers had been desirous that it should be so in ing opposed to it. But, if I construe the Act rightly, this authority subject to the proviso that if one-third of the owners or occupiers rail should be actually laid within the prescribed distance of the lainers, whatever notices had been given to them, could not have passing of the Act. The answer to them would have been that the ed and gave effect to the very agreement on which they founded,— would have the option stipulated for of objecting to any rail being the prescribed distance of the footpath ex adverso of their premises, y had therefore no ground for opposing the Act.

however, as the respondents proposed to construct the tramway in now complained of in front of the compainers' premises it was n the part of the complainers, as is admitted in the record (Ans. to at they objected to this being done, and the present application for s then presented, and interim interdict obtained. This interim s sometime thereafter recalled, by arrangemeut of parties,—the reeing willing to take the responsibility of forming the tramway in ie, subject to removal if so ordered by the Court, and the complainers us to avoid the risk of a claim of damages if the interim interdict e confirmed. Consequently, as the Lord Ordinary states in his note, minute, No. 20 of process, the tramway has been provisionally ect to removal if the suspenders' pleas are well founded."
on is, that the complainers' second and third pleas, taking them not

No. 74.

Feb. 21, 1873. Black, &c. v. Edinburgh Tramways Co.

separately, but together, are substantially well founded; and if t required confirmation, which I think it does not, from the probabiliti case, that confirmation would be amply afforded by examination of t and other productions, shewing the position and the measurements at points of the street called North Bridge Street now in question, or insp the street itself, and the consequent danger to the public from a doub rails being laid down there, when reference is had to the purposes nc served by that street, which neither have been nor could be dispute respondents.

As I have already observed, North Bridge Street, or, as it is familia "The North Bridge," extends, as the respondents correctly state in the rec Princes Street to High Street, and the effect of adhering to the Lord C judgment will necessarily be to prevent a double line of rails in any pa street. But this, I think, is just what the proviso was intended to en owners or occupiers of premises in that street to enforce, if they wished It is, I admit, surprising that a matter so important to the public should have been left to the option of these private complainers. The f ment on each side of the street, where it crosses the open arches of the barely broad enough to admit of three persons walking abreast. The rails at each side come within 13 inches or thereby of the foot-paveme tramway cars project some 6 inches or thereby beyond the rails. sequence necessarily is, that if the street is crowded, or if a storm of r rain, with or without the protection of umbrellas, causes any of the pe who are next the outside of the pavement to swerve from the perpend that exposed position, or if men's cloaks or greatcoats, or ladies' dres in the wind, the danger is imminent of their being caught by the pas and if any of the blind men who pass there habitually from and to t Asylum happen to be met with there must either be a collision w throw both parties in the way of the car, or the passenger who has his must step partially off the foot-pavement to let the blind passenger pa risk of being cruelly killed upon the spot, as happened to a highly re citizen, known to us all, since this case was last debated, although he w in vigorous health and in full possession of all his faculties. Then, t the space between the two lines of tramway, it is barely sufficient single carriage, so long as that carriage keeps precisely in the centre two tramway cars, going opposite ways, happen to come parallel to e and to the carriage which is in that position, the deviation of little mo few inches to either side, from the restiveness of the horse or agitati driver, may, at any moment, cause a collision fatal alike to the carriag occupants. These are results which no ordinary care could avoid. Or centre space, where one carriage cannot pass another without going rails, the occupants of two carriages, be these carriages of what sort or tion they may, must await the fate which providence and the Tramway have in store for them; and I need not tell your Lordships that all thi a street which forms the only great and properly available highway what are, in local position, two great and growing cities, although now n a common name,—viz., the old and new towns of Edinburgh,—there b two other possible ways of crossing the great valley which lies betw and both of these ways being unfitted, by their windings and gra accommodate the bulk of the traffic which consequently passes, almost along the street in question.

But, while it must thus be admitted to be surprising that the local should ever have agreed to a double line of tramway rails being author laid along such a street as North Bridge Street, with so uncertain against that authority being acted on as was afforded by the option en a few private individuals to object to it in the form of an expensive l would have been still more surprising if no means whatever of objec preventing a result so incompatible with the safety of the public had pulated for by the local authority, to whom it belonged to protect t interests. For the credit of the local authority it was necessary to

No. 74.

Feb. 21, 1873.
Black, &c. v. Edinburgh Tramways Co.

with that view; and while I think it should not have been left to a mber of private individuals to prevent a result which ought never to allowed to be possible, I think, at the same time, that it is impossible the stipulation as meaning nothing at all, and that it luckily proves, lt, to be legally sufficient for its purpose, which must be presumed to not merely the protection of private interests, but the prevention of danger to human life.

RDMILLAN.—An important and interesting question has been here he facts out of which the question has arisen are few and simple. The f the case is in the construction of the statutes, and the relative agree- r which the tramways in Edinburgh have been formed.
mway Company hold an Act of Parliament, passed in 1871, empower- o form and lay down tramways in different parts of the city of Edin- d one of these tramways is described as "a tramway from the General Post-office to Newington, passing along North Bridge Street, ay of the North Bridge, South Bridge Street," &c., to Newington.
with the Lord Ordinary in disregarding an objection taken by the rs to the terms of the statutory description of this line. I think that ay must be continuous; that the line is sufficiently described; and atutory authority and provisions must be held as applying to the whole this point I have nothing to add to what Lord Deas has so clearly

47th clause of the Act of 1871 it is enacted, "that nothing herein shall be deemed or construed to exempt the tramways from the provi- ay General Act relating to tramways now in force, or which may here- " &c. If there be in any General Act relating to tramways a clause for the public security, then it is the law of this statute that such the General Act shall affect the tramways constructed under this Act. e public safety and welfare was not left by its approprite guardians till further protection. An agreement relative to this Act of 1871 was to between the Lord Provost, Magistrates, and Town Council of Edin- the one part, and the promoters of the bill for the Edinburgh tramways ner part. By the 44th clause of the Act of 1871 it is enacted, "that nents which respectively are set forth in three schedules to this Act y respectively confirmed and made part of this Act, and the same shall into effect accordingly." agreement which is thus made part of the Act of 1871 (being set forth t schedule above mentioned), it is provided that "the whole provisions l Acts" (meaning the Tramways Act, 1870, and any other General Act o tramways), "shall apply to the Act of Parliament which the said arty is now promoting, or any Act of Parliament which they or the may hereafter obtain, as fully in every respect as if the same were a al order obtained under the Tramways Act, 1870."
lar provision is contained in the agreement No. 2, between the City of h Road Trust and the promoters, set forth in the second schedule of ; and another between the Magistrates of Leith and the promoters, in the third schedule of the Act; and these are also made part of appears,—1st, That the tramways constructed under the Act of 1871 xempt from the provisions of the General Tramways Act of 1870; 2d, agreement set forth in the first schedule is part of the Act of 1871, and force of statute; and 3d, That the whole provisions of the Act of 1870 rce of that agreement, and of the statute incorporating it, made applic- le Act of 1871, and to the tramways constructed under that Act. If a clause in the Act of 1870 affecting the public safety and welfare, then ifest that the question whether, to the present system of tramways urgh, that clause is now applicable and effectual, is one of great im-

h clause of the Act of 1870, called the General Tramways Act, is in the following terms:—"Every tramway in a town, which is hereafter authorised by provisional order, shall be constructed and maintained as nearly as may be in the middle of the road, and no tramway shall be authorised by any provisional order to be so laid that for a distance of 30 feet or upwards a less space than 9 feet 6 inches shall intervene between the outside of the footpath on either side of the road and the nearest rail of the tramway, if one-third of the owners or one-third of the occupiers of the houses, shops, or warehouses abutting upon the part of the road where such less space shall intervene as aforesaid shall in the prescribed manner and at the prescribed time express their dissent from the tramway being so laid." The word "prescribed" at the end of this clause is explained by the statute to mean prescribed by any rules made by the Board of Trade under the Act. No rules have been prescribed which exclude the objections. It is clear beyond dispute that this 9th clause of the General Act does affect the public safety, and that, if this 9th clause of the General Act is applicable to the tramway now complained of, then the complaint is well founded. The complainers have undoubtedly the interest which the statute recognises; their number exceeds that which the statute requires, and no good objection has been urged against the manner or the time of their expression of their dissent, if the clause is applicable.

No. 74.

Feb. 21, 1873.
Black, &c. v. Edinburgh Tramways Co.

The real question, and indeed, I think, the only question here is, whether the complainers can found on the 9th clause of the Act of 1870.

The first part of the Act of 1870, viz., from the 4th to the 21st clause, relates to procedure by provisional order by the Board of Trade, afterwards confirmed by Parliament. According to the agreement, "the whole provisions" of this General Act, no exception being made, are declared to apply to the Act of 1871; and among these whole provisions I cannot help including the provisions in the 9th clause, more especially as these whole provisions are in the agreement declared to be applicable "as fully in every respect as if the same were a provisional order obtained under the Tramways Act, 1870."

We are called on by the company to construe this agreement in such a manner as to hold the Tramways Company free from the force and obligation of the 9th clause of the General Tramway Act. Of the meaning of the 9th clause there is no doubt. It is said that the promoters have escaped from it; but it cannot be that promoters can easily escape from a clause of this nature. The argument urged is, that the promoters did not proceed by provisional order, but by Act of Parliament; and therefore it is said that the 9th clause does not apply. This argument is, in my opinion, not well founded. The Lord Provost and Magistrates, charged with protecting the interests, and especially the safety of the inhabitants of Edinburgh, were not content to leave the reference to the General Act as it stood under the 47th clause of the local Act. They, by the agreement with the promoters, brought the local Act within the reach and scope of the whole provisions of the General Act, inter alia, within the provisions of this 9th clause.

In the view which I take of the 9th clause as affecting not only the interest of the owners of houses on the street, but the interest and safety of the public, I think this is the construction of the agreement, which is to be presumed as being most in accordance with the duty and the presumable intentions of the parties to the agreement.

It has been contended that the words "provisional order obtained" must be obtained as a confirmed provisional order, having the force of statute, and if so it is argued that the 9th clause is not applicable, because its effect would be to prevent confirmation by Parliament, and the result of confirmation would be to exclude the previous provisions. I think that, in order to deal with this argument, it is important to ascertain the meaning of the word "obtain," as used in the Act, with reference to a provisional order. I am of opinion that the word "obtain" is used in the Act of 1870 in reference to an unconfirmed provisional order, or a provisional order in the course of procedure prior to confirmation, and therefore that there is no ground for contending that, in respect of the use of the word "obtain" in the agreement, the provisions in regard to the public procedure are shut out. This would be to defeat the true meaning of the Act

No 74.
Feb. 21, 1873.
Black, &c. v. Edinburgh Tramways Co.

very narrow technical objection. I may mention that the word "obtain" used with reference to unconfirmed orders in the 4th clause, and so also in 10th and 21st clauses. Still more important are the provisions of the 12th se, which enacts that a provisional order, being then unconfirmed, shall be ered by the Board of Trade to the promoters; then, by the 13th clause, the r so delivered shall be published; and by the 14th clause, on proof of the ication of the order thus delivered, the Board of Trade obtain confirmation sof from Parliament; after that the order has the force of statute. Now, I k that when this delivery for publication, with a view to confirmation, is a, the provisional order may be truly said to be "obtained by the promoters hom the delivery is made," the counterpart of the delivery being the accep- n or obtaining of the order.

ther instances might be given of the use of the word "obtain," but it is cessary. In my humble opinion, the whole provisions of the Act of 1870 pplicable to the Act of 1871. The construction proposed to us, by which words of the agreement are so read as to disengage the local Act from the isions of the 9th clause of the General Act, is far too narrow and critical to ound or safe.

n construing together the agreement of 1871, the local Act of 1871, and the eral Act of 1870, I think we must keep in view that the great end and aim he Legislature in regard to the construction of tramways in the streets of a t city must be, and doubtless was, the securing the public safety, and we t read this agreement bearing this in mind. If there be a doubt or difficulty onstruction we must read the agreements and the Acts so as to abate, if ible, the hazard to human life. The 9th clause affords important protection he public. It is on no light grounds that we can hold the clause of the Act Parliament excluded by force of construction of an agreement such as this. he company had proceeded by provisional order they could not, against the of these complainers, have laid down this tramway where it is and as it is. In present state and position the tramway complained of is unquestionably in ation of the 9th clause of the General Act, and it is complained of by parties itled to complain. It is equally clear that the tramway, as now laid along North Bridge, forming a continuous line with the portion specially com- ned of, is not laid in a manner consistent with the public safety. The space between the rail and the footpath is generally too small, and is in some es dangerously small. Of this fact we had recent painful experience.

by no means leave out of view the pleas founded on the Parliamentary plan the relative letterpress, which are certainly important, and which were ibly and ably urged in the judicious argument of Mr Mansfield. But I am prepared to say, either that, in respect of the Parliamentary authority given in tion to these plans and relative letterpress and notices, the 9th clause is re- ed, or that the company became entitled to set aside the provisions of the 9th se, and indeed to set them at defiance, or that the objections of the com- ners are now excluded as too late. The argument was ingenious, but not to mind conclusive.

Unless the 9th clause of the General Act was intended to be continued as a tection to the public, and unless it was imported into the local Act, I cannot why the first head of the first agreement was made part of the local Act at or why the whole of the General Act,—and not merely the second and third ts,—should be made applicable to the local Act. I observe that the Lord linary asks this question, a very natural question, I think, and I have heard satisfactory reply.

I cannot admit that the parties meant to introduce into this important part of agreement words without meaning. That is never presumed, and there is no on to believe it here.

In the whole matter, I cannot suppose that the Legislature intended in 1871 ject as inapplicable the protection to the public contained in the important vision made in the 9th clause of the General Act of 1870. Nor can I suppose the Lord Provost and Magistrates of Edinburgh, charged with the duty of ecting the public interests and guarding the public safety, in a matter necessarily calling for anxious and cautious provision, did agree to liberate th pany from this most important statutory limitation of their powers.

No. 74.

Feb. 21, 1873.
Black, &c. v. Edinburgh Tramways Co.

The extent of free space on the street along the line of tramway is, opinion, a matter of the deepest importance, not only to the interest o complainers, but to the safety of the public. The effect of enforcing clause of the General Act is to prevent the construction of a double tramways in this narrow thoroughfare, contrary to the expressed dissent complainers. A single line would leave the necessary free space. A dou in that place, and as now laid, is dangerous. The authority or provisio subsequent local Acts must, I think, be viewed as given under the c that the persons interested as these complainers are do not dissent.

Taking that into consideration, and fairly construing the statutes agreement, I concur in the judgment which the Lord Ordinary has pro

LORD JERVISWOODE.—I may state that on all the points which appear to the determination of the question here raised I concur in the judgm posed to be pronounced by Lord Deas and Lord Ardmillan.

LORD PRESIDENT.—As I have the misfortune to differ not only from t Ordinary, but from all your Lordships, I think it right to state the gr my opinion in some detail. The complainers are occupiers of houses, s warehouses in or abutting upon the portion of North Bridge Street which from the south end of the North Bridge to High Street. They const they say, more than one-third of the whole occupiers of the houses in tha of the street. Their complaint, and the remedy which they seek, is entirely to that portion of the street. I am not, therefore, inclined, n consider myself entitled, to offer any opinion as to the rights of the Tr Company in that part of the North Bridge which is not between the ho is open, for no such question can, by any possibility, be raised by thi The prayer of the note of suspension and interdict distinctly limits the to that portion of the street which extends from the south end of th Bridge to the High Street of Edinburgh. Now, the ground of the com that the tramways, in traversing that portion of the street, approach near feet 6 inches to the curb-stone of the pavement for a space of more than in length, and the complainers maintain that that is illegal under the A Tramways Company. If I were entitled to consider this as a questio pediency I should be inclined to agree with a great deal of what has b by your Lordships, for I consider that nothing could be more undesira the construction of such a tramway as now exists upon the North Bridg city. But it appears to me that such considerations are irrelevant in t tion, which depends entirely upon the construction of an Act of Parliame 5th section of the special Act provides that, "subject to the provisions of t and the Acts and parts of Acts incorporated herewith, the company ma form, lay down, and maintain the tramways hereinafter described, in the l according to the levels shewn on the deposited plans and sections, and i spects in accordance with those plans and sections, the tramways herein scribed, with all proper rails, plates, works, and conveniences connected th and may enter upon, take, and use such of the lands delineated on the sa and described in the deposited books of reference to those plans respect may be required for that purpose." Now, in order to understand precisely the power thus given to the Tramways Company; it is, of course, indispe look at that part of the plan applicable to the North Bridge, for the purpos ing what are the lines and levels according to which the tramways are to down. The first thing that we observe, upon looking to the Parliamentary that throughout the whole course of the North Bridge, including both po North Bridge Street, both that at the north end and that at the south end, laid down upon the plan a double line of tramways. There is therefore pow to lay down a double line of tramways along the whole way, and the Pa tary plan contains not only drawings, but also certain printed descrptions, w of the highest importance. Upon that sheet of the drawings we have this "For description and position of centre line in each tramway see sheet N

No. 74.

Feb. 21, 1873.
Black, &c. v. Edinburgh Tramways Co.

is, sheet No. 1 of the volume entitled "Parliamentary Plan." Now, when we s to sheet No. 1 of that volume, which is thus made part of the statute, for purpose of affording an accurate description of the works to be executed, nd this statement:—That there are to be several lines of tramways connect- he different parts of the city, and the sixth of these lines is a line which from the Edinburgh General Post-Office to Newington. The tramways g that line are called in this part of the Parliamentary plan, and are also d in the body of the statute itself, No. 6 and No. 6A. No. 6 is the eastern of the double line of tramways along the North Bridge, No. 6A is the western —here again shewing how distinctly the company are authorised to make ne line, but two lines of tramways along the whole of the North Bridge. description proceeds to shew how, after passing the North Bridge, the double of tramways is continued along the South Bridge, Nicolson Street, and various r streets, until it reaches Newington, and then there occurs this passage, h appears to me to be of vital importance in this question:—"The centre of proposed tramway No. 6 will be throughout at the distance of 4 feet 6 s from and on the left-hand side (proceeding from the commencement to the ination of the tramway) of the imaginary centre line of each of the streets oads through which it is intended to pass, except that from a point one a north of the north end of the bridge carrying the street or road called the h Bridge over the North British Railway the centre line of the tramway gradually diverge from the said imaginary centre line, until at the north end e said bridge it attains the distance of 8 feet 6 inches from and on the left- l side (proceeding as aforesaid) of the imaginary centre line of the roadway he bridge, and thence to the south end of the said bridge (at a point imme- ly over the south side of Low Market Street) it will continue at the last-men- d distance from and on the left-hand side (proceeding as aforesaid) of the inary centre line of the said roadway, and thence will again gradually approach l in the length of one chain it reaches the distance of 4 feet 6 inches from and he left-hand side (proceeding as aforesaid) of the imaginary centre line of the t." And then there is a corresponding description of the western tramway a the same ground, which is called Tramway No. 6A. This is a very minute ription, and it is perhaps clothed in rather too many words. It might be com- d in a very small number of words, for it amounts to no more than this, that of the two tramways passing along the North Bridge and North Bridge Street be at its centre 4 feet 6 inches from the centre of the street, except that in open part of the bridge it is to be a great deal further from the centre. At open point it is to be 8 feet 6 inches from the centre. I have already said it is needless to deal with that portion of the bridge which is unenclosed houses, because it is not within this case in any form whatever, and therefore only important point here is, that the centre line of No. 6, and equally the e line of No. 6A, in passing along North Bridge Street, must be 4 feet 6 inches, her more nor less, from the centre line of the street. Now, that being matter sitive enactment, from which the Tramways Company cannot escape, let us what the necessary consequence of this is. It is stated in the 9th article of the descendence that "the distance between the curb-stone on the west side and the b-stone on the east side of the North Bridge Street measures only from 31 feet inches at the top to 32 feet 6 inches at the bottom of the said street; and if uble line of rails is laid down in said street, with the usual distance between two inner rails, the space intervening between the outside of the footpath either side of the road and the nearest rail of the tramway will be less than and 6 inches." That is admitted. Parties, therefore, are agreed on that; it is better not to leave a matter of such vital importance in the construction statute even to the admission of parties, and I therefore proceed to shew it is certainly the case, and that it is physically impossible otherwise to truct the tramways. The total breadth between the footpath at the nar- t part is 31 feet 10 inches, one-half of which is 15 feet 11 inches. One of the street, therefore, on each side of the imaginary line of the centre is t 11 inches from the curb-stone. The centre line of each tramway is 4 6 inches from the centre line of the street; and must be, as a matter of

No. 74.

Feb. 21, 1873. Black, &c. v. Edinburgh Tramways Co.

statutory enactment. That leaves 11 feet 5 inches of breadth from t line of the tramway to the curb-stone. The breadth of the guage of t way is fixed by section 25 of the General Act at 4 feet 8½ inches. No one-half of that space, viz.,—2 feet 4¼ inches from the remaining bread feet 5 inches, there remain only 9 feet and ¾ of an inch between the c of each tramway and the curb-stone. It seems to me, therefore, to b matically demonstrable that it is impossible to construct the lines of t authorised by this Act of Parliament in such a way as to escape result that the space between the outer line of each tramway and the c shall be less than 9 feet 6 inches. If, again, you take the broad p street, where the total breadth is 32 feet 6 inches between the curb-st will find a corresponding result. The distance, then, between the out the tramway and the curb-stone on each side will not be so small former case, but it will still be under 9 feet 6 inches. It seems t monstrable, then, that this Act of Parliament has authorised the Company to make a double line of railway along the North Bridge, an it in such a way that in that part of North Bridge Street to which th complaint refers there must be, throughout the whole of it, a less spac
the outer line of each tramway and the curb-stone than 9 feet 6 inche it is quite possible that, notwithstanding this very distinct authorit the Tramways Company by their statute, there may be other clauses i of Parliament which prevent the company from carrying it into execu
I understand it to be the opinion of your Lordships that the line is to be laid down as it has been laid down, but that, notwithstanding it authorised to be laid down, it is illegal. That appears to me to be construction of an Act of Parliament; but still it may be so. Som Parliament are very oddly framed, and even self-contradictory; and w quite sure we have not such an Act of Parliament to deal with here.
immaterial to notice, in connection with the authority so given to tramways, without reference to the 9 feet 6 inches measurement, that clause in this special Act which contemplates the construction of within 9 feet 6 inches of the pavement, and provides a remedy, or at vides for the abatement of any inconvenience thence arising. The 8 provides that "where in any road in which a double line of tramw there shall be less width between the outside of the footpath on eith the road and the nearest rail of the tramway than 9 feet 6 inches, the shall, and they are hereby required, to construct a passing-place or p necting the one tramway with the other, and by means of such passin places the traffic shall, when necessary, be diverted from the one tramw other." Now, surely, if there is in this statute, either by incorporat any other way, a provision that there shall be no tramway within 9 fee of the pavement, this was an unnecessary clause. But it was a necess if that authority which I have shewn had been given to the company full force, and is not derogated from by any other part of the statute.
said that there is anything in the clauses of the special Act itself, or the general statutes incorporated with the special Act, that affects this or that could be construed so as to derogate from the authority giv leading section of the special Act—the fifth section—with the relati mentary plan. But it is said that there are three agreements, which porated with the statute, and which have the effect of introducing statute a provision that no line of tramways shall be constructed in complained of in this suspension and interdict. It is needless, as y ships have said, to refer to more than one of these agreements, for th substantially the same; but it is of some importance probably to obs the present complainers are not parties to any of these agreements.
mean to say that the complainers or any of the other inhabitants of E may not be very well entitled to avail themselves of stipulations made of the community by the Provost and Magistrates. But it must be mind that they are not parties to this agreement, and at the same time Provost and Magistrates, as the local authority, are bound by these ag h as the Tramways Company. Now, there is one clause in the agree-en the Tramways Company and the Magistrates of Edinburgh which ne to be of great importance. Under the statute all that was done power the Tramways Company to make these lines of tramway.

ey might be compelled to make them we need not consider, but so nguage of the statute is concerned they were only empowered and to make the lines. But under the second head of this agreement ound to make the lines, and they are bound to make them precisely ) the description in the Parliamentary plan. Here is the section :—
d party bind and oblige themselves and the said company to proceed r after the said bill shall become law to lay down, construct, and amways described in the said bill, and shewn on the Parliamentary Haymarket to Leith, and from the Edinburgh General Post-Office on," and some others particularly mentioned. Now, here stands an which the Lord Provost and Magistrates are entitled to enforce, and ll we know, they are prepared to enforce. We must assume that epared to enforce it, and to compel the Tramways Company to lay lines upon the North Bridge and North Bridge Street, according to entary plan. And is it to be said that, under an Act of Parliament g this agreement, there is another party who is entitled to interfere ' that shall not be done." What is the Tramways Company to do in stances? Are they to fulfil the express terms of their agreement to thority—the Provost and Magistrates—or are they to comply with ction of a clause of this agreement which the occupiers of houses in ge Street are seeking to enforce against them, to prevent them from which the local authority requires them to do? It is a very singular that be the case, and it is about the last conclusion that I should lopt—that either the Act of Parliament or an agreement embodied of Parliament should place the promoters of an undertaking in such hat they must do, and at the same time not do, the very thing autho-Act of Parliament. But the real question comes to be, whether the f the agreement which has been referred to is really susceptible of ction that has been put upon it. It consists, I think, of two parts; s of any practical force or effect at all. It is of some consequence to between these two parts. The first is this,—"The parties hereto of rt, as the local authority aforesaid, shall have the whole rights, l privileges which the Tramways Act, 1870, or any other general
; to tramways now in force, or which may hereafter pass during this or session of Parliament, confer or may hereafter confer upon the local f any district." Does that mean anything, or does it really confer al authority, the first party to this agreement, anything that they do without it? They shall have all power which any Act of Parliament r may give. Is there any virtue in that? If there be, still it was , for it is contained in one of the clauses of the special Act, viz., the provides,—"Nothing herein contained shall be deemed or construed e tramways from the provisions of any general Act relating to tramways , or which may hereafter pass during this or any future session of " It is not very easy to see how people are to be subject to the ope-ubsequent Act of Parliament, unless that Act of Parliament applies d if the Act of Parliament applies to them, the antecedent agree-ecessary, so that really the whole of this first half of the first head t consists of words without meaning. Now, we proceed to consider art,—"And the whole provisions of the said Acts shall apply to 'arliament which the said second party is now promoting, or to any iament which they or the company may hereafter obtain, as fully in t as if the same were a provisional order obtained under the Tram-370." Now, I quite agree that before we can make anything of this of the agreement we must distinctly understand what is meant by ' obtained under the Tramways Act, 1870." It is said, although r a recent discovery in the arguments, that a provisional order ob-

No. 74.

Feb. 21, 1873.
Black, &c. v. Edinburgh Tramways Co.

tained in this way means a provisional order obtained from the Board of Trade but not confirmed by Parliament. The Lord Ordinary is of an opposite opinion. He holds that it means a provisional order obtained and confirmed by Act of Parliament. And the counsel for the complainers, in stating the argument before us, adopted the same construction; but that was withdrawn, and cannot now be founded on. But let us consider the question on its merits. If the special Act of Parliament is to be dealt with as a provisional order "obtained from the Board of Trade, but not confirmed by Parliament, what is the consequence? The Tramways Company cannot lay down a rail, or use a spade, pick to raise a stone of the street. They have no authority whatever, because provisional order, until confirmed by Parliament, is absolutely worthless. It is to say that a special Act of Parliament which has passed both Houses of Parliament, and received the royal assent, is to be in the same position as a provisional order obtained from the Board of Trade, and not confirmed by Parliament is surely too startling a proposition to receive ready assent. If it is to be a provisional order still unconfirmed it surely, at least, must have the right to procure confirmation. Now, in what form is Parliament to confirm an Act which they have already passed? How is the House of Commons to entertain a bill for the purpose of confirming an Act of Parliament which has already obtained the royal assent? These are questions I cannot answer, and it is partly because I cannot answer these questions that I am driven to the necessity of adhering to the construction adopted by the Lord Ordinary,—that the provisional order intended under the first head of this agreement means a provisional order not only obtained from the Board of Trade, but subsequently confirmed by Parliament. The object of framing a provisional order by the Board of Trade is nothing more nor less than to save the time of Parliament. Instead of both Houses of Parliament appointing committees to consider a bill, the whole thing is done by the Board of Trade putting the matter in the form of a provisional order; and it seems to me a convenient and handy arrangement for the purpose of expediting public business. But the Board of Trade has no more right to make an Act of Parliament, or to give the authority to make a tramway, than any private person. That department merely prepares materials for Parliament, and when the provisional order is framed and adjusted and delivered to the promoters it has to be laid before Parliament, in order that it may be confirmed and converted into an Act of Parliament. But when it is converted into an Act of Parliament it is to be read just like any other Act, and therefore, if this special Act is to be dealt with as a provisional order confirmed by Act of Parliament I cannot see what benefit any person obtains from that greater than would have in dealing with it as a special Act. In short, in the result, a provisional order confirmed, and a special Act, is one and the same thing. somehow or other it is said that a provisional order could not have been obtained without having in it the provisions contained in the 9th section of the General Tramways Act. Now, that is a very unintelligible proposition to me, and I cannot see how it is arrived at. The first part of the General Tramways Act provides almost exclusively for the way in which provisional orders are to be obtained and carried through, not for the way in which they are to be construed after they are carried through; not for the way in which tramways are to be constructed under them; and not for the way in which tramways are to be managed after they are constructed,—for the construction of a tramway and the mode of management form the subject-matter exclusively of the second and third parts of the General Tramways Act; and, accordingly, the second and third parts of the General Tramways Act are incorporated by force of that General Act itself into every special Act and every provisional order alike. There is, however, no mention of the incorporation of the first part either in a special Act or provisional order, for this very obvious reason, that the whole functions of the first part of the statute have come to an end when either a special Act or a provisional order has been obtained,—that is to say, obtained in the sense of having passed through Parliament. The promoters of the undertaking, when they proceed to apply for a provisional order, are obliged to give notice and deposit documents, very much in the same way as if they were applying for

No. 74.

Feb. 21, 1873.

Black, &c. v. Edinburgh Tramways Co.

cial Act. The Board of Trade is authorised by the 7th section to con- er the application, to make various inquiries, and then, after this inquiry, y are authorised to make a provisional order. Then we are told what that visional order is to contain. It is to contain all provisions necessary to regu- the form, construction, and use of the tramways. In other words, it is just ontain everything that would be contained in a special Act. And then s the 9th section :—"Every tramway in a town which is hereafter autho- by provisional order shall be constructed and maintained, as nearly as may in the middle of the road; and no tramway shall be authorised by any pro- nal order to be so laid that for a distance of 30 feet or upwards a less than 9 feet and 6 inches shall intervene between the outside of the foot- on either side of the road and the nearest rail of the tramway, if one-third he owners, or one-third of the occupiers, of the houses, shops, or warehouses ting upon the part of the road where such less space shall intervene as afore- shall, in the prescribed manner and at the prescribed time, express their nt from any tramway being so laid." Now, this is plainly nothing more a direction to the Board of Trade, just like a standing order of either se of Parliament. It would be just as easily expressed in a standing order at any committee of this House shall authorise," and so forth, and that ding order shall be binding upon the House of Parliament that enacted But when an Act is passed that has received the royal assent, of what l is a standing order? If this special Act of Parliament had been a pro- nal order obtained from the Board of Trade, and subsequently confirmed Parliament, and contained, as this special Act does, authority to lay down s rails in the manner objected to, this 9th section could have been of no l. To shew how completely this portion of the statute deals entirely with e preliminary proceedings, it may be worth while to shew what follows this section :—The nature of the traffic has been specified in the provisional r; then the costs of the order are provided for, and then we come to the very of the order by the Board of Trade to the promoters, and the provi- for the publication of that order before it can be confirmed by Parliament; then the 14th section provides,—"On proof to the satisfaction of the rd of Trade of the completion of such publication as aforesaid, the Board of le shall, as soon as they conveniently can after the expiration of seven days a the completion of such publication, procure a bill to be introduced into er House of Parliament, in relation to any provisional order which shall have a published as aforesaid, not later than the 25th of April in any year, for an to confirm the provisional order, which shall be set out at length in the dule to the bill; and until confirmation, with or without amendment, by Act Parliament a provisional order under this Act shall not have any operation." n it is provided that when a bill is introduced into Parliament it may be re- d to a select committee; but when the bill is once passed then the Act of liament confirming the provisional order under the Act shall be deemed a lic general Act. And if this had been a provisional order in its original n and conception it would now be as much a public general Act of Parlia- t as this special Act really is. I think, therefore, that this reference in first head of the agreement, referred to in the special Act of Parliament, ly gives no aid whatever to the complainers in their present contention. nnot be held absolutely to annul and abrogate the powers which the spe- Act contains. Unless it can do that it can be of no avail, for there is ct and express powers to make these two lines of tramway along North ge Street within a less distance than 9 feet 6 inches of the pavement of r side; and nothing but an express contradiction or a repeal of that can ibly take away the power. I am, therefore, constrained, without considera- of those other matters that have been imported into the discussions, to to the conclusion that, upon the construction of this Act of Parliament, lines of tramways could be constructed in no other manner than they have constructed, and are authorised to be constructed; and that the Tramways pany, by their special Act incorporating the agreement with the town of

No. 74.

Feb. 21, 1873.
Black, &c. v. Edinburgh Tramways Co.

Edinburgh, are compellable so to construct these lines. They have no For these reasons I differ from the judgment pronounced by your Lordsh

THE following interlocutor was pronounced:—"Adhere to the Ordinary's interlocutor, and refuse the reclaiming note, a the motion of the complainers, decern and ordain the respo to remove the tramways laid by them in and along the por North Bridge Street, Edinburgh, which extends from the end of the North Bridge to the High Street, and decern and the respondents to restore the carriage-way of that por North Bridge Street to its former condition: Interdict, p and discharge the respondents from making or constructi tramway along the said portion of North Bridge Street i manner that for a distance of thirty feet or upwards a les than nine feet and six inches shall intervene between th stone of the pavement on either side of the street and the rail of the tramway, and decern: Find the complainers ent the expenses of process, allow an account," &c.

MILLAR, ALLARDICE, & ROBSON, W.S.—LINDSAY, PATERSON, & HALL, W.S.—A

No. 75.

Feb. 22, 1873.
Lord Advocate v. The Clyde Steam Navigation Co.

THE LORD ADVOCATE (for Board of Trade and Commissioners of Cu Pursuer.—Sol.-Gen. Clark—Rutherfurd.

THE CLYDE STEAM NAVIGATION COMPANY, Defenders,—Watson Lancaster.

Ship-Measurement—Merchant Shipping Act, 1854, sub-sections 4 a section 21.—A ship was constructed with an awning deck above the tonnage deck, and separated from the forecastle and poop by two gap tings extending completely across the vessel, the cuttings being closed b able planks or hatches not fastened down or rendered water-tight. H that the space between the awning deck and main deck was not "a pa closed-in space on the upper deck available for cargo or stores, or for the l or accommodation of passengers or crew," in terms of sub-section 4 of se of the Merchant Shipping Act, 1854 (17 and 18 Vict., 104); and (2) t vessel had not "a third deck, commonly called a spar deck," within the m of the provisions of sub-section 5 of section 21 of the said Act.

2D DIVISION. Lord Gifford. R.

THIS was an action at the instance of the Lord Advocate, on of the Board of Trade and Commissioners of Customs, again Clyde Steam Navigation Company, to have it found and declare the steam-ship "Bear," of Glasgow, belonging to the defenders, wa tonnage of not less than 585·46 tons, and that the defenders were to deliver up a former certificate of registry, under the penalty, i failed to do so, that the vessel should no longer be considered as a l vessel, or entitled to the privileges thereof.

The "Bear," which was built on the Clyde, was contracted for defenders in January 1870; and when ready she was registered examination by the registrar of shipping at Glasgow, as of 331·97 n tonnage. After trading with the vessel for some time the def made certain alterations upon her, whereby her tonnage was incr and the defenders intimated this fact to the registrar of shipping a gow, with a view to the correction of the register and certificate of try. The increase of tonnage consequent upon these alterations w more than seventy tons; but the surveying officer, under the dir of the Board of Trade and Commissioners of Customs, increased he tered tonnage from 331·97 to 585·46 tons. This increase was i

No. 75.

Feb. 22, 1873.
Lord Advocate v. The Clyde Steam Navigation Co.

the ground that the vessel was three-decked, or had a "permanent ered-in space" on the upper deck, and that the space between this er deck or covering and the tonnage deck, which had not been in- ed in the past survey of the ship, should be included in the measure- t of the ship's tonnage, under the Merchant Shipping Act, 1854, sec- 21, sub-sections 4 and 5. The defenders denied that there was a l deck, or a permanent covered-in space, within the meaning of the isions of the statute, and averred that the covering under dispute was rricane deck, covering portions of the ordinary deck, "making the more safe, and insuring the greater comfort of the passengers gene- , especially of steerage passengers, and also so far protecting cattle other live stock, but not forming a spar or third deck, and not in- sing the carrying capacity of the vessel, and not forming a closed-in e in the sense of the statute, but having, on the contrary, a variety ermanent openings." The openings measured respectively 13 feet ches, and 8 feet 6 inches wide, and extended completely across the el.

he Lord Ordinary pronounced an interlocutor, remitting to Mr William lumford, Lloyd's surveyor, Glasgow, to examine the "Bear" as to present state and condition of the main deck of said vessel, and of erections, structures, and coverings thereon, as far as the same relate r bear upon the question as to the measurement of the registered nage of the said steam-ship."

Mr Mumford accordingly examined the vessel, and reported, inter alia, the upper deck in dispute was an "awning deck," which the reporter not consider a continuous deck, as it was separated by openings com- ely across the vessel, which were only covered by moveable planks, fastened down or rendered water-tight. The reporter defined an ning deck" as a lightly-constructed deck over a main or weather , the main deck being fitted with coverings and hatches, as in the of a deck entirely exposed to the weather. It also appeared from report that a considerable portion of the main deck was necessary for working of the ship; that the "awning deck" was not water-tight, so o ensure the safety of cargo placed upon the main deck; and that if "Bear" were loaded as a three decked ship usually is she could not safety be sent to sea.

he Lord Ordinary, on 12th November 1872, pronounced this interlocu- —"The Lord Ordinary having heard parties' procurators, and having idered the closed record, the report by Mr Mumford, No. 12 of process, whole process, finds that, according to the sound construction of 'The chant Shipping Act, 1854,' and relative regulations, the space above the a or tonnage deck of the steam-ship 'Bear,' intervening between the aft of the forecastle and the front of the poop, ought not to be measured ncluded as part of the register tonnage of the said steam-ship, reserv- to measure any separate deck-house constructed on the main deck reen said points; and to this extent and effect assoilzies from the de- atory conclusions of the action, and decerns: And, with the above ing, appoints the cause to be enrolled, that parties may agree upon, or a remit may be made to ascertain, the measurement in conformity the above finding: Finds the defenders entitled to the expenses erto incurred by them, and remits the account thereof, when lodged, e Auditor of Court to tax the same, and to report." *

---

* NOTE.—The Lord Ordinary had occasion to consider the question raised e present process in a similar action which he decided in the beginning e present year.

No. 75. The pursuer reclaimed. At advising,—

Feb. 22, 1873. Lord Advocate v. The Clyde Steam Navigation Co.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—The question involved in this case is of some no The action is one at the instance of the Lord Advocate, as representi

"The question related to the steam-ship 'Danzig,' of Leith, and the Ordinary's judgment is dated 30th January 1872. This judgment was esced in by both parties, and the 'Danzig' was measured in conformity with.[1]

"The Lord Ordinary still adheres to the views expressed in the note judgment in the case of the 'Danzig;' and as the question in the present turns upon the same clauses in the Merchant Shipping Act, and invol same considerations, the Lord Ordinary ventures respectfully to refer to terlocutor and note of 30th January 1872, which he holds as repeated he is No. 19 of the present process.

"But although the questions and principles raised in the present ca tive to the steam-ship 'Bear' are of the same nature as those formerly relative to the steam-ship 'Danzig,' still, as the construction of the s somewhat different, the application of the principles and rules of the must be carefully considered in relation to the actual structure of the ship 'Bear,' and the Lord Ordinary must acknowledge that he feels t much greater difficulty and nicety in dealing with the 'Bear' than wi 'Danzig.'

"Indeed it was very ingeniously and forcibly urged by the pursuers t reference to the 'Bear' there was just the element which was awanting case of the 'Danzig,' viz., a complete closing in of the whole space und awning deck, by planking both fore and aft; while in the 'Danzig' the always an opening aft, and it was maintained that the 'Bear' was just an i of the case put under the fifth head of the Lord Ordinary's note in the 'D case, and no doubt it is just here that the difficulty of the case arises.

"On the whole, however, the Lord Ordinary has come to be of opini the space under the awning deck of the 'Bear,' including the space f between the forecastle and the awning deck, and the space aft betwe awning deck and the poop, are not measurable for tonnage under the Of course the Lord Ordinary leaves out of view any engine-rooms o houses under the awning deck, which, as closed-in spaces, fall to be sep dealt with.

"Two views were urged by the pursuers, both leading to the conclusi the whole space between forecastle and poop fell to be measured and in in the tonnage of the ship.

"First, it was maintained that, looking to the structure of what is the upper or awning deck of the 'Bear,' with the coverings which con that deck with the forecastle in front and with the poop behind, the really formed, in the sense of the statute (section 21, sub-section 5), 's deck, commonly called a spar deck.' Of course, if this is the case, th whole space under the spar deck must be measured in terms of sai section 5.

"The answer to this seems to the Lord Ordinary to be satisfactory, t covering in question is not a 'spar deck,' but only 'parts of an awning This is expressly reported by Mr Mumford, whose report has not in an ticular been objected to.

"Now, an awning deck, as its very name implies, is quite different f spar deck. Its purpose is not to form a third deck, constituting a hold tween-decks below it, but merely to form a shelter or awning for the m weather deck, which remains complete as before. Nothing can be carr the top of the awning-deck, which is not in any way protected by bulwar

[1] This case (Leith, Hull, and Hamburg Steam-Packet Company v. the Advocate) is reported postea.

No. 75.

Feb. 22, 1873.

Lord Advocate v. The Clyde Steam Navigation Co.

ard of Trade, and the summons concludes to have it found and declared that s steam-ship "Bear" of Glasgow is of a tonnage not less than 585·46 tons, and t the defenders, the owners, are bound to deliver up a former certificate of istry, under the penalty that, if they fail to do so, the vessel shall no longer considered a British vessel, or entitled to the privileges of one.

[It seems that this vessel, the "Bear," was built on the Clyde, and registered 1870 in usual form. Her tonnage was then registered as 331·97. She ich is a mere cover stretched over the proper bulwarks of the ship, and thus ltering as an awning does the main deck of the ship. The scuppers and other al openings are all on the main deck, just as if there was no awning deck, l there is no provision for closing these so as to make the space between the in deck and the awning deck in any sense of the word one of the 'tween-ks of the ship.

---

"It would be most unjust to deal with this awning deck, or parts of an awn-g deck, as if it were a third or spar deck, for this would be to compute the nage of the ship as if she might be loaded so as to sink her main or middle k below the water line,—a thing utterly impossible with the 'Bear,' as is ly explained by Mr Mumford in the last answer of his report, and in the tch annexed thereto.

"The Lord Ordinary, therefore, in the face of Mr Mumford's report to the trary, cannot hold the 'awning deck,' or 'partial awning deck,' of the 'Bear' be a 'spar deck' under the statute. But—

"Second, the alternative view was chiefly insisted in by the pursuers, that all events the space under the awning deck was a 'closed-in space' or 'per-nent closed-in space' in the sense of sub-section 4 of section 21 of the statute d relative regulations. It was ingeniously contended that the plankings or agways, by means of which the cuts or gaps fore and aft of the awning deck ight be closed up in a storm were permanent closings, just as a door or hatch-ay is a permanent closing, though they are made to open and to shut.

"This seems to the Lord Ordinary to be the only difficult point in the case. t the Lord Ordinary has come to the conclusion that these plankings, which, er all, are only occasionally used, do not constitute a permanent closed-in ace within the meaning of the Act.

"They are only used in storms, and to avoid or prevent to a great extent seas om being shipped on the main deck. They are not caulked, and cannot be id so as to exclude the water. The doors at the sides also would admit large antities of water, varying according to the pressure, and the space below uld not possibly in a storm be kept dry. Now, to justify measurement, the ace to be measured must not only be 'permanent,' or 'permanently closed in,' t it must be 'available for cargo, or stores, or for the berthing or accommoda-n of passengers or crew.' This does not refer to deck cargo or deck stores, e space for which is never measured, but to perishable cargo, which must be pt dry; and it is plain from Mr Mumford's report that such cargo could not stored there, nor could passengers or crew be berthed there. Still, further, e space is to a large extent necessary for the working of the vessel, and for cesses to the engine-room, coal and ash-shoots, and to some of the pumps d sounding-rods. The statute never intended such spaces to be measured as ailable for cargo.

"In the whole circumstances, therefore, and while feeling that the case is tended with nicety, the Lord Ordinary adopts the view of the defenders. If could have been shewn in this case, or if it shall appear in any other case, at an attempt is made merely to evade the provisions of the statute, and to t the benefit of a proper hold or 'tween-decks, without having it measured, e Court will at once defeat such an attempt. Even when the matter comes to a nice question of degree the Court would be slow to interfere with the judg-nt and discretion of the Board of Trade officials; but in the present case it pears to the Lord Ordinary that they are seeking to include as tonnage mea-rement space which, according to the sound view of the statute, cannot be nsidered as such."

No. 75.

Feb. 22, 1873.

Lord Advocate v. The Clyde Steam Navigation Co.

thereafter was engaged in the trade between the Clyde and Ireland. O some alterations in the cabin accommodation of the ship it became neces her again to be registered; and on this occasion the surveying offic directions, it is said, of the Board of Trade, increased her registered ton the amount specified in the summons, that is, from 331·97 to 585·46. I not to be disputed that the greater part of this addition arises from the s having included a space between the forecastle and the poop as being sul measurement which had not been so included in the former survey. The have resisted this addition, and hence the present action has been brough

The question involved depends on the meaning of two sub-sections of the clauses of the Merchant Shipping Act, 17 and 18 Vict. c. 104. had been previous statutory provisions on the subject, but this statute intr from section 20 to section 29, very detailed rules for ascertaining the t of vessels prior to their entering the register. I need not go over the pr detail, but the object is by ascertaining the cubic contents, and thereafte ing them by a given formula, to ascertain, not the absolute, but the carrying capacity of the vessel for many important purposes. These rules suffer modifications, first, in the case of a vessel "having a break o or other permanent closed-in space, on the upper deck, available for cargo or or for the berthing or accommodation of passengers or crew," which case vided for in sub-section 4 of section 21; and secondly, if the ship has " deck, commonly called a spar deck," which is provided for in sub-section 5 same section. There are other modifications of the general rule in reg engine space and otherwise, which need not be referred to. The question we have to consider is, whether this vessel has a third deck, commonly c spar deck, in the sense of sub-section 5, or whether the space in questi break or poop, or other permanent closed-in space, on the upper deck, sense of sub-section 4.

The Lord Ordinary has not allowed a proof of the averments of parti remitted to Mr Mumford, Lloyd's surveyor, to report on the vessel. T fenders, the shipowners, were anxious to have a proof, but this was resi the part of the pursuer, and the case now comes to us as a concluded ca Mr Mumford's report. I am not disposed to disturb the Lord Ordinary's in that matter, although the report, which is very able and distinct, leave facts not altogether cleared up. The state of the vessel is so clearly descri the report, and in the very lucid note of the Lord Ordinary, that I shall c myself with very shortly expressing my opinion on the two questions wh thus raised for judgment.

I am of opinion, in the first place, that the raised portion of the vessel the main or tonnage deck is not a third deck in the sense of the 5th sub- of the 21st section. It is quite true that when the openings in this upp struction are covered there is a continuous platform from stem to stern. appears that the ship is to a large extent worked from the top of this uppe although it is also true that the main or tonnage deck retains to some exte character of a weather deck, and that the scuppers or outlets for water are there, and not on the upper deck. But the conclusive ground on whic impossible to hold that this covering or platform, although capable of being continuous from stem to stern, can be considered as a third deck is, that the at the termination of each of the openings of the space in question, which down nearly to the level of the main deck, are not so constructed as to be capa resisting the pressure of the sea. The answer of Mr Mumford to the last qu makes it clear that the result of this is that it is impossible to load the to the depth to which, if this were a proper third deck, she ought to ad being loaded. It would also seem that the fact of the scuppers being plac and opening from, the main deck has the same effect. If the vessel were l to the depth to which a three decked vessel ought to be capable of being l she would not be seaworthy.

The second question is one of more difficulty. The words of sub-sec are singularly deficient in precision; but, taking the report which we h the only evidence in the case, I am unable to say that the space in questi

No. 75.

Feb. 22, 1873.
Lord Advocate v. The Clyde Steam Navigation Co.

manent closed-in space which is available for cargo or stores, or for the thing or accommodation of passengers or crew. I think the space is permanent, notwithstanding that the covering of the two openings is removeable. is capable of being permanently used in its closed condition, and that is all ich is required by this section. It is certainly also closed in where the planks laid across these openings. But then, on the information we have before us, annot affirm the proposition that this space is available for cargo—understanding thereby perishable cargo—or for the berthing of passengers or crew; d for this simple reason, that, as this vessel is constructed, the space in ques-n is not water-tight,—it is not protected from the action of the water while sea. The report brings out quite distinctly that the doors are not of sufficient ength to resist the action of the sea or to exclude the water, and that the vering is in no respect adapted to protect or secure the space below from jury by the waves. The only doubt which I have had in this matter is ether, although this is undoubtedly the state of the vessel as she appeared hen surveyed, she might not, with very little mechanical contrivance, be made rely water-tight as to the space in question; and I observe that Mr Mumford, hen asked the question whether these openings might not be made water-tight being covered by tarpaulins, does not answer the question, but contents him-lf with saying that there is no evidence of any fastenings having been provided adopted for that purpose. If it had appeared that the nature of the con-ction of these openings was such that any ordinary appliances might have cured and protected the cargo below, I should have thought that the existing te of the vessel was a mere evasion of the Act. But we are left without any idence on that matter, and the Crown has asked for a judgment on the case it stands. The defenders, on the other hand, entirely deny that they have ed or can use this space for the purposes of the stowage of perishable cargo. ey say, and I have no reason to doubt the statement from the evidence before , that the main object of covering the space in question is to protect the deck go, viz., the cattle, which form a main staple of their trade between the Clyde d Ireland. The clause in the statute can only be read as applicable to perish-ble cargo, which requires to be protected during its transit; and there seems tle doubt on the description of the vessel which is given us that, as it stands, e space in question would not be a proper or legitimate place in which to stow ishable cargo.

Something was said in the debate as to the effect of the closing in of the space question in a case of general average. I think it unnecessary to deal with is illustration, because I think it inapplicable. It may quite well be, looking the more modern views on the subject, that the removal of the deck cargo m a position where it would impede the navigation of the vessel, and the ditional protection afforded by the covering, might entitle the owner to the nefit of general average, although the space might be entirely unfitted for the owage of perishable cargo or for the berthing of passengers.

This is not so clear a case as that of the "Danzig," but I concur in the Lord dinary's judgment.

The other Judges concurred.

THE COURT adhered to the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor.

W. J. SANDS, W.S.—WEBSTER & WILL, S.S.C.—Agents.

No. 76.

Feb. 22, 1873.
Nimmo v. Nimmo.

DAVID NIMMO, Defender and Appellant.—Orr Paterson.
WILLIAM NIMMO, Pursuer and Respondent.—Gloag.

Loan—Proof—Deposit-Receipt.—In an action brought for payment of a sum of money, "being the amount contained in a deposit-receipt in name of the pursuer uplifted by the defender," the defender stated that he had received the deposit-receipt bearing the pursuer's endorsation from a third party, the true owner of the money, and to whom he had accounted for it. Held (1) that in so far as the action was or might be rested on an alleged loan by the pursuer to the defender such ground of action could not be proved by parole evidence, and that the only writing of the defender founded on in proof of it, being the defender's name written on the back of the deposit-receipt, was not legal proof of such loan, nor sufficient to render parole proof admissible; (2) that, in so far as the action was rested on the defender's alleged intromission with the pursuer's funds, the parole evidence had negatived the pursuer's case.

2D DIVISION. Sheriff of Stirlingshire. I.

IN December 1871 William Nimmo raised an action in the Sheriff-court of Stirlingshire against his brother, David Nimmo. The summons concluded for payment of £34, "being the amount contained in a deposit-receipt, dated the 27th day of October 1862, granted by the agent of the Commercial Bank of Scotland at Linlithgow in favour of the pursuer, and which amount was, on or about the 27th day of August 1863, uplifted by the defender from said bank; together with the sum of 11s. 5d., being the interest which had accrued on said principal sum, and for which sums the defender has refused or delayed to account to the pursuer, with interest on said respective sums, at the rate of £5 per centum per annum from the said last mentioned date till payment."

The pursuer averred,—"(1) For the period of five years or thereby preceding the 27th day of October 1872 the pursuer was employed as a ploughman, and during that time he almost invariably, on receiving payment of his half year's wages or fee, handed a proportion of the same to his mother, in order that she might place the same in bank to his credit, and she accordingly deposited the said sum of £34, which amount consisted of several accumulations, in the Commercial Bank at Linlithgow on said 26th day of October 1862, in the pursuer's name and for his behoof, the money so deposited being the pursuer's property. (2) On or about the 22d day of August 1863 a sale of the pursuer's father's effects took place, at which the defender was present and made several purchases. The defender, who was then in the knowledge that the pursuer had money in bank, came to the pursuer and informed him of the purchases which he had made at the sale, representing at the same time that he was short of cash, and would therefore be unable to pay for his purchases unless he obtained assistance from some one, for which assistance he solicited the pursuer. (3) Yielding to the solicitation of the defender, and in order to oblige him, the pursuer went to his mother (who had the custody of the said deposit-receipt for behoof of the pursuer), and he obtained delivery of the same from her. The pursuer thereupon endorsed the said receipt, and delivered the same to the defender, upon delivery of which the defender went to the bank at Linlithgow and uplifted the proceeds, together with 11s. 5d. of interest which had accrued thereon, and he applied the same in payment of his purchases at said sale, or otherwise for his own purposes. (4) About three months after the date of the sale above mentioned the pursuer, who was then in need of his money, went to the defender and asked for repayment of the sum which he had previously advanced. The defender stated that he was not in possession of the necessary funds at this time to repay the loan, but, in order to accommodate the pursuer, offered to give him an authority to uplift an account

No. 76.

Feb. 22, 1873.
Nimmo v. Nimmo.

mounting to £17, which the defender alleged to be due to him by Mr ardie, farmer, Little Kerse, Polmont. The pursuer, however, declined take the said account as part-payment of the sum contained in said posit-receipt."

The defender stated in answer,—"The defender, on or about the 27th gust 1863, received from his mother, Mary Robertson or Nimmo, a posit-receipt with the Commercial Bank, Linlithgow, for £34, dated on about the 27th October 1862, with instructions to cash the same for r, which the defender did, and accounted to her therefor at the time. he deposit-receipt is believed to have been originally in name of pursuer, t it had been endorsed by the pursuer, and was held by the said Mary obertson or Nimmo prior to her handing it to defender to cash for her. deed, it is believed and averred by the defender that the money in said posit-receipt never belonged to pursuer, but was solely the property of e said Mary Robertson or Nimmo."

He pleaded;—Preliminary—(1) The action being incompetently laid, d its averments being insufficient to support its conclusions, fell to be missed. On the merits—(2) The claim was prescribed. (3) The leged loan could only be proved by writ or oath of defender. (4) The fender having accounted to Mary Robertson or Nimmo, the holder of e said deposit-receipt, and the party who authorised and instructed im to cash it, was not responsible farther therefor.

The Sheriff-substitute (Bell) repelled the defender's first and second eas, and before further answer allowed to both parties a proof prout de re in support of their respective averments, and to the pursuer a con-junct probation.

The defender reclaimed against this interlocutor, to which the Sheriff (Blackburn) adhered.

Proof was led.

Mrs Mary Nimmo, the mother of the parties, deponed that the pursuer ad from time to time lodged part of his earnings with her, but that he ad got most of the money back again. She further stated,—"I deposited 34 of my own money in his name in bank at Linlithgow. I did this cause there was a law-plea going on with my husband, and I was afraid e money might be lost. That was money which my mother had left e when she died. It is nearly twenty years since my mother died. I t £65 at her death, and I had £40 of it for many years in my own me in the Clydesdale Bank. The other £25 I had used from time to me. I had not given David any of said money. I had lent him money, hich he always paid back. I think I had lodged money once in David's me in the Clydesdale Bank. I had at one time lodged £30 in George's me in the National Bank. That was since I lodged £34 in pursuer's me. It was previously that I had lodged money in defender's name. still have money lodged in George's name. I reminded him lately of is, since his examination in this case. I may have told William that I d £34 in bank in his name; but I did not tell him it was his, or as od as his. My husband's effects were sold off at the instance of Mr dam Smith, while the money, £34, was still in bank in pursuer's name. efender bought some of my husband's effects, and he was short of a tle money to pay for his purchases. I lent him what he needed on the y following the sale. I think it was £12, and he would have got more d he required it. That was part of the money which had been deposited pursuer's name. He signed the receipt, and we got the money. I had ked him to sign his name on the receipt which I brought to him in our wn house for that purpose."

The pursuer and defender repeated their statements on record.

No. 76.

Feb. 22, 1873.
Nimmo v. Nimmo.

The Sheriff-substitute pronounced the following interlocutor:—kirk, 5th June 1872.—Finds that, in terms of the deposit-receipt, of process, of date 27th October 1862, the pursuer became creditor Commercial Bank at Linlithgow for the sum of £34 sterling, whic been paid into the said bank in the pursuer's name by his brother, (Nimmo, acting under the instructions of their mother, Mrs Mary E son or Nimmo, to whom the pursuer had been in the habit of payi wages from time to time: Finds that the defender has failed to ove the presumption arising from the terms of the receipt in the pu favour, so as to prove that his mother, and not the pursuer, was th owner of the deposit-receipt: Finds that the said deposit-receipt w 26th August 1862, endorsed by the pursuer at the defender's requ order to enable the latter to pay for certain purchases which he had at the sale of his father's effects on that day: Finds that on the foll day the contents of the deposit-receipt, being £34, with 11s. 5d. of in accrued thereon, were uplifted from the bank by the defender, endorsation the deposit-receipt also bears: Finds, in law, that th fender, by uplifting the contents, became the debtor of the pursu the amount, and was bound to account to him therefor: Finds th has not accounted, except to the amount of 30s., as stated in the scendence: Therefore finds that the defender is bound to repay pusuer the sum of £33, 1s. 5d., with bank interest as in deposit-r from 27th August 1863 until the date of citation in this summon with interest on said sum at 5 per cent thereafter until payment: the pursuer entitled to expenses."

The defender appealed to the Sheriff, who adhered.

The defender then appealed to the Court of Session, and argued Loan of money can only be proved by writ or oath.[1] (2) If parol was competent the pursuer had failed to prove that the money was

The pursuer answered;—The defender, having admitted that ceived the money, was bound to account to the pursuer, in whose n was deposited.

At advising,—

Lord Benholme.—The summons seems to raise a case of intromissi consequent liability. The condescendence develops a case of loan. Thi rise to the plea against the pursuer that loan cannot be proved except or oath. Had it not been for mutual statements of facts by the part plea would have been decisive against the pursuer. But as the partie gone to issue on certain matters of fact we must look at the proof.

I take a different view of the import of the evidence from either of the S The pursuer cannot controvert the fact that the money was lodged in ba by him, but by the mother. He does not allege that he directed his mo lodge the money. She says that the money was her own, and gives anot a very plausible reason for the deposit-receipt not being in her name, vi she wished to protect the money from her husband's creditors. At the of his mother, or with her concurrence, the pursuer blank endorsed the d receipt. This seems to indicate that he had no objection to his mother the control of the money, whether it was hers or not. The receipt be endorsed, the money is drawn by the defender and the mother, wh together to the bank in order to do so. He was required by the bank his name on the back. This is solely for preserving a record of the pe whom the money is paid, and I question whether the bank have any r require the endorsation as a condition of paying the money.

The circumstances of this case are very different from that of any forme The money was not deposited by the pursuer himself, but by another and he is obliged to discredit that person's evidence. The whole strength

[1] Haldane v. Spiers, March 7, 1872, ante, vol. x. 537, and cases there

No. 76.

Feb. 22, 1873.
Nimmo v. Nimmo.

pursuer's case appears to be his own evidence. It is said to be supported, but I do not see that it is supported in any material point. The case resolves itself into this: Is the pursuer to have credit given to his own statement, without corroboration, and against the evidence of several witnesses, including the mother, who is not a party to this case, and must know more about the circumstances than any one else?

Viewing this case as one of intromission I think that parole evidence was admissible, but that it is insufficient to support the pursuer's case.

LORD NEAVES.—I concur; and I do so in both aspects of the case. If we were to decide the case on the clauses of the record which contain the facts alleged in support of the very general conclusions of the summons, we should undoubtedly have before us a question of loan of money; and I hold that in such a case parole evidence is inadmissible, and that here the only document which could be used as writ being the endorsed deposit-receipt, is inhabile to indicate quo animo the money was transferred. In principle there is no difference between this case and that of the endorsed cheque in Speirs's[1] case. It is true that there are important distinctions between a deposit-receipt and a cheque; but there is no difference between the signatures endorsed on both in this respect, that neither can be any evidence of loan. Such signature is evidence to the bank in both cases, in order to identify the recipient of the money, and can be demanded by the bank for no other purpose. The endorsed receipt here is not a chirographum which should remain with the pursuer, and in his hands an acknowledgment of receipt of money by the defender, with an obligation to repay.

But, as your Lordship has pointed out, the generality of the conclusions of the summons may be held to let in the other and totally different ratio on which the Sheriff has given decree in favour of the pursuer, viz., intromission by the defender with the pursuer's funds, and liability to account therefor. Now, this is a pure question of fact—whose was the money—and may be competently proved by parole. A proof has been led, and it shews that the circumstances of this family were embarrassed to an extent which in the end led to a poinding of the household furniture. This state of matters lends an air of probability to the statement of the mother, that she lodged her own money in bank not in her own name but in that of her son, in order to put it beyond the reach of her husband's creditors. The receipt remains in her custody. Then after it is cashed the pursuer remains silent for years, in presence of an express denial by the defender that he owed the money to the pursuer. Though I may suspect that the pursuer believed the story told by his mother, of her having lodged the money in his name, and thought it to mean that the money was his, being the savings from wages, I yet must hold it to be the result of the proof that the money de-posited never was his, and that he has failed to maintain this action either on the ratio of loan or of intromission with his funds, with a liability to account.

LORD COWAN.—The summons concludes for payment of £34, "being the amount contained in a deposit-receipt, dated the 27th day of October 1862, granted by the agent of the Commercial Bank of Scotland at Linlithgow in favour of the pursuer, and which amount was, on or about the 27th day of August 1863, uplifted by the defender from said bank." The summons does not appear to be a demand for repayment of money advanced in loan, but is framed so as to bring out a case of legal liability against the defender, on the ground of his having received the contents of the deposit-receipt, and being bound to account. That general statement in the summons is explained in the record, particularly in article 4 of the pursuer's condescendence, by the averment that the money had been truly advanced as a loan, and if this had been the view we were compelled to take of the action I should have been clearly of opinion that the principle given effect to in the case of Speirs excluded parole evidence. Undoubtedly loan of money can only be proved by writ or oath. To admit parole if it is necessary that a document should have passed between the parties,

[1] March 7, 1872, ante, vol. x. 537.

No. 76.

Feb. 22, 1873.
Nimmo v. Nimmo.

given by the recipient of the money to the other, so as to remain as a voucher in his hands, though not containing an obligation to repay.

It has been argued for the pursuer that the case of Speirs does not apply, because that case related to an endorsation on a cheque, and in this case we have the endorsation of the defender upon a deposit-receipt. I quite concur with your Lordship that there is no essential difference between the cases, in respect to the obligation undertaken by the defender in putting his name upon the document. He was naturally asked by the bank to put his name upon the deposit-receipt, but his doing so was not an acknowledgment of loan in favour of the pursuer. So that the principle of that class of cases, in which such an acknowledgment has been given as raises the presumption of obligation to repay, does not apply to the case of endorsation of a cheque or of a deposit-receipt.

If this action, then, had been based solely on loan, there would have been a question that parole proof was incompetent. But the generality of the summons led to an explanation by the pursuer how the deposit-receipt came to be in his name, although in the custody of his mother, and to a statement by the defender of the circumstances of this family transaction, to shew that he was not indebted to the pursuer in the amount claimed. The parole proof therefore was competent to explain the view set forth by the defender, as well as to support the claim of the pursuer for an accounting. In the peculiar circumstances of the case I think that the Sheriff was right in admitting parole evidence, and on the import of that evidence, which is certainly contradictory, the decision of the case depends.

Looking to the findings in the interlocutor, and to the explanatory note of the Sheriff-substitute, I observe that he has given effect to "the presumption arising from the terms of the receipt in the pursuer's favour," and it is very much on this ground that he takes a favourable view of the proof for the pursuer. The deposit-receipt no doubt bears to be in the pursuer's name, but the parole evidence, which was admitted to explain the whole circumstances, is entirely destructive of any presumption arising from the terms of the receipt. The money was not deposited by the pursuer, but by the mother. She says so, in so many words, that the money so deposited was not the pursuer's but her own. And she gives the reason, that her husband being in difficulties she deposited the money, which she had got from her own relations, in the name of another, to avoid the diligence of her husband's creditors. That is how the money came to be deposited in the name of the pursuer. The mother asks the pursuer, as she was entitled to demand, to put his name upon the back of the receipt. He leaves it endorsed in the hands of his mother. That is clearly proved not only by the evidence of the mother and of the defender, but of the pursuer himself. What follows? She gives the receipt to the defender, who takes it to the bank and gets the £34, and he immediately goes back and hands the money to his mother, as both of them distinctly state in their depositions. Some of it, about £12, seems to have been given over to the defender, but that he states that he afterwards repaid his mother, and this she confirms. How, then, can the presumption from the terms of the receipt he founded on, in the face of the clear evidence explaining why the pursuer's name had got upon the receipt? All the presumption is destroyed by the parole evidence.

The Sheriff-substitute thinks that the weight of the evidence supports the presumption to which he has given effect. I am very far from reaching that conclusion. I think that the pursuer's statements are unsupported in any essential respect, and that the weight of the evidence is in favour of the defence. If the pursuer has any claim for money deposited in the hands of his mother, which she denies in her deposition, her statement being that she had paid him as much as she ever got from him, he must constitute that claim against her. The defender has not been shewn to be his debtor.

The LORD JUSTICE-CLERK was absent.

THE COURT, on 4th February 1873, pronounced this interlocutor:—"Find that, in so far as the action is or may be rested on an allegation of loan of money by the pursuer to the defender, such ground of action cannot be proved by parole evidence, and that the writing of the defender founded on in proof of it being the defender's name written on the back of the deposit-receipt in question is not legal proof of such a loan, nor sufficient to render parole proof admissible: Further, in so far as the action is rested on the defender's alleged intromissions with the pursuer's funds and the defender's consequent liability to account, find in point of fact that the deposit-receipt in question, on the 27th August 1863, when its contents were uplifted from the bank, was in the hands of the mother of the parties, who had herself deposited the money in bank on 27th October 1862, and who had remained in possession of the said receipt all along; that the said receipt had been taken by her in the name of the pursuer to preserve from her husband's creditors the fund paid in, which was not the pursuer's property, but money to which she had succeeded; that on 26th October 1862 the pursuer put his name on the back of the receipt with a view to its contents being uplifted, which was done by her going to the bank in company with the defender; that the defender thereafter got from the mother of the parties a part of the money thus obtained from the bank, but did so as an advance by his mother to him, and not as an advance to him by the pursuer; that the defender came under no obligation to pay or account for the same to the pursuer, and that accordingly the defender paid or accounted to his mother for all the money he had got as aforesaid: Find in point of law that in these circumstances the defender was under no obligation to pay or account to the pursuer for the contents of the said deposit-receipt, or any part thereof: Therefore sustain the appeal: Recall the interlocutors complained of, and assoilzie the defender from the conclusions of the action, and decern: Find the defender entitled to the expenses of process, both in the inferior Court and in this Court; and remit," &c.

No. 76.

Feb. 22, 1873.
Nimmo v. Nimmo.

J. & A. PEDDIE, W.S.—BURN & GLOAG, W.S.—Agents.

No. 77.

The Rev. PETER SAWERS, Petitioner.—Lord-Adv. Young—Scott. JGH M'CONNELL and JOHN PETRIE (Monteith's Trustees), Respondents —Trayner.

Feb. 22, 1873.
Sawers' Executors v. Sawers' Trustees.

Process—Expenses—Appeal to House of Lords.—Where an interlocutor of the ner-House, recalling an interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary, was reversed by House of Lords, without any affirmance of the latter, and without any find- as to expenses, but with a remit to the Court "to do therein as shall be just consistent with this judgment," held (diss. Lord Benholme) that, the House Lords not having exhausted the case, the Court took it up, in applying the gment, as if the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor had never been recalled, and e entitled to deal with the question of expenses from the date thereof.

A PETITION having been presented on 23d June 1868 by James Monteith, of the two surviving trustees of the late Peter Sawers, praying the rt to sequestrate the trust-estate and appoint a judicial factor, it was osed by the other surviving trustee, the Rev. Peter Sawers, minister he Free Church at Gargunnock, Stirling. The Lord Ordinary (Manor), 5th Nov. 1868, refused the petition, and found the petitioner liable in enses, which he modified at two guineas. The Second Division, on h March 1869, recalled the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor, and granted petition, and found the petitioner, James Monteith, entitled to exses out of the trust-estate. Against this interlocutor the Rev. Peter ers appealed to the House of Lords.

2D DIVISION. Lord Manor. R.

No. 77.

Feb. 22, 1873. Sawers' Executors v. Sawers' Trustees.

Pending this appeal, James Monteith applied for interim execution which was, on his death on 18th May 1869, insisted in by his trustees Hugh M'Connell and John Petrie. On 14th July 1869 the Court approved of the Auditor's report on the account of expenses incurred by the late James Monteith, and decerned for payment in favour of his trustees and granted warrant for interim execution pending appeal. Against the interlocutor the Rev. Peter Sawers presented a supplementary appeal.

On 23d Feb. 1872 the House of Lords, after hearing the cause ex parte no appearance being made for the trustees of the late James Monteith ordered and ordained that the said interlocutors of the Second Division appealed against should be reversed; and it was further ordered—"That the costs decerned under the said interlocutor of the 14th of July 1869 for payment to the said Hugh M'Connell and John Petrie, the respondents in the said supplementary appeal, out of the trust-estate of the late Peter Sawers, deceased, shall, if the same have been paid or retained, be repaid to the said trust-estate, with interest, conform to the last-mentioned interlocutor of the 14th of July 1869." And it was also further ordered —"That the said cause be, and is hereby, remitted back to the Court of Session in Scotland, to do therein as shall be just and consistent with the judgment."

The present petition was presented by the Rev. Peter Sawers to apply the judgment of the House of Lords, to alter the interlocutor appealed from in terms of said judgment, "to affirm the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary of 5th November 1868, and to refuse the prayer of the petition for the appointment of a judicial factor; and also to ordain the respondents to repeat and pay back the costs, amounting to £93, 18s. 2d. decerned for under the said interlocutor of 14th July 1869, if the same have been paid or retained, with interest thereof at five per cent from the date thereof, to the said trust-estate, and to find the petitioner entitled to the expenses of process since the date of the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor of 5th November 1868, including the expenses of the present application; to remit the account thereof, when lodged, to the Auditor to tax and report, and to decern in the petitioner's favour for the taxed amount against the said Hugh M'Connell and John Petrie, as trustees of the late James Monteith."

The respondents argued;—The judgment of the House of Lords exhausted the case; the remit to the Court of Session "to do therein as shall be just" were mere words of style, and were strictly qualified by the words which followed, "and consistent with this judgment;" nothing therefore was remitted to this Court except to apply the judgment; and as that judgment did not contain a finding of expenses it was incompetent for this Court now to give them.[1]

At advising,—

Lord Justice-Clerk.—The cases cited create little difficulty as to our power to give expenses. In the case of Borrows and Colquhoun the House of Lords reversed the judgment of this Division, and affirmed that of the Lord Ordinary and remitted the case back to the Court of Session, to do therein as should be just and consistent with their judgment. Now, the whole of the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor in that case was before the House of Lords, and as they said nothing about costs that matter was held to be exhausted. It is not so here, however. The interlocutors of this Division have been reversed without affirming those of the Lord Ordinary. The case is remitted back to us to do therein as shall be [1] Purves v. Landell, May 31, 1845, 7 D. 810; Colquhoun v. Borrows, Dec. 20, 1854, 17 D. 245; Stewart v. Scott, March 11, 1836, 14 Sh. 692; Dunnet, March 8, 1839, 1 D. 689.

No. 77.

Feb. 22, 1873.
Sawers' Executors v. Sawers' Trustees.

st, and it lies with us to take up the reclaiming note as it stood before we gave dgment upon it, and dispose of it in accordance with the judgment of the ouse of Lords. I apprehend we must follow the judgment of the House of rds in dealing with the reclaiming note, but I cannot see that it necessarily mits our powers in dealing with the case, as long as we do nothing that is in- nsistent with the House of Lords' judgment. I should require to hear more gent argument than that which has been addressed to us before I could hold at we are in any way restrained from doing substantial justice by a mere tech- nality such as that which has been pleaded. Though I have a great respect r the authorities, I do not think that they apply to the present case.

LORD COWAN.—When the case, of which the present petition is the sequel, me before the House of Lords on appeal, there was no affirmance of the Lord rdinary's interlocutor of 5th November 1868, but the judgment of the Inner- ouse recalling it having been reversed, the case is, in fact, sent back in pre- sely the same position as if the interlocutors of this Division had never been nounced. In these circumstances the petitioner, who has been successful in s appeal, asks for the expenses of the process from the date of the Lord Ordi- ry's interlocutor. I am of opinion that he is entitled to succeed in his appli- tion, if we have powers competently to give them. I think we clearly have. n examination of the cases which have been quoted by the respondents it ll appear that in all of them the House of Lords expressly affirmed the Lord rdinary's judgment, and, by omitting to give expenses, obviously did not in- nd to give them, seeing that their Lordships' minds had been directed to the bject. In Colquhoun's case, while the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor is affirmed, s application for expenses is not refused as incompetent, but simply refused. It was pressed for the respondents that they were in bona fide in the original pplication out of which this appeal arose. I do not doubt that they were in ntima fide, but in a matter of expenses we can only inquire whether the appli- tion was a proper one in the circumstances. The House of Lords has found at it was not, and I think it would be unjust to withhold expenses from the esent petitioner.

LORD BENHOLME.—I confess my mind is not so free from doubt as my brother rd Cowan's. I think that the distinction on which your Lordships go, namely, at there is not here an express affirmance of the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor, d that therefore we are entitled to dispose of the reclaiming note, and to go ther than we should have been entitled, had the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor en expressly affirmed, is too shadowy to be satisfactory. I think the House Lords tell us how far they reverse, and what the consequences are, and that are bound to obey. My impression is that the case may be different where y only reverse, without pointing out the results of their judgment, and leave er things to be done by us, about which they have said nothing. But when, here, they point out the consequences of their judgment, they do not intend y other consequences to follow, and do not give us power to do anything but ply their judgment in that form. The words used are words of style. It is, I nk, rather a thin distinction to say, that if they had affirmed the Lord Ordi- ry's interlocutor we could not have gone on to consider this matter of ex- nses; but as they have not done so, we have power to go on and decide the estion of expenses in this Court. I think such a course is infringing upon previous authorities, and, though I have not formed a decided opinion, I am clined to take a different view from your Lordships.

LORD NEAVES.—I agree in the judgment proposed by your Lordship, which is nsistent with justice and correct in form. We only know the views of the use of Lords in appeals from the judgment before us. The principle in plying such judgments is that we are to do nothing in any matter with which ir Lordships have themselves dealt. The matter of expenses ought to be posed of when an interlocutor of affirmance is pronounced; and if the House Lords say nothing more than that "we affirm the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor," it is not in our power to add expenses, since their Lordships ha their minds directed to the subject of expenses, and have been intenti silent. The same will be the case, if they remit to us to affirm the Lord nary's interlocutor, and dictate the terms of our affirmance, without sayin thing about expenses. But here we have neither of these cases. The comes back to us just in the same position as that which it occupied w first appeared before us, with this exception, that our judgment must not consistent with the interlocutor of the House of Lords. Therefore w affirm the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor, and as to expenses we are at lib decern according to the justice of the case.

No. 77.

Feb. 22, 1873. Sawers' Executors v. Sawers' Trustees.

THE COURT, on 6th February 1873, pronounced this interlocu "Apply the judgment of the House of Lords: Alter the int tors appealed from, in terms of said judgment; dismiss the re ing petition for the late James Monteith; affirm the interl of the Lord Ordinary of 5th November 1868, and refuse the of the petition for the appointment of a judicial factor: P the respondents from applying the trust-funds in payment costs decerned for in the said interlocutors: Find the pet entitled to the expenses of process since the date of the Lord nary's interlocutor of 5th November 1868, including the ex of the present application; and remit," &c.

A. BEVERIDGE, S.S.C.—M'EWEN & CARMENT, W.S.—Agents.

No. 78.

Feb. 22, 1873. Forbes v. Wilson.

WILLIAM FORBES, Pursuer.—Watson—Mackay.
JOHN WILSON, Defender.—Sol.-Gen. Clark—Gloag.

Lease—Constitution—Rei interventus—Homologation—Personal Bar—Removing—A. S. 14th December 1756.—Held, in an action of rem brought on the footing that the tenancy was yearly, that a valid and ing lease for years had been constituted by a written offer from the int tenant, stating rent and ish, combined with circumstances, both befo after its date, which inferred acceptance by the landlord or his agents, lowed by such outlay on the tenant's part as amounted to rei interventus.

Entail—Lease.—Question, Whether a lease granted by an heir of en a longer period than is allowed by the entail is good even for the allowed.

2D DIVISION. Sheriff of Stirlingshire. I.

THIS was an action of removing, in terms of the Act of Sede 14th December 1756, and of the Sheriff-court Act, 1853, brought Forbes of Callendar, for the purpose of having the defender, Mr Wil South Bantaskine, decerned to flit and remove from a piece of g less than half an acre in extent, situated on the south side of the burgh and Glasgow Union Canal and the Falkirk Fire-brick W bounded on the west by the defender's lands of South Bantaskin occupied by the defender under the pursuer at a yearly rent of 15s ling. The summons was dated 23d September 1870, and the date removing sued for was Martinmas following.

The following facts were either proved or not disputed:—The la Forbes of Callendar, M.P. (the father of the pursuer), who held the of Callendar under a strict entail, but with power to grant leases n ceeding nineteen years in duration, entered into negotiations in 185 the defender, whose lands adjoined those of Callendar, for an exch It was necessary to obtain judicial sanction therefor, and on applica the Sheriff a remit was made to referees for the purpose of deter what would be a suitable exchange in the circumstances. The ras dated the 7th of December 1854, and included in the parcels which were to be disjoined from the Callendar estate and given the defender the piece of ground which formed the subject of the action. It appeared, however, that the late Mr Forbes objected iclusion of the said piece of ground, as he had been advised that t might possibly be required for the formation of a road to his Standalane. It was a matter of equal importance to Mr Wilson hould be included, his sole, or at least, main object in agreeing to mbion, being to provide a commodious access to his mansion- f South Bantaskine, which access would necessarily cross the land referred to. This purpose was communicated shortly after e of the first report of the referees to the pursuer's father, in a ddressed by Mr Russel, the defender's agent, to Colonel Forbes, Mr Forbes's brother, who was acting for him, and dated 22d er 1854. A correspondence followed, which is sufficiently nar- the opinion of the Lord Justice-Clerk. It was ultimately agreed disputed piece of land should be struck out of the excambion. 23d of January 1855 Mr Wilson wrote as follows to Mr Forbes, ie pursuer's agent, who had a power of attorney to grant leases:— ground reserved for a road to Mr Forbes, Standalane farm, at t side of the feuars' ground, extending to 401 dec. parts of an ing now struck out of the excambion, I am anxious to become of it until it is required for the proposed road by Mr Forbes. I e now offer fifteen shillings annually for it, on a lease of say nine years; but if it shall be required during that period for the above mentioned I will at once abandon the lease thereof.

No. 78.

Feb. 22, 1873.
Forbes v. Wilson.

a are aware that through the ground I have got from Mr Forbes rming a road to Bantaskine. It was granted to me by Mr Forbes y for this purpose. This road requires to cross the ground reserved Forbes for his road, and my understanding is, that I am to be to form my road through it; but if in doing so I shall alter the the ground, so as in any way to interfere with Mr Forbes's road, er shall be formed, I understand that he or his successors are , in forming their road, to make such alterations on the level of l as they may find necessary.

s matter has been mentioned to Mr Hamilton (the pursuer's land-) by Mr John Russel, and he understood him to say that he would end the arrangement now proposed."

letter was received and retained by Mr Forbes, W.S., and there ne evidence that he and Mr Hamilton had expressly intimated nce to Mr Russel. A second or amended report, excluding the ce of ground, was drawn up by the referees before the death of Mr M.P., which occurred on 10th February 1855; and possession had ken by Mr Wilson of the lands disponed to him before the nego- above mentioned had come to an end, but the contract of excam- as not formally executed till May 1856. During this interval and o the date of the present action, the defender had regularly paid a of fifteen shillings annually in name of rent for the disputed f ground, and obtained receipts for the same. He had, moreover, before the late Mr Forbes's death, and completed after that event, mation of a road and bridge across the said ground, at a cost of £150, as access to his mansion house of South Bantaskine, and ther improvements on his adjoining lands, on the footing that his should pass in that direction. The pursuer denied having had rsonal knowledge of the existence of the said letter down to the 868, or of any payments of rent for the said ground; but he continued to accept the rent for two years from the time that th lease came into his hands.

No. 78.

Feb. 22, 1873.
Forbes v. Wilson.

On 2d November 1870, at revisal, in addition to his other st the pursuer added the following:—(Cond. 8) "The pursuer d resume possession of the piece of ground which forms the su the present action, in order to form a road over it from the E and Glasgow Union Canal to the farm of Standalane, part of the Callendar."

The pursuer pleaded;—1. As the defender has no right or possess the ground in question after Martinmas next, decree s ought to be pronounced. 3. The only proof which is competer alleged lease for twenty-nine years is by writ or oath. 4. The f Forbes, W.S., having had no power or authority to grant lease part of the estate of Callendar beyond the duration allowed by lendar entail, his acceptance of, or acquiescence in, any proposa for a lease cannot constitute a valid lease. 5. The late Mr Forbe lendar having been proprietor of the ground in question, under t of a strict entail, a lease by him, or any person acting for hin period of twenty-nine years, is not valid in a question with the his successor in the entailed estate. 6. A lease invalid on the gr it was granted by an heir of entail for a period beyond his granting leases, both at common law and under the entail, is and cannot be sustained for any shorter period. 7. The alleged twenty-nine years not having been, in any view, constituted written instrument, it is not necessary for the pursuer to reduce bringing the present action. 8. In the event of its being held defender has proved the existence of a lease for twenty-nine y bound to remove from the subjects, as required by the pursuer to enable the pursuer to form the road to his farm of Standalane facts and circumstances founded on in the defences are irrelevar sufficient to constitute either acquiesence or homologation on t the pursuer, or rei interventus on the part of the defender, whi validate an improbative lease for twenty-nine years.

The defender pleaded;—1. A lease for twenty-nine years of of ground, from which the pursuer seeks to remove the defen constituted or instructed by the offer by the defender, set for defender's statement of facts, the acceptance thereof by the pur the payment and acceptance of the rent therein offered, and the being still current, the defender is entitled to absolvitor. 2. lease cannot be challenged by the pursuer, in respect of the a interventus libelled, and of the acquiescence of the pursuer and c decessors in the said lands, and in respect of the pursuer's hon of the lease by acceptance of the rent offered. 3. Even if the ri late Mr Forbes and of the pursuer to grant leases were limit entail of the estate of Callendar, as averred by the pursuer (wh admitted), the lease, at all events, falls to be sustained to the e for the duration sanctioned by said deed of entail. 4. The de virtue of the foresaid letter, the assent thereto of the late Mr F proprietor, and of the possession following thereon, the acts of ventus, and the acquiescence and homologation by the pursue has acquired a valid and unchallengeable right to use and enjoy across the said stripe of ground. 6. So long as the said lease right granted by the late Mr Forbes to use the said road, have reduced, the defender's right to the lease and to use the road mu tained, and he is therefore entitled to absolvitor from the conc the present summons. 10. The pursuer cannot in this action

No. 78.

Feb. 22, 1873.
Forbes v. Wilson.

e averment introduced by him on revisal, and on 2d November 1870, at he requires the said piece of ground for the construction of a road to s farm of Standalane, in respect (1) no such intention was ever previously intimated; (2) such intention was not entertained when the tion was raised, and was not the true reason of the present endeavour remove the defender; (3) The road may be made without the removal the defender from the subject, and without interference with or removal the defender's road; (4) the pursuer cannot, at the same time, found and reprobate the letter of 23d January 1855. 11. Such intention ms no ground for a decree of removing against the defender, or for terference with or removal of his road.

After some procedure as to the relevancy in the Sheriff-court, and an peal to the Court of Session, the First Division, on 11th July 1871, mitted to the Sheriff to allow a proof before answer, with power to the eriff to dispose of all questions of expenses, including the expense of is appeal. Proof was led, and on 22d May 1872 the Sheriff-substitute ell) pronounced the following interlocutor:—"Finds in point of fact at the late Mr Forbes of Callendar (the pursuer's father), and the de-nder, in the year 1854, entered into an agreement for the excambion of rtain portions of their respective lands, including the piece of ground w in dispute, forming part of the entailed estate of Callendar: Finds at proceedings were instituted in the Sheriff-court of Stirlingshire by e petition, 34/1 of process, under the provisions of the statute 10 eorge III., c. 51: Finds that, throughout the excambion proceedings, e late Mr Forbes was represented by Mr William Forbes, W.S., his mmissioner and law agent, who had full authority to act for him in the hole arrangements, and by Mr Hamilton, his land-steward at Callendar, th of whom, as well as Mr Forbes himself, were aware that the de-nder's chief object in going into the excambion was to enable him to form new approach to his residence at Bantaskine, through the grounds pro-sed to be acquired: Finds that the valuator's report as originally lodged 7th December 1854, included the piece of ground in question, as form-g part of Mr Forbes's entailed lands proposed to be conveyed to the fender, but before the reporters had made oath to their report an jection was stated on behalf of Mr Forbes to the said piece of ground ng embraced in the excambion, as the idea had been suggested by Mr milton that it might possibly be required at some future period for the rmation of a road to the adjoining farm of Standalane: Finds that the cambion proceedings were, in consequence of said objection, delayed r a considerable time, as the defender was unwilling to relinquish said ce of ground, the possession of which was essential for the formation a proper approach to Bantaskine: Finds that protracted communings d correspondence in reference to this point took place between Mr rbes, W.S., and Mr Hamilton, on behalf of Mr Forbes, and the defen-r's agents, in which Mr Dickson, one of the valuators, also took part, d, by special arrangement with Mr Forbes, W.S., a meeting was held the office of Mr Black, surveyor, on 20th January 1855, at which essrs Dickson, Russel, and Hamilton were present: Finds that at this eeting it was arranged that the piece of ground in question should be ithdrawn from the excambion, on the understanding that a lease for a rm of years should be obtained from Mr Forbes of Callendar in favour the defender, so that he might have security for the formation of his oposed approach, but reserving right to Mr Forbes to make a road to andalane during the currency of the lease whenever he might choose to so: Finds that, in accordance with the spirit of the said arrangement, e defender addressed the offer, of date 23d January 1855, to Mr Forbes,

No. 78.

Feb. 22, 1873.
Forbes v. Wilson.

W.S., as representing Mr Forbes of Callendar in the excambion: Finds that the said offer was considered and approved of by Mr Forbes, W.S. as acting for Mr Forbes of Callendar, after discussing the matter fully with Mr Dickson, one of the valuators: Finds that in the amended report 34/3 of process, the said piece of ground was left out of the excambion but without any diminution of the gross value put upon Mr Forbes's land given in exchange: Finds that said amended report was signed by the valuators on 31st January: Finds that on 1st February Mr John Russel the defender's agent, received from Mr Hamilton (who had been in Edinburgh with Mr Forbes, W.S., on the preceding day), a verbal intimation that the defender's offer had been accepted (by Mr Forbes, W.S., as Mr Russel understood), and that the defender might proceed with his operations: Finds that although there is no direct evidence to shew that the late Mr Forbes had personally accepted the defender's offer there are very strong presumptions that he was made fully aware of the whole course and details of the transaction: Finds that on the 1st February Mr Forbes, W.S., sent to Mr Russel the excambion proceedings in order that they might be carried through, and by the agency of Mr Russel, who believed that the defender's offer had been agreed to; the reporters' oaths were subsequently duly taken to the report, and the Sheriff's authority interponed to the excambion by interlocutor of 8th February 1855 thereby completing the proceedings in the Sheriff-court: Finds that on 10th February 1855 Mr Forbes, then of Callendar, died: Finds that on the faith of his offer having been accepted the defender, before Mr Forbes's death, took possession of the piece of ground in question, and carried on operations thereon in connection with the other portion of his approach which, on the faith of the excambion, had been previously commenced through the other portion of the lands embraced in the excambion: Finds that all these operations were carried on openly with the knowledge of the late Mr Forbes, or of those for whom he was responsible: Finds that subsequently the defender's approach and other improvements—including the road and several bridges—were completed at a large cost, a considerable portion of which was expended upon the piece of ground in question and these operations were carried on with the knowledge of the pursuer or of those acting for him: Finds that after Mr Forbes's death the excambion proceedings were brought to a close, through the agency of Mr Forbes, W.S., the pursuer's agent, by contract of excambion between the pursuer and defender, signed on 8th and 27th May, and recorded at Stirling on 11th July 1856: Finds that on 28th November 1856 the defender paid to Mr Forbes, W.S., the pursuer's commissioner, 30s. as the rent of the piece of ground in question, for the two years preceding Martinmas 1856, as per receipt number 8/1 of process, and the rents for subsequent years were paid from time to time to the said Mr Forbes, who granted receipts for the amounts: Finds that the defender's offer, of date 23d January 1855, has all along been in the possession of Mr Forbes, W.S. as agent and commissioner for the late Mr Forbes and the pursuer: Finds that matters remained on this footing until September 1868, when Mr Hamilton, the pursuer's land-steward, intimated to the defender that the pursuer wished to recover possession of the piece of ground in question and having received a copy of the offer of 23d January 1855, under which the defender maintained that he held the ground in lease, he communicated it to the pursuer: Finds that no farther communication on the subject was made to the defender until the present summons of removing was raised on 23d September 1870, and that in the interval the pursuer's commissioner, Mr Forbes, W.S., had received payment of the rents of said piece of ground for the years 1868 and 1869, and had granted receipts

No. 78.

Feb. 22, 1873.
Forbes v. Wilson.

: without any protest or reservation being intimated: Finds that suer represents his father, Mr Forbes of Callendar, titulo lucratio: n point of law in reference to the whole circumstances narrated oregoing findings, that a valid lease for the period of twenty-nine rom Martinmas 1854 was constituted, during the lifetime of the : Forbes, by the defender's offer of date 23d January 1855, which rbally accepted by Mr Forbes, W.S., as acting for the late Mr in the transaction by which the Sheriff-court proceedings were ted, and which was followed by rei interventus on the part of the r, in so far as, on the faith of the said offer having been accepted, uiesced in and sanctioned the completion of the excambion pro- s in the Sheriff-court, and with the knowledge of the late Mr or of those acting for him, took possession of the said piece of and executed works, and incurred expenditure thereon of a kind could only be attributed to the assurance of a long occupancy: hat the defender's rights under the said lease have been homolo- y the pursuer, in respect that,—1st, By the agency of his commis- Mr Forbes, W.S., who was cognisant of the whole transaction, he ted the contract of excambion in accordance with the proceedings Sheriff-court, of which the lease in question was virtually part and 2d, Extensive operations by the defender on the ground in ques- id in connection therewith, were executed openly, and with the nce of the pursuer or those for whom he is responsible; 3d, The of the piece of ground were received by the pursuer through his sed agent, Mr Forbes, W.S., while the offer of the defender, his tle of possession, was retained by him; and payment of the rents 8 and 1869 were taken for the pursuer without any protest or tion, after the defender's claim to a lease had been specially t under his notice: Finds that the pursuer, from having thus per- homologated the lease, and also from his representation of his late is barred from objecting to the validity of the defender's right he lease: Finds that, even although there was no personal bar on t of the pursuer, there is no room in this action of removing for g that the lease is invalid as being for a longer period than is sanc- by the Callendar entail, for such a plea could not receive effect ie defender's right under the lease had been reduced: Finds, how- iat in terms of the defender's offer of 23d June 1855, the defender id, as has been admitted in the record, to cede possession of the f ground in question, in so far as may be necessary for the forma- f a road to Standalane, but otherwise, without prejudice to the er's possession, during the currency of the lease, of the road formed t, and of the remainder of the ground included in his lease not d for the pursuer's road: Therefore, to that extent, decerns in the ng, reserving as between the parties all questions as to the mode ch the pursuer's road may be formed; quoad ultra assoilzies the er from the conclusions of the libel: Finds him entitled to ex- ," &c.*

NOTE— . . . In the Sheriff-substitute's opinion it is proved beyond a that Mr Forbes, W.S., did make up his mind that the offer should be d; and in assenting, whether tacitly or expressly, to the defender's offer January 1855, he must be held as having acted as Mr Forbes' repre- re in the transaction of the excambion, which would have been suspended, ltogether interrupted, had the proposal by the defender for a long lease n agreed to. Notwithstanding the restrictions of the entail, Mr Forbes endar was entitled to grant the lease for twenty-nine years now founded

No. 78.

Feb. 22, 1873.
Forbes v. Wilson.

On appeal, the Sheriff-principal (Blackburn) issued the followi terlocutor:—"Finds that the defender has failed to prove the l avers as the ground of his right to retain possession of the strip of l question: Therefore sustains the appeal; recalls the interlocutor a against; repels the defences, and decerns in terms of the conclus

---

on, which would be effectual until competently challenged by a reducti it is thought that the acts of Mr Forbes, W.S., in assenting to the le material part of the transaction in the excambion, were equally effectu was not exercising the powers as to leases conferred by the factory and sion, No. 11 of process, but he was representing his constituent in a transaction; and it may here be remarked that, if the point of contrave the entail occurred to either Mr Forbes or Mr Forbes, W.S., it might re thrown aside, considering the trifling value of the ground and the advan nature of the agreement by which the proprietor of the estate of Callen during the lease, to receive a rent greatly exceeding the annual value of t of ground, without any hindrance in the way of forming an access to Sta and to receive credit in the excambion for its value, without giving any lent in return. . . . . Intimation of acceptance, although of impor shewing more clearly the intention of parties, is not absolutely necessar lessor to whom an offer has been addressed is barred from resiling by r the offer, while he allows the offerer to proceed upon his offer as if it h accepted, and to perform acts referable to the agreement, and which, refusal to execute the agreement, would prove detrimental to the person led or encouraged to proceed—See Bell's Commentaries, 1st vol., pp. 3 329, 5th edition. In the present case, the Sheriff-substitute thinks th was rei interventus following on the defender's offer, during the late Mr lifetime, sufficient to validate the agreement of lease. There was not possession of the ground in question, but expensive operations thereon— a nature as could only be attributed to a lengthened right of occupanc carried on openly, with the cognisance of the lessor or his representativ generally, matters were no longer entire when the defender had acqui the completion of the excambion after the exclusion of the piece of gr question, whereby, had he not been assured of possession under the question, great inconvenience and disappointment would have resulted. over, there have been acts of rei interventus since the pursuer's accession, excambion contract was executed, and expensive operations on the grou carried on and completed, under circumstances of which the pursuer held to have been legally cognisant. There have been also acts of homo and acquiescence on the part of the pursuer, and of Mr Forbes, W.S., fo he is responsible—as detailed in the foregoing interlocutor—which are Sheriff-substitute's opinion, sufficient to bar the pursuer from impugn defender's title to possess. . . . .

"In support of his views as to the effect of rei interventus, following defender's offer, having constituted a valid lease in favour of the defen Sheriff-substitute would refer to the following authorities:—Bell's Comm vol. 1st, pp. 328, 329; Hunter's Landlord and Tenant, last ed. pp. 41 and 433, 434; and the following decisions: Gordon v. Hall, 10th Augu Mor. p. 15,178; Countess of Moray v. Stewart, 1772, and House of 1773, Mor. p. 4392; Ross v. Ross, 9th February 1790, Hume's Deci 774; Campbell v. Campbell and M'Pherson, 6th March 1793, Hume's D p. 786; M'Pherson v. M'Pherson and Clark, 12th May 1815, Fac. Col Robertson's opinion); Keir and Others v. Duke of Athole, 17th Januar and House of Lords, 15th July 1815, 6 Paton's Appeals, p. 130.

"With regard to the validity of a lease by contravention of the limita an entail, until it has been set aside by an action of reduction the case of v. Gillespie, 23d June 1813, Fac. Coll., is a clear authority.

"The defender has been found entitled to expenses, seeing that he h successful in every branch of the case."

summons: Finds the pursuer entitled to expenses of the appeal to Court of Session, in terms of the interlocutor of 11th July 1871, pronced by the First Division of said Court, as well as to the expenses urred in this Court, but subject to modification to the extent of one-rd of the taxed amounts thereof."*

No. 78.

Feb. 22, 1873.
Forbes v. Wilson.

---

* "NOTE.—The defender's case is, that he holds the land in dispute under informal lease of twenty-nine years from 23d January 1855, upon which rei interventus has followed, and therefore he refuses to remove.

"The parties have been allowed a proof of their averments on record before answer—the defender leading.

"The question therefore is, has the defender proved, by competent evidence, enough to support his defence? The foregoing interlocutor is founded on the ground that he has failed to do so.

"The lease, being one for a number of years, must be proved by writ or oath before any proof of rei interventus can be admitted.

"To render valid the contract of lease it is essential that the subject, the parties, the rent, and the term of the lease be clear, and proved by writ or oath of party—Stair, 2, 9, 5.

"The defender accordingly founds upon a letter written by himself to Mr William Forbes, W.S., as agent and commissioner for the late Mr Forbes of Callendar, and dated the 23d of January 1855. This letter is quoted at length in the 4th statement of the defences, and it is said to contain all that it is required to prove by writ to constitute the lease on which he relies.

"There is no dispute that the letter was written to and received by Mr Forbes, W.S., nor as to its terms; and although the Sheriff has doubts whether it fully comes up to what Lord Stair requires for a valid lease in one particular, namely, the duration of the lease, it has been dealt with by the parties on the footing that, by the terms of the letter, the offer was one for the term of twenty-nine years from its date—that is, from 23d January 1855. The words, 'say for twenty-nine years,' suggest that the letter contained a tentative rather than a definite offer of clear conditions of lease; but the Sheriff will deal with it as the parties have done.

"The Sheriff lays stress upon this, however, here, because he thinks that this discussion is probably the origin of the misapprehensions and cross purposes which have ended in the present lamentable dispute.

"Taking, then, this offer to be one for a lease of the subject in dispute by the late Mr Forbes to the defender, for a rent of 15s., and for twenty-nine years from the date of the offer, the next question is, was that offer accepted by the late Mr Forbes, M.P.?

"The defender's averment on this point is also in the 4th statement of his defences, and is pointed and clear. He says,—'Mr Forbes (then of Callendar) accepted of this offer, and acquiesced in and assented to the intentions of the defender as therein expressed. His assent and acquiescence were intimated to the defender by Mr Forbes's land-steward, Mr Hamilton, mentioned in the letter.'

"No written proof is adduced either that Mr Forbes, M.P., directly or indirectly accepted this offer. But there is produced a deed of commission and factory under the late Mr Forbes's hand to Mr William Forbes, W.S., to manage the estate of Callendar, as his commissioner and factor, and under that deed Mr Forbes has authority to grant leases, but not of longer endurance than is allowed by the deed of entail of the estate.

"An extract of the deed of entail of Callendar is also produced, from which it appears that leases of longer duration than nineteen years, or for the life of the entail, are strictly prohibited.

"It was not within Mr Forbes's power under that commission to bind his constituent to a lease of twenty-nine years, and thus even a written acceptance of the defender's offer under the hand of Mr Forbes, W.S., as commissioner for the late Mr Forbes, would not, constructively even, be evidence of acceptance of the offer by the late Mr Forbes.

No. 78.

Feb. 22, 1873.
Forbes v. Wilson.

The defender appealed to the Court of Session.

Argued for him;—The letter of 23d January 1855, followed by

"Then arises the question, can the defender prove the acceptance of in any other way than by writ or oath? Without acceptance the contr complete, and the recent cases of Gowan's Trustees v. Carstairs, 18th J 24 D. 1382, and Walker v. Flint, 20th February 1863, 1 Macph. 417, there must be complete proof of the contract by writ or oath before the for parole proof of rei interventus.

"If this be sound law there is an end of the case, for there is no st here. But it is not necessary to rest the judgment on this ground alor

"Though it were competent to prove the landlord's acceptance of offer of lease by parole, to the effect of constituting the contract, the Sh not think there is such proof here.

"He agrees with the Sheriff-substitute that there is not proof that M M.P., accepted this offer. There is really no evidence that he was e of this offer having been made, or that any specific proposal had been n the defender should become tenant of the ground for a term of years, it is not unlikely he may have known that something of the kind suggested.

"It is said, however, that Mr Forbes, W.S., accepted the offer now fo

"There is a great improbability here to be overcome, arising from Mr W.S., want of power. It is not credible, without strong proof, that have accepted such an offer without express authority from Mr Forb nor that Mr Forbes, M.P., would have given any one else that authorit first consulting Mr Forbes, W.S. But it is clear from the evidence the 23d of January, when the offer was sent to Mr Forbes, W.S., until of February, when he died, Mr Forbes, M.P., of Callendar, was in n transact such business, and there is no evidence whatever that in tha he ever saw Mr Forbes, W.S.

. . . . .

"As regards rei interventus and homologation by the present pursuer, there can be none if the Sheriff is right.

"But the Sheriff would just make this remark on the receipts for they, one and all, are receipts for rent for the year beginning at Martin the first receipt is for rent for the year beginning at Martinmas 185 could hardly, therefore, be referred to a lease which commences at 23d 1855, while they do raise a presumption that the defender was occup land at and before the date of the offer, and did not enter upon pos consequence of its supposed acceptance.

"On the whole, the Sheriff has no doubt that the law of this case i with the pursuer, while he has as little doubt that the defender has bona fide belief that he had obtained the right which he claims.

"Perhaps it would not be easy to find a case which, more fully than sent, justifies the wisdom of the rule, which the Sheriff holds to be t law, that a contract of lease for years, including its acceptance, must b by writ or oath of party, and cannot be competently proved by parole.

"The Sheriff does not think that the pursuer really wants the land a road to his farm of Standalane. Whatever his real object was that the one which influenced him to institute these proceedings. But th doubt that the averment has caused a good deal of expense in the proo

"The Sheriff has therefore thought it right to grant some modificati expenses.

"It is, perhaps, too much to expect that this judgment will prove a to the parties; but the Sheriff may, without offence, he trusts, express t hope that they will find in it a solution of their rights which they ma and may see their way to make such arrangements for the future as m to the pursuer a full acknowledgment of his rights, and to the defe enjoyment of his present access, and of the expenditure he has mad and, if possible, a restoration of that good feeling between neighbo

No. 78.

Feb. 22, 1873.
Forbes v. Wilson.

r tacit acceptance by those for whose acts Mr Forbes, M.P., was respon-le, was a valid lease for years, containing all the particulars which are uisite for such a contract. It was not necessary that the acceptance uld be in writing or proved by the oath of the lessor, and the present e did not fall under the rule of Gowan's Trustees, as cited by the purr.[1] To the objection that the alleged lease for twenty-nine years was d, as being in contravention of the entail, and therefore ultra vires the late Mr Forbes to grant, it was replied—(1) This objection could y be raised in a reduction, and not in the present process of removing er the Act of Sederunt;[2] (2) the lease is at least good for the period wed by the entail, i.e., nineteen years, or the lifetime of the granter;[3] the present Mr Forbes cannot raise the objection, being subject to onal bar, by accepting rent, especially after the alleged lease had e to his own knowledge. A contract of location being thus esta-hed, however informal, Mr Wilson had shewn not only rei interventus actings and outlay on his part, but also homologation by the landlord.
e present summons is not fitted to try any other question than whether defender holds under any other title than a verbal contract, enduring y for one year;[4] and in particular it is irrelevant to found on the con-on adjected to the lease when granted.

Argued for the pursuer;—The present alleged lease for more than one r must be proved by the writ or oath of the lessor before the lessee get in any proof of rei interventus.[5] In the cases of Drummond and a distinction was drawn between a completed though informal lease one, such as we have here, which was incomplete. A factor has no mmon law powers to grant leases, and in the present case, if Mr Forbes, S., can be held to have tacitly or expressly accepted the defender's r, he went beyond the express terms of his commission.[6] Even if a lid contract of lease between the defender and the late Mr Forbes be de out, it is not binding on the present heir of entail in possession, and reduction is required, the circumstances in Agnew v. Gillespie being ite different. If a lease contravenes an entail in respect of endurance, annot be valid to any effect, or for any lesser term.[7] Mere acceptance rents did not raise a personal bar by homologation, as the receipts e equally applicable to a yearly tenancy, and the facts alleged in supt of the plea of rei interventus do not come up to Bell's definition.[8]
e demand for enforcement of the condition as to the road to Standalane bona fide made, and may be competently raised in the present action.

---

ms, previous to these proceedings, to have uninterruptedly existed between
m."

[1] Hunter on Landlord and Tenant, i. 432; Drummond v. Gow, 1779, in Bell Leases, i. 314; Gordon v. Hall, Aug. 10, 1757, M. 15,178; Countess-Dowager Moray v. Stewart, 1772, M. 4392 and 15,179—rev. March 24, 1773, 2 Pat. 7; Ross v. Ross, Feb. 9, 1790, Hume's Dec. 774; M'Pherson v. M'Pherson, y 15, 1815, F.C.

[2] Agnew v. Gillespie, June 23, 1813, F.C.

[3] Bell's Com. i. 70—contra Bell's Prin. 1752; Hunter, i. 103; Agnew v. M'Niven, June 23, 1813, F.C.; Ivory's Erskine, iii. 8, 29, p. 808, note.

[4] Hislop v. Howden, Feb. 7, 1843, 5 D. 507; Keir v. Duke of Athole, July 1815, 6 Pat. 130.

[5] Gowan's Trustees v. Carstairs, July 13, 1862, 24 D. 1382; Walker v. Flint, 20, 1863, ante, vol. i. 417; Emslie v. Duff, June 2, 1865, ante, vol. iii. 854.

[6] Stair, ii. 9, 3.

[7] Hunter, i. 103; Mordaunt v. Innes, May 9, 1819, F.C.; Duke of Gordon v. Nov. 22, 1822, 2 Sh. 32; Malcolm v. Bardner, June 19, 1823, 2 Sh. 410.

[8] Bell's Prin. sec. 26.

No. 78. At advising,—

Feb. 22, 1873. Forbes v. Wilson.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—This is a summons of removing under the Act of Sederunt. The conclusions are that the defender should be decerned to remove from a piece of ground belonging to the pursuer, which the defender is said to have occupied as a yearly tenant, and that at the term of Martinmas 1870, the summons being dated 23d September 1870. The question is, whether the defender was a tenant from year to year. I am of opinion that he was not.

It appears to me that the history of the case has scarcely received the attention which it deserved. In 1854 negotiations for an excambion took place between the late Mr Forbes of Callendar and Mr Wilson, whose properties adjoined. Mr Forbes being an heir of entail it was necessary to have judicial authority for the excambion. The object which Mr Wilson mainly had in view is explained in a letter on 22d December 1854, by his agent, Mr Russel, to Colonel Forbes, brother of the late Mr Forbes, who was acting for him: "Mr Forbes is aware that the land acquired by Mr Wilson is purchased by him solely or chiefly for the purpose of enabling him to make a better entry to Bantaskine than he presently has." The only or chief object of Mr Wilson in carrying out the excambion was thus to make an access to his estate, and Mr Forbes was perfectly aware of this. It was originally intended to include the piece of ground in dispute in the excambion, and it was accordingly included in the first report of the referees to whom the Sheriff had remitted, which report was dated 7th December 1854. The letter from which I have quoted was written in consequence of a proposition to exclude the piece of ground from the excambion. It is explained by Mr Hamilton in his evidence that Mr Forbes had a great objection to it being included, because he did not wish to lose the power of making a road across it to his farm of Standalane, and the piece of ground was accordingly excluded from the excambion. When this proposition was made known to Mr Wilson he at first demurred. On 10th January 1855 Mr Russel writes to Mr William Forbes, W.S.:—"You are aware that Colonel Forbes mentioned that his brother was most anxious to have the excambion carried through; and as this small corner of ground is the sole cause of the delay, I trust that this matter may be immediately adjusted. Either Mr Wilson or myself will be glad to meet you in Edinburgh any day you may appoint if you wish further information upon the subject, as you are aware that Colonel Forbes wishes the matter adjusted without delay." Then on 15th January we have a long letter from Mr Russel to Mr Dickson, one of the referees, containing the following passage:—"In the plan, a large piece of ground, several times the breadth required to be left for the proposed road to Mr Forbes's farm, was left, and you may recollect that it was filled in, and a memorandum made by Mr Black that Mr Forbes was to have right to take at any time whatever breadth of ground was necessary to form his road, should he at any time think of doing so (which there is no chance of his ever doing.) Across this ground Mr Wilson's road is formed, and indeed without it Mr Wilson's whole object in getting the rest of the ground would have been useless, and indeed it was distinctly understood and known that it was to be formed." In this state of the correspondence, in which Mr Forbes understood that Mr Wilson's main object was to obtain an access to Bantaskine, and, on the other hand, Mr Wilson knew that Mr Forbes wished to retain the power of making a road to Standalane, the parties came to an arrangement at a meeting on the ground, at which Mr Hamilton, Mr Wilson, Mr Russel, and Mr Dickson were present, and which is described in a letter by Mr Hamilton to Mr Forbes, W.S., dated 23d January 1855. It was proposed that Mr Wilson should have a lease of the ground, and some discussion took place as to the rent. On the same day, 23d January 1855, the letter was written by Mr Wilson, which is the subject of the present action—(Reads letter, quoted supra.) That letter was sent to Mr Forbes's agent, Mr William Forbes, W.S., and the excambion was ultimately carried out. It would rather appear that the excambion had proceeded on the basis of this arrangement. It is plain that Mr Wilson would not have gone on with the excambion if he had failed to obtain an access. The letter was retained by Mr Forbes, W.S., who, it must be observed,

No. 78.

Feb. 22, 1873.
Forbes v. Wilson.

a power of attorney from Mr Forbes of Callendar, which enabled him to at leases. Mr Forbes of Callendar unfortunately died the following month. e further correspondence took place between Mr Forbes, W.S., and Mr ilton, which is not very distinct, but with which Mr Wilson had nothing to From that date to the raising of the present action Mr Wilson has held piece of ground for fifteen shillings, the sum mentioned in the letter, which been accepted by the landlord, and on the ground Mr Wilson has built a ge and other works at a cost, as he says, of £150.

t is said that Mr Forbes did not know that there was a lease. I question ther the pursuer is entitled to maintain this. If those authorised to act for ndlord act under an informal writing on the footing that there is a lease, and ive rent and allow expenditure to be incurred in reliance thereon, the land- l cannot turn round and say that he knew nothing of the lease personally. in addition to that, in 1868, the pursuer ascertained how the facts stood, and he continued to accept the rent for two years.

n these circumstances, I am of opinion, in the first place, that the reading of letter of 23d January 1855, and its retention by the landlord, followed as it by rei interventus, are sufficient to constitute a binding lease, and, in the se- d place, that the pursuer cannot maintain that the heir of entail who granted lease had no power to grant it, because by his own actings the pursuer has pted the transaction.

t is not necessary to express any opinion as to whether a lease granted for a ger period than is allowed by an entail would be good for the period allowed the entail. That is a difficult question.

n the circumstances it is plain that the summons is unfounded. We have hing to do with the meaning of the condition supposed to be inherent in the e. This is not an action for the termination of the lease in respect of the tingency having arrived, but a summons of removing on the ground of the de- der being a yearly tenant. Whatever questions may remain behind this is nly not a lease for one year, but for a term of years, and the defender is en- d to have the action dismissed.

LORD COWAN.—This is a simple action of removing, on the footing that the nder held the piece of land in question only on a verbal lease for a single r. I am of opinion with your Lordship that such is not the true state of the , and that the action has been wrongly raised, and cannot be maintained.

The defence is that a lease for a term of years was granted under very peculiar mstances, that is to say, under an agreement collateral to an arrangement an excambion betwixt the pursuer's father and the defender, in consequence which and on the faith of which the excambion was in fact carried through. regard to this matter I entirely adopt the views of the Sheriff-substitute. It s contemplated at first that the piece of ground referred to should be included the excambion, and on this footing the first report of the valuators proceeded. rwards the parties agreed that the ground should be struck out of the ex- bion, and remain the property of Mr Forbes, so as to enable him to form a dway on the ground if he at any time required such access to his farm of ndalane. Accordingly it was arranged that the strip of land should be let to Wilson, under a condition framed to meet this contemplated necessity, and roffer by Mr Wilson, which is the foundation of the present action, was adjusted, d to Mr Forbes's agent, and by him retained for his client's behoof. In con- quence of this change in the arrangement of parties a new report was obtained m the valuators, in which this strip is left out of view, and the excambion s carried through on the understanding that the proposed lease was part of whole arrangement. Thereafter followed rei interventus of the most plain l obvious description. Mr Wilson entered into possession even before the Mr Forbes's death, which occurred soon after the date of the offer referred nd laid out a large sum of money in forming an avenue to his house of Ban- tine through the strip of ground the formation of which was the very object he excambion, the excambed ground being used for that purpose. There was s fixed on the late Mr Forbes an obligation to give effect to this lease. Nothing is better established than that such a conjunction of circumstances is quite sufficient to constitute a valid and binding contract of lease. Many cases that import were referred to by the defender's counsel, and I may mention the case of Neill v. E. of Cassillis, 22d November 1810, F.C., as bearing out the same doctrine. Nor is there any room for the contention that the lease so established is not binding on the present pursuer. There can be no doubt that he adopted the arrangement come to by his predecessors. The excambion still went on after his accession to the property; the alterations made by the defender also went on, and might have been seen by the pursuer; and he is not only the heir of entail, but the general representative of his father, and bound by all his personal obligations. Moreover, the stipulated rent was paid to and accepted by the pursuer or by those acting for him, and entered in his rental books, for upwards of fifteen years. Above all, though he may himself have had no personal knowledge of what was going on, he, like most landed proprietors, has to trust much to his servants, and to be responsible for their acts. They, in the present case, were quite cognisant of the state of affairs, and one of them held the very deed which has caused so much controversy. But the proof of adoption is more distinct still, for we find that in 1868 a copy of the lease at length reached Mr Forbes, and that for two years after that period he accepted the rent which was originally stipulated for the strip of ground.

No. 78.

Feb. 22, 1873. Forbes v. Wilson.

The form of the action, being a removing on the footing of the lease being merely verbal, excludes consideration of the question what would be the effect of the restriction of leases to a period of nineteen years, contained in Mr Forbes's entail; and though it is not necessary for the decision of the case, I cannot conclude without adverting to the character and terms of the offer of lease. I doubt very much whether any removing which could have been ordered in the circumstances of this case could have applied to the right of way which the defender has acquired across the strip of ground in question. The two things, if we carefully consider the correspondence and the terms of the defender's letter, are quite distinct, and this consideration may come to be of importance at the ish of the present lease whenever that may turn out to be.

Lord Benholme.—I concur with your Lordships. The present action is not calculated to try the second question raised, viz., whether, assuming the existence of a good lease for twenty-nine years, the subject is not liable to be resumed on certain contingencies. The action is one of removing, on the ground of there being no lease, and the only question before us is, whether there was a lease. I am also clearly of opinion that the pursuer is barred by rei interventus and homologation from challenging this as a lease for twenty-nine years. I think that we should decide the removing on its own merits, and dismiss the action.

Lord Neaves.—I concur in the opinion expressed by your Lordships. It is impossible to mistake the nature of the action, which is plainly stated in the record to be laid on the Act of Sederunt of 1756, and on the Sheriff-court Act of 1853, and which proceeds on an admission that a lease did actually subsist between the parties, with, however, the qualification that the contract was only verbal and the endurance of the tack only from year to year; and such being the case the conclusion is that the tenant is bound to remove at the Martinmas next following the date of the action. Now, if the defender turns out not to be merely a yearly tenant, but on the contrary to have a lease of longer duration, the ground of action entirely fails. I think this is just what appears from the case as submitted to us. The defence is founded on an alleged lease for twenty-nine years; and then on revisal, the pursuer somewhat inconsistently traverses the defence by means of a very special stipulation in the offer, referred to by your Lordships, in virtue of which, as he alleged, he might at any moment bring the lease to an end, by occupying the ground himself for another purpose. Now this is quite a different case from that with which the summons sets out, and I am of opinion, if the defender can make out a valid lease in his favour for a term of years, he is entitled to prevail in this action as laid, and that we cannot wander into inquiries about the qualifications or conditions contained in the lease

No. 78.

Feb. 22, 1873.
Forbes v. Wilson.

Now, I think it quite plain that the defender has succeeded in making valid contract of lease, and that on much the same grounds of rei inter- or homologation as your Lordships have adverted to. It may be that Mr is quite correct in stating that he had no personal knowledge of what been arranged, and of what operations were going on in respect to the strip of d in dispute; but I must hold that every proprietor, whether he mismanages tate or not, is presumed to know all about what goes on in connection with d especially what passes with the full knowledge of his own servants. He not be allowed by the law to indulge the dignified repose of the gods of rus, especially in a business-like country and age such as this; and if it m that valuable rights are thereby imperilled, and expense incurred, he just take his chance. But I think Mr Forbes must have obtained some cognisance of what was occurring even before 1868; for we find the rent strip of ground duly entered in the rental-book of the estate. After 1868 doubtedly knew of Mr Wilson's alleged right, and allowed it full effect for two years thereafter without challenge.

THE following interlocutor was pronounced:—"Find that in the year 1854 the defender and the late Mr Forbes of Callendar entered into a contract of excambion of certain lands near their respective properties: Find it proved that the defender intimated to Mr Forbes that his object in including the excambion was to obtain an access to his lands of Bantaskine: Find that the strip of ground in question was struck out of the excambion, and that the parties agreed that the defender should have a lease of it: Find that the letter, No. of process, was transmitted to Mr Forbes's agents and retained by them, and that it has been acted on by payment and receipt of the stipulated rent ever since: Find that, in these circumstances, the said writings, followed by the actings of parties, constituted a binding lease for a term of years, and cannot be repudiated by the pursuer: Therefore recall the judgment appealed from; dismiss the action, and find the appellant entitled to expenses in this and the inferior Court, including the expenses of the appeal formerly taken to this Court, and decern: Further, remit to the Auditor," &c.

BURN & GLOAG, W.S.—J. K. CRAWFORD, S.S.C.—Agents.

No. 79.

Feb. 26, 1873.
Stewart v. Padwick and Another.

ARCHIBALD DOUGLAS STEWART, Pursuer.—Shand—Balfour—Mackay.
HENRY PADWICK and FRANC NICHOLLS STEUART, Defenders.—Sol.-Gen. Clark—Watson—Keir.

penses—Counsels' Fees.—In a question of expenses between party and r in a case in which the evidence was voluminous, and involved diffi- questions of medical science—(1) fees to counsel for consultation before debate in the Inner-House allowed; (2) the fees of medical men ex- ed as experts upon the effect of the whole evidence fixed at ten guineas a- ; (3) fees of medical men called as witnesses to matters of fact, but who also examined upon questions of medical opinion, also fixed at ten guineas r.

1ST DIVISION.
Ld. Mackenzie.
B.

HIS was an action of reduction on the ground of deathbed of a ute or agreement of sale in favour of the defender Padwick of the te of Grandtully and others, executed by Sir William Drummond rt on 30th March and 3d April 1871. Sir W. D. Stewart died on April 1871.

record was made up and closed, and proof was led in the action be- the Lord Ordinary, who, on 30th May 1872, found that it was not

No. 79.

Feb. 26, 1873.
Stewart v. Padwick and Another.

proved that on the date on which Sir W. D. Stewart executed the said minute he was labouring under the disease of which he died, and assoilzied the defenders, with expenses.

To this judgment the First Division adhered on 17th January 1873.

The main question in the case was whether Sir William D. Stewart died of active congestion of the lungs, the result of inflammatory action, or passive congestion of the lungs, the result of pre-existing structural disease of the semi-lunar valves operating mechanically to produce congestion; and, accordingly, great part of the proof, which extended to 2[illegible] pages of print, consisted of medical evidence.

The case now came before the Court on objections to the Auditor's report on the defenders' account of expenses. The defenders objected that the Auditor had disallowed fees paid to counsel for consultation before the hearing in the Inner-House; and argued that this charge ought to be allowed, (1) on account of the length of time (more than six months) between the hearing in the Outer-House and that in the Inner House; (2) on account of the great delicacy and difficulty of the evidence.

At advising,—

LORD PRESIDENT.—I think that we should allow the fee for consultation before hearing in the Inner-House. Sometimes we have inconsistent arguments by counsel on the same side, which would have been avoided had there been consultation. Of course there are many cases in which a consultation before hearing in the Inner-House is not necessary; but in a case like this it is of the greatest consequence that counsel should arrange in what way they are to present the case to the Court, and for that purpose a consultation is necessary.

The other Judges concurred.

The fees charged in the account as paid to each of Dr Grainger Stewart and Dr P. H. Watson, who were examined for the defenders as experts and gave evidence upon the whole evidence led, amounted to £[illegible]. This charge the Auditor disallowed, and allowed £10, 10s. a-day for the days during which the proof lasted to each.

Professor Spence and Dr Gillespie were also examined for the defenders with regard to their observations in a post mortem examination of Sir William D. Stewart's body; but the questions put to them extended also to matters of scientific opinion. The Auditor allowed only the usual fee of £2, 2s. per day to these gentleman, regarding them as merely witnesses to matters of fact.

The defenders objected to these findings by the Auditor, and argued that such remuneration was altogether inadequate for medical men of the position of the witnesses.

At advising,—

LORD PRESIDENT.—Mr Grainger Stewart and Mr Watson were called merely as experts, and I do not think it safe to exceed the allowance fixed by the Auditor. There is no doubt that the highest class of evidence cannot be got at this rate, and in a case of such importance as this is parties will have the best evidence; and it is desirable that it should be so. But is the winning party entitled to charge the whole of his expenses against the loser? It is against the spirit and practice of the Court that he should. If we exceed the sum paid by the Auditor I do not see where we are to find a limit to such charges. The only safe course is to adhere to the rule of the Auditor.

As to Drs Spence and Gillespie, theirs is a very exceptional case. I do not remember a similar case. For they were called to speak to a matter of fact, but a matter entirely of medical fact, observed by themselves, and valuable y on account of their skill as observers of such facts. They were also ex- No. 79.

d as experts. Now, it is difficult to see any good ground for making a ence between the remuneration of these gentlemen and that allowed to Drs Feb. 26, 1873.
ger Stewart and Watson. No doubt they might have been compelled to Stewart v.
l as witnesses to fact; but the facts to which they were called to speak Padwick and Another.
their observations in the post mortem examination; and they went volunto conduct this examination, and were sent to conduct it as being highly d men. So I am of opinion that they should be allowed the same reation as Drs Grainger Stewart and Watson—that is, ten guineas a-day.

e other Judges concurred.

Interlocutor accordingly.

DUNDAS & WILSON, C.S.—TODS, MURRAY, & JAMIESON, W.S.—Agents.

THE EARL OF ZETLAND, Pursuer.—Fraser—Lancaster. No. 80.
LEXANDER ALLAN LAIRD and OTHERS (Hugh Tennent's Trustees), Defenders.—Sol.-Gen. Clark—Gloag.

Feb. 26, 1873.
Earl of Zetland v. Tennent's Trustees.

lmon-Fishings—Prescription—Possession—River—Medium Filum.—Held the right which may be acquired by possession for forty years on a grant lmon-fishings pertaining to lands situated on one side of a river (1) t limited to the fishings in that part of the river which is ex adverso of nds; and (2) may extend to fishings beyond the medium filum of the operty—Possession—Bounding Charter—Medium Filum—Where a proprie- d a right of salmon-fishings pertaining to lands described as lying within nty bounded by a river, which separated that from another county, held he description applied to the lands and not to an incorporeal right attached m, and that the possession following upon the title was not limited by the m filum of the river.

served that, even if the title were ambiguous, possession, which was the r interpreter of its meaning, had made it clear.

served that the medium filum is only of importance in determining rights of rty in the solum, or making arrangements for the exercise of the right of g where opposite proprietors have each rights of fishings, but neither has xclusive possession.

shings—River—Possession—Prescription.—Where the right of salmon-fish- d been exercised from banks on the bed of a river for more than forty years, from changes in the river, new banks had been formed, one of which had d for less than that period, held that the possession of the fishings from new bank was only an exercise of the right of fishing previously exercised the former banks,—the substantial right of fishing being the matter to be ded, and not the particular stations from which the right was exercised.

HE Earl of Zetland was proprietor of and infeft in the lands and 2D DIVISION.
e of Balinbreich, in the county of Fife, and lying on the south side Lord Jerviswoode.
e firth or estuary of the river Tay, with the fishings attached thereto R.
he river Tay, "prout medium flumen dictæ aquæ currit." The de-ers, the trustees of the deceased Hugh Tennent, Esquire of Errol, were ch heritable proprietors, and duly infeft in the lands of Easter Errol, he north side of the river Tay, including therein "All and whole the s of Dallalie, Easter and Wester Randerstone," &c., "together with almon-fishings and other fishings pertaining to the said lands of Ran- one and Dallalie, all lying within the parish of Errol and sheriffdom rth."

this action of declarator and interdict the pursuer sought to have it d and declared "that the pursuer had good and undoubted right to the salmon-fishings in the river Tay, between Corbieden on the east and the Pow of Lindores on the west, and that from the south shore as far as the middle line of the said river, and including the exclusive right to fish for salmon, and other fish of the salmon kind, in the South Deep or south channel of the said river, so far as opposite to the said estate of Easter Errol, belonging to the defenders, and particularly from and upon the banks or fishing stations called Lower Peesweep, Haggis, and south side of Hobby Horse; and that the defenders and their successors in the said lands and estate of Easter Errol had no right or title to fish for salmon, or other fish of the salmon kind, to the south of the middle line of the said river, and, in particular, from the said banks or fishing stations, or in any other part of the South Deep or south channel of the river Tay ex adverso of the said estate of Easter Errol."

No. 80

Feb. 26, 1873.
Earl of Zetland v. Tennent's Trustees.

The pursuer stated in his condescendence that under their titles to the said estate the pursuer and his predecessors had for greatly more than forty years been in the uninterrupted possession of the right of fishing for salmon by net and coble and otherwise in the river Tay from Corbieden on the east to the Pow of Lindores, the westmost point of his estate. His estate of Balinbreich and the defenders' estate of Easter Errol were separated from each other by the firth or estuary of the Tay,—Errol being on the north side, and Balinbreich on the south side. The firth or estuary, where it stretched between these lands, varied from a mile to a mile and a half in breadth at high water. The channel of the stream of the river Tay at low water occupied only about a third of this space, and as the tide receded extensive banks of sand and mud were left bare along the north and south shores and in the channel of the river. Among these banks was a large bank lying nearly in the middle of the river, opposite to his estate, and also partly opposite to the defenders' lands. The southern side of that portion of the bank which lay opposite to the defenders' lands was divided into two fishing stations, called Lower Peesweep on the west, and Haggis on the east. To the east of the large bank above mentioned, and separated therefrom by a channel about thirty yards in breadth, there was another bank, called the Hobby Horse, also lying nearly in the middle of the river, and opposite to his estate. The said banks, which were constantly changing their form and position, owing to the action of the river and the tide, were parts of the alveus or bed of the river, and were entirely submerged by the tide, which at high water covered them to a depth of about two feet. The Hobby Horse bank had only existed for ten years. At low water the river Tay flowed eastward in two channels of nearly equal breadth, one on the north side and the other on the south side of the above-mentioned banks. The former channel was called the North Deep, the latter the South Deep. A considerable part of the volume of the river Tay flowed in the channel called the North Deep, between the said banks and the estate of Errol. Throughout the whole course of the said north channel salmon-fishing was extensively carried on from the time of low water till the banks were covered by the tide. The north channel was quite as much a part of the river Tay as the south channel, and the medium filum of the river, according to which the rights of the opposite proprietors to the salmon-fishings therein fell to be regulated, consisted of a line drawn down the river equidistant from the north and south shores at low water. This line intersected the two banks in question, dividing them longitudinally into nearly equal halves. The south sides of the said banks, consisting of the fishing stations called Lower Peesweep, Haggis, and south side of Hobby Horse, were considerably to the south of the medium filum, and the defenders could not rest out crossing that line and encroaching on the portion of the ishings in which belonged to the pursuer. The defenders, noting, claimed the right not only to the salmon-fishings in the ep opposite to their lands, but to cross the middle line of the to fish in the South Deep at the before-mentioned stations, ver Peesweep, Haggis, and south side of Hobby Horse.

fenders stated,—The salmon-fishings pertaining to their said prehended the fishings from the said bank or banks ex adverso nds, and, inter alia, the fishing stations and fishings on these wn by the name of the fishing stations of Peesweep, south side ggis Bank, and the south side of the Higham or Hobby Horse ese fishing stations were on the south side of the foresaid bank and were the fishing stations claimed by the pursuer in this a virtue of their title to the salmon-fishings above set forth they predecessors in the said lands had from time immemorial, and more than forty years prior to July 1870, possessed the salmon-the river Tay from the said bank or banks ex adverso of the said d, in particular, they had possessed for the period foresaid the hings called the Lower Peesweep, South Haggis Bank, and South
r Hobby Horse Bank fishings. This they had done by fishing a with net and coble from the said fishing stations and bank or adverso of their said lands, southwards into the stream of the by hauling their nets on the said bank or banks, and that with-nge or interruption. Neither the pursuer nor any of his predeer, by themselves or their tenants, fished at the said fishing r from any part of the said banks, nor until July 1870 did they e any right to do so, or state any objection whatever to the dexclusive possession thereof.

rsuer pleaded ;—(2) In virtue of his title founded on, and of the a which had followed thereon, he had the exclusive right to fish a and other fish of the salmon kind in the river Tay between a and the Pow of Lindores to the south of the middle line of the ) The banks or fishing stations called Lower Peesweep, Haggis, a side of Hobby Horse, being situated between Corbieden and of Lindores, and to the south of the middle of the river, he had sive right to fish for salmon at the said stations. (6) The titles on by the defenders having reference to lands and fishings in the Perth only, can confer no right to the fishing stations in disch are situate within the county of Fife.

fenders pleaded ;—(2) The right of the pursuer to salmon-fishings extended beyond his previous possession thereof, and neither s predecessors having ever possessed the said fishings his claim annot be maintained. (4) In respect of their title to the said shings, and of the immemorial and exclusive possession thereof and of their predecessors, they were entitled to absolvitor, with of of the averments of parties having been allowed and taken Ordinary, on 31st July 1872, pronounced this interlocutor :—

s matter of fact that the defenders and their predecessors in the Easter Errol, described in the statement of facts on their behalf, essed, as set forth in the sixth article of the said statement of hout challenge or interruption on the part of the pursuer or his right, the salmon-fishings in the river Tay from the bank or erred to in the said article ex adverso of the said lands ; and, in , that they have so possessed the salmon-fishings called the eesweep, South Haggis Bank, and South Higham or Hobby

No. 80.

Feb. 26, 1873. Earl of Zetland v. Tennent's Trustees.

Horse Bank fishings: Therefore sustains the defences, assoilzies the defenders from the conclusions of the summons, and decerns," &c.

The pursuer reclaimed.

Argued for pursuer;—The defenders had no title on which to found prescriptive possession to the fishings in question, in respect (1) that the medium filum of the river formed the legal boundary line between opposite riparian proprietors having each a grant of fishings; (2) that the defenders' charter was a bounding charter, the lands to which the right of fishing was attached being described as lying within the parish of Errol and county of Perth, while the fishings in dispute were beyond the medium filum of the river which bounded both the parish and the county. Further, that there could be no prescriptive possession of the fishings from the Hobby Horse station, that bank not having been forty years in existence.[1]

At advising,—

Lord Justice-Clerk.—The pursuer seeks to have it found and declared that he has right to the salmon-fishings in the South Deep or channel of the river Tay opposite to the defenders' estate of Easter Errol, and particularly from the banks or fishing stations called Lower Peesweep, Haggis, and south side of Hobby Horse; and that the defenders have no right to fish there. This is the claim of exclusive right to the fishings in these particular localities. The Lord Ordinary has found that the defenders have possessed these fishings for forty years; and in regard to the stations, Lower Peesweep and Haggis, that is admitted by the pursuer, but it is not admitted as regards the Hobby Horse station, which is said to have come into existence within the prescriptive period. These conclusions depend, in the first instance, on the title of the defenders. The defenders have shewn a sufficient title to support possession of fishings. The title is not disputed to be a title to salmon-fishings. But it is said (1) that the fishings in dispute are not ex adverso of the defenders' lands, while the grant was only of fishings attached or pertaining to the lands; and (2) that as the defenders' charter is a bounding charter, the estate being described as lying within the parish of Errol and county of Perth, it cannot be a title to possess fishings in these stations, which, being to the south of the middle line of the river, are within the county of Fife. Neither of these contentions can be maintained consistently with the uniform decisions of this Court. In the first place, where there is a title to salmon-fishings followed by possession on the part of the proprietor on one side of a salmon-fishing river, it is not necessary that he should limit his right of possession to that part of the river which is directly ex adverso of his lands, or that it should not extend beyond the medium filum of the river. In the case of the Duke of Richmond I was of opinion (though Lord Benholme gave another construction to the expressions used in the grant) that the fishings in the grant were only those ex adverso of the lands, but as the Duke had possessed on both sides he had converted that grant into a complete right to the river. Now, the present is a stronger case for the application of this doctrine for the possession of these stations is substantially ex adverso of the lands in question. Possession for forty years on a mere title cum piscationibus is enough. Here there is an express title of salmon-fishings, and the right cannot be affected by the fact that the possession has been a little above or below the lands contained in the title.

---

[1] Young v. Carmichael, 1671, M. 9636; Hepburn v. D. of Gordon, Nov. 25, 1823, 2 S. 459 (N. E.); Milne v. Smith, Nov. 22, 1850, 13 D. 112; Wedderburn v. Paterson, March 22, 1864, ante, vol. ii. 902; Fraser v. Grant, Feb. 21, 1866, ante, vol. iv. 596; Lord Zetland v. Glover Incorporation of Perth, Jan. 31, 1868, ante, vol. vi. 292; Duke of Richmond v. Earl of Seafield, Feb. 16, 1870, ante, vol. viii. 530; Macbraire v. Mather, June 29, 1871, ante, vol ix. 913.

No. 80.

Feb. 26, 1873.
Earl of Zetland v. Tennent's Trustees

to the medium filum, I do not think that a matter of any importance. sage and practice has been that the proprietor on one bank uses his right ing across the stream, and the proprietor on the other bank does the same. is here quite a sufficient title to prescribe, and I do not give any weight idea that the circumstance of the lands being described as lying within a ılar parish and county will limit the right of salmon-fishing to the medium of a bounding river. But prescription has construed this clause "lying ı the parish of Errol and county of Fife," and construed it conclusively. th regard to the fishings from the Hobby Horse station it is said that there possession for forty years, for that sand-bank has not existed for that . The answer to this is, that although these names are given to the par- : sand-banks where the right of salmon-fishing is exercised, the substantial to which possession applies is the right of fishing itself. There have been es in the river; but is it to be said that there has not been possession of hings for forty years, because it has not, and by reason of these changes it not have been, exercised in the same spot during all that time? I look : fishing from the Hobby Horse station as but a portion of the same right ing from the sand-banks in the south channel.
ı defenders have had sufficient possession on a sufficient title, and I am, ore, for adhering to the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor, but I think we must me finding as to the title.

ND COWAN.—This is a case involving questions of feudal title and of of salmon-fishing under such title. This matter has been the subject of consideration in many cases, and the principles on which the law is ed have not been left in much doubt. The pursuer's title, as set forth in ı 2 of his condescendence, is a title to salmon-fishings attached to his lands e south bank of the South Deep or channel of the river Tay. The only sion which the pursuer has had under that title has been of fishing from ns on this south bank of the south pool of the river. The title of the de- rs, on the other hand, is in these general terms:—"All and whole the of Dallalie, Easter and Wester Randerstone, &c., together with the salmon- gs and other fishings pertaining to the said lands of Randerstone and Dal- all lying within the parish of Errol and sheriffdom of Perth." Now, what ı right of salmon-fishing pertaining to these lands? I do not see any way certaining this except by inquiring into the facts of possession. And what ı possession that has been enjoyed by the defenders? It is not disputed he interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary is correct in its findings, so far as are confined to the question of possession. He finds that the defenders and predecessors in the lands of Errol have possessed without challenge and uption the fishings ex adverso of their property extending to and including shing stations on the north bank of the south pool, and especially from tations mentioned in the summons, and that the pursuer has had no pos- n whatever on that side of the south pool. The practical result of that ng is that all the stations on the sand-banks forming the north side of the ı pool which can be fished have been possessed by the defenders exclusively time immemorial. Now, that possession has been enjoyed under their ; and possession affording the only interpretation of the title, it seems to hat the title is amply explained, and that the salmon-fishings held by the ıders under their titles are those extending from their own lands on the ı bank of the river to the north bank of what is called the South Deep or nel. And this cannot be of the shifting character alleged, as the evidence s that the fishings from it have been exercised beyond the memory of man. was in the argument which we have heard urgently pressed that the title e defenders is a limiting title, and confines the defenders to the parish of and county of Perth, and cannot extend beyond the medium filum of the I do not so read the defenders' titles. I rather think that the descrip- n regards the parish applies to the lands only. But admitting the terms is respect to be ambiguous, how is the ambiguity to be cleared up except roof of possession? And as the proof shews the possession has extended

No. 80.

Feb. 26, 1873.
Earl of Zetland v. Tennent's Trustees.

beyond what is said to be the medium filum of the stream I do not think that that would be excluded by the terms of the title. As an incorporeal right attached to the lands its extent is to be ascertained by possession, and that from what the salmon-fishings are which the title describes as "pertaining" to the defenders' estate. As to the authorities, it was admitted that the case of Gr which related to fishings on a loch, would be conclusive against the pursuer, the same principle could be applied to river fishings. I do not see any sufficient ground for the distinction, and it so happens that the decision in the case of the Duke of Richmond and Lord Seafield had reference to river fishing There was this peculiarity, no doubt, that Lord Seafield's title had not been followed up by possession at all, but the decision is a clear authority as regards the sufficiency of the title to support prescriptive right. We must take it settled by that case that the Duke's title was sufficient to enable him to prescribe the whole fishings all the way across the river. The decision went so far as this, that he could draw his nets on Lord Seafield's lands. My opinion in that case has been fully reported, and quite agrees with that of your Lordships and I need not, therefore, refer to it further.

Now, the clear law of the case being as I have stated it, and being as found by the Lord Ordinary, I cannot give any effect to the distinction attempted to be drawn as to the Hobby Horse station. That is a station which has only been fished for the last twenty or thirty years, for the good reason that it has only existed for that time. But there are other stations in the same locality which have been worked by the defenders for more than the prescriptive period, and because these stations may vary from time to time, according to the shifting of the banks in the river's bed, is that to affect the exercise of the substantive right of fishing exercised from time immemorial? Can it be said that a change in the position of a fishing station, owing to a change in the bed of the stream, is to alter the question of right acquired through immemorial possession? I think such a proposition is untenable.

But, lastly, a good deal has been said about the medium filum of the stream. If there had been no possession at all, and we came to consider how the different competing rights of heritors on the banks of the river, having each a right of salmon-fishing ex adverso of their lands, were to be regulated, then indeed I think the Court have recognised clear principles upon which the fishing must be carried on. If the stream is broad enough to allow of a clear sweep of the nets, without crossing the medium filum, each riparian proprietor must exercise his right as to keep within the medium filum of the stream. But then again, a different state of matters arises where the stream is not sufficiently broad to admit of this. The Court in such cases has found that some arrangement must be made for an alternate sweep of the nets from the different sides. In the case, however, where immemorial possession has been enjoyed, I cannot think that the ascertainment of the medium filum is of any avail in determining such rights of fishing. The title being sufficient and the proof of possession clear, there is conclusive ground for judgment in the defenders' favour; and in this case, and on the whole matter, I think the defenders' title amply sufficient to support the possession they have had, and to establish their rights. Consequently, they are entitled to absolvitor.

Lord Benholme.—I quite concur with your Lordships. The argument for the pursuer, though able, appeared to me to proceed entirely on assumptions in point of law, for which, plausible as they seemed, no authority could be produced. On the other hand, there is strong evidence of possession, founded on undoubted title, which can hardly be impeached by theoretical argument alone unsupported by decision or authority; and in these circumstances I concur in thinking that we should find the title sufficient to support the possession which has been had.

Lord Neaves.—The first point in salmon-fishing cases is the question of title, the second the fact of possession. These two things are quite separate. You must have a habile title. Possession alone is of no use. Next, having a habile title

No. 80.

Feb. 26, 1873.
Earl of Zetland v. Tennent's Trustees.

ust have had possession to explain that title. Here you have a title, but aid to be habile to support the right of salmon-fishing only on the north of the river, and limited by the medium filum of the stream for the being. I am not aware of any authority for that proposition. The ques- s whether the title is habile or not to support the possession which has had. I know of no authority for saying that, in a question of this kind, ight of fishing can only be exercised ex adverso of the property to which shing is attached. The right of salmon-fishing is an incorporeal right at- g to certain lands founded on a grant, and interpreted and supported by sion; and it appears to me that the fishings in a river belonging to a pro- r under his titles are those fishings which he from time immemorial has nued to possess in virtue of those titles.

e point most pressed by the pursuer was that the fishings cannot go beyond edium filum of the stream. Does that view come to this, that the owner hings must follow the medium filum of the stream for the time being, as ream itself shifts its course? Or is the medium filum to be taken as when rant of fishings was made, and the proprietor to lose his fishings if the n shifts away from him? This would be quite at variance with the cases cted with the river Nairn, where the tendency of our law was shewn as ing the proprietor to follow his fishings. The matter of the medium filum be of importance in questions of property rights, but it can have nothing to ith rights of fishing, except in those cases in which the Court have availed selves of it for the purpose of making workable arrangements between com- g proprietors.

THIS interlocutor was pronounced:—"Find that the defenders have produced a sufficient feudal title to support the prescriptive right claimed by them to the fishings libelled; and with this finding adhere to the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor," &c.

H. G. & S. DICKSON, W.S.—CAMPBELL & SMITH, S.S.C.—Agents.

No. 81.

Feb. 27, 1873.
Jackson v. Cochrane.

THOMAS JACKSON, Complainer.—Mair.
e Rev. Dr COCHRANE, Respondent.—Sol.-Gen. Clark—J. C. Smith.

oof—Oath on Reference.—In an oath on reference, a party having deponed a statement in an article of his condescendence was true, held that the nent was thereby imported into the oath.

served, that in order to make documents part of the oath on reference the nent must be examined specifically on the matters therein contained; but that is done it is not necessary to engross the whole documents, a reference em being sufficient.

inds—Minister's Stipend.—Held that a proprietor who has a bare supe- y over lands, or one who has a security right over lands on which no ssion has followed, and who has not intromitted with the fruits, is not for minister's stipend.

inion, that it is not necessary to enable a minister to use his decree of ity against a possessor of lands localled on that the possessor's name should ar in the locality.

inion, that a proprietor whose name appears in the decree of locality ceases liable for stipend when he ceases to be proprietor.

2D DIVISION. Ld. Ormidale. I.

IIS was a suspension at the instance of Thomas Jackson, writer in caldy, of a charge on an interim decreet of augmentation, modifica- and locality, obtained on 9th February 1853 and 2d February 1855, e minister of the parish of Cupar-Fife, against the titulars and tacks- heritors, possessors of the lands and others, intromitters with the and teinds of the parish. The charge was for arrears of stipend for

No. 81.

Feb. 27, 1873.
Jackson v. Cochrane.

fifteen years from 1853, amounting to £20, 17s. 6d., alleged to be due to the respondent from lands called St Michael's Acres. The complainer's name did not appear in the decree of locality. The person whose name appeared therein in connection with those lands was an Andrew Thallon. The complainer stated that in 1853 a disposition was granted by the National Bank of Scotland, with consent of Thallon, and by Thallon for his own right and interest, in favour of the complainer and David Pearson, which disposition, though ex facie absolute, was qualified by a back bond in favour of Thallon; that the whole subjects conveyed by this deed having been previously feued out, only the dominium directum of the subjects was thereby conveyed; that by a series of transmissions the dominium directum was now vested in the complainer under the qualification contained in the foresaid back-letter; that he was not aware what lands were referred to under the name of St Michael's Acres, but that this name might apply to the lands conveyed by Thallon.

In article 10 of the statement of facts for the complainer it was stated, that "in the interim locality in said process, on which said interim decreet and warrant proceed, the said Andrew Thallon, and the said lands of St Michael's Acres, were localled on for part of the stipend due to the respondent. After David Pearson and the complainer became disponees of the National Bank and Andrew Thallon, as aforesaid, they lodged objections, on 10th June 1856, to said interim locality, on the ground that they only possessed the dominium directum of the property so disponed to them, and they specified the names and designations of those who possessed the dominium utile. These objections were allowed to be received and seen. They are undisposed of."

Pleaded for the complainer;—(1) The charge complained of being illegal and incompetent, in respect that it charged the complainer to make payment of the said alleged arrears of augmentation and stipend, and that to the respondent and his successors in office, it ought to be suspended. (2) The complainer never having intromitted with the rents and teinds of any lands in said parish, and never having had any right, heritable or personal, to do so, he was not liable in payment of stipend to the respondent. (3) Having only the dominium directum of any lands possessed by him in said parish, he was not liable in such payment. (4) Separatim. Being only an heritable creditor as regarded the said subjects disponed by the National Bank of Scotland and the said Andrew Thallon as aforesaid he was not liable in payment of stipend to the respondent in respect of said subjects. (5) The sums charged for, in so far as alleged to have been due upwards of five years, were prescribed. (7) The complainer not being mentioned nominatim in the pretended interim decreet and warrant, and the precise sums alleged to be due by him not being specified therein, and no such sum being due and resting owing to the respondent, the said charge ought to be suspended.

Pleaded for the respondent;—(2) It was incompetent to rectify or quash an interim decree of locality by process of suspension. (3) The complainer having failed to insist in his objections in the locality process and to obtain a judgment therein, was precluded from challenging the interim decree of locality by any separate process.

The Lord Ordinary (Ormidale), on 10th February 1870, pronounced this interlocutor:—"The Lord Ordinary having heard counsel for the parties on the complainer's first and seventh pleas in law, to the effect that the charge brought under suspension is illegal and incompetent, and having considered the argument and proceeding, repels said pleas in law except in so far as the seventh plea assumes that the sums charged for are not due by the complainer; and, under a reservation, in the meantime

No. 81.

Feb. 27, 1873.
Jackson v. Cochrane.

l questions of expenses, appoints the case to be enrolled, to be further eeded with." *

e complainer withdrew his objections so far as referring to the last years' stipend, and the Lord Ordinary, on 18th May 1872, held that laim for stipend for the previous years was prescribed, and could be d only by the writ or oath of the complainer. A proof scripto of omplainer having failed, the whole cause was referred to his oath. he course of his deposition the following statement was made,—) Is the first sentence in statement 10 true? (A.) I have not the im locality, but I have no doubt it is true. (Q.) Is that first sentence ? (A.) I have no doubt there is not a statement made for me on the d that is not true. (Q.) Are all your statements on record true. I think so."

e Lord Ordinary, on 14th January 1873, pronounced the following locutor:—"The Lord Ordinary having heard counsel for the parties he import and effect of the complainer's oath, finds the same to be tive of the reference: Therefore, quoad the sums charged for other those found due to the respondent by interlocutor of 18th May 1870, nds the letters and charge complained of, and decerns," &c. †

---

* NOTE.—If the complainer's pleas, now repelled, had been well founded, onsideration of his other pleas, which relate to what may be called the s of the claim made against him, would have been unnecessary. Both s therefore concurred in asking judgment on the pleas now disposed of e the case was further proceeded with.

The Lord Ordinary, being very clearly of opinion that the complainer's now repelled are ill founded, has had no hesitation in repelling them.

The ground on which the complainer endeavoured to support his first and ith pleas was, that, as he was not named in the decree of locality charged nd is only proceeded against as having come into the place of one Thallon, is said to have been an heritor when the decree was pronounced, it was ssary to have constituted his liability by action. But the Lord Ordinary not think so. A general decree against heritors and others, such as that in question, was undoubtedly competent, and is in accordance with the ary form and practice. And it is equally undoubted that the respondent, inister, was entitled in virtue of such a decree to charge the complainer as g an heritor now liable, although all the heritors be dead that were alive at ate—(Erskine, 4, 3, 11; and Connell on Tithes, vol. i. pp. 97-8). And the ndent was also clearly entitled to charge the complainer on and in virtue of decree of locality without the necessity of raising and expeding letters of ing—1 and 2 Vict. c. 114, secs. 1 and 3.

Whether the complainer can shew that he is not liable to the respondent in sums charged for on the ground that he is not an heritor, or any other nd, is a question which will now fall to be determined under his pleas other i those which have been repelled."

"NOTE.—It is unfortunate that so much litigation should have taken place, consequently so much expense incurred—about £20; but the Lord Ordi- r had of course no alternative but to deal with the case as it was presented im.

Since the 18th of May 1870 the litigation has related to the respondent's avours to establish his claims so far as not found due to him by the Lord inary's interlocutor of that date, first, by the writ of the complainer, and ndly, by his oath. It has been found by interlocutor of 5th November 3 that the respondent had failed in the first of these endeavours, and he has , by the present interlocutor, been found to have failed in the second.

In regard to the complainer's oath, the question is not quid verum est but juratum est. So dealing with the oath, the Lord Ordinary has found it ssible to arrive at any other conclusion than that it is negative of the ence.

No. 81.

Feb. 27, 1873. Jackson v. Cochrane.

The respondent reclaimed.[1]

At advising,—

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—This question arises in a suspension of a charge at the

"It cannot be, and was not contended, that the complainer has directly acknowledged either the constitution or the resting owing of the stipend in question. The contention of the respondent has been merely to the effect that must be inferred, from the complainer's oath, taken in connection with the writings alluded to in it, and particularly the proceedings in the augmentation and locality, that he is liable to the respondent in the stipend charged for. But the Lord Ordinary has felt himself unable to adopt this view. The respondent had formerly an opportunity of instructing his claims by the writs founded on to him for that purpose; but they were held to be insufficient. He then referred the matter to the complainer's oath, and now he says the allusions therein made to the writs, which had been previously found to be insufficient, are to be held as sufficient to establish his case. This was, in effect, the nature of respondent's argument, as the Lord Ordinary understood it, and so understanding it he had had little hesitation in holding it to be untenable. The process of augmentation and locality is not produced in the present process at all. There has only been produced of, or connected with that process, the locality (No. 61 of the process) of 9th February 1853, commencing with crop and year 1852, and the interim decree (No. 14 of process) of dates 9th February 1853 and 2d February 1855, but in neither of these writs is the name of the complainer mentioned. These writs, therefore, cannot in any view that can be taken of them, either by themselves or in connection with the complainer's oath, be held to get over the prescription established by the statute 1669, cap. 9, which enacts that ministers' stipends 'not pursued within five years after the same are due shall prescribe in all time coming,' except the same 'shall be offered to be proved by the defenders their oaths, or by a special writ under their hands acknowledging what is resting owing.'

"Having regard to the terms of the statute it would rather appear that although the whole augmentation process had been imported into and made part of the complainer's oath, the respondent could not be held to have prevailed. But the augmentation process in its entirety cannot, in any view that can be taken of the complainer's oath, be held to have been made a part of it. As the oath stands, it may well be doubted whether any of the writs spoken to by the complainer can be held to have been made parts of his oath in such a manner as to entitle the Court to consider them in determining its true import and effect. In the case of Boyd v. Kerr, 17th June 1843, 5 D. 1213, although it was held to be competent, in the examination of a party under a reference to his oath, to place documents before him with the view of assisting his memory, and to question him on the subject, or even to shew him a document irrelevant to the cause the Court could not consider such document with the view of contradicting the oath; and in the case of Gordon v. Pratt, 24th February 1860, 22 D. 902, it was held that although a party produced documents on the opposite party's call and deponed that they all had relation to the matter referred to and were genuine, that they were not imported into the oath so as to form part of it, the Lord Justice-Clerk, now the Lord President, remarking that 'proof by writ or oath does not mean proof by writ and oath; if the defender fail to prove his case by writ, he can have recourse to reference to oath, but he is then confined to the oath as his only evidence—the reference to oath being a judicial contract that the case is to be determined by what his adversary shall depone.'"

[1] Authorities cited (as to the reference to oath).—Cooper v. Hamilton, Feb. 20, 1824, 2 S. 728—aff. March 14, 1826, 2 W. and S. 59; Boyd v. Kerr, June 17, 1843, 5 D. 1213; Hunter v. Geddes, Jan. 29, 1835, 13 S. 369; Hamilton v. Struthers, Dec. 2, 1858, 21 D. 51; Gordon v. Pratt, Feb. 24, 1860, 22 D. 902. (As to the liability to stipend).—Dundas v. Nicolson, 1778, M. 8511; M'Donald v. Heriot's Hospital, Feb. 12, 1828, Shaw's Teind Cases, 156; Duncan's Par. and Eccles. Law, 167, 333.

No. 81.

Feb. 27, 1873.
Jackson v. Cochrane.

ance of Dr Cochrane, the minister of Cupar, against Mr Jackson, for the portion of stipend said to be in arrear for a number of years prior to the date he charge. The ground of action is that Mr Jackson is in possession of certlands which appear in the locality of this parish to have been localled on. person therein localled upon is one Andrew Thallon, and the charge pros on the footing that Jackson became the proprietor of these lands, and was uring the years for which stipend is claimed. Jackson suspends, and in the se of discussion the plea of prescription under the Act 1669, cap. 9, is stated gard to all but five years of the stipend said to be due. As regards the claim tipend for these last five years Jackson has satisfied it, putting in a minute ertaking that the money shall be paid. But as regards the rest of the claim plea of prescription is manifestly good in itself, and the Lord Ordinary has ained it, leaving the minister to prove the constitution and the resting owing the oath of the suspender. The whole case now depends on the oath on rence. The reference is of the whole cause. Whether that was altogether ntial in the circumstances of the case may be questioned. But be that as it y, the question now is, Quid juratum est—has the minister proved by the h of Jackson that this claim was originally due, and is now resting owing. e questions which are submitted to the deponent, and in the answers to which minister must find his grounds of success, are in reality these: First, Was drew Thallon localled on in respect of these lands in the locality? and, Second, Jackson acquire these lands from Thallon, and was he proprietor or possessor them or intromitter with their profits during the years in question? On the t question I am clearly of opinion that it is proved that Thallon was localled in respect of these lands for the amount of stipend claimed. Something has n said about the competency of referring to the documentary evidence in the n. There is no doubt as to the law on that subject. When a case is referred oath the proof must be derived from that which is sworn; but it is perfectly mpetent to put to a deponent documents relative to the subject-matter of the rence, and to interrogate him thereon, taking the answers as part of the deition. The case of Hunter v. Geddes affords a very apt illustration of the w on this subject. But it is quite a different question whether you can, per ersionem, import documentary matter in regard to which no detailed questions ve been put. That was the case in Gordon v. Pratt; and I refer to the opening tences in Lord Cowan's opinion in that case as giving a perfectly concise and nd view of the law on that subject. The rule is simply this, that you may make ruments part of the oath on reference, but in order to do this you must examine e party specifically on these matters; yet when that is done it is not necessary engross the whole documents, a reference to them being sufficient. Keeping se principles in view, we return to the question, whether it is proved that allon was localled on. It is stated in the tenth article of the condescendence t he was, and the question was put to Jackson, "Is that statement true?" and e answer is affirmative. I therefore hold it to be proved that Thallon was alled on. The next question is, did Pearson and Jackson acquire these lands? is distinctly proved by the statement in the tenth article, as also by the ole tenor of the oath. What question, then, there can be as to the identity of e lands I am at a loss to see. For Jackson, who was agent for the original prietor, who held a security over the subjects, and who has been connected rewith for the last fifteen years, to say that he does not know what lands were alled on does not reflect much credit on him. He certainly knew in 1854, Pearson and Jackson moved then to have the locality altered. We do not, wever, need to travel beyond the oath in order to find an answer to this ques-n.

The next question is, did Jackson take the place of Thallon? Now, I do not nsider what the minister's remedy is against singular successors. My impresn is that a singular successor just stands in relation to the minister in the me position as his predecessor, and that it is not necessary, at any rate, in order use the general decree against a possessor of lands, that his name should appear the locality. How far a former proprietor remains liable is a question which is not necessary to determine, although my impression is that he ceases to be liable when he sells. The question here is, what is the minister's right; and would greatly restrict that right if he could not use his summary remedy u the interim locality was rectified or the final one reduced. But it is sugge that Pearson and Jackson were never more than bare superiors. That is st in the condescendence and also in the oath. Now, in order to sustain charge it must be proved that the new proprietor takes the place of the old that respect. In my opinion it does not appear in the oath that Jackson du the years in question held the place of Thallon as intromitter with the fr There was a pro indiviso right ex facie of the conveyance to Pearson and Jack although it was really only a security that they used. But it does not ap that there was any possession on that title, in the proper sense of the word, the company or by either partner. After a year or two the company was divo by a conveyance to Welch, but on what footing he held the subjects is not pro by the oath, and it was essential to the success of the minister that this sh be cleared up. Thereafter there was a conveyance to Mackenzie, to which same remark applies. Consequently, since I am obliged to find within this grounds for this charge, and since I do not find there any evidence that du the years in question Jackson came into the place of Thallon as intromitter v the fruits, I come to the conclusion that there is a flaw in the essential pa the case, and that the oath must be held as negative.

No. 81.

Feb. 27, 1873. Jackson v. Cochrane.

The other Judges concurred.

THE COURT pronounced the following interlocutor:—"Adhere to interlocutor complained against, and refuse the prayer of the claiming note," &c.

JAMES BARTON, S.S.C.—BOYD, MACDONALD, & LOWSON, S.S.C.—Agents.

No. 82.

Feb. 28, 1873. Stirling & Sons v. Holm and Others.

WILLIAM STIRLING AND SONS, AND OTHERS, Pursuers.—Watson—Balf
JOHN HOLM, Assessor for the County of Dumbarton, Defender.—Fraser—Robertson.
THE COMMISSIONERS OF INLAND REVENUE.—Sol.-Gen. Clark—Rutherf

Jurisdiction—Administration of Justice—Corruption—Irregularity—Va tion Act.—Allegations of private communications between the Judges of Valuation Appeal Court and the assistant Solicitor of Inland Revenue w held irrelevant to support a conclusion for the reduction of judgments follo thereon, it being the duty of the Solicitor of Inland Revenue to lay the sp case for appeal before the Judges and get their opinion thereon.

Valuation of Land (Scotland) Acts—Valuation Appeal Court.—The Valu Appeal Court is a Supreme Court, and its proceedings cannot be set aside the Court of Session on the ground that they are ultra vires and incompet

1st DIVISION. Lord Gifford. M.

THE circumstances out of which this action arose are thus stated in Lord Ordinary's note:—

"The pursuers are owners and occupiers of certain dye and printw in the Vale of Leven, Dumbartonshire, and they appealed to the Comm sioners of Supply of Dumbartonshire against the valuation of their w made by the assessor for the county for the year 1870-1.

"On 13th September 1870 the Commissioners of Supply sustained appeal, and restricted the proposed valuations to the sums at which works stood in the valuation-roll of the preceding year.

"The assessor, being dissatisfied with this decision of the Commissio craved a case for the opinion of the Judges—that is of Lord Ormi and Lord Mure—who had been appointed to decide in such mat under 30 and 31 Vict., cap. 80, sec. 8. A case was accordingly state the Commissioners, which was duly laid before Lord Ormidale Lord Mure.

No. 82.

Feb. 28, 1873.
Stirling & Sons v. Holm and Others.

ı 5th July 1871 Lord Ormidale and Lord Mure, after hearing l, pronounced an interlocutor requesting the Commissioners of to give the appellants (that is, the present pursuers) an opportu- proving certain facts, and requesting the Commissioners 'to report stance of what may be proved.' A proof was accordingly led by pellants (pursuers) before the Commissioners, the substance of was reported by the Commissioners. No proof was led by the r, the Commissioners observing 'the remit authorises only a proof appellants.'

e case again came before Lords Ormidale and Mure, when their ips, on 5th December 1871, 'before disposing of this case,' again d to the Commissioners to give the assessor access to certain valu- to allow the assessor to lead evidence, and 'to report the substance t is proved.'

. 37 of process contains a report by the Commissioners under this remit, but it has no date, although it appears that the proof d on was not led till 20th May 1872.

the meantime, and before this second proof was led, the present of reduction and interdict was brought on 16th May 1872, con- ; for reduction,—(1st), of the interlocutor of Lords Ormidale and lated 5th December 1871; (2d), a deliverance by the Commis- of Supply, 23d April 1872, fixing a diet of proof; and (3d), an- leliverance of the Commissioners, dated 30th April 1872, post- the proof and fixing a new diet. The original remit by Lords le and Mure, dated 5th July 1871, and under which the pursuers lves had led proof before the Commissioners, is not brought under on. The summons also concludes for interdict against the Com- ers proceeding with the proof, but as no interim interdict was d the proof was proceeded with on 20th May 1872."

pursuers averred, inter alia, that the report of the Commissioners ly, under the remit of 5th July 1871, was transmitted to the Com- ers of Inland Revenue, who laid it with the case before Lords le and Mure, the Judges under the Valuation Act, who, on 25th ber 1871, heard parties on the whole case,—"The present pur- eing represented at the debate by counsel, and the assessor and mmissioners of Inland Revenue by Mr David Crole, assistant r of Inland Revenue, Edinburgh; and after the debate was con- the Judges made avizandum." (Cond. 11.) "The pursuers heard ; more of the case until 1st December 1871, when a paragraph d in the Glasgow 'Evening Citizen' newspaper intimating that a ad been allowed to the assessor in the case, and similar announce- were made in the Glasgow daily papers of the following day. inquiries were consequently made for an interlocutor by Messrs on, Kinnear, and Beatson, W.S., the pursuers' agents in Edinburgh, December, but they were told that no judgment had, down to that een pronounced."

; day the Judges issued the interlocutor of 5th December above- ned. On 7th December the pursuers requested Mr Crole to state ad taken place between him and the Judges between 25th Novem- l the issuing of the notes. "Mr Crole at first displayed an gness to give information, but ultimately he admitted, and the s believe and aver, that he, as acting for said assessor and Com- ers of Inland Revenue, had two meetings with the said Judges e debate mentioned in article 10, and before the said interlocutor ı were written out and signed, at which the questions before said for opinion as aforesaid, or some of them, and the terms of the

No. 82.

Feb. 28, 1873.
Stirling & Sons v. Holm and Others.

interlocutor, notes, or opinion to be issued or given by said Judg said case were made the subject of consideration and remarks, thereafter either Lord Mure drafted the interlocutor, notes, or which said Judges were to issue or pronounce on said case, and draft for revisal to Mr Crole, who revised it, or that the draf interlocutor or notes was prepared by Mr Crole and submitted t Judges for approval, and that the notes as revised by Mr Cr prepared by him and approved by said Judges, were issued Judges on 5th December 1871 as aforesaid. Mr Crole, however though asked, to exhibit said draft, or to state the extent or nat alterations which he had made upon it."

They further averred that they (the pursuers) had received no such private or ex parte meetings between the Judges and Mr C understood and believed that in accordance with the invariabl judicial proceedings no private or ex parte "communications w place with or be made to the Judges, but that the judgment, opinion to be pronounced by the Judges would proceed upon stated and argument openly submitted, and the statements op when both parties were present in Court, and upon the informat larly and competently before the Judges. Further, they re notice that any draft interlocutor or notes had been prepared mitted to Mr Crole for revisal. No such draft interlocutor or n submitted for revisal to the pursuers, or any one on their be they had no opportunity of submitting their views thereupo Judges, or of objecting to the alterations made or suggested by just as they had no opportunity of hearing and meeting the s made by that gentleman to the Judges at the private and ex pa ings above mentioned."

The Valuation of Lands (Scotland) Act (17 and 18 Vict. c. 91) the valuation-rolls of counties to be made up annually by appointed by the Commissioners of Supply, subject to appeal (1
8) against the assessor's valuations to the Court of the Commis Supply. The Act 20 and 21 Vict. c. 58, sec. 1, makes it lawf Commissioners of Supply, if they think fit, to appoint the officer of Inland Revenue having the survey of the income and asses within any county to be assessor or assessors for the purpos Valuation of Lands Act, "and in such case the expense atte making up of valuation-rolls by such officer or officers shall be by the Commissioners of Inland Revenue, or as the Commis Her Majesty's Treasury shall direct in that behalf." By th section of the same statute it is enacted that "all persons e appeal against valuations made by the assessors appointed unde Act, shall also be entitled to appeal under and subject to the and regulations against the valuations to be made by such officers of Inland Revenue appointed as aforesaid under this Ac upon any such appeal, any officer of Inland Revenue or the p pealing shall apprehend the determination of the said Commis Magistrates hearing such appeal to be contrary to the true inte said Act, and shall then declare himself dissatisfied with such d tion, it shall be lawful for such officer or appellant respectively the said Commissioners or Magistrates to state specially and to case upon which the question arose, together with the dete thereupon, and to transmit such case to the Commissioners Revenue, to the end that the same may be submitted to the Se Ordinary and the Lord Ordinary officiating in Exchequer cau Court of Session, for their opinion thereon; and such Judges

No. 82.

Feb. 28, 1873.
Stirling & Sons v. Holm and Others.

...ch case may be submitted shall, with all convenient speed, give and ...scribe their opinion thereon, and according to such opinion the valua... or assessment which shall have been the cause of the appeal shall ...altered or confirmed." By statute 30th and 31st Vict., cap. 80, "The ...uation of Lands (Scotland) Amendment Act, 1867," the second section ...he 20th and 21st Vict., cap. 58, is amended, and it is "provided always ... any valuation which shall have been confirmed or altered in con...ity with the opinion of said Judges shall hereafter be final, and not ...ject to review in any manner of way."

...he Lord Ordinary (14th January 1873) pronounced an interlocutor ...ing that "the averments made by the pursuers are not relevant or ...cient to support the conclusions of the action, or any of them: There... dismisses the action, and decerns: Finds the pursuers liable in ...nses, and remits," &c.*

---

* NOTE.—(After the narrative above quoted)—It will be observed that Lords ...idale and Mure have as yet decided nothing upon the original case as laid ...e them under the statute, the remits made to the Commissioners, and the ...s directed to be allowed, being necessarily before answer. Under the ...tes, Lord Ormidale and Lord Mure will yet fall to give their opinion upon ...riginal case of 13th September 1870.

In these circumstances, the very peculiar nature of the present action ...es apparent. It seeks to set aside certain intermediate procedure adopted ...ords Ormidale and Mure, who admittedly are the only competent Judges to ... the statutory opinion upon the statutory case. Farther, that intermediate ...dure is only partially brought under reduction. The pursuers propose to ... the proof led by themselves under the first remit to stand, but they pro... to interdict as incompetent any counter proof to be led by the assessor. ... farther, they seek to interdict the Commissioners of Supply from obeying ...emit or order made to them by Lords Ormidale and Mure, although the ...ers themselves have taken advantage of and acted upon a precisely similar ... or remit, under which a report has already been made to the Lords ...inary.

Notwithstanding the able and ingenious argument submitted on the part ... pursuers the Lord Ordinary is of opinion that the present action is wholly ...vant and incompetent, and he has accordingly dismissed the same.

It is necessary, however, to keep in view that the action embraces several ...ct and separate grounds of reduction, and as the Lord Ordinary thinks ... these fall to be differently dealt with, he will explain shortly the view ...kes of each.

I. There are apparently allegations of corruption, if not against Lords ...idale and Mure, against Mr Crole, Assistant-Solicitor of Inland Revenue, ...burgh, who, it is said, had ex parte and private meetings or communications ... the Judges, and suggested the terms of their interlocutors.

The counsel for the pursuers, while declining to abandon any part of the ... certainly did not insist very strongly in the pursuers' first plea in law, ... he declined to ask an issue in support of the allegations on which the ... rests.

The Lord Ordinary, however, is very clearly of opinion that the pursuers ... made no relevant averment, not to say of corruption, for they shrink from ... that word, but even of such partial counsel or irregularity as has even the ...test semblance of what might be held to be legal corruption or irregularity ... arbiter or judge.

Supposing it to be true that Mr Crole did draft the interlocutor, or suggest ...rms, or alterations upon its terms, the Lord Ordinary thinks this is wholly ...aterial. Mr Crole was in no sense a litigant in the cause, and had no ...est whatever therein. Mr Crole represents the Commissioners of Inland ...nue, to whom the case is to be transmitted, and who are to lay it before ... Judges. Mr Crole's position was really that of Clerk of Court, or at least

No. 82.

Feb. 28, 1873.
Stirling & Sons v. Holm and Others.

The pursuers reclaimed, and argued;—(1) The interlocutor had l nounced after private communications with Mr Crole, who had a it was more analogous to that position than to any other. Quite r the Judges might have requested him either to draft the interlocu suggest its form, and quite rightly the Judges might receive from suggestions calculated to carry out their views. The adjustment of t terms of an interlocutor of remit, while undoubtedly the act of the Ju practice every day made with the Clerk of Court after the parties hav bar. The pursuers' allegations, when carefully examined, really co more than this.

" The Lord Ordinary cannot help regretting that the pursuers sho thought it necessary to make the allegations now in question, which appearance at least of being imputations against the impartiality and ing of the parties concerned. For such imputations there is not the foundation.

" II. The more serious question, however, in the case, is that rais pursuers' pleas, that the proceedings of Lords Ormidale and Mure w vires and incompetent under the statutes, and that the Court of Sess Supreme Court of the country had right to set aside such proceedings, it has no right to review the ultimate judgments.

" It was urged, with great force, that under the statutes a special ca opinion of the Judges was really of the nature of a special verdict, and be dealt with as such. The Judges, it was said, have no right to deal special case as if it were an issue in fact, and to send it to proof eithe mission or otherwise. Still farther, the anomalies were dwelt on whi result from proofs taken, it may be, on many separate days before meetings of the Commissioners of Supply, each meeting possibly att different members, and the last meeting being required, not simply evidence or the mere depositions of witnesses, but to report the sul what had been proved. Indeed, the very purpose of a special case is sede proof, and the Legislature cannot have intended that the Lords who are to be the final Judges, should either lead proof themselve commission for leading proof, and, least of all, that they should gran sion for proof to such a body as the Commissioners of Supply.

" The Lord Ordinary feels the full force of the pursuers' argumen branch of their case, but he is of opinion that he cannot give effect t in the present process, or in any process like the present.

" (1) Lords Ormidale and Mure form a statutory Court, whose j are in no way subject to review. They derive their authority merel clusively from the Valuation Acts, 17 and 18 Vict. 91, 20, and 21 Vic 30 and 31 Vict. 80. It is expressly declared that the valuations ' wh have been confirmed or altered in conformity with the opinion of sa shall thereafter be final, and not subject to review in any manner of w judgment of Lords Ormidale and Mure is to be given by way of opini special case, but when it is so given it was not pretended that it wou way be subject to review.

" (2) Now, if the final judgment could not be touched or reviewed way of reduction or otherwise, the Lord Ordinary does not think that mediate step which the supreme and final Judges may think it necessa to enable them to give final judgment can be interfered with. Th which make the judgment of Lords Ormidale and Mure final do not any form of process. The statutes do not prohibit the Judges from m inquiry, or from informing their minds in any way they may think r Plainly, they might receive explanations from the assessor, or from th and it is thought they might call for any leases or documents bearin question at issue. How far they may go with such inquiries is real tion of expediency, which must be left to the discretion of the Jud selves, and with the exercise of this discretion the Court of Session wi slow to interfere.

as a party, and ought to be reduced in consequence of this grossly ular and incompetent procedure. Mr Crole being a party, or having himself a party, could not act as an official of Court, as appeared to ld.[1] There was, at all events, a grave irregularity in the interview

No. 82.

Feb. 28, 1873.
Stirling & Sons v. Holm and Others.

) The Lord Ordinary, as at present advised, cannot hold that under the ion Acts, or under similar statutes providing for special cases being laid the Judges, the special cases once transmitted cannot be amended or added e rather thinks that it is inherent in the Judges who are finally to decide ct that obvious errors in the special case may be corrected, and obvious ons supplied, it being always a question of discretion how far such power endment shall be exercised. Probably in most cases the Judges will be ing to send back special cases for amendment, especially where there is ver to convene the same individuals by whom the special case was origi- ent up. All this, however, is matter for the Judges themselves, and not Court of Session, which has no power of review.

) The argument of the pursuers as to the illegality of the remit under ion is equally applicable to the previous remit, of which the pursuers lves took advantage. The pursuers' counsel scarcely ventured to main- at Lords Ormidale and Mure were bound to look at evidence on one side nd to exclude all evidence on the other side; and yet this would be the of the pursuers prevailing in the present action; for the Lord Ordinary ly set aside the interlocutor brought under reduction, and not another utor of which no one complains. It is vain to suggest that a judgment our of the pursuers would virtually set aside the remit of 5th July 1871 l as that of 5th December 1871. It would need a new action to do this, y mere expression of opinion either of the Lord Ordinary or of the Court not be enough. Decree in terms of the libel would leave the remit of 5th 871, and the proof taken under it, quite untouched.

) The whole remits made by Lords Ormidale and Mure are necessarily, deed expressly, before answer. The remit complained of expressly bears made 'before disposing of this case.' Now, in their final judgment, Ormidale and Mure may possibly lay aside the remits altogether, and exclusively on the special case as originally returned. The present Lord ry cannot anticipate the future proceedings in the cause, and he declines cribe, to the slightest extent, the course which the sole statutory Judges dopt.

stly, it appears to the Lord Ordinary that the remit of which the pur- omplain was really a remit made in favour of the pursuers themselves, that the remit of 5th July 1871 and 5th December 1871, taking both to s they really do, one remit, was a remit to give the pursuers an oppor- of justifying the decision of the Commissioners of Supply. The Lord ry may be wrong, but the perusal of the proceedings has produced a impression on his mind that Lords Ormidale and Mure were not satis- th the decision of the Commissioners, but were inclined to return to the n of the assessor. Accordingly, it is not to the assessor that a proof is l in the first instance, but to the pursuers, although they held the judg- f the Commissioners. This seems to infer that unless the appellants something, the assessor's judgment must stand. If this view is well l, the plea of personal bar against the present pursuers would be very for what they are now doing is to seek to take advantage of the proof hey themselves have been allowed, and yet to exclude the assessor from junct probation, and from all probation whatever.

ile the Lord Ordinary, however, has thought it right to notice shortly re considerations, he rests his judgment chiefly on the ground that this s no power to interfere with or review the proceedings of the supreme r Court created by the Valuation Acts."

pbell v. M'Cowan, July 10, 1824, 3 S. 245; Manson v. Smith, Feb. 8, ite, vol. ix. 492, 496 (per Lord Neaves).

No. 82.

Feb. 28, 1873.
Stirling & Sons v. Holm and Others.

between the Judges and the party. (2) The Court has inherent po set right the Valuation Appeal Court when it goes beyond its jurisd The Judges of the Valuation Court are part of the Court of S and however their judgments may be invested with finality, so regards the merits of any case, they were subject to review whe clearly exceeded the powers conferred by the statute. If the could not be controlled, at all events this Court could prevent th missioners of Supply from proceeding with an incompetent proc special case was the only thing that could be laid before the Judges.

Counsel for the respondents (defenders) were not called on.

At advising,—

LORD PRESIDENT.—There are two grounds of action here, and t Ordinary has found a great many reasons against entertaining either. I do not think it necessary to find so many reasons, because there is or applicable to each ground of action, which, to my mind, is perfectly con

There is an allegation that something took place between the A Solicitor of Inland Revenue and the two Judges to whom the case Commissioners of Supply of Dumbartonshire was presented which ough have taken place between the Judges and him, because he had argued to the Judges on behalf of the assessor of the county of Dumbarton, t opposed to the present pursuers. Now, whether any such argument place is a matter of fact not ascertained. We must assume that it did t in disposing of this question of relevancy, and I am free to confess th Assistant-Solicitor of Inland Revenue did argue the case of one of the p stepped out of his proper province; but then I think the fault was i taking that duty of arguing the case of one of the parties, and not in else that he did as alleged upon this record. The statute 20 and 21 ' vides for the mode in which the case is to be laid before the Judges. It that "all persons entitled to appeal against valuations made by the appointed under the said Act shall also be entitled to appeal under an to the like rules and regulations against the valuations to be made by su or officers of Inland Revenue, appointed as aforesaid, under this Act; an any such appeal, any officer of Inland Revenue, or the person appeal apprehend the determination of the said Commissioners or Magistrate such appeal to be contrary to the true intent of the said Act, and s declare himself dissatisfied with such determination, it shall be lawfu officer or appellant respectively to require the said Commissioners or M to state specially and to sign the case upon which the question arose with the determination thereupon, and to transmit such case to the sioners of Inland Revenue, to the end that the same may be submitt Senior Lord Ordinary and the Lord Ordinary officiating in Exchequ in the Court of Session for their opinion thereon; and such Judges such case may be submitted shall, with all convenient speed, give and their opinion thereon, and according to such opinion the valuation or a which shall have been the cause of the appeal shall be altered or co Now, it is quite clear that when a case is prepared by the Commis Supply, and subscribed by their chairman, their business is, in the fi to send it to the Commissioners of Inland Revenue,—there is no direct cation between them and the Judges; and the Commissioners of Inland are directed then to submit it to the two Judges. Of course, by the sioners of Inland Revenue is meant any officer of the Commissioners Reveuue, and in Scotland that must mean either the Solicitor of Inland or his assistant. Therefore, the Assistant-Solicitor here was perfor statutory duty in submitting this case for the opinion of the two Judg was his business to see that they gave their opinion thereon and subs so that he might retransmit it, with the opinion of the Judges there Commissioners of Supply to regulate the Commissioners of Supply i

No. 82.

Feb. 28, 1873.
Stirling & Sons v. Holm and Others.

confirming the valuation in question. It is quite plain, therefore, upon this ...se of the statute, that the Solicitor of Inland Revenue or his assistant is the ...per custodier of the case, and it is his business to see the opinion of the ...dges written upon that case, and subscribed by them, and then to have the ...e returned to the Commissioners of Supply. As I said before, if there was ...y fault upon the part of the Assistant-Solicitor here it seems to me to have ...en entirely that which is alleged against him of having argued the case of one ...the parties, and not that he came into communication with the Judges when ...y were making up their minds upon their opinion, and writing it upon the ...e. I think the 13th article of the condescendence, in which the only aver...nts upon this subject are contained, is irrelevant. Indeed, I do not see how ...could have even the appearance of relevancy, unless something like a charge ...corruption were insinuated either against the Assistant-Solicitor or against the ...dges. Whether that would be a charge which we should have sustained in ...s Court is another and a very different question indeed, on which I offer no ...nion; but upon this I am quite clear that the allegations in the 13th article ...the condescendence are irrelevant.

The other ground of action is that in the proceedings complained of the two ...dges who were acting under this 11th section of the statute to which I have ...rred went out of the statute in the mode of conducting their procedure. It ...gued, and argued with much force, that a case such as is here contemplated ...s a case stating the facts, and raising a question of law for the Judges to ...wer; and that if the Judges find that the facts stated in the case are not ...cient to enable them to form an opinion, the proper course is to send back ...case to be amended, which of course must be done through the intervention ...the Commissioners of Inland Revenue just as before. That may be a perfectly ...nd argument: upon that I give no opinion either. What the Judges did ...not to order the case to be amended, but in point of fact to order it to be ...plemented. They desired the Commissioners of Supply to satisfy themselves ...certain other facts by leading additional evidence, or allowing the parties to ...l additional evidence, and to report, as a supplement to their case, the result ...that evidence. Now, whether I should have been disposed to take that course ...not, if I had been sitting as one of the Judges under this statute, I am not ...pared to say; but I am quite clear of one thing,—that we have nothing to do ...h the matter any more than if this were a complaint that the Court of Justi...y had pronounced a wrong judgment, or had gone out of their way and ...lated their own form of process, or their act of adjournal. I think these two ...dges sitting under this statute are just as much a Supreme Court as we are ...ing here, that their jurisdiction is absolutely privative, and that no other ...ge or Court in the realm can interfere with questions arising under the ...sation Act, or rather, I should more properly say, with questions relating to ...sations. It is to these two Judges, and to nobody else, that the whole juris...tion in this matter is committed; and I think we have no jurisdiction to ...rfere with the way in which they conduct their business.

LORD DEAS.—I am of the same opinion. There are just two grounds of action ...e:—in other words, two reasons of reduction. The pleas in law are now ...derstood to come in place of the reasons that were formerly embodied in the ...al summons; and the first plea in law is substantially the one that raises the ...t question to which your Lordship has referred, taken perhaps in connection ...h some parts of the second; but it just comes to this, that there were certain ...munications between Mr Crole and the Judges in the preparation of the ...erlocutor, which are said to make that interlocutor of no effect. Now, I am ...opinion that in order to give relevancy to that plea and to these averments, ...posing we had jurisdiction to entertain the matter, they must come up to a ...e of malfeasance on the part of the Judges, as well as of Mr Crole; and it is ...ite plain that unless it is definitely stated that Mr Crole influenced the Judges, ...d unless the Judges were equally to blame with him, there is no case against ...her the one or the other. The answer to that upon relevancy is that, although ...re is some insinuation of that kind, there is no distinct and substantive statement of fact to found such a plea; and that I understand to be w Lord Ordinary has found. I would only say further upon that point in place of insinuation, there were distinct statements amounting to mali on the part of the Judges and of Mr Crole, I should think twice before hold that we had any jurisdiction whatever to interfere in such a matter. Judges form a Supreme Court. The jurisdiction, be it what it may, is to them, with no appeal to us,—with no right to us to interfere at all would be a most extraordinary assumption for the Judges in one Supren to sit in judgment upon what really amounted to a charge of corruption the Judges of another Supreme Court. I can quite understand that, in of an arbiter, inquiry may be made as to whether there was corruption; a very different thing when the question comes to be with regard to a Judge in another Court over which we have no jurisdiction whatevc not necessary, however, to go upon that, because I hold with your I that there is really no averment of corruption. If there were, I should much inclined to think that it was by impeachment in Parliament and an action of reduction in this Court that the question should be tri a Judge lent himself to such things as are insinuated, although not sa I think it would be in vain for him to say, "I meant nothing wrong." that would raise a question not to be decided in the particular case, but tion of the removal of the Judge, and if it did not come up to that, I doubt if it would amount to anything at all. It is not necessary, how go into all that, if we are right in holding that there is no allegation of tion here.

No. 82.

Feb. 28, 1873.
Stirling & Sons v. Holm and Others.

The only other reason of reduction resolves, as your Lordship has s a question as to the mode of procedure,—whether in construing this the Judges were wrong in thinking that it does not prevent some inquiry to be made by them, and whether they are not entitled, eithe particular case they are dealing with, or by a general rule, to make would call in this Court an Act of Sederunt with reference to the form a of procedure, a thing that is implied in the constitution of every Suprem The constitution of every Supreme Court implies a power to make and the forms of procedure in that Court; and it is very difficult to say t power does not extend to such matters as were dealt with here. At all they might construe the statute in one way in that respect, and we might construe it in another way, but it would not be for us to say who was r who was wrong in that respect. It belongs to that Supreme Court to w jurisdiction is confided to construe the statute, and to construe their own for the regulation of the mode of procedure. I think with your Lords we have nothing to do with that at all. I see no reason, for my own think that the Judges went wrong; but although that were more doubt it seems to me to be, I do not think that our construction of the statu by possibility, be put in place of theirs.

Lord Ardmillan.—I should content myself by saying that I concur w Lordships, but as I had considerable experience in this Court, having Judge on valuations for several years, I think it right to make a few tions.

In the first place, I have a very distinct recollection,—and your L view of the statute is entirely in support of mine,—that the Solicitor of Revenue, or Mr Crole, the Assistant-Solicitor, does not represent the who is the party to the case. He is not there as counsel for the assess is there as custodier of the proceedings, and he is there, on the part of the of the Inland Revenue, in the discharge of a public and statutory duty. understand that Mr Crole appears in any sense for the assessor; and I that I have very often seen Mr Crole, when he did appear, give expl (for that was a duty of his) favourable to the subject, and unfavourab assessor. It is quite a mistake to say that Mr Crole is a mere counsel assessor. I have often myself, when sitting judicially, asked Mr Crole q and received answers from him unfavourable to the procedure of the as

No. 82.

Feb. 28, 1873.

Stirling & Sons v. Holm and Others.

y, and favourable to the party appealing; and, therefore, I think the f Mr Crole has been somewhat misapprehended. I have nothing more that part of the case.

I believe, the uniform practice is that the word "right" or "wrong" a either by one of the Judges or by the Judge's clerk; and I see o vitiate the proceedings when it happened to be written by Mr nything of the nature of corruption or malversation nothing of the kind relevantly alleged.

her part of the case appears to me to be equally clear; and there also d an explanation from my personal knowledge of the matter. It has y been felt necessary to get a little more information than the case of oners supplied, and in order to get that information, sometimes one form and sometimes another form was used; but the thing done is to ask the oners to correct, or admit, or add to the statement of facts upon which es are to proceed. In this case the form is rather different from what enerally seen; but I do not see much objection to it. The formal xpression, "allow a proof," are not the words used. The first judgment ows is that of 5th July 1871, where "the Judges request the Commis- give the appellants an opportunity of proving by witnesses or other- d so forth, and "the Judges request the Commissioners to report the of what may be proved." Now, under that remit, these gentlemen, tell us that anything like ordering a proof is absolutely incompetent, hemselves of the opportunity which was given to them, and used the ty to lead evidence before the Commissioners, but now they say, when d judgment comes for further inquiry,—a proof being allowed on the ,—the words being again exactly the same,—it is incompetent to do so. e right to allow these gentlemen to lead evidence, and they use their ; it it quite wrong to allow the opposite party to lead it, and that is to rned, as if the Judges were to proceed to decide the case when only a e evidence had been led, and to shut out the other. I cannot see that ither justice or law in that contention. It does not appear to me that ase in which the Court ought to interfere, and I agree with your Lord- he chair that Judges acting and having a final jurisdiction cannot be l by us.

ERVISWOODE.—I am entirely of the same opinion as has been expressed. o hesitation in saying that, even if it were within our power to touch ment, we should not interfere with it.

IE COURT adhered to the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary.

, KINNEAR & BEATSON, W.S.—ANGUS FLETCHER, Solicitor of Inland Revenue—CHARLES TAYLOR, S.S.C.—Agents.

No. 83.

Mar. 3. 1873.

Donaldson, &c.

DONALDSON, AND REV. WILLIAM SMITH, Minister of the Parish of North Leith, Petitioners.—Lee.

—Erection—Endowment—Lease—Feu—Act 7 and 8 Vict. c. 44, sec. on of Parishes Act, 1844).—The above Act sanctions the erection of cra parishes only in cases when the title to the site of the proposed s such that it shall be inalienably secured as the church of the new Held (diss. Lord Justice-Clerk and Lord Ardmillan) that a 999 years' church site did not satisfy this condition.

was a petition for the disjunction and erection of the church and oad sacra of Dalreoch, in the parish of Cardross and presbytery barton.

ite of the proposed church was held on a 999 years' lease only, on a feu-right, and the question was raised whether this was

TEIND COURT. Teind Clerk.

No. 83.

Mar. 3, 1873. Donaldson, &c.

sufficient compliance with the Act 7 and 8 Vict. c. 44, sec. enacts,—"And provided also that the titles to the said chur taken and conceived so as that the said church shall be i secured as the church of the said new parish in connection Church of Scotland."

At advising,—

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—My opinion is that there is here sufficient with the Act of Parliament, because the right, although in form equivalent to a perpetual grant.

LORD NEAVES.—I do not think we have here a sufficient complian statute. I have great doubt if we should sanction the erection o which is only to last for a limited period.

LORD ARDMILLAN.—I am inclined to think that there have been sions and legislation tending to recognise very long leases as equivale to a right of ownership. Undoubtedly a lease for 999 years is as nea ency as possible, and I am of opinion that in the matter here inv quite sufficient to meet the requirements of the statute.

LORD JERVISWOODE.—The question is one of considerable diffi view is rather that a lease, however long, cannot be looked on here as title. A lease is quite a different title from one of property, and ques arise under it with singular successors of the granter and otherwise w be subversive of the purposes of the Act.

LORD MACKENZIE.—I do not think that a lease fulfils the requiren statute. If Mr Donaldson was to convey his estate without takin obligation from his disponee the lease might not be binding upo singular successor, and the objects of the Act might thus be defeated.

LORD DEAS.—It seems to me that a feudal title is necessary here with the provisions of the statute. It is true that in certain classes such as qualifications of parliamentery voters,—a lease for 999 year held equivalent to a right of property; but that does not in the lea question we have here to dispose of.

The LORD PRESIDENT concurred with Lord Neaves.

THIS interlocutor was pronounced:—"Find that the leas years in favour of the trustees of the ground on which t has been built is not a sufficient title under the mean 8th section of the statute 7 and 8 Vict. c. 44, and with ing continue the cause until next calling."

J. B. M'INTOSH, S.S.C.—Agent.

No. 84.

Mar. 6, 1873. Bathie v. Lord Wharncliffe.

MARGARET BATHIE, Pursuer.—Millar—Scott.
The Right Hon. LORD WHARNCLIFFE, Defender.—Sol-Gen. Cl Robertson.

Landlord and Tenant—Draft Lease—Rei Interventus.—Circum which held that a draft lease of a farm had been validated rei interv to constitute a valid lease for nineteen years.

1ST DIVISION. Ld. Ormidale. B.

MISS MARGARET BATHIE raised this action against Lord Wl concluding for declarator that the defender had let to her th Gateside of Newtyle at the rent of £83 for the period of ninet from Martinmas 1868, and that he should be ordained to execu

No. 84.

Mar. 6, 1873.
Bathie v. Lord Wharncliffe.

her favour in terms of the draft of a lease thereof prepared by the late Christopher Kerr, as his factor and commissioner, and revised and justed by Mr Gray Bissett, solicitor, Dundee, on her behalf, or in such ms as should be fixed by the Court.

The pursuer, and her father, who died in 1854, had possessed the farm Gateside of Newtyle from 1849. It was disputed whether their possion had been from year to year or on a verbal lease. The pursuer erred that in 1867 and 1868 she had certain meetings with Mr Kerr commissioner for Lord Wharncliffe, and with his son, Mr C. W. Kerr, o assisted his father in his business of a law-agent and factor; t at the first of these meetings Mr Kerr agreed, on behalf of the dlord, to accept the pursuer's offer to take a renewed lease of the farm the old rent of £83 for another period of nineteen years, "and stated e might consider the farm as again let to her at the rent of £83, and the condition that the improvements after-mentioned should be ecuted. The agreement being thus concluded it was also arranged tween Mr Kerr and the pursuer that no time should be lost in carrying t the stipulated improvements upon the farm, and the pursuer undertook that Mr Kerr's wishes in this respect should also be fulfilled. The suer accordingly now made purchases of lime, laid the same on the d, and proceeded to make the other improvements, in so far as these re to be executed by her."

Mr C. W. Kerr died in October 1868, and Mr Kerr, his father, in June 69, and the factor who was appointed in his place declined to acknowdge the existence of the alleged lease.

The pursuer pleaded;—(2) The pursuer having entered to possession of e farm at Martinmas 1868 under the new lease, or agreement for a ase, to her, and possessed the same since that term, and executed expenve improvements on the land and otherwise, before and since her entry, the faith of the new agreement, an effectual contract has been conluded between the parties for a renewed lease of the subjects, which both e bound to implement and give effect to, whether the new lease has en formally executed or not. (3) A draft of the new lease having been epared by the defender's agent and factor, communicated to the pursuer, d revised by her agent, and the terms of the lease adjusted, both landrd and tenant are bound by this draft of the lease and their actings with ference to the subjects let, and the pursuer is entitled to have the deder compelled to enter into a formal lease to her of the subjects, in rms of said draft, or otherwise in such terms as may be adjusted at the ght of the Court. (4) The lease, or agreement for a lease, having been ted upon by both parties in essential particulars, the defender is barred om challenging it or refusing to give effect thereto by rei interventus and homologation.

The defender pleaded;—(1) The pursuer's statements are not relevant sufficient in law to support the conclusions of the summons. (2) The efender ought to be assoilzied, in respect that no lease for nineteen years as ever entered into with the pursuer by the defender, or any one acting n his behalf. (3) The pursuer's whole material statements being unounded in fact, the defender is entitled to absolvitor, with expenses.

A proof was allowed and led before the Lord Ordinary. The import f the proof is stated in the Lord Ordinary's note and the opinions of he Judges.

The Lord Ordinary pronounced this interlocutor:—"Finds it proved hat the farm of Gateside, and the other subjects libelled, have been let to he pursuer for the period, for the rents, and on the conditions set out in he summons: Therefore finds, decerns, and declares in terms of the first evidence that Miss Bathie and her brother had got right, from the lan the farm for a period of nineteen years. Miss Bathie says that this understanding, and in the rental account, kept for the landlord, 'for cr and other rents payable in 1868,' (Appendix of Documents, p. 20), the entry applicable to the farm of Gateside in these terms:—'Conditions pancy.—Holds for nineteen years from Marts. 1849. Rent, £83, pa Candlemas and Lammas after reaping.' And there is added—'N arrangement is in progress for giving a new lease from Martinmas 1868.'

"That there were negotiations for a new lease in 1868, and that t (No 69 of process) of such new lease was then prepared by Mr Christoph or under his directions, for the landlord, and revised by Mr Gray Bi behalf of the pursuer, are undoubted facts in the case. But the partie issue on the question whether that draft lease, although not extended a scribed by the parties, and formally completed, must not now be held circumstances which have been established by the proof, to be valid and as a lease.

"As preliminary to an examination of the proof, the Lord Ordin remark that he cannot help thinking that the difficulties in the way parties, which gave rise to the present dispute, might not improbably ha obviated, or have never occurred, had it not been for the death not onl Christopher Kerr himself, in June 1869, but also of the death of his son W. Kerr, who, it will be found from the evidence, had a good deal to the adjustment of the new lease, on the 10th of October 1868. Not but it also appears from a correspondence which took place in 1869 an after the death of Mr Christopher Kerr, between Mr Bissett as acting pursuer, and Mr William Kerr and Mr Whitton as acting for the landl the draft lease itself had gone amissing, although it was ultimately found Mr C. Kerr's papers. The Lord Ordinary may further remark, in refe this correspondence, that the fairness and accuracy of Mr Bissett's repres of the nature and terms of the draft lease, made at a time when it was s to be lost, are calculated, in his opinion, to add weight to the testimo gentleman has given as a witness in the present case.

"In considering the proof, the two material questions to be kept in v 1st, Has it been established that the parties had agreed that the pursue have a tack or lease of the farm and subjects in dispute, in conformity w draft, No. 69 of process. And 2d, Has this draft, although imperf

No. 84.

Mar. 6, 1873.
Bathie v.
Lord Wharncliffe.

The defender reclaimed, and argued;—The parole evidence could not be looked at in proof of the lease or agreement, but only with regard to the rei latter stated that 'the matter was all right,' that he had instructed his son, Webster Kerr, 'to prepare a lease of the farm of Gateside, and he referred to him;' that having, accordingly got the draft as prepared in Mr Kerr's se, he, after going over it with the pursuer, revised and completed it by filling various blanks, and that, on the 27th of August, he went over and adjusted t a meeting with Mr Webster Kerr, who, it was then arranged, was to get it nded and sent to him, Mr Bissett, for execution by the pursuer. Mr Bissett ther states that in consequence of some delay having occurred in obtaining extended lease he saw Mr Webster Kerr on the subject about the beginning September, who then told him, 'it was all right,' only that the draft had to before his father as a mere matter of form. Mr Bissett, having in about ten s thereafter called for Mr Christopher Kerr, was told by him that the lease uld require to be gone over by Mr John Davidson, 'to see that it was all t with regard to the rotation of cropping,' and that it 'would be well to the rent of William Robertson's holding,' but 'he assured me at the same e that everything was all right;' and Mr Bissett also says that having reafter met Mr C. Kerr, and reminded him that he had never got the extended e for signature, 'he told me that he had it in his bag, and that he would orders for its being sent me ere long.' 'He said he was very busy, but that had given John Davidson instructions to carry out the improvements pro- d for by the tack;' and he also said—'Margaret Bathie need not trouble head about it, that it was all right.' In addition to all this there is the roborative evidence, to a large extent, of Mr Macfarlane, formerly the managing k of Mr C. Kerr, now one of the defender's agents, a witness adduced for , besides a large body of evidence, written as well as parole, presently to be iced, which, although it bears especially on the matter of rei interventus, is o pregnant with important matter, shewing that the terms and conditions of ase had been agreed to; and if a lease had been agreed to it must have been t contained in the draft, No. 69 of process, for there is no evidence of there ing been any other.

"The Lord Ordinary, however, is quite aware that a lease for a term of years not be established by parole evidence, but that the verbal agreement must be ved by writing or oath of party—Walker v. Flint, 20th February 1863, 1 cph. 417, and Emslie v. Duff and Husband, 2d June 1863, 3 Macph. 854. The d Ordinary does not therefore rest his judgment in the present case on the le evidence, except in so far as that evidence may be competent and necessary identify and render intelligible the writings and the actings forming the rei rventus, whereby these writings, although defective and invalid as a lease in nselves, were perfected and made obligatory; and that parole evidence may admissible in a case such as the present for other purposes besides proving rei interventus, is well illustrated by the case of the Earl of Mansfield, and reshie v. Henderson, 5th June 1856, 18 D. 989.

"The principal writing upon which the pursuer relies is the draft lease, No. of process. This writing is quite complete as a draft lease. It contains not ly all the essentials of such a contract,—that is to say, a description of the bjects of the lease, the term of entry, the period of endurance, and the rent to paid, but also all the usual and necessary details. It could not indeed well otherwise, for the draft was prepared, in the first instance, by the defender, the landlord, or by his agent, who held ample powers for that purpose; it s then considered and revised by the pursuer and her agent, and by the latter was returned to the landlord's agents, in whose possession it thereafter remained til recovered and produced in the present process. Nor can it be doubted at in law such a draft if acted upon,—that is to say, if followed by the requisite interventus,—must bind the parties. This principle has been given effect to numerous cases, occurring in every variety of circumstances, as referred to Mr Hunter's Treatise on Landlord and Tenant, vol. i. 415, and following ges. But here there are other writings besides the draft lease, of a very

No. 84.

lar. 6, 1873. Bathie v. ord Wharnliffe.

intervenlus. The draft was the only writing founded on, and that did not prove an agreement, but only that at one time there was a proposal or suggestion for an agreement. Even if this informal writing were sufficient, no sufficient rei intervenlus to shew that there was intended to be a nineteen years' lease had taken place. These ordinary improvements and preparations for better culture by the tenant were not sufficient.[1]

The pursuer argued;—The draft, which was a writ of the character sufficient, along with rei intervenlus, to establish a lease,[2] contained the conditions of lease agreed upon, which included all the essentialia of a lease for a term of years, and it had been followed by sufficient rei intervenlus.[3]

At advising,—

Lord President.—This is an action at the instance of Miss Bathie against pregnant character, in support of the pursuer's allegations that an agreement for a lease had been come to. Thus, in the rental accounts kept by or for the landlord for the years 1868 and 1869 (Appendix of Documents, pp. 22 and 30) there occurs an entry to the effect that 'lease expired at Martinmas 1868; new lease in course of adjustment for nineteen years from Martinmas 1868.' And the new lease must have been held by the landlord or his agents as ultimately adjusted the Lord Ordinary thinks may be reasonably inferred from others of the writings which have been produced, and especially from entries in the account at bottom of p. 23, and the accounts at pp. 23, 25, 26, 27, and 28 of the Appendix of Documents.

---

"As to the rei intervenlus, or actings of the parties, it appears to the Lord Ordinary that the proof—and there is a great deal of it—leaves no room for doubt on the subject. That the improvements or meliorations stipulated for in the new lease were nearly all carried into effect in the course of the autumn and winter of 1868 is proved beyond all question. Not only do various witnesses speak to this, but the written evidence, consisting of receipts and other documents supported as it is by the parole evidence, is quite conclusive on the point. And that the improvements and meliorations were carried into effect on the faith of the lease as drafted seems also abundantly clear. The Lord Ordinary thinks it impossible to read the evidence of the pursuer herself, supported as it is more or less by that of all the other witnesses, without being satisfied of this. It is proved that the improvements were authorised and paid for—except the carriages which, in terms of the new lease, were undertaken by the pursuer herself—by the defender, or those acting for and in charge of his interests. It is also proved that these operations were of a character and extent to render it improbable that they should have been thought of, or executed at all, unless a new lease of some permanence had been agreed upon. All this indeed is placed beyond any question by the written receipts, accounts, and other documents recovered from the parties who acted, and still continue to act, for the defender. Many of these writings bear express reference to a lease under and in virtue of which the operations to which they relate were performed.

"These are the grounds upon which the Lord Ordinary has proceeded in pronouncing the prefixed interlocutor. But the Lord Ordinary has gone no further for the present than to sustain the first conclusion of the summons, as it is possible some of the subordinate details of the lease may still require adjustment. This, however, can be no reason for holding that the essentials of a lease were not agreed upon in terms of the first conclusion of the summons—Erskine v. Glendinning, 7th March 1871, 9 Macph. 656."

[1] Walker v. Flint, Feb. 20, 1863, ante, vol. i. p. 467; Emslie v. Duff, June 2, 1863, ante, vol. iii. p. 854; Macrorie v. M'Whirter, Dec. 18, 1810, F.C.

[2] Grieve v. Pringle, 1797, M. 5951.

[3] D. of Gordon v. Carmichael, May 30, 1800, Hume, 805; E. of Aboyne v. Ogg, Dec. 8, 1810, Hume, 847; Macpherson v. Macpherson, May 12, 1815, F.C.; Grieve v. Pringle, cit.

No. 84.

Mar. 6, 1873.
Bathie v. Lord Wharncliffe.

Wharncliffe, to have it declared that his Lordship let to her the farm of ide of Newtyle for nineteen years from Martinmas 1868, and for decree st his Lordship to execute a lease in favour of the pursuer, in terms of a prepared by the late Mr Kerr, town-clerk of Dundee, as factor and agent e defender, or by his directions, communicated to the pursuer, and revised adjusted by Mr Gray Bissett, solicitor, Dundee, on her behalf. Now, the in which this nineteen years' tack is said to be proved is by a draft ease adjusted between the parties. The constitution of the agreement is to have been verbal, but the proof of it is a draft which was adjusted in of the verbal agreement; and that draft—which, not being signed or in way properly completed, is not a lease in itself—is said to be validated and complete by rei interventus. Every case of this kind requires very care- onsideration, for it is indispensable to the constitution of a lease in this for a term of years not only that the writing which proves the lease should rfectly distinct and clear, and be the writing of the party against whom it ed, but also that what is called the rei interventus has a sufficiently clear listinct relation to the terms of the alleged contract. In the present case I the draft is shewn to have been to all important effects, and as regards all ssentials of the lease, adjusted between the parties. It may be that there are details about which slight alterations might be proposed and assented to, but is not material. If in the draft of the lease we find the whole essentials e contract, and if that draft has been as regards these essentials adjusted e satisfaction of the whole parties, and followed by rei interventus, that I shend, is quite sufficient. Now, here, there can be no doubt, reading the s of the draft, in the first place, as to the term of endurance. That is for teen years. In the second place, as to the rent, I do not see any reason for t as to what was the rent agreed to between the parties. There is an omission ter the rent and a slight mistake at first in entering the amount of it on the in; but it is not contended on either side that the rent was not fixed, or is ompletely stated in the draft that now exists. Thirdly, it appears to me the subject of the contract is also precisely and definitely ascertained. To re, a difficulty was suggested here in regard to a piece of land adjoining the , which was in the possession of a person named William Robertson, and it certainly in the contemplation of the parties that if this William Robertson, was only a yearly tenant, gave up this piece of land it should be added liss Bathie's farm; and in the draft as originally proposed by the landlord's t there was a declaration inserted that it was in the contemplation of the ies that that should be so, and that Miss Bathie was to have that addition s to her farm when Robertson went out of possession, provided an agree- t were come to as to the rent and conditions of lease between her and the nistor. In the draft as originally proposed on behalf of the landlord was no lease of Robertson's pendicle of land at all, and no concluded agree- ; of any kind contemplated or proposed to be entered into at the same time e agreement for the lease of the farm of Gateside. It was merely a pro- ive arrangement, the terms of which fell to be adjusted afterwards when pportunity arose. A proposal was made on the part of the agent for Miss ie, that the terms of that arrangement as to the addition of Robertson's land d be inserted in the lease, and a question is now raised whether that mat- s finally adjusted between the parties. It appears to me to be of very little quence whether that matter was finally adjusted between the parties or not. vas not finally adjusted between the parties, then the lease stands exactly as it riginally proposed by the landlord's agent. It is left for future arrangment. s adjusted between the parties then it forms a part of the lease and must be led in the lease; and, therefore if this shall be found hereafter to be the proper ng of this draft, that proper reading will be given effect to in extending the leted and formal contract. But, in the meantime, whether the parties have r arranged the terms upon which Miss Bathie is to hold Robertson's land, re not, that does not interfere with the question whether they have finally ged the terms upon which she is to hold the farm of Gateside for a period neteen years. I think, therefore, looking to the whole evidence in the

Now, it is proved that Miss Bathie did take down these cottages, and the materials thereby acquired, and other materials, the landlord pro build a dyke along the side of the road, in terms of the obligation in t and in consequence of that proceeding Miss Bathie stands bound, if t lease, to maintain the whole houses and fences for the period of her le the footing of her having received the whole in a tenantable cond appears to me that this is an act of rei interventus of the greates importance. Miss Bathie could have no interest whatever in pulling d ruinous cottages unless in contemplation of a continuous possession fo this farm. Her act, therefore, is to be ascribed to this obligation or arr in the lease. She performed her part of the arrangement contained clauses; and although the act of the landlord following upon that i interventus in this question, in which the claim is made by the tenan the landlord, yet the circumstance of his proceeding to follow up tenant had done in terms of the contract of lease, makes it demonstr that he saw and recognised what had been done by the tenant as an ac her in pursuance of this contract of lease, and an act done by her and up by him with most serious consequences as regards the whole end the lease; for the effect of the one act following upon the other—the of the fence following upon the taking down of the cottages—was to obligation against the tenant to keep up the whole buildings and a period of nineteen years. I must say I cannot conceive any interventus more significant than that. It is an act done precisely in this clause of the lease; and there is no possibility of ascribing it to motive than the object of carrying out this particular clause of the leas again, we have an obligation upon the part of the landlord to drain formerly occupied by William Simpson, and now attached to this f with this obligation is coupled, as is very common in leases, an obliga the part of the tenant to drive the material—that is, in particular, in c with this drainage, to drive the tiles. Well that is done. The land is dr the tiles are driven by the tenant. And does anybody imagine for a mo the tenant would drive tiles to be buried in land of which she was not to session for a term? or is it possible to ascribe that act of driving the til thing else than the obligation imposed upon her under this clause of t That is another unequivocal act, as it appears to me, constituting rei in

But not to dwell upon less important matters, there is, finally, the tion of manure and lime to a very considerable extent, which is prob

No. 84.

Mar. 6, 1873.

Bathie v. Lord Wharncliffe.

a yearly tenant. A more insane proceeding for a yearly tenant it is difficult to gine. This, I apprehend, can only be ascribed to the obligation which she undertaken and the right which she had acquired to a possession of nineteen . No other period can be suggested. There was no other period in the mplation of the parties. Nineteen years confessedly was in the contempla- of the parties, whether they completed the bargain or not, and these acts ch as nobody could possibly perform except in the contemplation of pos- n for a term of years, which therefore leads to our ascribing these acts to lease for nineteen years, and to the right thereby acquired. The dung, would be put in either upon the lea or with turnips, would unquestion- remain an unexhausted improvement for a period of four or five years. The which was put in in these two years would remain an unexhausted im- ment certainly for a period of ten years, and, as some people think, for ntire endurance of the nineteen years' lease. Now, these are acts totally istent with the notion that the tenant at least did not believe this to be a luded agreement, and acted upon it as such. I am therefore of opinion the Lord Ordinary has come to a perfectly sound conclusion in this case. has done well, I think, in the meantime to limit himself to a judgment in of the first conclusion, because if that is well founded the next step to be is to adjust the terms of the completed contract—that is to say, to extend draft, with any such verbal alterations as may be thought requisite by the .

D DEAS.—I am entirely and very clearly of your Lordship's opinion. It fectly settled in our law and practice that if there are writings between a ord and a tenant—no matter in the possession of which of them,—if posses- has followed upon them—writings which fix the subject, the rent, and the ance,—a lease must be carried out, and any further conditions of that lease, though important, will fall to be fixed, if the parties do not agree about , by a remit to a professional man to adjust the lease, subject to the approval e Court. There are two different classes of cases of that kind. One class here there is a verbal agreement proved by writing. That is more rare. was the case of Emslie. The only difficulty there was as to the kind of ing by which the lease was said to have been proved; but it was held the writing was sufficient to prove a verbal lease. Another and a more on class of cases is where the essential terms of the lease—by which I mean ent, the endurance, and the subject—are proved by writings which, however, informal, and consequently require rei interventus to validate them. That is more ordinary case; and I am disposed to think that that is the nature of case. It does not, however, matter whether this case be regarded as falling the class of cases in which a verbal bargain is held to be proved by writing, der that class of cases where the writings themselves prove the terms of the , and want only to be made probative by rei interventus. Here the draft of ease unquestionably shews all the essentials of the bargain—viz., the endur- , the subject, and the rent. As to that part of the draft which refers to the ct possessed by Robertson, I agree with your Lordship that it may be with in either of two ways. When the parties come to adjust the formal , if they are agreed that it shall stand as it does on the face of the draft, it may be so inserted in the formal lease. On the other hand, if it turns that they differ upon that point, the result will simply be to bring it back to position in which the landlord at first proposed to have it—viz., that it should ft to future arrangement. Either view does not effect the present question. thing that was not fixed in the case of Emslie was not less important this about Robertson's possession. The lease was for nineteen years, but it a question between the parties whether there was a break at the end of seven or not; and it was held that the fact of that being an unsettled question not prevent the lease from being a binding lease in whatever way that might be settled. Now, the question here being whether there is a lease the farm called Gateside, I think we have the essentials of the bargain quite r and precise.

No. 84.

Mar. 6, 1873.
Bathie v. Lord Wharncliffe.

The next point, on which I likewise agree with your Lordship, is that is here such rei interventus or such adoption of this draft as to make it bi between the parties. The various things your Lordship has noticed an clearly things which were done in implement of stipulations in the draft The landlord undertook to do a variety of things with reference to the dw house, the hedges, the stone fences, and the drains, and all of these are a ingly done by the landlord. They were done at the sight of Mr Davidso seems to have acted in a twofold character, either of which entitled h bind the landlord. He was clerk to the landlord's agent, Mr Kerr, a became a farmer on the estate; but whether in one or both of these char he was acting for and representing the landlord beyond all doubt. Mr K son, as representing the landlord, authorises all these things in succession done at the landlord's expense. He authorises the operations on the dw house, the cementing the walls, and the cutting round the walls to mak dry, at an expense to the landlord of £11, 15s. 8d.; he authorises the ope upon the hedges, at the landlords expense, which cost £30; he authoris operations on the stone walls at the landlord's expense, which cost £9, a cutting of the drains, which cost £18, 11s. 8d. Now, so far as the la makes that expenditure, it perhaps cannot be called very great, but co every one of these things, and more particularly all of them taken to are the clearest acknowledgment by the landlord that that draft was th —the lease which was to be carried out and acted on. I do not kno in a question of this kind it makes much difference whether all that is d at the expense of the landlord, or, as here, partly at the expense of the la and partly at the expense of the tenant. This is a mutual contract, bind both parties or neither; and the objection as to its not being binding mi well arise on the part of the tenant as on the part of the landlord. If th party is bound the other cannot be free. Most unquestionably if the had been objecting the landlord would have been entitled to say—"I these things at my own expense." The tenant, on the other hand, is enti say—"You did all these things at your expense, in terms of this very h the draft—which you are now objecting to." But when all that is c with this, that the tenant does all the carriages, which, though not ex amount to the cost to the landlord, are unquestionably a substantial expe by the tenant—there is very clearly rei interventus on that lease. Furth tenant's expenditure for lime and manure, which is large, considering the the farm and the rent, is an expenditure that no tenant would have made on the faith that there was a lease for a term of years. I suppose the l the first year rather does harm than good; at any rate, it is mainly inten have effect over a considerable period of years, and the manure purchas and above the manure made on the farm, at considerable cost, is likew questionably applied on the footing of a lease for a term of years. It that the tenant made expenditure of the same kind previously. I s little evidence of that. I certainly see no evidence at all that she ev viously made expenditure on lime and manure to the same extent. said she had done it before on a lease from year to year. I do no that would very much affect her, even if it were so. The question w she had a lease from year to year before is of no moment at all in th except as being attempted to be made a ground for depreciating the imp of the subsequent expenditure for lime and manure which she made the present lease. It is only in that way that it becomes of any mon all. But if it were of any moment, I think it rather appears that the p lease was a lease for nineteen years. That is the way in which it is ent the landord's rental for crop 1867—"Conditions of occupancy—holds fo teen years from Martinmas 1849." Now, that might not be sufficient to tute a lease for nineteen years, having been made up by Mr Kerr's exa and not in his lifetime; but I cannot hold that it is not evidence in the q whether Miss Bathie may fairly be held to have understood that she pre had a lease for nineteen years, and therefore in the comparison betwee she expended for lime and manure before and what she did after, I do n

No. 84.

Mar. 6, 1873.

Bathie v. Lord Wharncliffe.

it could be held that she did it as a tenant from year to year, and I am not fied that if that were so it would make any difference. If she had a lease year to year before, it rather tells the other way if she immediately increases antities of manure and lime beyond what she had previously laid on. view, I think, is rather against the landlord. All the sums of expenditure I have mentioned, made in terms of the lease, are proved, under the hand of avidson, to have been made according to his instructions. There are sums of 15s. expended on the house; £30 for hedges, with the words in Davidson's riting "all in terms of lease;" £12 for walls, "in terms of lease," and £18, d. for drainage "in terms of proposed lease." All these are authenticated by avidson at the time as made in conformity with instructions given by him, his understanding of the provisions of the lease; and although Mr David- rather disposed in his evidence to be in favour of the landlord as far as he he is obliged in his cross-examination to confess that he cannot account for he has written in any other way. Taking it altogether, I think this is one clearest cases of the kind I have met with.

D ARDMILLAN.—I entirely agree in what your Lordships have stated, and only make one remark in addition. I think it very important always to the rule that, in our law, we recognise rei interventus as a clear equitable upon any man resiling from an informal transaction. Though there is no nt written lease, nothing can be better settled than that, if there is an al writing such as this, the parties to that writing cannot resile from it if has been rei interventus. I think there has been here rei interventus very strongest kind. The farm is small, the rent is small, and the s are considerable. The only question is whether these outlays stand to the lease, so as to be clearly done on the faith of it. If done on the of it no man can doubt that the rei interventus was enough; and the only ion is, were they done on the faith of it? Now, it is in that view I think that what the landlord did is very important. Both landlord and have done something. The tenant performs certain operations which are unterpart of what the landlord has done, and therefore every step which ndlord took in fulfilment of the provisions of this draft lease is relative to the tenant did, and is a link which binds what the tenant did under the lease as done on the faith of that draft lease. Taking it in that view I not the least doubt that if Miss Bathie, the tenant, wanted to get out of ase, what the landlord did would have been rei interventus, and would prevented her from resiling. Now, what the tenant did, as the counter- of what the landlord did, is by the landord's actings so brought into connec- with the draft lease as to be clearly done on the faith of it. I have no t that under these circumstances we must hold this to be a good lease, as ded for.

D JERVISWOODE concurred.

THE COURT adhered to the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary.

ADAM & SANG, W.S.—G. & J. BINNY, W.S.—Agents.

No. 85.

Mar. 7, 1873.

Union Bank v. Makin.

R BANK OF SCOTLAND, Pursuers and Respondents.—Sol.-Gen. Clark—Marshall.

MAKIN & SONS, Defenders and Appellants.—Watson—Balfour.

nt and Principal—Mandate—Bill—Forgery.—A firm of merchants, by a addressed to a bank, granted authority to their manager "to sign, per pro- ion of their firm, all bills, cheques, cash-orders, and other documents neces- to the conducting of our business, and all vouchers so subscribed will be y binding as if signed by any member of our firm." They also delivered r manager a letter of procuration binding themselves to meet all cheques, , drafts, bills, &c., endorsed by the manager, and "to keep the parties

No. 85.

Mar. 7, 1873. Union Bank v. Makin.

dealing with you free and skaithless; and we bind ourselves to ratify, l gate, and confirm the actings and doings of you, the manager, in respect cheques," &c. This document was delivered by the manager to th The manager, after forging the names of certain real and fictitious firms tors of bills to bills drawn by himself as procurator of his principals' f counted the bills at the bank, and endorsed them per procuratory, and app the money thus obtained to his own use.

Held that, as it was not proved that the bank had failed to exe caution in discounting any of the bills, or that the signatures thereto w fest forgeries, or presented a suspicious appearance which should have bank on their guard, the firm were liable to the bank for the amount of 1st Division. Sheriff of Lanarkshire. M.

THIS action was raised in the Sheriff-court of Lanarkshire Union Bank of Scotland against Makin & Sons, steel and file whose principal place of business was at Sheffield, and who had or agency at Glasgow under the management of Samuel Watson ster. The conclusions of the action were for payment of £7 4d., contained in seven bills of exchange which had been dis with the bank and endorsed by Dempster per procuratory for fenders. The facts of the case, as brought out in a proof, wer lows :—

On 26th January 1870 the defenders addressed to the pu letter, which was shortly afterwards delivered to the pursuers by ster, in which they said,—"Samuel Watson Dempster, our ma Scotland, has authority to sign, per procuration of our firm, cheques, cash-orders, and other documents necessary to the cond our business, and all vouchers so subscribed will be equally bind signed by any member of our firm."

About the same date the pursuers, at Dempster's request, after inquiries to be made in Sheffield as to the defenders' credit, ope the defenders a discount account and an account current at thei in Canning Street, Calton, Glasgow.

The pursuers, wishing to obtain from the defenders a mor authority to Dempster, prepared through their law-agents a pr or power of attorney on stamped paper, and which, having bee by the pursuers to Dempster for the defenders' signature, was, on 1870, signed by the defenders before witnesses, and was shortly a returned by Dempster to the pursuers, and duly completed in th clause, which bore,—"We, William Makin & Sons, Shef James Marchinton and Benjamin Makin, sole partners of t hereby authorise you, Samuel Watson Dempster, 34 Saint Enoc Glasgow, our general representative and agent in Scotland, to our whole business and affairs in Scotland, to sign for us all d relating to or in connection with our business in Scotland, and we authorise you to sign, per procuration, for us and on our b cheques, orders, and drafts, and to draw, grant, accept, or endor and on our behalf, all bills, promissory-notes, and negotiable do and to discount the same on our credit and responsibility; an gage to meet and honour all such cheques, orders, drafts, bills, sory-notes, and negotiable documents drawn, granted, accepted, or or bearing to be drawn, granted, accepted, or endorsed by you, Samuel Watson Dempster, and to keep the parties dealing with and skaithless: And we bind ourselves to ratify, homologate, firm the actings and doings of you, the said Samuel Watson Dem respect of all such cheques, orders, drafts, bills, promissory-n negotiable documents; for all which powers these presents held full and ample authority: And we declare that the auth

No. 85.
Mar. 7, 1873.
Union Bank v. Makin.

r hereby granted shall subsist notwithstanding any change in our and until the same be expressly recalled in writing.—In witness eof," &c.

tween the months of January and June 1870 inclusive Dempster ted upon the said accounts, and discounted a number of bills in the ers' branch, which discounts the pursuers allowed on the credit of efenders, and relying on the said letter and procuration. Inter alia, pster so discounted the said seven bills purporting to be drawn by efenders upon, and to be accepted by, the parties following, viz.:— for £96, 14s. 7d., by Brigham and Bickerton, machine makers, Ber-, dated 28th March 1870, payable four months after date; (2) for l, by Howie and Young, engineers, Kirkcaldy, dated 19th April 1870, ble four months after date; (3) for £41, by Nevin and Rintoul, hbuilders, Greenock, dated 27th April, 1870, payable three months date; (4) for £44, 10s. 9d., by Robert Russell and Sons, engineers, ake, dated 2d May 1870, payable four months after date; (5) for 5, 10s. 9d., by Caird and Company, shipbuilders, Greenock, dated 16th 1870, and payable four months after date; (6) for £39, 5s. 6d., by s Hatley and Company, contractors, Carstairs, dated 23d May 1870, ble three months after date; (7) for £138, 14s. 9d., by Laing and rin, coachbuilders, Aberdeen, dated dated 1st June 1870, and payable months after date.

mpster signed the said seven bills as drawer and endorser, "p. p." t is, per procuration) of William Makin and Sons, except the one dly above described, which was signed "for Wm. Makin and Sons, f'Pherson" as drawer, and was endorsed by Dempster as above. The atures, purporting to be those of the acceptors of all the said seven , were forged, and the defenders had not at the dates thereof any n against any of these parties.

he pursuers paid to Dempster the proceeds of all the said bills (de-ing bank charges), and the whole or part of the proceeds of the first ere paid into the said current account, and mixed up with the de-rs' other moneys therein. The proceeds of the seventh bill (deduct-harges) having been £137, 2s. 2d., Dempster drew a cheque at the ers' said bank, and purchased therewith, and with £20 drawn from the nt account, a draft on Messrs Glyn and Co., bankers, London, for £150 ng in favour of the defenders, the balance (£6, 19s. 1d.), after deduc-of bank charges, having been paid to him in cash. The said draft for was not transmitted to the defenders, and they did not receive any of the proceeds thereof.

the parties appearing as acceptors of the said bills, Messrs Brigham Bickerton, Howie and Young, Nevin and Rintoul, and Caird and pany, were existing firms, and the three first mentioned had had ess dealings with the defenders; but Messrs Robert Russell and and Messrs James Hatley and Company were non-existent and fic-us.

ll of the said pretended acceptors appeared to be in lines of busi-in which dealings with the defenders might have taken place. pster, when applying for discounts of said bills, gave explanations h satisfied the pursuers' officers that they were genuine and bona fide duly accepted by parties indebted to the defenders in the ordinary of their business, and the pursuers discounted all the said bills, ng on Dempster's explanations and on the apparent genuineness of locuments. It was not proved that the pursuers failed to exercise aution in discounting any of the said bills, or that the signatures

No. 85.

Mar. 7, 1873.
Union Bank
v. Makin.

thereto were manifest forgeries, or presented a suspicious ap which should have put the pursuers on their guard.

The pursuers pleaded;—(1) The said Samuel Watson Demps the general and accredited manager, agent, and representative o fenders, and the seven bills or documents above mentioned hav drawn and endorsed by him while acting within the line and sc employment and of the defenders' business, the defenders are lia pursuers in payment of the same. (2) Separatim, the said bills ments having been drawn, endorsed, and discounted by the sai Watson Dempster, as acting within the power of procuration upon him by the defenders, the defenders are liable to the pu payment of the same. (3) The said seven bills or document been discounted by the pursuers on the understanding and repr that the same were genuine acceptances of the parties on wh respectively purport to be drawn, and the proceeds thereof hav paid by them to the said Samuel Watson Dempster, as manage presentative foresaid, and the signatures of the drawees on having been discovered not to be genuine, the pursuers are e instant repayment of the sums contained therein, with interest, duction as concluded for in the summons."

The defenders pleaded;—(2) Dempster's authority to bind the in the drawing and endorsing bills cannot be extended beyond of the letter of procuration. (3) The documents in question not b granted in the ordinary course of the defenders' business, or ne the conduct thereof, or for their behoof, Dempster had no au draw or endorse them in the defenders' name, or to discount t they are not bound thereby. (4) The documents in question genuine, Dempster had no authority to put the defenders' nam as drawees or endorsers, nor to discount them on their account a and they are not bound by such his acts. (5) The pursuers ha guilty of negligence in their dealing with said documents, must loss caused by the fraud of Dempster.

A proof was led in the Sheriff-court, which established the fa narrated; and thereafter the Sheriff-substitute (Dickson) pronc interlocutor, which, after detailed findings in fact, "finds that said pretended acceptors appeared to be in lines of business dealings with the defenders might have taken place; that] when applying for discounts of said bills, gave explanations wh fied the pursuers' officers that they were genuine and bona duly accepted by parties indebted to the defenders in the ordina their business; and that the pursuers discounted all the said bil on Dempster's explanations, and on the apparent genuinene documents: Finds it not proved that the pursuers failed to ex caution in discounting any of the said bills, or that the signatur were manifest forgeries, or presented a suspicious appearanc should have put the pursuers on their guard: Therefore repel fences: Finds the defenders liable to the pursuers in the amoun said bills, being £736, 16s. 4d. (but under deduction of £4, 4s the proportion of discount libelled on), with interest as libelled:] defenders liable in expenses."

On appeal, the Sheriff (Bell) adhered. The defenders appeale

They argued;—(1) They were not liable, as they had not author agent to commit a fraud, and had not profited by it. They were o for acts done by the agent within the scope of their employment, t was no allegation that they had authorised their agent to com gery. (2) The bank were negligent, and did not make proper in ıs on whom the bills were drawn. They ought at all events that the parties existed. Where one of two innocent per- iffer the one who has most directly caused the wrong ought ers argued;—Makin and Sons had given a very wide autho- ns rendered themselves liable for the genuineness of every esented by their agent. There was no negligence on their ey were bound to look at was the endorsation, and that was he transactions were within the apparent scope of Dempster's ıd the defenders represented to the bank that he had autho- them. The question was, to what extent the party dealing ınt was entitled to believe in his authority to bind his prin- object of a general procuration was to avoid the necessity of plying to the principals every time the agent presented a bill

ıg,—

IDENT.—In this case the Union Bank of Scotland sues William ons, steel and file-makers, Sheffield, for payment of the amount of f exchange alleged to have been discounted by the defenders' agent Samuel Dempster, with the Union Bank, at various times between f March and June 1870. The defence set forth is not that Demp- the agent for the defenders, but that he exceeded the powers en- n in the circumstances disclosed on record. The most important to is the nature and extent of the authority given to Dempster. on two different writings, each giving him authority. It is im- ep both of these writings in view in considering the position of One of these is dated in January and the other in May, and some ere in question were discounted before May, so they fall under the nly. This first writing is addressed directly to the Union Bank, much an authority to Dempster as a letter of guarantee to that ns as follows:—"Attercliffe and Clifton Steel Works, Sheffield, , 1870. To the Union Banking Company, Glasgow. Gentlemen, Watson Dempster, our manager in Scotland, whose signature is s authority to sign, per procuration of our firm, all bills, cheques, nd other documents necessary to the conducting of our business, ers so subscribed will be equally binding as if signed by any mem- n. We are, Gentn., yours very respecty. (Signed) Wm. Makin archinton, p.p. Wm. Makin & Sons, S. W. Dempster."

r as the matter of discounting bills of exchange is concerned, that s a very large and important authority. It puts the Union Bank in safe as if they were dealing with a member of the defenders' firm ember authorised to draw and endorse bills of exchange. The is somewhat different, and is a proper procuratory or mandate ad- mpster. By it the defenders authorised him to act (1) as their sentative and agent in Scotland, to manage their whole business and Dickson, March 15, 1867, ante, vol. v. p. 603; M'Lean and Hope ne 14, 1867, ante, vol. v. p. 893; M'Lean and Hope v. Fleming, 71, ante, vol. ix., House of Lords, p. 38; Grant v. Norway, Feb. Scott, C. B. p. 665; Coleman v. Riches, May 2, 1855, 16 C. B. r. Atherton, April 23, 1861, 30 L. J. (Exch.) 387; Hubbersty v. 6, 1853, 22 L. J. (Exch.) 113; Parsons on Contracts, i. (5th ed.) rstein v. Barber, 2 L. R. (Com. Pleas) 38; Fuller v. Smith, April Carrington and Payne, 197; Lindley on Partnership (2d ed.), ii. oway v. Grant, June 20, 1859, 19 D. 865; Galloway v. Grant, Dec. D. 230.

mm. ii. 611, 5th ed.; Smith's Mercantile Law, 7th ed. p. 124, 8th Willet v. Taylor, 2 Cowper, 817; Addison's Wrongs and their Re- 6, 3d ed.; Story on Agency, sec. 73.

No. 85.

Mar. 7, 1873.
Union Bank
v. Makin.

affairs in Scotland ; then follows the particular power chiefly under cons here, viz. :—to sign per procuration for them and on their behalf all orders, and drafts, and to draw, grant, accept or endorse for them all b missory-notes, and negotiable documents ; and they bind themselves homologate, and confirm all his actings and doings. It is then decl this authority is to subsist notwithstanding any changes in their firm, expressly recalled in writing. It appears to me that this later documen as wide as regards the obligations of the defenders with respect to dra endorsing bills as the earlier one. No partner could have greater pow by this, as by the former writing, the bank is informed that all bills d dorsed, and discounted by Dempster were to be in the same position a drawn, endorsed, and discounted by the firm. But further, in the sec ing there is a peculiar addition, which has been a little lost sight of. do the defenders authorise Dempster to sign such negotiable docum have alluded to, and engage to meet and honour all such documents a but they bind themselves "to ratify, homologate, and confirm" his ac doings in respect of all such negotiable documents. That must me thing more than a mere general authority, because if Dempster wa tended to act under the direction of the defenders' firm, there would b for their undertaking to ratify all his actings and doings. It appears t what is meant by that addition is to make it clear to any one that Makin were bound not to object to any paper signed by Dempster per proc their firm. In this respect it seems to me that it is a peculiarly larg tory and authority.

It is necessary for us now to see what Dempster did. The pursue payment of seven bills in all, signed by him per procuration of the firm, but all of these not quite in the same position. The first is for £96 and is drawn upon Brigham and Bickerton, machine-makers, Berwick cond for £100, on Howie and Young, engineers, Kirkcaldy ; and the thir on Niven and Rintoul, coachbuilders, Greenock ; and the seventh an £138, 14s. 9d. is drawn on Laing and Melvin, coachbuilders, Aberdee these firms were customers of the defenders, and therefore it was na bills should be drawn on them by the defenders' agent.

The fourth bill in the summons for £44, 10s. 9d. bears to be drawn sell and Son, engineers, Carluke, and the sixth for £39, 5s. 6d. be drawn on James Hatley and Company, contractors, Carstairs. No s as these last two are or were in existence. The only remaining bill—t for £276, 10s. 9d., is drawn on Caird and Co., shipbuilders, Greenock. a real firm, but they were not customers of the defenders. Such is t of the drafts which are now before us—four upon customers of the two on fictitious firms, and one on a real firm, who were not customers gards the bills drawn upon real firms—i.e., the four customers and the were not customers—the acceptance on each of these bills was forged b ster ; and with regard to those drawn on the two fictitious firms, the ac in these cases also were in a manner forged—that is, the signatures of tious firms were written by Dempster. All these bills were discounted l ster with the Union Bank, and there was nothing remarkable in what t Some inquiries seem to have been made as to the acceptors and drawe were satisfactorily answered by Dempster, and no suspicions seem to h entertained by the bank officials. One of the bills was in a peculiar because the drawer of it was not Dempster, but a clerk in his office Dempster endorsed and discounted it himself, that kept it from seeming to the bank agent.

The money realised by discounting six of these bills was paid into th account in Dempster's name for the defenders ; and as regards the seventh, it was converted into a draft on London for £150,—the amou bill being £138 odds, and the balance being paid by Dempster out of £ by cheque at the time of getting the draft. In reality no part of the obtained ever came into the hands of the defenders. Dempster ap whole sums to his own uses. Having committed the crime of forgery,

No. 85.

Mar. 7, 1873.
Union Bank
v. Makin.

mbezzlement. The question now arises who is to suffer for the loss -the Union Bank or the defenders?

ıl of authority has been quoted to us, but nothing seems to be law by the recent cases. They do not seem to vary the great general he law of mandate in the civil law. There is and can be no diffi- e principle; the only difficulty is its application in such circum- this case there is no real difficulty in applying it. I inquire merely Dempster did here was done under the authority granted to him by . No doubt, as between mandant and mandatary there was a great gularity and breach of duty, and without doubt the defenders could ing beyond the scope of his authority if the question were between tomers of theirs. It is easy to conceive how Dempster could have the scope of even such wide authority as he had. For example, if the mandate of Makin and Sons, steel and file-makers, Sheffield, he en to deal with parties in cotton, that would be clearly outwith the nted to him, and so he could not have bound his principals. Though, rould be of great importance in a question between the defenders tomers whether Dempster went outside his authority or not, it is ferent in a question with the bank. The question with the bank her he was engaged in carrying through transactions with a view defenders' goods: that was not it. It was what was his authority— rity to sell goods, but his authority to make negotiable documents. of negotiable documents was all the bank was concerned in, and ial department of business; and in conducting that special depart- er was authorised to bind the defenders. It appears to me therefore ıces here are quite irrelevant, and that the bank had nothing on earth ıe question whether the money raised from them was intended to) the defenders' business or not. The only question is, whether l not deal with the bank in that department of business in which lly authorised to deal. I am clearly of opinion he did.

ı concurred.

MILLAN.—I have given to this case the attentive consideration which ortance deserves. We have had an able argument and an ample thorities. Both parties have been deceived and both are innocent, ontending de damno vitando. The question therefore in regard to of the loss caused by the dishonesty and forgery of Dempster, the lefenders, is very serious. Such cases must, I fear, be viewed as asionally, and the decision in this case may have a somewhat wide ned a clear opinion in accordance with the judgment of the Sheriffs, in the exposition of the law given by your Lordship. I shall not ex- il the grounds of my opinion. The agency of Dempster was of the ıost comprehensive character. He was manager in Scotland for the He acted for them, and represented them, and they bound them- ſy and confirm his acts. This very wide power and authority, by fenders accredited Dempster as acting for them and binding them, ıd apart from the special and particular authority to sign per pro- , cheques, cash orders, and other documents in conducting their 'e have here two distinct and ample letters of authority—one ad- ıe bank, the other addressed to Dempster, and handed or communi- bank. These letters could scarcely be more clear or more compre- ıntertain no doubt that the bank, acting in their banking business er as the defenders' manager—discounting the bills and notes, and e drafts of Dempster for the defenders,—were in entire good faith, ıual and natural course of their business. Holding these letters, suspect, and had no reason to suspect, Dempster; and they were ɔinion, under any obligation to make special inquiry in regard to e names were on bills drawn by Dempster. The bank failed in no

No. 85.

Mar. 7, 1873.
Union Bank
v. Makin.

duty, and neglected no precaution incumbent on them. The bills were c by Dempster for Makin and Sons, and the acceptances were forged by They were discounted by the bank. Dempster has been convicted of forg

We have no case here of implied authority. We have very clear and authority expressly conferred. On that authority, given by the defenders t manager, their "general representative and agent in Scotland," the bank entitled to rely.

So far as the bank did know, or could know, the business in the cou which these bills were discounted was the business of the defenders. The nothing here to awaken even a suspicion on the part of the bank. The to deceive and defraud the bank was given to Dempster by the defenders used that power, and deceived and defrauded the bank. Some one must loser by the deceit. He who armed the deceiver with the power of dec ought to suffer rather than he who was deceived. Makin and Sons were c by Dempster, but they of their own accord trusted and authorised Dem The bank only trusted Dempster because Makin and Sons authorised t credited him to the bank. No authority has been produced to shake the principle of equity in respect of which liability for the loss attaches defenders, who gave to Dempster the power and authority under whi acting for the defenders, defrauded the bank.

LORD JERVISWOODE concurred.

THE COURT pronounced this interlocutor:—(After finding ting forth the import of the proof as above given)—"Fin all of the said pretended acceptors appeared to be in li business in which dealings with the defenders might have place; that Dempster, when applying for discounts of said gave explanations which satisfied the pursuers' officers that were genuine and bona fide bills duly accepted by parties in to the defenders in the ordinary way of their business, an the pursuers discounted all the said bills, relying on Dem explanations and on the apparent genuineness of the docu Find it not proved that the pursuers failed to exercise due c in discounting any of the said bills, or that the signatures t were manifest forgeries, or presented a suspicious appearance, should have put the pursuers on their guard: Therefore refu appeal, and decern: Find the appellants liable in expenses; an account," &c.

J. & F. ANDERSON, W.S.—J. & R. D. ROSS, W.S.—Agents.

No. 86.

Mar. 8, 1873.
Macvean v.
Maclean.

DONALD MACVEAN, Pursuer.—Sol.-Gen. Clark—Fraser.
ALEXANDER MACLEAN, Defender.—Millar—Adam.

Proof—Bill of Exchange—Discharge—Parole.—A proof before allowed to explain documents alleged to instruct discharge of a debt con in two promissory-notes in possession of the creditor in the obligation.

Process—Interlocutor—Proof before Answer.—Observations as to the of the words "before answer."

2D DIVISION.
Ld. Mackenzie.
B.

THIS was an action at the instance of Donald Macvean, ten Sallachan, Ardgour, against his landlord, Mr Alexander Maclean o gour, for payment of £1000, being the sum contained in two promi notes for £500 each, and payable one day after date, granted t defender to the pursuer, and dated 28th March 1868.

The pursuer had been tenant of the farm of Sallachan since Whits 1853, under a lease the natural termination of which was Whits 1872. At the date of this action he held the farm under a lease

No. 86.

Mar. 8, 1873.
Macvean v. Maclean.

uary 1870, for twenty-one years, at the same rent as under the ease, being £361, 6s. 10d. In 1868 the pursuer lent £1000 to ader, who granted the promissory-notes mentioned above. The admitted the loan, but averred that he had granted to the pur- lease of 20th January 1870 on the same easy terms as the former ly on consideration that this debt should be cancelled. He alleged that the debt was discharged, and explained the pur- ssession of the promissory-notes by producing the following h letter, which he said the pursuer had written to him in answer quest that the promissory-notes should be given up on delivery ase:—

Sallachan, Saturday evening.

Ardgour,—In looking through my papers to-day I find that all ts I have of any consequence are lying in the bank safe, amongst our promissory-notes for £1000; and if you have any doubts of grity, had better keep the lease until I give you a sufficient e that I'll never claim the above. I called up this evening, but t find you.—I have the honour to be your obedient servant, efender pleaded;—(1) The defender not being indebted in the l for, is entitled to be assoilzied, with expenses. (2) The debt is not due, in respect that the pursuer has received a new lease rm as the consideration for his discharging or cancelling the 3) The sums contained in the notes libelled on having been paid, ier is bound to deliver the same to the defender.

Maclean, Esq., Ardgour. DOND. MACVEAN."

e other hand, the pursuer averred that, although a lease at a it on condition of the debt being cancelled had been proposed, it er been concluded. In April 1869 the defender offered to the a lease at a rent of £300 a-year, provided he would discharge the tained in the promissory-notes. In consequence of this the pur- te to the defender making a formal offer to take the farm on the terms. To this letter the defender replied accepting the offer, as in answer to this last letter that the pursuer wrote the letter Saturday evening," founded on by the defender. No lease, how- s executed upon this offer and acceptance, as the pursuer refused into the transaction further, upon being advised by his law-agents a a lease would not be binding upon the defender's heirs of entail. ary 1870 the defender offered to grant the pursuer a lease of the the old rent of £361, 6s. 10d. for twenty-one years. The pursuer these terms. The lease was extended and executed, and the continued his possession of the farm under this new lease. The paid interest on the £1000 until March 1869, and, as the pur- ged, he excused himself after that date on the ground of pecuniary sment, but admitted the debt after the lease of 1870 was entered n 14th June 1872, however, he wrote to the pursuer stating that gnorant of any claim which the pursuer had against him. In nce of this letter the pursuer raised this action.

efender having died during the dependence of this action, the linary (Mackenzie), on 14th January 1873, pronounced an inter- sisting Alexander Maclean and John Dalrymple Maclean, the 's sons, as accepting trustees in room of the defender. The Lord then pronounced this interlocutor:—"The Lord Ordinary having unsel, before answer allows the parties a proof of their respective ts, and appoints the defenders to take the lead in the proof."

ursuer reclaimed, and argued;—That the interlocutor reclaimed allowed parole proof of the discharge of two promissory-notes,

No. 86.

Mar. 8, 1873. Macvean v. Maclean.

granted for value, and in possession of the creditor. That was incompetent, the discharge of the debt being only provable by writ or oath of the pursuer.[1] The words in the letter, "Saturday evening," founded on by the defenders, were ambiguous, and might be explained by parole evidence, but beyond this parole proof was inadmissible.

The defenders argued;—That although parole proof of the discharge of the debt was inadmissible it was quite competent to bring parole evidence to shew what was the bearing of the letters upon the lease, what lease the letter dated "Saturday evening" referred to, and generally to explain the circumstances of the case.[2]

At advising,—

Lord Cowan.—There is considerable delicacy in the question as to the extent and mode of proof to be allowed in this case; but on the whole, I think, the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor should be adhered to. Generally speaking, questions regarding the discharge of a loan which is constituted by writ can only be determined by writ or oath. But there have been a great variety of cases, most of them referred to in Haldane v. Speirs, all to the effect that where there is writing left with the alleged creditor shewing that money has been paid by him to the alleged debtor, then, in order to explain the circumstances under which it was paid, and the effect of the payment, as implying an obligation to repay, parole proof is admissible. The peculiarity of Haldane's case, where parole proof was disallowed, lay in this, that the writing founded on was the mere endorsation of a bank cheque, which the majority of the Court viewed as quite insufficient for the purpose. I do not know any good reason why the same principle may not apply as much to the extinction as to the constitution of loan of money. Here we have a letter which recognises, under the pursuer's hand that in certain circumstances the lease was not to be delivered until the promissory-notes sued on were given up. But its terms do not shew that the lease referred to is that on which the pursuer did obtain delivery, and under which he is in possession of the farm. Further, there are undoubtedly circumstances and statements in the other letters, even on the pursuer's own shewing, which, in one view of the case, draw very nigh a case of fraud. For instance, the pursuer's statement in his letter as to the documents being in the custody of the bank has an awkward appearance, and requires to be cleared up. And, on the whole matter, I think the surrounding circumstances must be inquired into, in order to explain the transactions between these parties in their relation to the promissory-notes sued on. It has been said that we must confine the parole proof to the date of this letter, but I think the proof should not be so limited. Much that may be valuable and necessary for the justice of the case, even as regards the pursuer's position, might be excluded if we did not allow a parole proof referring to the whole circumstances, and particularly the whole correspondence. Having regard to the very special case before us, we are not departing from any legal principle as to evidence in questions of loan by thus admitting parole proof to clear up the uncertainty in which the documents here leave us. The words "before answer" are sufficient to protect the pursuer from any danger on the score of irrelevancy.

Lord Benholme.—It occurs to me that the date of the letter which Lord Cowan has read, and which is only dated "Saturday evening," may be all that is necessary for the elucidation of this matter. For if the date of that letter is proved, then we may be able to conclude with certainty whether it refers to a proposed lease which was never completed, or to the lease under which the pursuer now holds his farm. I doubt whether there should be any parole proof except what is necessary to shew the effect of the written documents; and if it appears from the date of this letter that its contents refer to the one or to the

[1] Haldane v. Speirs, May 1872, ante, vol. x. 557.
[2] Fraser v. Fraser, Feb. 9, 1871, ante, vol. ix. 497.

No. 86.

Mar. 8, 1873.
Macvean v. Maclean.

of these leases I do not think that parole proof beyond that need be ed.

hile I throw out these doubts as to the course proposed I am not prepared sent.

RD NEAVES.—I concur in the opinion delivered by your Lordships, but I s I should prefer to see the interlocutor pronounced without the intro- on of the words "before answer," which mean, in my understanding, re answer as to the relevancy." I cannot see any justification for the prac- f allowing a proof "before answer as to the competency." If it is incom- t, the incompetency should be decided now. I am of opinion that the proof ed is competent, and should be allowed, but I would rather that these s were left out of the interlocutor, as the facts alleged seem clearly to be ant.

dmit the general doctrine that the discharge of an obligation constituted by ng can only be proved by writ or oath. But then the question must be d at with reference to the whole circumstances of each case. Here there is d deal of writing; but the fault is not on one side, but on both sides, that ritings require explanation. The question is, whether the bills in question withdrawn or held as cancelled in consideration of a new lease being granted e same terms as the old lease. Now, looking at the written evidence which ave with a view to determine this, we find the letter written by the pursuer referred to in the defender's condescendence. It cannot be read without nation. Its date even is wanting, and its terms are of doubtful import. It goes to prove that in a certain event the pursuer was not to claim the amount e bills. What that event was exactly, and whether it has occurred, we t tell from the documents. We must therefore get this document explained, s manifest defects supplied by parole evidence. I see no incompetency in

But there is not only this one letter, there is all the correspondence en the parties, which more or less requires explanation from the surround- ircumstances, and that even if we set aside the somewhat disingenuous light ich part of it appears, when we look at it from the defender's point of view. nclusion, I do not think that in allowing this proof we impugn the general f law. We have plenty of written testimony here; all that is required is planation of its meaning and effect.

RD JUSTICE-CLERK.—I sympathise with Lord Benholme in the doubts which as expressed, and will make one or two observations upon the position of case.

e pursuer Macvean holds two promissory-notes, which are documents of , and the defenders say that the debt is discharged. Now, if it is proposed ove the discharge by parole I think that incompetent. But there are many nds upon which, in a case of this sort, proof may be allowed before answer; example, if there is suspicion of fraud, or if the documentary writings ire explanation.

does not follow that, when a proof before answer is allowed in such a case, lecide anything on the competency of the evidence which may be adduced, hich we cannot judge at this stage. I therefore differ from Lord Neaves as ese words "before answer," and object to their being omitted in this case. llow the parties a proof of their averments without the insertion of the words fore answer" would simply be to allow them to prove discharge of this debt arole testimony. The use of the words "before answer" is just to guard nst this result. I interpret the words to mean, not before answer only as to relevancy, but also before answer as to the competency; and so far from their ing crept into our practice through inadvertency I do not recollect a case re parole proof regarding a privileged document has been allowed without rting them in the interlocutor allowing proof.

ow, in regard to the proof which is to be allowed, I have no doubt that it mpetent to lead such evidence as is necessary to shew the effect of the ings. It is also competent to supply omissions in the documentary evidence

No. 86.

Mar. 8, 1873.
Macvean v. Maclean.

by parole proof,—for example, to prove the date of the letter, which is only "Saturday evening." Then again, prior correspondence is a matter which have an important bearing as to the discharge, not as proving it, but as thr light upon the written documents.

I am therefore of opinion that we should adhere to the interlocutor c Lord Ordinary.

THE COURT pronounced this interlocutor:—"Refuse the note, adhere to the interlocutor complained of: Reserve the consi tion of the question of expenses: Allow the parties a proof of respective averments, and appoint the same to be taken by Neaves," &c.

MURRAY, BEITH, & MURRAY, W.S.—TODS, MURRAY, & JAMIESON, W.S.—Agent

No. 87.

Mar. 11, 1873.
Molleson v. Challis.

(In Multiplepoinding Scott v. Sceales.)

JAMES A. MOLLESON (Mackay's Trustee), Claimant.—Sol.-Gen. Cla —Trayner.

THOMAS CHALLIS AND OTHERS (Trustees for the General Fire and Assurance Company), Claimants.—Watson—Strachan.

Bankruptcy—Fraud—Right in Security—Assignation—Discharge.—A discharged bankrupt obtained a loan from an English assurance company, out of the sum lent, paid a former debt due by him to a Scotch assurance pany, but not having been made aware of the fact of the bankruptcy, in of getting an assignation of the securities held by the Scotch assurance comp obtained a discharge of the debt, and took from the bankrupt a new bon assignation in security over the rights disburdened by the discharge. He a competition between the trustee on the bankrupt estate and the second cre for a sum of money over which the assignation extended, that on groun equity the trustee could not be allowed to benefit by the fraud of the bank in concealing from the second creditor the fact of his bankruptcy.

2D DIVISION. Lord Shand. I.

IN an action of multiplepoinding, Scott v. Sceales, the Court, on July 1865, ranked and preferred the claimant, Miss Euphemia Rit to the sum of £500, with interest from Martinmas 1860. In July Miss Ritchie married Mr John Mackay.

Mr and Mrs Mackay, in April 1868, borrowed a sum of £500 from City of Glasgow Life Assurance Company, and on the 27th of that m granted a bond and assignation in security, by which, after acknowl ing receipt of the amount of the loan, and binding themselves for re ment, in the terms in which such obligations are usually granted married persons, they assigned in security of repayment the benef right and interest of every description of Mrs Mackay, and of her husband through her, in the trust-estate and effects of the late And Sceales, being a liferent right in a sum of £3000, held exclusive of jus mariti of her husband, and her right to the said sum of £500, which her husband's jus mariti extended. A policy of insurance effe on the wife's life was also assigned.

In November 1869 the estates of Mr Mackay were sequestrated u the bankrupt statutes, and the claimant, Mr Molleson, C.A., was ele and confirmed trustee in the sequestration.

The security in favour of the City of Glasgow Assurance Comp continued to subsist until 23d June 1871. On that date a sum of £ was advanced by the claimants, the General Life and Fire Assur Company, £500 of which was applied in paying off the loan by the of Glasgow Company, and the balance paid to Mr and Mrs Mackay.

No. 87.

Mar. 11, 1873.
Molleson v. Challis.

aking an assignation to the subsisting security, the claimants, al Assurance Company, who were in ignorance of the fact that vas an undischarged bankrupt, obtained a discharge of the y the City of Glasgow Company, and a new bond and assigna- :urity by Mr and Mrs Mackay, in their own favour, for the full 700, and by this deed the right to the sum of £500, the liferent the policy of insurance were assigned in security of the personal s by the granters for repayment of the money, in the same hese rights had been assigned to the City of Glasgow Company. it obligation the rate of interest was five, in the second, six per state of the facts, Mr Molleson, the trustee on Mr Mackay's ne forward and asked decree in his favour for the sum of £500 ntioned, with the interest which had accrued on it.

rd Ordinary, on 27th January 1873, pronounced this interlocu- epels the claim of the said James Alexander Molleson, and prefers the said Thomas Challis and others, trustees of the said Fire and Life Assurance Company, as representing the said Ritchie, now Mackay, and John Mackay, her husband, for his o the said sum of £500, and interest thereon, to which the said Ritchie, now Mackay, was ranked and preferred by the pre- erlocutor of 20th July 1865," &c. *

E.— . . . The argument for the trustee in support of his claim this, that at the date of the sequestration Mr Mackay's right through the sum of £500 became vested in the trustee in his sequestration of his creditors, subject only to the burden of the assignation in hich had been granted to the City of Glasgow Company, and that this security subsisted to the exclusion of any benefit or advantage to rs down to 23d June 1871, yet, on that date, by the discharge of the anted by that company, the only burden which affected the right was ed, while an absolute right to the money remained in the trustee. It ned that the new assignation in security then granted in favour of the mants, the General Assurance Company, is ineffectual, because, Mr aving been divested of his estates, had no power thereafter to grant a nation to the sum of £500.
ther claimants, the General Assurance Company, maintain that, by ction entered into by them, as now explained, and the relative deeds, acquired right to the money, and that the trustee in the sequestration ctually found upon that transaction as having enlarged the bankrupt's division among his creditors. The Lord Ordinary is of opinion that nce company are right in their contention. It may be assumed that kay, from funds to which he had acquired right by succession or other- ren which he had borrowed without coming under an obligation to give r the benefit of the subsisting security in favour of the City of Glasgow , had paid off the loan to that company and taken a discharge of it, ome days thereafter borrowed the amount which he obtained from the ssurance Company, any assignation of the fund now in dispute would worthless, because the absolute right to the fund, discharged of the hich had subsisted over it, would in the interval have vested in the the sequestration.
the case which has occurred, and in fact raised the present question, opinion of the Lord Ordinary, essentially different from this.
creation of the new loan took place simultaneously with the settlement former lenders. The claimants, the General Assurance Company, in otiations with Mr and Mrs Mackay, agreed to lend the sum of £700 condition that the money advanced by them should, to the extent , be applied in payment of the debt to the City of Glasgow Company

No. 87.

Mar. 11, 1873.
Molleson v. Challis.

The trustee on the sequestrated estate reclaimed.

Argued for him;—(1) The radical right to the sum was in the trustee subject to the burden which affected it at the date of the sequestration which burden was now discharged. The General Assurance Company's alleged right arose under the assignation granted by the bankrupt, who at the time of granting it, had nothing to assign. It was impossible for the insurance company to make up a title. (2) It could not be said that the transaction was in reality a transference of the old debt and security for the sum was increased and also the rate of interest. (3) As regards equity, that was called into play only where a claimant got more than he had a true title to. When loss arose through one's own fault, non intelligitur damnum subire, and that rule applied here, for bankruptcy was a public fact of which everyone must be held to be aware. Further, if the company lost the £500 a benefit accrued to the creditors, and no real loss would be suffered by the company, which would still be amply protected by the other securities it held.

Argued for the assurance company;—The new debt and obligation was

---

with a view to their own security, and that they should get the benefit of the securities which that company held. In virtue of this agreement it is not disputed that, on paying the debt due to the City of Glasgow Company, they were entitled to the benefit of the securities which that company held. If they had thought fit they might have taken an assignation to these securities, in which case the trustee could have had no possible claim; but it is said that by the form in which they carried through the transaction, taking a discharge of the old security, the trustee's right has emerged. The Lord Ordinary cannot adopt the view that the form of the transaction, rather than its substance, is to determine the rights of the parties, or hold that, because the new lender, through ignorance or want of care, completed the transaction in the particular way in which he did, when an assignation would have secured him, the trustee, who had no personal concern with the transaction, is to reap the large benefit claimed to the detriment of the creditors advancing the money. The case is not like that of a creditor who has, per incuriam, failed to complete a security by registration or otherwise before bankruptcy. In such a case, the trustee founds merely on the omission of the creditor to do an act necessary to complete his own right, while here the trustee further claims the entire benefit of a payment made by the creditor with his own funds.

"Accordingly, even in the form in which the transaction was carried through the Lord Ordinary is of opinion that the trustee's claim is excluded. It is not said that in the transaction the bankrupt, Mr Mackay, intervened in any way. On the contrary, the claimants, the General Assurance Company, with their own funds, paid the City of Glasgow Company directly, and took the discharge for them, with which they have never parted, but which they obtained as the writ or voucher for the payment, and still hold. Having made this payment the balance of the loan only was handed over to the borrowers, Mr and Mrs Mackay. This state of the facts is not disputed, but if any question on the subject had arisen it would have been competent to ascertain the actual circumstances by proof prout de jure—See Fairbairn, 6 Macph. 640.

"Can the trustee, in the circumstances now stated, plead on the discharge conferring a benefit on him? The Lord Ordinary is of opinion that he cannot. The new transaction was conditional on the creditor getting the benefit of the old security. The discharge was not delivered to the bankrupt, and, if seven days had elapsed after the date of the discharge, and before the completion of the transaction, Mr Mackay could not, in the meantime, have insisted on delivery of the discharge, or taken the benefit of it to the effect of obtaining payment of the money from Mr Sceales' trust. He was equally precluded from taking such benefit when the transaction was completed, and the Lord Ordinary is of opinion that, in the circumstances, the trustee is in no better a position."

No. 87.

Mar. 11, 1873.
Molleson v. Challis.

rrogatum for the old. So far as regarded the £500, the transaction s really an assignation, though in form a discharge. The radical right a trustee was different from the right of a creditor having a postponed urity; for the estate of the bankrupt went to the trustee subject to all equities to which it was subject in the hands of the bankrupt. On principle of recompense or restitution the bankrupt estate should not allowed to be enriched by the fraud of the bankrupt, or by an act of company which was not intended to effect a donation.[1]

The assurance company abandoned the claim to the interest of the £500 arded to them by the Lord Ordinary.

At advising,—

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—In this case the Lord Ordinary has found the General and Life Assurance Company entitled to the sum of £500 which Mr Mac-, as in right of his wife, receives under this process, notwithstanding that the d and assignation in security granted by them was legally discharged. The ition of matters is peculiar. That Mr Mackay, the bankrupt, was entitled mariti to the £500 which comes to his wife under the will of the late Mrs ales is not disputed. That sum was not yet payable, but was still in expec-y. Mrs Mackay was also entitled to a liferent of a sum of £3000, secluding husband's jus mariti, of which £1000 was burdened by another liferent. hing to raise money, the husband and wife agreed to borrow from the City Glasgow Life Assurance Company a sum of £500, and they assigned in secu-their beneficial rights under Mr and Mrs Sceales's trust-disposition and settle-t. At that time Mr Mackay was solvent. He became bankrupt in 1869, subsequent to that it occurred to him that he could get a further advance of y on the securities already assigned. He accordingly applied to an English , the General Fire and Life Assurance Company, but did not disclose the of his bankruptcy. The mode in which the transaction was carried out was :—The General Fire and Life office paid directly to the City of Glasgow the sum of £500, and the bond and assignation in security originally ed to the latter by Mr and Mrs Mackay was simpliciter discharged. The eral Fire and Life Assurance Company further made an additional advance 300 to the husband and wife, and took from them a bond and assignation 700 in the same terms as the previous one for £500 to the other office. , the £500 to which the husband was entitled under the Sceales's settle-has become payable in this process of multiplepoinding, and the trustee in ruptcy of Mr Mackay claims it on the ground that the original bond and nation has been discharged, and that Mr Mackay had no power again to it, he, the trustee, immediately acquiring right to it on the discharge. Lord Ordinary has found that the trustee is not entitled to it, on the ground the new loan took place simultaneously with the settlement with the former ns, and that the new transaction was conditional on the creditor getting the fit of the old security. Now, without saying whether I am disposed to with that ground of judgment or not, I am clearly of opinion that the ee cannot take advantage of the discharge obtained by the bankrupt by s of his own fraud, for it is quite clear that the English office, if it had en the true state of Mackay's affairs, would never have entered into this saction. It is equally clear that the bankrupt could not maintain that his e was to be increased to his creditors by liberating his own funds in this ner from the joint debt, and throwing the whole on his wife's funds. This lation of the General Fire and Life Assurance Company is one directed to equitable jurisdiction of this Court, and entitles us to look at this matter all sides. Now, that being the case, it has appeared to us that there are points to be considered than the one which occupied the attention of the Lord

---

Stair i. 8, 6, 7; Erskine, iii. 1, 11; Gordon v. Sutherland, 1731, M. 11,534; , 1751, M. 15,394; Eliot v. Cleghorn, August 27, 1839, Maclean and 1033; Stainton v. Dawson, Jan. 17, 1868, ante, vol. vi. 240.

No. 87.

Mar. 11, 1873. Molleson v. Challis.

Ordinary. A most important one is, what are the claims which can with propri be sustained at the instance of the English company against this sum of £500? T security they hold is one for more than £500, and so far as it is for a new de and in excess of the original £500, the trustee has no need to consider it. T bankrupt could not bind himself in a new debt so as to interfere with the rig of his creditors, and of the trustee as representing them. If the company rec £500, the whole original debt will be thereby extinguished. But then the qu tion arises, how much is to be paid by the husband's estate, and how much the wife's? The security granted from first to last was a catholic security o the beneficial interest of both husband and wife under this settlement. If, th the English company are to retain the security over the wife's separate estat meet the balance due to them, they may be bound to allocate the whole d over the two estates in some rateable proportion. For if these two estates co-obligants it would be manifestly unjust to throw the burden of payment the husband's to the full extent that it will carry. On the other hand, husband's estate may be the principal debtor, the wife's only cautioner. H then, matters are to be decided is yet to be cleared up. We are entitled bound, before finally disposing of the case, to see that the rights of all pa are fully protected. We require, therefore, further argument on this branc the case, and I think that the wife has a very material interest to be he Whether or not she should be represented at the bar we leave in the meant for the parties to consider.

Lord Cowan.—The fund in competition in this multiplepoinding is a sm £500, with interest at 4 per cent from Martinmas 1860, amounting now to wards of £740.

The competitors are—1st, the trustee on the sequestrated estate of John kay, to whom the legacy jure mariti belonged, as in right of his wife, his se tration having occurred in November 1869; and 2d, the trustees of the Ge Assurance Company, who claim the fund as assigned to them by Mr Macka June 1871, in security of a loan of £700 then made to these parties by the company. At the date of this loan there subsisted an assignation to the fund in favour of the City of Glasgow Assurance Company, in security to of the sum of £500 borrowed by Mr Mackay in April 1868 before his se tration. At the date of the transaction with the second company Mackay an undischarged bankrupt,—a fact which he did not make known to them he effected the loan for £700; and accordingly, while they stipulated fo obtained a discharge for the loan of £500, in security of which the City of gow Company held an assignation to the fund in medio, they took a new as tion from Mackay to this fund in security of their then loan for £700. however, the fund, subject to the burden of the security held by the C Glasgow Assurance Company, had passed to the trustee in Mackay's seque tion in 1869, the bankrupt had no right or power to deal with the fund in l and hence, on the documents founded on by the General Assurance Compa they stand, they have no legal claim to the fund in competition with the tr to whom the fund had passed subject to the security held by the City of gow Company. That security having been discharged in 1871 the right o creditors to the fund had become absolute by the extinction of the only sec by which it was burdened at the date of the sequestration. It is, therefor grounds of equity alone that the General Assurance Company can maintain claim to the fund, and their contention is, that having entered into the tra tion and carried it through in ignorance of the sequestration, and of Mackay b an undischarged bankrupt, and through the concealment of that fact by they are entitled to be dealt with in this competition on the same footing instead of taking a deed of discharge from the City of Glasgow Company, had obtained an assignation to the debt of £500 and the securities for pa ment thereof held by that company.

I am of opinion that, on principles of equity, the General Assurance Comp are entitled to the redress which they claim, subject to the condition afte plained. Had the company been aware of the position in which Mackay s

No. 87.

Mar. 11, 1873.
Molleson v. Challis.

the time they never would have allowed the transaction with him to have assumed the form which it did, the effect of which was to make the security on which they calculated in lending the £700 useless and effete so far as the fund in medio was concerned, and to leave the fund, unburdened by the money which was advanced to pay the loan to the City of Glasgow Company, to be claimed by the creditors. The concealment or fraud practised on the General Assurance Company by the bankrupt alone led to the form which the transaction in 1871 assumed, under which, instead of an assignation from the City of Glasgow Company of their security when the loan of £500 was paid, a deed of discharge was taken in them, by which means alone the inequitable position in which the parties are relatively placed has been effected. Equity forbids that such a result should be allowed to stand. The trustee and creditors cannot be allowed to be benefited by the fraudulent conduct of the bankrupt. In so far as the General Assurance Company have suffered loss, and the creditors of the sequestrated estate got benefit by the transaction as it stands, the Court are entitled and bound to give restitution or redress.

While I am of the opinion now expressed, I am not satisfied that the Lord Ordinary has fully appreciated and properly applied the equitable principle now explained. He has decerned for payment of the fund to the General Assurance Company in absolute and unconditional terms, without adverting to the fact that the General Assurance Company, and also the City of Glasgow Company, hold other securities for payment of their respective loans, in addition to the assignation of the fund in medio—1st, an assignation by Mrs Mackay of her present interest in the sum of £3000, subject to the deduction therein stated, to which she was entitled under the settlement of Mrs Sceales, free of her husband's jus mariti or right of administration; and 2d, policy of insurance effected on Mrs Mackay's life, the premiums on which, if not paid by her, the company are entitled to pay to themselves, charging the same in accounting with Mrs Mackay for their intromissions with her liferent interest in said sum. There are thus two securities besides the policy of insurance held by the assurance companies for their respective loans, and the question is, how, on equitable principles, the respective rights of the two competitors should be adjusted. On the one hand, it does not seem consistent with sound principle that the assurance company should be at once preferred, as it is by the interlocutor, to the whole fund in medio, to the entire defeat of the claim advanced by the trustee under the sequestration; and, on the other hand, the creditors cannot be preferred to the fund, which has been liberated through inadvertence, the effect of which admits of being redressed, free of the security with which the fund was burdened at the date of the sequestration. There must be an equalisation effected of the burden attaching to each of the two securities held by the company. At least this is a matter requiring consideration, and to which the argument of the parties was not addressed, and probably this part of the case may require further discussion.

LORD BENHOLME concurred.

LORD NEAVES.—I concur in the result which is proposed, and I adopt so far the view to which the Lord Ordinary has given effect. The Glasgow company held a security which was preferable to the right of the trustee. The London company advanced money which went to pay that debt. No doubt a discharge of that debt passed between the Glasgow company and Mackay, and had the apparent effect of extinguishing the claim against him. It is alleged that the effect of the discharge is to enable the trustee to come forward and say that he is the radical owner of the money, which is now disburdened of the only burden under which it was affected, and that consequently it is his property. That is not a very equitable view. It involves the idea that the London company made restitution of that sum of £500 to the creditors. On the other hand, the second company was not content to take over the original debt, but took a new assignation for a larger sum, in a way which looks very like a novation of the whole matter. That is the point on which I feel some difficulty; but it does not prevent

No. 87.

Mar. 11, 1873. Molleson v. Challis.

me from acquiescing in the view of your Lordship. The Lord Ordinary is wrong however, on one point, for what the London company holds is a security, and is not entitled to immediate payment of the sum over which the security extends. Further, it is to be remembered that this is a catholic security partly over the £500 which belonged to the husband and partly over the wife's liferent interest in the £3000, and the question comes to be whether, as regards the debt of £5[illegible] it is to be paid out of the husband's estate, and the wife's separate estate is to be liberated altogether. Before determining this question, the wife must be heard for her interest. She already appears, for this discussion occurs in a multiplepoinding to which she was called; and all that requires to be done is to give her notice that her original claim in the action is said to be affected in this way.

The case was afterwards settled, the trustee on the sequestrated estate and the General Life and Fire Assurance Company agreeing to a division of the £500 found due to Mrs Mackay in the multiplepoinding, over which the jus mariti of her husband extended, and a concerted interlocutor embodying this arrangement was pronounced.

J. C. IRONS, S.S.C.—J. S. MACK, S.S.C.—Agents.

No. 88.

Mar. 11, 1873. Trevelyan v. Trevelyan.

HARRINGTON ASTLEY TREVELYAN, Pursuer.—Watson—Kinnear.
MRS ELIZABETH LETHBRIDGE TREVELYAN, Defender.—Sol.-Gen. Clark—Gloag.

Parent and Child—Legitim—Discharge—Marriage-Contract—Provisions—Foreign.—In an action for legitim brought by the only child of a domiciled Scotsman against the executrix of his father, the defender alleged that the pursuer's claim was excluded by an antenuptial marriage-contract executed by the parents when domiciled in England, averring that by this deed two sums of £[illegible] and £6000 were conveyed by the spouses respectively in trust for behoof of the children of the marriage, and that, according to the law of England, the provisions made in the marriage-contract in favour of the issue of the marriage operated as a full discharge of all legal and other claims which the issue so provided for could prefer against the succession of their parents, or in respect of the death of either of them, and that the pursuer had accepted of these provisions, and in so doing had discharged all other claims against his father's estate. Held that the defender's averments in regard to the terms of the marriage-contract and its effect by the law of England were not relevant averments of such a deed as the law of Scotland would exclude a claim for legitim.

Parent and Child—Collatio inter liberos.—Advances made by a father to a child cannot be imputed to account of legitim, except in a question with other children entitled to legitim.

2D DIVISION. Lord Mure. I.

THIS action was brought by Colonel Trevelyan, only child of the deceased Lieutenant-General Willoughby Trevelyan, against Mrs Trevelyan his father's widow and executrix, for payment of legitim. General Trevelyan, who died on 3d July 1871, was twice married, first to the pursuer's mother, Anne Mary Astley; and secondly, to the defender. At the time of his first marriage General Trevelyan was domiciled in England, and at the time of his death he was domiciled in Scotland.

The defender averred,—(Stat. 1.) "By antenuptial contract or indenture of marriage in the English style, entered into in England on 24th December 1830, between the pursuer's father and mother, the former conveyed the sum of £5000, and the latter the sum of £6167, 3s. consols to certain persons therein designated, in trust for behoof of the children of their marriage, on the death of the survivor of them. Of this marriage the pursuer is the only child, and at the death of his father on 3d July 1871 the funds settled as aforesaid became payable to and have been

No. 88.

Mar. 11, 1873.
Trevelyan v. Trevelyan.

ived by him. At the time of their marriage the father and mother the pursuer both had their domicile in England." (Stat. 2.) "According the law of England the provisions made in the foresaid marriage-con- or indenture in favour of the issue of the marriage operated as a discharge of all legal or other claims which the issue so provided for d prefer against the succession of their parents, or in respect of the h of either of them. The pursuer has accepted of these provisions, by so doing has discharged all other claims against the estate or suc- ion of his deceased father."

he defender pleaded;—(3) The pursuer's claim to succeed to part of the veable estate of his father falls to be determined by English law, and rding to the just construction of the marriage indenture of 1830, and whole claims in the present action being thereby excluded, the nder is entitled to absolvitor. (4) The pursuer's claim of legitim was ded in respect of the marriage indenture of his parents and of his er's deed of settlement in 1871, and of his having been forisfamiliated provided for in lieu of legitim before his father had acquired a Scotch icile, or on one or more of these grounds. (5) Esto the pursuer is itled to legitim, his claim is satisfied to the extent of the outlay and nces on his behalf by General Trevelyan, and his claim of interest is sive.

he Lord Ordinary pronounced this interlocutor:—"The Lord Ordinary ing heard parties' procurators, and considered the closed record and actions, 1st, Finds it admitted that the pursuer's father, the late ral Trevelyan, was a domiciled Scotsman at the time of his death, that, by the will or deed of settlement executed by him in January , he did not make any provision in favour of the pursuer: 2d, Finds ese circumstances in point of law (1) that the pursuer, as the only d of his father, is entitled to legitim out of the free moveable estate which his father died possessed; (2) that the pursuer is not barred claiming legitim by the terms of the contract of marriage entered between his father and mother in 1830; and (3) that, in a question the defender, the pursuer is not bound to collate, or impute in satis- ion of his legitim, the provisions in his favour contained in that mar- e-contract, or any outlay or advances made to him by his father of nature set forth in the defender's statement of facts: Therefore to extent repels the defences, and appoints the case to be put to the that an account may be taken of the amount of the free moveable te of General Trevelyan at the time of his death, and reserves in the ntime all questions of expenses."*

---

* "NOTE.—As the late General Trevelyan was a domiciled Scotsman at the od of his death the main questions here raised must, it is thought, be dis- d of according to the law of Scotland, in compliance with the well-established that all questions of succession to moveable estate are regulated by the law e domicile of the party whose succession is in question.

Now, it is not alleged that there has been, in the present case, any express ten discharge of his legitim by the pursuer; and the Lord Ordinary did not erstand it to be contended, on the part of the defender, that, if the question e pursuer's right to legitim had turned upon the terms of the will executed General Trevelyan in 1871, there would have been any good grounds in law sisting the pursuer's claim. Neither did the Lord Ordinary understand it to ntended, and he does not think that there are any grounds for holding, that has been, in the circumstances of this case, any such forisfamiliation of the er, in the sense in which the term is used in the law of Scotland, as was ated to operate a discharge of the pursuer's right to legitim—Ersk., iii., 9,

But it was maintained—(1) that the claim now made was excluded, in

No. 88.

Mar. 11, 1873. Trevelyan v. Trevelyan.

The defender reclaimed, and argued;—The claim of legitim was barred by the English contract of marriage. By the English law—according to which the marriage-contract must be construed [1]—that deed operated a full discharge of all claims which the children could otherwise have preferred against the succession of their parents. That being so the claim of legitim was excluded, for legitim was a claim which might be discharged by the parent, so long as the right to discharge was not so used as respect of the provisions of the marriage-contract entered into between the pursuer's father and mother in 1830, which ought, it was said, to be construed the law of England; and (2) that assuming the pursuer to be entitled to legitim the claim has been satisfied, and is excluded to the extent of the advances alleged to have been made by his father on his behalf in the purchase of commissions in the army, and towards payment of his debts.

---

"1st, The marriage-contract or indenture, on which the first of these pleas rested, was not in process when the case was debated. It has, however, since then been produced; but after examining its provisions the Lord Ordinary has been unable to find any of them which can be held to import a discharge of the pursuer's claim, or of any other legal rights which might accrue to him as one of the children of the marriage. The case must therefore, it is thought, be ruled by the decisions in the cases of Lord Chandos, 16th August 1836 (15 and M'L., p. 377), and Keith's Trustees, 17th July 1857, 19 D. 1040, the latter of which seems to be more specially in point. Because, while the deed was an English contract, executed between parties resident in England, where it was alleged that Lord Keith was domiciled at the time, the Court do not seem to have considered it necessary to direct any inquiry as to the domicile; thereby implying that, in such a case, they did not consider the ascertainment of the question of domicile at the date of the execution of the contract to be essential for the disposal of the case.

"2d, With reference, again, to the sums sought to be charged against the pursuer in name of outlay or advances for commissions and to pay debts, it appears to the Lord Ordinary to have been settled in the case of Nisbet's Trustees, 1st March 1868, following that of M'Dougall, 31st January 1804 (M. App. Bankrupt, No. 21), that such advances cannot be claimed as debts, except where an obligation for payment has been taken at the time, and the advances have thus been constituted and kept up as debts, which is not here alleged to have been done. While therefore claims of that description were allowed as against the eldest son in Nisbet's case, they were allowed not as sums claimable in name of debts, but on the footing that they were advances, which, in a question with liberos, required to be collated in settling the legitim. The doctrine of collation among children, however, has no application here, as the question is raised not with children, but with a widow under a general settlement, with whom it appears to be settled that a child cannot be called on to collate—Stair, iii, 8, 46; Ersk. Principles, iii., 9, 10; Keith's Trustees, ut supra.

"In the view which the Lord Ordinary thus takes of the law applicable to the case he has seen no sufficient reason for allowing the defender a proof as to the meaning and effect of the marriage-contract of 1830 according to the law of England; because it is not alleged that the marriage-contract contains words of technical import in the law or practice of England which can only be construed by those who are conversant with English law. It is for this Court therefore to put its own construction on the deed, as was done in the case of Thomson's Trustees, 18th December 1851, 14 D. 217, as well as in the cases of Lord Chandos and Keith's Trustees. And as the advances made to the pursuer by his father are not of a description which can, in the opinion of the Lord Ordinary, be imputed in satisfaction of the pursuer's claim, he has not deemed it necessary to allow the defender a proof as to the amount of those advances before disposing of the case."

[1] Story's Conflict of Laws, sec. 276.

No. 88.

Mar. 11, 1873.
Trevelyan v. Trevelyan.

re the child portionless.[1] The child took legitim not as heir but as litor,[2] and if provision was made for the child to come in place of tim the debt was discharged. So the meaning of the English deed g that the whole provision of the children of the marriage was to ast of the provisions therein contained, goodwill excepted, the child id not claim legitim, for the parent had by that deed exercised the ht which the law of Scotland recognised, of making a provision for his ldren which was to come in the place of, and discharge the claim for, tim.

Argued for the pursuer;—As the marriage-contract was clear and unbiguous there was no need to go to the English law, but the case must decided entirely according to the law of Scotland; for the question at ue was whether the Scotch right of legitim had been discharged, and it s for the law of Scotland to say what constituted a valid discharge of t right. By the law of Scotland the claim for legitim could only be ed by express discharge,[3] and there was here no averment of such discge, but only the allegation that according to the law of England a tain deed implied a discharge of all claim against the succession of the ant. Now, legitim could not be discharged by implication, but only 'express discharge, and therefore the claim of the pursuer was well aded.

At advising,—

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—The two questions which have been raised in this case , first, whether the marriage-settlement executed between General Trevelyan . his first wife excludes the claim of the pursuer for legitim; and, secondly, ther the advances set out in the condescendence are to be taken as deducs or payments to account of the claim.

s to the first point, there can be no doubt that the right to legitim, although certain sense a debt, is so far a right of succession that it is to be determined the domicile of the defunct. That was not disputed by the defender; but it aintained that this right has been surrendered or discharged by virtue of English contract of marriage between General Trevelyan and his first wife; l in the second article of the statement of facts the effect of this instrument is ed as matter of English law.

According to the law of Scotland it is now well settled that legitim can only excluded by express discharge; and, certainly, as far as the contract in ques- is set out by the defender, nothing to that effect appears to be contained in

All that is alleged is, that by the indenture in question a sum of £5000 is veyed by the husband, and a sum of £6167, 3s. by the wife, to trustees, in t for the spouses for their lives, and for the children of the marriage. That h a provision would not by our law exclude the right to legitim seems not to doubtful; and the cases of Breadalbane and Keith, referred to by the Lord dinary, are decisions which appear conclusive on this point.

It is, however, contended that the law of England, and not the law of Scotd, must regulate this matter, and that any discharge which would by the glish law exclude such a claim must be accepted by the Courts of Scotland as ficient to extinguish it.

This point was not raised in either of the cases referred to, although it was volved in the circumstances in which they respectively arose. There can be tle question, as was laid down by Lord Eldon in the second branch of the case Hog v. Lashley, that when persons domiciled in England settle the incidents

---

[1] Hog v. Lashley or Hog, 3 Paton's Appeal Cases, 247; Nisbet's Trustees v. Nisbet, March 10, 1868 ante vol. vi. 567.

[2] Erskine Inst., 3, 9, 15.

[3] Keith's Trustees v. Keith and Others, July 17, 1857, 19 D. 1040; Breadalbane v. Chandos, August 16, 1836, 2 Shaw and M'Lean, 377.

No. 88.

Mar. 11, 1873. Trevelyan v. Trevelyan.

of the marriage by an English contract, its stipulations, and the effect to b to them, will follow them to any domicile to which they may afterwards r an illustration of the general rule that contracts must be construed accor the law of the place where they are made, and where they are originally in to be fulfilled. Whether it be a sound corollary from this principle that like legitim, arising from the customary law of the domicile, can be dis otherwise than according to the law of the domicile, might be attend doubt; and certainly the cases of Breadalbane and Keith seem to have pr on an opposite assumption. If we had to decide on that proposition I have had difficulty in excluding the law of the place of the alleged conti

In the present case, however, I have a very clear opinion that the al in regard to the law of England is not relevant as it stands. It is as fol "According to the law of England the provisions made in the foresaid r contract or indenture in favour of the issue of the marriage operated discharge of all legal or other claims which the issue so provided for cou against the succession of their parents, or in respect of the death of them. The pursuer has accepted of these provisions, and by so doing charged all other claims against the estate or succession of his deceased

Now, before we inquire into the law of England, we must have a clea standing of what it is alleged to be. I own I gather no definite meani this allegation. It is not said that there are any claims which by th England would have been competent to the pursuer, and from which the would exclude him. It is not said whether the claims said to be discha claims arising on intestacy, or claims which would arise notwithstanding ment by will. It is not said that this marriage indenture was equival mutual contract of release between the father and child, nor what deman by the law of England be held to be thereby released. We could not case for the Courts in England which would be intelligible on this st We know, as matter of general jurisprudence, that the right of legitim place in the law of England, although in London and in York some a customs until recently prevailed. I doubt if the allegation is meant that the indenture would exclude the son's right ab intestato; and if i mean that, I am at a loss to gather its import. As to referring the inte question to the English Courts and asking them how they would decide I presume no such suggestion is made.

I am therefore prepared to hold the allegation irrelevant, and to repel founded on it.

On the second point, I concur in the opinion of the Lord Ordinary, a nothing to add to what he has said.

Lord Cowan.—Having regard to the legal questions raised in the and the argument under the reclaiming note, I am of opinion that no g ground has been stated which should lead us to disturb the interlocuto Lord Ordinary.

The legitim claimed by the pursuer is by the law of Scotland und due to him, as the only child of the marriage of his parents. At the da death his father was a domiciled Scotchman, and he had no power to t his whole moveable estate to the detriment of that right of succession w law the pursuer has in his father's executry, unless the same has been or discharged. Accordingly this is what the defender, the second General Trevelyan, as his general disponee under his settlement of 187 tains to be the actual state of matters. No express or special discharge legitim is alleged ever to have been executed. No provision in express tion of his legal right is alleged to have been settled on the pursuer father. Yet by the law of Scotland such special discharge, except peculiar circumstances, which do not here exist, is indispensable to excl claim of legitim.

The defender, however, maintains, in the first place, that by antenup tract entered into in England between the pursuer's father and moth the parties were both of them domiciled in England, a certain provis

No. 88.

Mar. 11, 1873.
Trevelyan v. Trevelyan.

le for the children of the intended marriage, and that this provision, accord- to the law of England, "operated as a full discharge of all legal or other ns which the issue so provided for could prefer against the succession of r parents." From the statement made by the defender in article first it s not appear that any general settlement of the father's estate, either at date of the marriage or at his death, was made by the contract. All that aged is that a sum of £5000 by the father and the sum of £6167, 3s. ls by the mother, were given over to trustees for behoof of the issue on the h of the surviving parent. This being the nature of the provision to which defender refers, the first matter for consideration is, whether it is necessary make inquiry as to the law of England. That this course has been followed me cases may be true, and I observe in the case of Hog v. Lashley the ion of English counsel was taken by this Court as to the effect by the law of and of certain provisions contained in an English contract which had been ed into before the marriage as regards the jus relictæ. I do not think, how- that this course should be adopted in the present case.

) The provision in the contract is stated to have consisted of a sum of money, part, subject to the liferent of the spouses, as a separate fund for the child- not by their father alone, but by the mother also; and this fund they could as theirs, and, if not actually given over to the trustees, was a debt claim- nteably out of the general estates of both parents. In such a question as present there is no difficulty in dealing with such a provision without having ence to the law of England, there being no technical words or phraseology loyed requiring to be interpreted by that law.

nd (2) it is for the law of Scotland to judge of the effect of such a provision the right to legitim asserted by the pursuer, inasmuch as it is not alleged by the law of England any interest in or share of the moveable estate of the r is capable of being vindicated by his children, upon his death, domiciled in and. In this respect there is a distinction between the claim of the children gitim and the interest of the wife to share in the goods in communion. By law of England there is a corresponding right of dower in the wife, the im- discharge of which by an English contract may, when alleged to have been arged, be matter for inquiry. It is different as regards the legitim, there s no right whatever in the children similar to that by the English law able of being impliedly discharged.

ccordingly, in the case of Hog v. Lashley, the Court there, in the question gards the legitim, judged of the effect of a provision in an antenuptial con- very similar to the present, without having recourse to English counsel to tain the effect of the English contract (Hog v. Lashley, April and May , 3 Pat. App., 247), but at once proceeded to judge of it exclusively by our law. But where the question of the alleged implied discharge of the jus by the English contract came before the Court (Hog v. Lashley, March November 1804, 4 Pat. App., 586), recourse was had to English lawyers the effect of the contract in extinguishing the wife's right of dower, and far thereby her jus relictæ might be affected, becoming exigible by our law e change of domicile to Scotland. We have here to deal only with legitim, h, as there stated, is truly a right of succession, and is an interest which the gives to children on the father's death, and thus differing in its character the wife's share in the goods in communion, which might formerly, when predeceased, have been made effectual during the husband's life.

n the second branch of the case we have to consider only the effect of the plea for the defender, which exclusively relates to outlay for and advances e to the pursuer by his father, and as to this point the decisions referred to he Lord Ordinary in his note support his interlocutor. No plea is stated no argument was maintained with regard to the right of the pursuer to claim whole legitim without bringing into computation the marriage-contract pro- n, in so far as it was provided out of the father's estate. No question of that , therefore, requires to be considered.

RD BENHOLME concurred.

No. 88.

Mar. 11, 1873. Trevelyan v. Trevelyan.

LORD NEAVES.—I am of the same opinion, and I have little to add to what has been said by your Lordships. The first question—if it be a question—seems to be this, whether or not the succession of a domiciled Scotchman is to be governed by the law of Scotland. By the law of Scotland the succession to estate is divided into various portions, and one of these is legitim, and legitim due unless it is specially excluded. Now, in this case it is said that the claim excluded by an English contract of marriage, and that we must go to England for the law. In that contract the pursuer's father conveys the sum of £5[illegible] and his mother the sum of £6167 to certain persons therein designated, in trust for behoof of the children of their marriage, on the death of the survivor of them. Now, there is no doubt that a contract entered into between two parties, if a good contract in the country where it was made, is binding upon them all the world over. But there is nothing of that sort here. All that is said is that this contract of marriage operated as a full discharge of all claims which the children would otherwise have had against the parents, and, among other claims, that of legitim. It is not said that the marriage-contract imported a discharge of legitim, but that it operated such a discharge. Now, it is a very startling proposition to say that an English marriage-contract in 1830 operated a full discharge of a claim for legitim which did not arise till 1873. Can the law of England say any such thing? Would this deed operate as a discharge of all such claims in every country in the world? It is impossible that it should have any such effect.

It is not alleged that there is any obscurity in the deed requiring English law to clear it up. But it is said that the deed implied a discharge of all claims which might arise to the children. Now, that is the very case which, according to the law of Scotland, does not exclude the claim of legitim, for the law of Scotland says that nothing but an express discharge excludes that claim. Therefore the statement on record as to the law of England is utterly irrelevant. There is no need to go to England, where there is nothing to be construed, the English law.

In regard to the second question I entirely agree with your Lordships.

THE COURT adhered.

MACKENZIE & KERMACK, W.S.—GILLESPIE & PATERSON, W.S.—Agents.

No. 89.

Mar. 14, 1873. Mather, &c. v. Macbraire, &c.

CHARLES THOMAS NATERS MATHER AND GEORGE YOUNG, Pursuers.—Watson—Robert Johnstone.

JAMES MACBRAIRE, Defender.—Sol.-Gen. Clark—Macdonald.

THE BERWICK SHIPPING COMPANY (LIMITED), Defenders.—Sol.-Gen. Clark—Trayner.

Property—River—Salmon-Fishing.—A and B were owners of salmon-fishings on the north and south sides respectively of a tidal river, the medium filum being the boundary between them. From time immemorial the main stream of the river had flowed in a narrow channel close to the northern bank of the river, in consequence of a gravel bank, partially dry at low water, stretching across the medium filum from the south; and it had been the practice of the proprietor of the northern fishings to repair the bank when injured by extraordinary floods so as to prevent the main channel of the river from being diverted to the injury of his fishing. In a process of declarator and interdict brought by B to prevent A interfering with the operations of nature upon the alveus of the river, held that the original grant as well as the custom of the river implied a right in each proprietor to keep the stream, so far as practicable, in its normal state, and that A was entitled to restore the alveus to its normal condition when altered by extraordinary floods.

No. 89.

Mar. 14, 1873.
Mather, &c. v. Macbraire, &c.

1st Division.
Lord Jervis-woode.

B.

CHARLES T. N. MATHER of Longridge, in the county of Northumberland, as proprietor, and George Young, fishmonger, was tenant of the Watham hery, in the river Tweed, situated in the county of Northumberland. mes Macbraire of Broadmeadows was proprietor of the Scotch New ter fishing ex adverso of the lands of Tweedhill, in the county of rwick, in which the Berwick Shipping Company were his tenants. The ndary between these two fisheries was the medium filum of the river, ich also formed the division between England and Scotland.

At the place in question the Tweed was a tidal river, its alveus being t 150 yards in breadth. A bank or bed of sand or gravel stretched s the alveus from the south or English side, and being almost dry at water confined the main body of water in the river to a narrow nel of about twenty yards in width close to the northern bank of the . At low water salmon ascending the river could do so only by this nel. The salmon were caught at this part of the Tweed by a process d "fording the fish." The fishermen watched the fish as they ascend narrow and rapid currents, and when they saw a salmon approach immediately gave the signal to their fellow fishermen to shoot the , and this watching or fording was carried on at night as well as during day at the time of low water.

In 1867 and in 1871, in consequence of heavy floods and masses of ice ing down the river, and also in the latter year in consequence, as was ged, of certain operations of the pursuers, the bed of the river at the nder's fishery was injured, and the defenders restored matters to their ner condition by filling up the holes and replacing the bed in its ordi- y condition.

Mr Mather, and his tenant, Mr Young, brought this action, concluding declarator "(1) that the defenders had no right or title to interfere with ank or bed of sand, gravel, and stones forming part of the alveus of the er Tweed, situated near the middle of the said river, ex adverso of the d lands of Tweedhill, and lying partly within the limits of the said otch New Water fishing, and partly within the limits of the salmon hery of Watham, in the county of Northumberland, and that in so far as e said bank or bed of sand, gravel, and stones lies to the north of the dium filum of the river Tweed; or to embank or otherwise protect the id bank or bed of sand, gravel, and stones against the natural flow or rrent of said river; and that the defenders have no right or title to erect nbankments or obstructions, or to deposit stones or other materials upon e said bank or bed of sand, gravel, and stones, or in any channels or eams of water intersecting the said bank or bed, so far as the same is uated to the north of the medium filum of the river;" that the operations the defenders in 1867 and 1871 were illegal and unwarrantable, and at they should be ordained to remove them. There was a conclusion r interdict; and, further, it was concluded, "or otherwise and in any event e defenders ought and should be interdicted, prohibited, and discharged, decree foresaid, from executing all or any of the foresaid operations, d also from scraping or excavating or otherwise interfering with the ds of the said river to the north of the medium filum thereof, for the rpose or with the effect of preventing the natural flow of the water ough or over said bank or bed of sand, gravel, and stones, and channels d streams intersecting the same, to the injury of the pursuers' right of mon-fishing, or fishery of Watham, situated to the south of the medium m of the river and ex adverso of the said Scotch New Water fishing."

The pursuers pleaded;—1. The operations of the defenders complained being illegal and unwarrantable, and injurious to the property of the rsuers, the pursuers are entitled to decree of declarator to the effect

No. 89.

Mar. 14, 1873.
Mather, &c. v. Macbraire, &c.

concluded for. 2. The defenders having no right to interfere w alveus of the river Tweed to the injury of the pursuers' right of fishing, the pursuers are entitled to decree interdicting and prohibiti in terms of one or other of the conclusions of the summons for int

The defender, Mather, pleaded;—3. The defenders' operation entirely on their own side of the medium filum, and having had n on that part of the stream which flows to the south thereof or u pursuers' fishery, which lies to the south of the medium filum, the d are entitled to absolvitor. 4. The defenders' operations having bee sary for the purpose of preventing injury to their fishings, resulti the illegal and unwarrantable proceedings of the pursuers, they are to absolvitor. 5. The defenders not having altered the course of th in any way, but only having kept it the same as it has been f years and upwards or from time immemorial, the defenders are en absolvitor. 6. Separatim, the whole of the defenders' operations been performed according to the usual and immemorial custom Tweed fisheries, and having been necessary to maintain the fis working condition, the defenders are entitled to absolvitor.

The defenders, the Berwick Shipping Company, pleaded;—3. fenders were entitled to execute the operations which they carried in 1867 and since then, in respect (1) these operations did not a alveus to the south of the medium filum; (2) the said operations h the effect of maintaining the river in the natural course in whic run from time immemorial; and (3) the said operations were not i to the pursuers' fishings.

A proof was taken before the Lord Ordinary, from which, in add the facts already stated, it appeared that the operations complaine been executed by the defenders on the south side of the medium filu river, and had not been inconsistent with the usage and custom of prietors and tenants of salmon-fishings in the river Tweed; and defenders had not altered but merely restored the bed and stream river to their ordinary condition.

The Lord Ordinary pronounced an interlocutor (30th Novembe finding "as matter of fact (1st), That the operations forming the of the present action, and which were executed by the defender upon the bank or bed of sand, gravel, and stones described in the and forming part of the alveus of the river Tweed, and in or upo parts of said alveus, were executed upon the north or Scotch side medium filum of said river, and with relation to the salmon-fishing as the Scotch New Water fishing belonging to the defender, Mr Ma and situated ex adverso of his lands and estate of Tweedhill: (2) T the said salmon-fishing the main body of water now flows, and forty years and upwards flowed, along the north or Scotch side river: (3d) That the said operations of the defenders had not the e diverting the water of the river from its natural or ordinary cours changing the same: (4th) That the said operations were performed purpose of repairing the damage caused to the bed of the river by floods and floating masses of ice or otherwise, and of restoring the c to its former state, and so maintaining the said salmon-fishing in a s condition for the due and proper use of nets therein, and otherwise due exercise of the rights of the defenders in relation to the said and that said operations did not go beyond reasonable repair to the the river: and (5th) That the defenders and their predecessors ha in use for forty years and upwards, and for the like purpose, to operations of the description complained of: Further, and as m law, finds that the defenders were and are entitled to execute such

No. 89.

Mar. 14, 1873.
Mather, &c. v. Macbraire, &c.

s, and that these are not such as to warrant the interference of the suers with the same: Therefore assoilzies the defenders from the conions of the summons, and decerns: Finds the pursuers liable to the nders in expenses, in so far as they have not already been found liable ain: Allows an account of the expenses now found due to be lodged, remits the same to the Auditor to tax and report."

he pursuers reclaimed, and argued;—All operations in alveo by a on having a common interest in a river were unlawful, and the deers had no right to interfere with the alveus. While a river kept in its banks a riparian owner had no right to interfere with the ations of nature in its bed and stream.[1]

he defenders argued;—The only interest of the pursuers was, that the nders were interfering with a prospective advantage which Mather, as a rietor of fishings, might derive from a sudden natural change in the se of the river. The distinction between a gradual and imperceptible nge in the stream or its bed and a sudden change caused by an extrainary flood was obvious.[2] The cases referred to for the pursuers all ted to private streams, except that of Lindsay v. Thomson, in which hing touching the present question was decided.

t advising,—

ORD DEAS.—The question in the present case involves some elements of lty, and requires careful consideration. It relates to salmon-fisheries in a ion of the river Tweed, at a place where the river is mutually admitted to a public tidal river. The pursuer, Mr Mather, is a domiciled Englishman, and defender, Mr Macbraire, is a domiciled Scotsman. The pursuer, Mr Mather, proprietor of the Watham salmon-fishery, connected with the English or thern bank, and the defender, Mr Macbraire, is proprietor of the salmonry on the Scotch or northern side, immediately opposite, connected with nds of Tweedhill. I understand the medium filum to be admittedly the dary of the two fisheries, as well as of the two countries, recognising the line laid down in the case of Milne Home v. Smith, 23d November 1850, D. 112, noticed by your Lordship in the chair in the course of the discussion. oth rights of fishing necessarily flow from crown grants, and although it id appear that one or other of these grants may have originated before the n of the Crowns, I do not think that this creates any specialty of import-. The two Crowns are now united, and the case is, I think, to be dealt with a the footing of two grants flowing from the same sovereign power, and giving ights which in both countries are deemed inter regalia minora.

he defender, Mr Macbraire, is, as I have said, proprietor of the lands of edhill, upon which he draws his nets. The pursuer must, no doubt, have t to draw his nets on the southern side. Allusion is made in the proof to r Mather's land," but it is not averred in the record that he is proprietor of land there. This, however, is of no moment, because neither party pre- to be exercising or enforcing any rights as a riparian proprietor. The title interest asserted on both sides are exclusively the title and interest of protors of salmon-fishings in a tidal public river. Neither of them has any proy in the solum of the river, which remains vested in the Crown. The ques- between them substantially comes to be, whether, if a sudden and unusual d has altered the solum or bed of the river upon one side of the medium filum

Morris v. Bicket, May 20, 1862, ante, vol. ii. p. 1082,—affd. July 13, 1866, , vol. iv. H. L. p. 44, L. R. 1 Sc. Ap. 47; Lindsay v. Thomson, Nov. 15, 6, ante, vol. v. p. 29; Jackson's Trustees v. Marshall, July 4, 1872, ante, x. p. 913; Town of Nairn v. Brodie, 1738, M. 12,779; Farquharson v. rquharson, 1741, ib.; Town of Aberdeen v. Menzies, 1748, M. 12,787; nzies v. Earl of Breadalbane, July 4, 1828, 3 W. and S. 235.

E. of Zetland v. Glover Incorp. of Perth, Jan. 31, 1868, ante, vol. vi. 292.

No. 89.
Mar. 14, 1873.
Mather, &c. v. Macbraire, &c.

in a manner prejudicial to the salmon-fishing upon that side, the party wh fishing is thus injured can be prevented by the other from de recenti restor the solum on his own side to the same state in which it was immediately be the flood. That is what the defender has done, and it is clear, I think, u the proof, that that is all which he has done.

A gravel bank of considerable breadth extends from near the English side 125 yards or thereby across the river towards the Scotch side, being about th fourths of the width of the river, and reaches to within 20 yards or thereb the Scotch side. These are the measurements averred by the pursuers in ar 4 of their condescendence, but accuracy or precision as to these measuremen not material to the question at issue. The main body of the water flows wi this last-mentioned space,—hypothetically assumed to be 20 yards or thereb on the Scotch side; and at low water the salmon can only ascend in this comp tively limited space, so that the defender, Mr Macbraire, and his tenants ha much better opportunity of watching (or, as it is called, of "fording") the f and consequently, of catching them, than they would otherwise have.

It appears that about July or August 1867, and again in August 1871, defender, Mr Macbraire, and his tenants performed certain operations on the of the river, on their own side of the medium filum, by filling in stones gravel for the purpose and with the effect of filling up gaps in the gravel b already mentioned, which had been caused by unusual floods in the course of of the two immediately preceding winters respectively, and thereby restoring bank to the state it had been in prior to these floods. These are the operati which the pursuer complains of and seeks to have undone. The gaps, while remained, had the effect of causing the deeper portion of the water, in wh the fish prefer to ascend, to flow nearer than formerly to the medium filum, this the pursuer alleges gave him an opportunity, which he had not before watching the fish from his side of the medium filum, and, consequently, a be opportunity than formerly of securing them.

The pursuer does not say that the operations complained of will or can any way, prevent him from exercising his rights of fishing, in precisely the manner and with the same results, as these rights had been exercised for t immemorial prior to the floods in question. What the pursuer complains not any injury or possible injury, but that he is deprived of a benefit which resulted to him from the floods. His argument is, that whatever changes upon the alveus of the river from the floods, however unusual, or from any accidental cause, the parties must accept the benefit or injury, as the case be, to their respective fisheries resulting from these changes, and can law do nothing to restore themselves against these results, so long as the river tinues to flow within the same banks as formerly.

The immemorial usage of proprietors and tenants of salmon-fisheries in river has certainly been adverse to this contention. The pursuer's witnesses doubt say that any operations they have known to be performed on the be the Tweed have always been confined to the space over which the nets drawn in bringing the fish to the shore, and consisted in smoothing that gro and filling up holes which would otherwise have enabled the fish to escape of the nets. But of these witnesses the three last only are of considerable and speak to a period of from forty to fifty years. The others, so far as t ages are mentioned, are all comparatively young men, and have had very s experience. Besides, the evidence of all the pursuer's witnesses is, upon point, merely negative, and cannot be regarded as contradictory to the pos evidence of the defenders' witnesses, nine of whom are persons of from sixt seventy-two years of age, and speak to periods of from forty to sixty y during all which time they say it consists with their own knowledge that invariable custom on the Tweed has been for the proprietors and tenants of salmon-fisheries to restore the bed of the river against all important cha such as occurred in the two winters which respectively preceded the defen operations of 1867 and 1871, and this in a manner precisely similar to which the defenders adopted in these years. Two other witnesses for the fenders give evidence to the same effect, applicable to their shorter experi twenty years and the other of thirty years prior to this action. All itnesses expressly state that the operations so habitually performed imited to the space over which the nets had to be drawn towards the were performed wherever they were required, for the restoration of the river. The witnesses on both sides, at the same time, agree that nder had not performed the operations complained of, or some equally perations, the result would have been that the main body of the water y soon have come to be established permanently much nearer the lum than it has ever hitherto been, to the great depreciation and of the defenders' fishery, and this to an extent greatly disproportionate efit resulting to the pursuers' fishery.

the case, then, upon the above footing, I apply the law to it thus— construe the original grant in favour of each of the grantees as a grant fishery in the river in its then normal state, implying a right to each e the solum of his own fishery so far as practicable in that same state. It being proved that for time immemorial the solum of the defenders' s been maintained and enjoyed in the same state in which it was im- before the floods in question, and to which state the defenders de tored it, I hold that this state must be presumed to have been its nor- tion at the date of the original grant, and, consequently, to have been n which the grantee obtained right to preserve and enjoy it.

lum of the river remains, as I have said, the property of the Crown, terest in that solum was necessarily implied in the crown grant of a hery. Even the Crown, I rather suppose, could not thereafter, by : otherwise, have taken away that solum, and so have destroyed the its own grant, any more than it could have taken away or destroyed of the river, if these had been the property of the Crown. The ex- the solum is as essential to keep the water in its place as the existence ıka. The solum may be called the floor of the fishery. Without that s could be no water, and without the water there could be no fishery. ever the Crown might do, the one grantee cannot destroy the right ıer. Although the Crown did not part with the property of the floor, ne bound to maintain it, an interest in the floor of his own fishery, and maintain it at his own expense, was, I think, beyond all doubt, con- the grantee of the one fishery in a question with the grantee of be so, it may fairly be held to follow that the crown grants likewise right to each grantee to prevent the other from altering the solum on his of the medium filum to the injury of the other. That deduction from nent is not, however, necessary to enable the defenders to stand upon sive. It is rather a position assumed by the pursuers, for the very foun- their action is, and must be, that Mr Mather's right of fishery implies n interest in the solum of Mr Macbraire's fishery, which entitles Mr o complain of Mr Macbraire's operations, although these are entirely on s of his own fishery.

me interest I have been speaking of as an interest in the solum may, for oses of the present case, be equally intelligibly described as an interest urse of the main body of the water. For it is abundantly proved on s that the main body of the water has immemorially flowed on the north ı side of the alveus, and that, but for the defenders' operations, it would ome permanently established at a much greater distance from that side. est in this change is the very interest which the pursuers seek to vindi- l the law they contend for is, as I have already said, that so long as the ps within its banks neither party is entitled either to prevent the shift- e main current, or to bring it back if it has recently shifted. I know of iple or authority for that alleged law. It would operate very unfairly ants of salmon-fishings holding leases for a term of years, as well as upon ors. For instance, the rent of the pursuer's fishery is only £54 a-year, e rent of the defenders' fishery is £300 a-year. No tenant, I should ould engage to pay this rent for the defenders' fishery for a term of years on the footing that nothing could lawfully be done to keep the of the stream from deserting its immemorial course, on which the chi the fishery depends. Such a law would go far to prevent leases fisheries for a period of years from being entered into at all.

No. 89. Mar. 14, 1873. Mather, &c. v. Macbraire, &c.

I can find nothing in any of the cases referred to in the discussion the principle on which, I think, this case falls to be decided. The case v. the Marquis of Breadalbane, H. of L., 3 W. and S. 235, involved r of salmon-fishings. It was a case between riparian proprietors upo banks of the Tay, at a part of the river which, so far as appears, w tidal nor public; and what was held was that the one proprietor was r to build a bulwark, although mainly on his own ground, across an o of the river, which still remained the only course by which the surpl periodically recurring winter floods could get away without overflowi flat land belonging to the other proprietor. The House of Lords di interlocutor of the Court below to be so far varied as to limit the i the erection of "any bulwark or any other opus manufactum upon th the river Tay which may have the effect of diverting the stream of t times of flood from its accustomed course, and throwing the same upo of the appellant." But this was upon the footing that, besides the channel, there existed also a regular flood channel. Accordingly, Chancellor, while observing that the ordinary course of the river was t it took in ordinary times, further observed,—"There is also a flood ch am not talking of that which takes place in extraordinary or acciden but the ordinary course of the river in the different seasons of the yea apprehend, be subject to the same principle." And again, he observe apparently conflicting passages on the subject in the Roman Digest m bably be reconciled by attending to the distinction between the usual the river at different seasons of the year and "accidental and extr casualties from the flood suddenly bursting forth, and they" (that is, t rently conflicting passages) "go to this, that in such a case the parties r to the prejudice of their neighbours, for the sake of self-preservation, gu selves against the consequences."

It is obvious that there is nothing in these views adverse to the def the present case, but rather the reverse. There is not alleged to have habitual winter channel in the Tweed, from which the water has been by the defenders' operations. The floods, against the consequences of w defenders have restored themselves, are not said to have been other th ordinary and accidental floods which altered the normal state of the alv river.

In a subsequent part of the same opinion the Lord Chancellor exp case of Farquharson of Invercauld in 1741, as to embanking upon the attributing importance to the custom of that part of the country,—a vie rather favours than otherwise the recognition of the custom of the Twe portant in the present case, although the question here is between two pr of salmon-fisheries in a public river, and not, as in the Invercauld case, two riparian proprietors in a private stream.

The case of Bicket v. Morris, decided in the House of Lords, 13th Ju 4 Macph. H. of L. p. 44, and 1 Law Rep. Scotch App. p. 47, cited pursuers, has no application here. It was not pretended that the newly wall of the house, which in that case encroached on the alveus of the stre intended either to restore the stream to its usual course or to keep it wit course. On the contrary, the objection which was sustained was that a the encroachment was slight it could not with any certainty be predicte might not to some extent alter the usual course of the stream.

On the other hand, the case of the Town of Nairn v. Brodie, 28th Jul M. 12,779, seems to be strongly corroborative of the principle on which I posed to decide the present case. That case related to a public tidal river, the river Nairn, at and shortly before its junction with the sea. The to a stell-fishing at the mouth of the river. A sudden spate or flood char course of the river, and it was held that the town was entitled to build a ring the river back to its usual course. The case of Straiton v. Fullarton, mber 1752, M. 12,797, mentioned by your Lordship in the chair in the se of the argument, would seem to imply that, if the river could not be re- d to the course it had deserted, the proprietor of the fishery would be entitled llow his fishery, which equally implies a right to enjoy that fishery as ly, so far as practicable, although that is a sort of case which it is unne- ry to discuss here.

No. 89.

Mar. 14, 1873.
Mather, &c. v. Macbraire, &c.

is of no moment to the authority of the decision in the case of the town of what the nature of a stell-fishing was. It is enough that it was a legal of fishing for salmon, till struck at by the prohibition in the statute 20 and ict., c. 148, sec. 2. It had been immemorially practised in different ways ferent parts of the country, generally by rowing out into the stream as in se of net and coble, but with this important difference, that the further end net was either fastened by an anchor in the river, or held by a man in a till the fish were seen or felt to strike the net, which was then immediately d round them and drawn to the shore. Its deadly character accounts for olition, and I mention its nature for explanation merely.

e case of the Magistrates of Aberdeen v. Menzies of Pitfoddel, 22d November M. 12,787, is in no way inconsistent with the case of the town of Nairn. e ground upon which Menzies was held not entitled to restore the channel stream, so as to recover his fishing, was that, although he might have done ale recenti, he could not do it after having acquiesced in the change for rds of twenty years.

y opinion, upon the whole, is that the defender, Mr Macbraire, was entitled ep the solum of his fishery, or, what comes practically to the same thing, ain flow of the water, in the normal condition in which the same had existed time immemorial before the accidental and unusual floods in question, and as he and his tenants did nothing more than restore the solum and flow of ater to that normal condition they have been rightly assoilzied from the lusions of this action.

e other Judges concurred.

THE COURT adhered to the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary.

, MACKAY, & MANN, W.S.—TODS, MURRAY, & JAMIESON, W.S.—E. WALLACE, W.S.—Agents.

No. 90.

Mar. 14, 1873.
Muir v. Muir.

MRS JANE LIDDELL OR MUIR, Pursuer.—Fraser—Scott.
GEORGE MUIR, Defender.—M'Laren.

rocess—Proof—Commission—Criminating Question.—Where a criminating tion was proposed to be put to a witness to be examined before a foreign missioner, held that the commissioner should be instructed (1) to intimate e witness that he was entitled to decline to answer the question; and (2), in vent of the witness electing to answer the question, to allow all competent tions bearing on the matter to be put with a view to test his credibility.

1ST DIVISION.
Ld. Mackenzie.
B

n an action of divorce raised by Mrs Jane Liddell or Muir against ge Muir, her husband, on the ground of adultery, the pursuer applied e Lord Ordinary for a commission to examine a woman of the name Weir on interrogatories in support of the averments that she had com- d adultery with the defender. The defender moved the Court to rt in the interrogatories an instruction to the commission in New land to warn Weir that she might decline answering the question ether she had been guilty of adultery with the defender. The pursuer osed the motion, on the ground that she was not entitled to this pro- tion, having made the matter public by bringing an action against the nder for the aliment of an illegitimate child.[1]

[1] Statutes 15 and 16 Vict. cap. 27 (Evidence Amendment Act, Scotland, 2), sec. 3; 32 and 33 Vict. cap. 68 (Evidence Further Amendment, Eng-

No. 90.

Mar. 14, 1873.
Muir v. Muir.

The Lord Ordinary reported the point to the First Division.

At advising,—

LORD PRESIDENT.—Among other questions proposed to be put to the witness is this,—whether on a certain occasion she had illicit intercourse with the defender. If that question were put in a trial before the Lord Ordinary or Judge and jury the witness would at once be informed by the Court that she was entitled to decline answering,—the defender having been a married man the time of the alleged intercourse. The witness is to be examined by commission in New Zealand, and we have no security as to who the commissioner may be, or whether he knows the Scotch law. It might not occur to him to inform her that she need not answer unless she chose. But it is necessary that the witness should be so warned; and accordingly the direction of the Court is that the Lord Ordinary, in pronouncing the interlocutor approving of the interrogatories, shall instruct the commissioner that when the fourth interrogatory is put the witness shall be informed that she is entitled to decline answering that or any of the following questions.

On the other hand, it is necessary also to provide for the contingency that the witness may not choose to decline answering the question, but may answer it in the negative. If she shall do so, then it becomes the right of the pursuer to test her credit by all competent questions bearing on the matter of that interrogatory. The commissioner, therefore, ought to be instructed that in that event the questions which follow may be put.

The other Judges concurred.

GEORGE BEGG, S.S.C.—MILLAR, ALLARDICE, & ROBSON, W.S.—Agents.

No. 91.

Mar. 14, 1873.
Stobbs v. Caven.

JAMES STOBBS, Pursuer and Appellant.—Watson—Balfour.
THOMAS CAVEN, Defender and Respondent.—Sol.-Gen. Clark—M'K

Process—Jurisdiction—Sheriff—Servitude—Thirlage—Petitory and Possessory Actions—Title to Sue—Statute 1 and 2 Vict. c. 119, sec. 15.—Held that an action by the tenant of a mill for abstracted multures, involving a question to the extent of the thirl, was competent in the Sheriff-court under the 15th section of the Sheriff-court Act, 1838 (1 and 2 Vict. c. 119), being an action relative to a question touching the constitution of a prædial servitude—Lord D. dissenting, on the ground that the section did not apply, the action not being raised by a person who had a title to try a question relative to the constitution of a heritable right; but holding that it was competent in the Sheriff-court as a possessory action.

Observations (per Lord Deas) on the distinction between petitory and possessory actions.

Question, whether an action of declarator of the constitution of a right of thirlage is competent in the Sheriff-court.

Servitude—Thirlage—Usage.—In the titles of lands which were thirled to a barony mill the thirl was described as of "the whole grindable corn growing on the said lands except teind and seed corn," or "except teind and horse corn." In a decree-arbitral pronounced in 1787, in a submission entered into between the proprietor of the mill and the proprietors of the lands it was found that the lands were astricted for their whole growing corns, seed and horse corn excepted. Held, upon consideration of the terms of the titles, and of the deland, 1869), sec. 3; Nicolson v. Nicolson, 18th February 1771, 3 Pat. App. 655; Marshall v. Anderson, 26th June 1798, M. 16,787, and H. of L. 8th April 1799, 4 Pat. App. 72; Don v. Don, 25th May 1848, 10 D. 1064; Gall v. Gall, 23d Nov. 1870, ante, vol. ix. 177; M'Lean and Hope v. Fleming, 9th March 1867, ante, vol. v. 579; Dysart v. Dysart, 10th May 1843, 3 Curteis Eccl. Rep. p. 543; Swift v. Swift, 1832, 4 Hag. Eccl. Rep. p. 139—see p. 15 Ersk. iv. 4, 53; Hume, i. 454.

No. 91.

Mar. 14, 1873.

Stobbs v. Caven.

1st Division.

Sheriff of Dumfries-shire.

M.

d other evidence of usage, that the ambiguous terms "grindable corn" onstrued by usage to mean omnia grana crescentia.

James Stobbs became tacksman of "the mill of Snaid, and kiln thereto, with the mill lands, multures, knaveship, and sequels." ie lands astricted to the mill, which was a barony one, were the Birkshaw and Moatland, both being parts of the two merk land of which was the property of the defender. As appeared from arters by progress between 1792 and 1854 in favour of the pro- Birkshaw, these lands were held on condition of the proprie- eir tenants "grinding their whole grindable corns growing on the (excepting teind and seed corn) at the mill of Snaid, and paying and other services conform to use and wont." The astriction ds of Moatland was in the same terms, with this difference only, exception was of "teind and horse corn." In 1784, in conse- questions and differences having arisen relative to the astriction nd other lands, a submission was entered into between the pro- id tenant of the mill on the one part, and the proprietors of the lands on the other part, whereby these questions, and a process ted multures, and a declarator of thirlage, were referred to the of Alexander Wight, Esq. By his decreet-arbitral, of date 1787, he found, inter alia, that "the lands of Birkshaw, belong- omas Collow, are astricted and thirled to the miln of Snaid for e growing corns, seed and horse corn excepted," and he decerned ied "the heritors or possessors of the said lands to frequent the with their whole growing victual, to be grinded thereat, seed and excepted, and to pay therefor the multures and services follow- ie lands of Birkshaw in the 25th grain of multure, and that over the 32d grain of the whole corns growing on these lands, of and sequels." This submission contained a consent to regis- r preservation and execution, and in virtue thereof it was re- the Books of Council and Session on 22d June 1787.

Stobbs raised an action against Caven as proprietor of Birk- Moatland, in which he concluded—"Therefore the defender, been in the constant and immemorial use, and is bound and frequent the said mill with his whole growing victual to be hereat, seed and horse corn excepted, and to pay therefor the n of multure, and that over and above the 32d grain of the ns growing on the said lands, of knaveship and sequels, con- ecreet-arbitral, dated the 22d day of June 1787, pronounced by Wight, Esquire, advocate, ... but who notwith- whereof has for these five crops and years bypast most illegally rrantably taken upon him to abstract from the said mill con- quantities of victual which had grown upon the said lands, and ect to payment of multure, knaveship, and sequels as aforesaid, e decerned to make payment to the pursuer of the sum of £25 ore or less, as may be ascertained in the process to follow here- he converted value of the multures, knaveship, and sequels cor- g to the quantities of grain severally abstracted by him from ill during the five years bypast, with the interest of the said e rate of five per centum per annum from the date of citation."

fence was:—Preliminary.—The action is incompetent in the rt, in respect that it involves a question of heritable right. rits.—(1) A denial that the whole growing victual or corns on lands are astricted to the mill of Snaid, or that he has fre- r is bound to frequent the mill with his whole growing victual

No. 91.

Mar. 14, 1873. Stobbs v. Caven.

as libelled, it being only the grindable corns that are so astricted; denial that any victual of the nature libelled has been abstracte That if any grindable wheat or barley has been abstracted it was b said mill is insufficient for grinding these grains.

A proof before answer of their averments having been allowed t parties and taken, the Sheriff-substitute (Hope) on 12th July 187 nounced an interlocutor finding the defender liable in £11 as th verted value of the abstracted multures. He found "that from tir memorial, or at least since the date of the decreet-arbitral, the de and his predecessors in the lands libelled have been in use to fr the mill of Snaid with their whole growing corns, except as afte tioned, and to pay multures, knaveship, and sequels to the tenants mill, either in kind at the rates specified in said decreet-arbitral, commuted money payment." He also repelled the preliminary p the ground that the question of heritable right was res judicat decreet-arbitral founded on by the pursuer, which had been pron in a submission, the contract of which contained a clause of regis and which had been recorded in the Books of Council and Session, the same effect as a decree of the Court of Session.

Caven appealed to the Sheriff (Napier), who on 7th Decembe recalled his Substitute's interlocutor, sustained the defender's preli plea, and dismissed the action.

The pursuer appealed to the First Division of the Court of S Parties were first heard on the question of competency.

Argued for appellant;—Thirlage was a prædial servitude, a Sheriff-court (Scotland) Act, 1838 (1 and 2 Vict. c. 119), sec. 15, that "the jurisdiction, power, and authority of Sheriffs of Scotlan be and the same are hereby extended to all actions or proceeding tive . . . . to questions touching either the constitution exercise of real or prædial servitudes." But independent of the s such actions as this had always been competent in the Sheriff Further, the decree-arbitral having been registered in the Books of cil and Session had the effect of a decree of Court.[1]

Argued for respondent;—(1) Thirlage was not a prædial ser It was more of the nature of a tax. (2) Even if it were a prædial tude the action involved a question as to the constitution of a he right, which the tenant had no title to try.[2]

Lord President.—My Lords, in this case the Sheriff on appeal fr Sheriff-substitute has dismissed the action on the ground that it is incon in the Sheriff-court, in respect it involves a question of heritable right.

The summons concludes for a sum of £25 sterling, and the ground of as disclosed in the conclusions of the summons in the somewhat awkwa in use in the Sheriff-court where there is no record, is, that the whole g corn on the defender's lands being thirled to the pursuer's mill by consti immemorial use in manner there described the defender has for five cro years previous to the date of the summons abstracted considerable quant victual grown on his lands from the pursuer's mill, and has so prevent from obtaining multures to the extent above mentioned. This ground of is further strengthened by reference to a decreet-arbitral pronounced on 22

[1] Milne v. Kyd, June 26, 1787, Hume, 728; Beattie v. Low, June 26 Hume, 729; Thomson v. Murdoch, May 21, 1862, 24 D. 975; Harris ville, May 29, 1863, ante, vol. i. 833.

[2] Earl of Hopetoun v. Brewers of Bathgate, 1753, M. 16,029; Erskin allan's edition), ii. 9, 18; Bankton's Institutes, ii. 7, 14; Ross's Lectures, Bell's Prin. 1016.

No. 91.

Mar. 14, 1873.
Stobbs v. Caven.

1787 by Alexander Wight, Esq., advocate, sole arbiter in a submission between the heritable proprietors of the mill and lands respectively.

The ground of defence is that the growing corn of the defender's lands is not restricted, but merely his grindable corn, and as the defender is willing to pay for his grindable corn he is entitled to absolvitor. It seems to me that the question thus raised is not only whether the defender is owing £25 for abstracted multures, but also what are the terms of the thirl as to growing and grindable corn. That depends on the constitution of this servitude of thirlage. This question the Sheriff has held to be a question of heritable right, and perhaps it is; but it is also a question as to the constitution of a servitude. Section 15 of 1 and 2 Vict. cap. 119 (Sheriff-court Act, 1838), touches upon this question, and it is of importance to observe precisely what the words there used are. The section enacts that "the jurisdiction, power, and authority of Sheriffs of Scotland shall be and the same are hereby extended to all actions or proceedings relative . . . . to questions touching either the constitution or the exercise of real or prædial servitudes." Under that provision a Sheriff is not only entitled to entertain questions regarding the constitution or exercise of real or prædial servitudes, but his jurisdiction is extended to all actions relative to the constitution or exercise of real or prædial servitudes. The only question, then, that arises to my mind is, is this an action or proceeding relative to the constitution or exercise of such a servitude. It has been contended to us that thirlage is not only a prædial servitude. That, if a correct proposition, would settle this question; but in reality there is no difficulty about it. It may be a subject for philosophical jurists to discuss, but that is not what is before us. The point is, how is it dealt with in the law of Scotland, because it is to administer that law that we are here. When we find the three great institutional writers class it as prædial servitude we can fairly conclude that it was the intention of the Legislature, in framing the section of the statute I have read, to include it among them. It was also contended that while the Sheriff's jurisdiction was extended to actions of the above nature, he was not entitled to entertain declaratory actions. I do not think it necessary to decide whether that is the case or not. I am clearly of opinion, however, that the true application of the statute is that this action is competent.

It was suggested also that the tacksman of the mill was not entitled to try this question. That might have been a serious objection had he raised a declarator in this Court, or a declaratory action in the Sheriff-court. But he has not done so. The action is a petitory one for abstracted multures. Unquestionably the general question as to growing or grindable corn is raised too, but that is unavoidable. I think the action is competent as an action for recovery of £25 of abstracted multures, and that we must proceed with it.

LORD DEAS.—I cannot help thinking that there has been some misapprehension about the nature of this case. If this had been an action to try a question of the constitution of this right of servitude either in whole or in part, at the instance of a party competent to raise such an action, it would certainly have been necessary to consider whether the 15th section of the Act of 1838 did or did not apply. But as I do not consider this an action of that kind I shall not enter into that question. All I shall say on that subject is, that there is nothing, in my opinion, in the case of Harris v. Magistrates of Dundee, 29th May 1863, that would prevent me from deciding it either way. The question considered in that case was, whether the right claimed by the town of Dundee was a right maintainable in point of law at all. The right claimed there was a right to make exactions upon all grain whatever brought within the bounds of the burgh, no matter where it came from. If it had been necessary there to make out a right of servitude proper it would have been very difficult to maintain that such a right could exist without there being a servient as well as a dominant tenement, whereas there was there a servient tenement. My observation was to the effect that although the right was anomalous—a sort of mixed right—it fell more within the category of rights to petty customs than of proper rights of servitude, but that it might, notwithstanding, be a perfectly good right in law. And, indeed, to hold it not to be so would strike deep against many such rights to dues and custom are very various in their nature. But the right claimed in the presen undoubtedly a proper right of servitude. There is a dominant and a tenement, and the question is whether the thirlage applies to all growi the produce of that servient tenement, or to all the grindable corn o the case of Harris we indicated opinions to the effect that questions as to stitution of rights of servitude might be competent before the Sheriff u Act of 1838. But that question is not, I think, before us in this case cannot decide it here any more than we did there. I will explain why

No. 91.

Mar. 14, 1873. Stobbs v. Haven.

The pursuer is tenant of the mill upon a nineteen years' lease, and he has a right during that period to all the multures. There is a g which is superfluous in the summons, but in substance it is a summo concludes for £25, being the multures payable to this tenant for the fi libelled. Now, I am clearly of opinion that in such an action as that question comes to be, whether the pursuer is or is not entitled to a p judgment. It has been suggested that this is not a possessory but a petitor But there is scarcely any possessory action which is not petitory in th An action is not the less a possessory action for containing petitory con What is meant by a possessory action is an action in which you look to of possession, or, in other words, to the practice for the last seven years lating the judgment. If this tenant of the thirlage was in the exercis right, and could shew that the practice had been for seven years to up tures of the kind now claimed from the servient tenement, that was all bound to prove, and all that the Sheriff was called upon to try. No dou might be a question as to the date from which the seven years backward be counted. That is a question of circumstances. The period is not ne counted from the date of the action. It may be from the date of the But the nature of a possessory action is a matter so familiar that I could supposed it necessary to quote authority on the subject. We need not, go further than Mr Erskine. He says,—"Petitory actions are so ca because something is sought to be awarded by the Judge (for in that actions must be petitory), but because some demand is made upon the in consequence either of a right of property or credit in the pursuer. Possessory actions are those in which the point of right is not directly c but barely that of possession."—(Institutes, iv. 1, 47.) Then he disti possessory from declaratory actions thus,—"A declaratory action is that some right either of property or servitude, or some other inferior right, to be declared in favour of the pursuer, but where nothing is deman paid or performed by the defender."—(Inst. iv. 1, 46.)

Of course petitory conclusions may be and often are combined wit tory conclusions. But declaratory conclusions for the constitution of a right (which is the character of thirlage) can only be insisted in by t who has in him the heritable title to the right which is sought to be c and declared. If the landlord had brought an action of this kind in th court, the question would then have arisen whether it was authorise clause of the statute of 1838. Very probably it would have been h so. But the tenant of the thirlage has no title to try the question of right, which can only be settled and declared in an action between the prietors. The practice of payment during the possessory period ma cient to entitle the tenant to continue the same exactions in the me that practice is held to be proved. But the statute neither prevents from bringing a possessory action which he could bring before, nor does upon him a title which he had not before to raise an action for the co of the heritable or feudal right vested in his landlord. It is not the fo action which prevents it from coming within the statute. There m special words necessary for that purpose. But what excludes any questi kind here is that the statute applies only to actions brought by parties title to bring them. I cannot imagine that because the statute makes to the constitution of certain servitudes competent before the Sheriff a right to bring such actions upon parties having no title to try them

No. 91.

Mar. 14, 1873.
Stobbs v. Caven.

At the same time I do not think this action incompetent, or that it must necessarily fail. On the contrary, it is likely to be easier for the pursuer to make out his case upon the possession for seven years than to establish the constitution of the permanent right. He has simply to prove that during the possessory period the multures in dispute have been uplifted by himself or his predecessors upon a title on which possession might proceed. That does not involve possible objections to the validity of the title; but the competency of the Sheriff looking at the title for certain purposes is, nevertheless, undoubted. In the case of Johnstone v. Lady Murray, 5th March 1862, 24 D. 709, from the same county, as to the loch called Lochmaben, an objection of that kind was taken, and we affirmed the familiar doctrine that in the Sheriff-court it is always competent for the Sheriff to examine the title as a title to support possession, though not for the purpose of deciding the question of right. The proof of possession is not in any case necessarily limited to the last seven years. It may go back for many years for the purpose of shewing the character of the possession during the seven years, but for that purpose only. The statute of 1838 was not required to make this competent. What that statute did was to extend the Sheriff's jurisdiction in certain cases to a competition of heritable rights, but there can here be no such competition between the tenant of the mill and the abstracter of the multures, for the simple reason that they are not the proper opponents in such a competition. If the present case admitted of anything more than a possessory judgment that judgment would necessarily be a judgment on the matter of right. But would the proprietor of the mill be barred from bringing an action to declare his right by any judgment to be pronounced in this action to which he is no party? It is surely impossible to suppose such a result. I am therefore clearly of opinion that the statute does not apply to the present case, but at the same time that there is no incompetency in the action in the Sheriff-court, and consequently that we must either send the case back to the Sheriff to consider the case on its merits or proceed ourselves to do so.

LORD ARDMILLAN.—The question here raised is one of some nicety. It is important to observe (1) that this is not an action of declarator, and (2) that it could not be an action of declarator. The Sheriff has not jurisdiction to entertain a proper action of declarator, and the tenant has not the title or proper instance to raise the question in a declarator. What we have before us is a petitory action for £25, and although the summons contains a number of statements in accordance with the practice in the Sheriff-court, where the condescendence is really embodied in the conclusions of the summons, and is not, as in this Court, kept quite separate, still this is not a declarator. The defence is that the pursuer has no such right as he claims. It is the defence which raises the question. The right of thirlage is admitted, but to the extent claimed it is disputed. Certainly the question raised by that defence is one relating to the constitution or exercise of a servitude, but only in so far as involved in the petitory conclusion. I have nothing to add on the curious question whether thirlage is a proper servitude or not. I am disposed to think that it is a prædial servitude. However that may be, no one can doubt that, in this action, where there is a dominant tenement and a servient tenement, and an acknowledged right of thirlage, it must here be held to be, at least to a certain extent, a prædial servitude, and if so the statute applies. I do not think that the statute gives the Sheriff power to dispose of a declaratory question. But under the wording of section 15, the Sheriff has certainly the power to settle questions of a nature like this—not indeed to the extent of deciding a proper action of declarator, but to the extent of deciding the cause before him. He is not to be stopped in trying a question relating to a claim for £25 because it may be that a question of heritable right is connected with that claim, or lies at the root of it.

In my opinion this is a petitory and not a possessory action—not an action to maintain or to regulate possession. It is an action for £25, and a petitory action. The effect of the section of the statute is to give the Sheriff power to deal with a declaratory question so as to dispose of this action.

LORD JERVISWOODE concurred with the Lord President and Lord Ardmillan.

No. 91.

Mar. 14, 1873.
Stobbs v. Caven.

The Court recalled the Sheriff's interlocutor of 7th December 1 repelled the preliminary plea, and sustained the jurisdiction of the She
On the merits.

Argued for defender;—The title only applies to grindable corn, tha corn which the tenant requires to grind. Where the terms were ambig they were to be construed in favour of freedom.

Argued for pursuer;—Unless the thirl was of all growing corn the ception of seed and horse corn was meaningless. The terms of the dec arbitral, regarding it in no higher light than a piece of evidence, w conclusive in favour of the pursuer's construction. If the terms w ambiguous these could be interpreted by usage, and the usage had b all in favour of the same construction.

LORD PRESIDENT.—This mill of Snaid was a barony mill. At what tim came into existence, or when the thirl was created, we have no evidence. I only know that the pursuer is tenant of the mill, to which the lands of the fender are thirled to some effect. Nor do we know in what terms the la were astricted in the constitution of the original right. We have only t evidence of certain charters by progress, which describe the astriction in s stantially the same terms, and we must assume that in the titles of the servi tenement the thirl has been described throughout in these or similar terms. T astriction is in these terms:—"The feuar and his tenants grinding their wh grindable corns growing on the said lands, except teind and seed corn, at t mill of Snaid, and paying multures and other sequels conform to use and wo
The only variation in any charter is that in the exception the words are so times "seed and horse corn;" but the exception occurs in each charter produ
This astriction may mean that the thirl extends to grana crescentia, or that extends only to such portions of the crop as the cultivator requires or choose grind. The term "grindable corn" is an equivocal and flexible term, susceptib of interpretation from the context or from usage. The terms of the excepti favour the more extensive view of this expression; for if the grindable co meant only such corn as is actually sent to be ground, the exception of teind a seed and horse corn would be useless and unmeaning, for that portion of t crop never is sent to the mill to be ground. That is a point in favour of t miller on the construction of the titles of the servient tenement. His o titles, so far as the leases are concerned, do not throw much light on the matt for the mill is conveyed in very general terms; but in tracing the history of t thirl we come upon one remarkable piece of evidence, for it is chiefly as a pie of evidence that it is valuable,—the decreet-arbitral of 1787. There was then dispute between the owner of the mill and the proprietors and tenants of app rently the whole astricted lands. It is not possible to read the decreet-arbit and the submission, making special reference to an action of abstracted multu and also a declarator of right, without seeing that the question which was decid was just the question raised now. The arbiter determined that in a very cle and distinct manner, finding that the astriction extended to the whole corn grow on the lands. It is plain as a matter of inference that at this time the existi usage was to pay on the whole grana crescentia, for we cannot suppose a lawy of the eminence of Mr Wight would have pronounced a decreet which wou have been quite indefensible if the usage had not been so. Further, it appe that the tenants and possessors of the thirled lands had settled the whole clai of the miller from 1785, when the dispute arose, down to the date of the decre and of course these could only be paid on the principle of Mr Wight's awa Here, then, is usage of a most distinct and precise kind as regards the pari when the decreet was pronounced, and some years preceding. Some proceedin followed in the Bailie Court, in which the decreet-arbitral received effect, compel the tenants to maintain the roof of the mill,—one of the ordinary burde of the thirl,—not to force them to pay abstracted multures. From this ari the inference that as regards the multures the tenants had, at least for the tim no repugnance to pay them. All this is strong foundation for usage. There

No. 91.

Mar. 14, 1873.
Stobbs v. Caven.

:t evidence of usage until a much later period. In 1828 and onwards lence is on the whole satisfactory that the multures continued to be paid rana crescentia. In the earlier period, as regards the lands of Moatland, distinct evidence from the witness Johnston that the possessor took all n to the mill except seed and horse corn; that he never sold, and did not : himself entitled to sell, any grain. Then we have, as to both properties, dvin and others, evidence which brings usage down to 1856, and we have :t account of what the usage was. The way of regulating the thirl was ı estimate was made of the yield of the lands, one-third was taken off for l horse corn, one twenty-fifth from the remainder for multures, and one :ond taken off in kind for knaveship and sequels. On this footing nents were made for money payments, and among other lands for which arrangement was made were these lands of Birkshaw and Moatland. The d when the defender became proprietor of both lands was £4, and it is evidence that this sum was fixed on the footing of the decree-arbitral. The r never seems to have refused making the money payments in terms of this nent. No doubt in 1856 a dispute arose. The pursuer, however, has suffi- roved usage up to the time of the dispute, and that usage is in his favour.

Deas.—This is an action at the instance of the tenant of the mill of in the county of Dumfries. The mill is let to him under a lease for ı years, with a right to all the multures and other pertinents of the mill. ant brings this action for £25 of abstracted multures, and that is quite a nt action for him to raise before the Sheriff, independently altogether of ute of 1838, which has nothing to do with this case. The Sheriff has tion, at common law, in all possessory actions, whether they relate to ng to be done or suffered, or to some periodical or even incidental pay- r exactions, of which last the numerous cases in the books as to petty , toll and ferry dues, &c., are familiar examples. I continue, however, pinion I formerly expressed in the case, that the tenant could not com- ' have brought an action to establish the constitution of the heritable When his lease comes to an end any interest he has will be at an end but to enable him to pursue for the £25 of abstracted multures it was for him to produce a prima facie title, and to offer to prove a practice of t during the possessory period. I greatly doubt whether he was bound any other title besides the tack under which he holds, and thereupon to ossession for the seven years previous to the commencement of this dis- 1866, taking into view the previous practice as illustrating the character possession. If anything further were required by way of title there is reet-arbitral to which your Lordship has referred.

only doubtful thing in the case seems to me to be the matter of fact, : the compoundings for the servitude were on the footing of the smaller he greater kind of thirlage. Upon that point, however, I come to a con- favourable to the pursuer.

easy to account for extraneous matter having been introduced into this · the fact that the landlord, though not actually a party to the action, is ly desirous to take advantage of it so as to have the right constituted. necessary to say that no judgment in this action can be res judicata to ect. But as between the present parties I think the pursuer is entitled e for the amount proposed by your Lordship.

Ardmillan.—The pursuer is tenant of the mill, and if it had not been nature of the defence stated there would have been no difficulty in this case. The legal question, which is not very clear, is raised by the r; his plea is that he does not dispute the existence of the right of thirlage it maintains that the right is restricted to grindable corn only,—that is, actually taken to some mill to be ground. The pursuer's contention, on er hand, is that his right extends to all grana crescentia except seed and orn. This question may be, and ought to be, decided in this action to ot concluded for.

I very strongly that the claim of this pursuer to the extent urged is one

No. 91.

Mar. 14, 1873. Stobbs v. Caven.

for which the law has no favour. The thirlage of invecta et illata is what called odious to the law. The thirlage of omnia grana crescentia is not quite unfavourably viewed. But there is a presumption against it. The law will willingly, nor without strong proof, sustain a thirl of all growing grain. T milder thirl of grindable corn stands in much higher favour, and will in d be presumed. I admit fully that the pursuer must meet an adverse presu tion, but, under the decreet-arbitral, he has a strong foundation for his claim.

That decree shews the usage at its date, and a usage to which the emin lawyer who pronounced that decreet would never have given effect had it been sufficiently proved as an existing usage. Next in the titles which we h had to consider, titles by progress, but not to be lost sight of, there is the exc tion of seed corn and horse corn, which would seem to imply that what th were excepted from was not grindable corn, but all growing corn. The excepti is scarcely intelligible on any other view. Erskine and Hume both say that t word "grindable" is capable of construction, and to be construed accordi to the usage. That being the case, and looking to the proof of usage here connection with the views of the case which I have stated, particularly t existence of the decreet-arbitral and the construction I put upon the titles of t defender, I am of opinion that the pursuer has discharged himself of a very he burden successfully, and that we should find in his favour.

LORD JERVISWOODE concurred.

THE following interlocutor was pronounced:—"Recall the interlocu of the Sheriff-substitute of 12th July 1872: Find that the purs (appellant) is tenant of the mill of Snaid under a tack for nine years from Whitsunday 1866: Find that the defender's (respo dent's) lands are thirled to the said mill: Find that for a per past the memory of man the defender has paid multures to t tenant of the said mill upon all grains grown on the ground of t said lands, excepting seed and horse corn, at the rate of o twenty-fifth grain of multure, besides one thirty-second grain knaveship, or has paid a sum of money annually as a commutati for the said rates on all grain grown on the said lands: Find t the defender has refused to pay any multures for the years 18 1867, 1868, 1869, and 1870: Find that the quantities of grain which multures at the above rates are payable are—for the y 1866, 135 bushels of oats; for the year 1867, 70 bushels of bar and 160 bushels of oats; for the year 1868, 9 bushels of bar and 219 bushels of oats; for the year 1869, 10 bushels of bar and 16 bushels of oats; and for the year 1870, 328 bushels oats: Find that the value in money of the one twenty-fifth o one twenty-third of said quantities of barley and oats, accordi to the fiars' prices of the respective years mentioned, would ha been—for crop 1866, £1, 10s. 5¼d.; for crop 1867, £3, 2s. 10½ for crop 1868, £2, 15s. 6¾d.; for crop 1869, 6s. 0½d.; and for cr 1870, £3, 5s. 2¾d., amounting in all to the sum of £11, 0s. 2 sterling: Therefore repel the defences, and decern against the d fender for payment to the pursuer of the said sum of £11, 0s. 2 sterling, with interest as libelled: Find the defender liable i expenses both in this Court and in the inferior Court; allow," &c

TAWSE & BONAR, W.S.—SCOTT, BRUCE, & GLOVER, W.S.—Agents.

No. 92.

Mar. 18, 1873. O'Neil v. Rankin & Sons.

THOMAS O'NEIL, Pursuer.—J. C. Smith—M'Kechnie.

WILLIAM RANKIN & SONS, Defenders.—Sol.-Gen. Clark—Maclean.

Ship—Liability of Owners for Master—Merchant Shipping Act, 1854 (1 and 18 Vict. c. 104, sec. 246).—Section 246 of the Merchant Shipping Ac 1854, confers on "the master, or any mate, or the owner, ship's husba

No. 92.

Mar. 18, 1873.
O'Neil v. Rankin & Sons.

signee" of a vessel power to apprehend a seaman who deserts; and pro- that, if the apprehension is made on improper or insufficient grounds, the who makes the same, or causes it to be made, should incur a penalty, if inflicted, should "be a bar to any action for false imprisonment in of such apprehension." Held that the powers conferred by this section masters, &c., were conferred upon them in their individual capacity, and acting for the owners, and consequently that the owners were not re- ible for any misuse of these powers.

1ST DIVISION.
Lord Mure.
M.

is was an action of damages by Thomas O'Neil, against William in and Sons, owners of the ship "Earl Grey."

omas O'Neil was engaged to act as cook and steward for a voyage Kirkcudbright to Lisbon on board the brig "Earl Grey," of which rs Rankin and Sons were the owners, and Edward Nankivell was the er. While the vessel was lying at Kirkcudbright, the pursuer, on 23d mber 1871, left the vessel, taking with him his body clothes and personal effects. Nankivell, acting in virtue of the powers con- d by the 246th section of the Merchant Shipping Act, 1854,* imme- ly caused him to be apprehended. Nankivell then presented a ion to the Steward to have the penalties specified in the 243d section e Act inflicted on O'Neil, on which petition a warrant was granted is apprehension. Before the trial came on the ship had sailed, and equently the master did not appear, and no further proceedings were n. Nankivell had, it was further alleged, also taken possession of pursuer's clothes, conveyed them on board his vessel, and sailed with The pursuer alleged that the whole of these actings and proceed- of Nankivell, as master, and as acting on behalf of the owners, Rankin Sons, were illegal, unwarrantable, nimious, and oppressive. He dingly raised this action of damages, which were laid at £200, against kin and Sons, the owners, and Nankivell, the master. The summons however, not executed against the latter.

e pursuer pleaded against Rankin and Sons;—(1) The defenders, the William Rankin and Sons, as managing registered owners of the l Grey," were bound by the suits and contracts pursued and under- n by the said other defender, the said Edward Nankivell, the master, in his province; and in respect that the proceedings complained of

---

"Whenever, either at the commencement or during the progress of any ge, any seaman or apprentice neglects or refuses to join, or deserts from or es to proceed to sea in any ship in which he is duly engaged to serve, or is d otherwise absenting himself therefrom without leave, the master, or any , or the owner, ship's-husband, or consignee, may, in any place in her sty's dominions, with or without the assistance of the local police officers or tables, who are hereby directed to give the same if required, as also at any e out of her Majesty's dominions if and so far as the laws in force at such a e will permit, apprehend him without first procuring a warrant; and may upon, in any case, and shall, in case he so requires and it is practicable, ey him before some Court capable of taking cognisance of the matter, to be t with according to law; and may, for the purpose of conveying him before Court, detain him in custody for a period not exceeding twenty-four hours, uch shorter time as may be necessary, or may, if he does not so require, or ere is no such Court at or near the place, at once convey him on board; and ny such apprehension appears to the Court before which the case is brought ave been made on improper or insufficient grounds, the master, mate, owner, 's-husband, or consignee, who makes the same or causes the same to be e, shall incur a penalty not exceeding twenty pounds; but such penalty, if cted, shall be a bar to any action for false imprisonment in respect of such rehension."

No. 92.

Mar. 18, 1873. O'Neil v. Rankin & Sons.

were undertaken by the master in matters within the sphere of his d the said defenders are liable to the pursuer therefor in reparation as c cluded for. (3) The proceedings complained of being illegal, unwarra able, nimious, and oppressive, malicious, and without probable cause, pursuer was entitled to damages against the defenders severally, as c descended on, with expenses.

The defenders, Rankin and Sons, pleaded;—(1) The pursuer has set forth facts relevant or sufficient to warrant the conclusions of action against the present defenders, and the same should be dismi with expenses. (2) All parties not called, in respect the summons not been executed against the captain of the ship. (3) Assuming the proceedings taken by the master of the ship were as stated by pursuer, the present defenders are not answerable for the same, and should be assoilzied, with expenses.

The Lord Ordinary, on 23d December 1872, pronounced this in locutor:—"Sustains the first plea in law for the defenders, William Ran and Sons, dismisses the action, and decerns: Finds them entitled expenses, of which appoints an account to be given in, and remits same, when lodged, to the Auditor to tax and report." *

---

* "NOTE.—In this action the pursuer seeks to recover damages from the fenders, as owners of a vessel in which the pursuer was engaged as cook, respect of certain alleged illegal proceedings of the master of that vessel, wh also called as a defender, but against whom the summons has not been exec The damages are laid on two grounds—1st, certain irregularities in proceed taken at the instance of the master for apprehending the pursuer as a des from the vessel when at Kirkcudbright in November 1871; and 2d, for master having illegally carried away the pursuer's clothes, bedding, bed-cl &c., from the railway station at Kirkcudbright, and taken them on board vessel on the day it sailed. It is not, however, said that any of the things plained of were done by the master by orders from the defenders, or with authority, or after communication had with them on the subject; and, in absence of any such allegations, it appears to the Lord Ordinary that the ments are not relevant to found a claim of damage against the present defen

"As regards the removal of the clothes and bedding, the charge appe amount almost to one of theft on the part of the master. It was at all event a proceeding within his ordinary duties as ship-master, but one apparently of an irregular and illegal description as—having regard to the opinion of the C in the case of Macdonald, 16th May 1860, 22 D. 1075—cannot, it is thought made the foundation of a claim of damages against owners unless directly au rised by them. The claim made in respect of the alleged illegal apprehen is attended with more difficulty, as it has the appearance of having been a p ceeding adopted for the benefit of the vessel and its owners. It is one, how which would not, it is thought, at common law, have been competent to master in the discharge of his ordinary duty, or as falling within his ordi powers delegated to him by the owners. For it relates to the exercise of a po specially conferred upon him, as well as upon all 'owners, ship-husbands, or e signees,' by section 246 of the Merchant Shipping Act, on which the applicat against the pursuer was founded. It is made competent by that section for an or any of these parties to adopt such proceedings on their individual respon bility; and the statute bears expressly that, when the proceedings appear to t Court before which the case is brought to have been improperly taken, it is t party making the application who is to be responsible for the penalty incurr Now, the petition in the present instance bears to have been presented und the statute in the name of the master alone; and, in the absence of any allega tion of direct authority, or any instructions from the defenders, it appears to t Lord Ordinary that in such circumstances it is against the master, and not t owners, that the party complaining ought to proceed in order to obtain redres

No. 92.

Mar. 18, 1873. O'Neil v. Rankin & Sons.

he pursuer reclaimed.

rgued for him;—(1) The proceedings were illegal, in respect that the ner had been detained without a warrant for more than twenty-four s after his apprehension;[1] that the concurrence of the fiscal was not n to the petition in terms of section 531;[2] that, contrary to section , the clothes had been taken possession of without a conviction, and ugh not on board the vessel. (2) The owners were liable for acts e master within the scope of his authority, even when the authority derived from statute.[3]

rgued for Rankin and Sons;—(1) As regards the master's taking pos- n of the clothes and carrying them on board ship, that was not an for which the owners could be responsible, not being within the ary scope of his duties.[4] (2) The master and the seamen were col- rateurs.[5]

RD PRESIDENT.—The principle of the doctrine of collaborateur is, that the n on entering the service takes the risk of the acts of his fellow-workmen. that apply here; does the person take the risk of illegal apprehension?

The authority of the master was derived not from the owners, but the statute. He had an independent power, and, when using it, he d in the interest of and as representing not the owners alone, but the ers of the cargo, the crew, and all concerned.

t advising,—

ORD PRESIDENT.—This is an action at the instance of the cook or steward on d the brig "Earl Grey" of Liverpool, against the owners of that vessel, to er damages for certain proceedings taken against him by the master of the el at Kirkcudbright, when the ship was about to sail for Portugal. The er is called and concluded against in the summons, but it was not executed inst him. We have, therefore, only the owners to deal with. The proceedings plained of were taken under sec. 246 of the Merchant Shipping Act, and the nce, which the Lord Ordinary has sustained, is that the pursuer has not set h on record facts relevant and sufficient to warrant the conclusions of the on. The defenders further plead that they are not answerable for what was e by the master, even though it were illegal, under the 246th section of the t. This raises a question of great importance, but it is very special, because provisions contained in this section are very different from those contained he former Acts regulating the relations of masters and seamen. The title is given to a large number of persons to adopt proceedings. The section runs llows:—(His Lordship here read the section above quoted.)

he proceedings complained of were at the instance of the master, on the ged ground that the pursuer had deserted from the ship; and it is averred the pursuer that the procedure was illegal and irregular. Whether that be or not it must be assumed to be true at present. The question is, whether owners are answerable for the master's behaviour in such circumstances. If y are answerable for the master, are they to be answerable for any of the er persons mentioned in the section—mates, ship's-husbands, consignees of go? It seems quite impossible to maintain under this section that they can liable for a ship's-husband or consignee. There is no such liability at com-

[1] Merchant Shipping Act, 1854, sec. 246.
[2] M'Kelvie v. Barr, Dec. 3, 1860, 3 Irv. 631.
[3] Gowans v. Thomson, Feb. 6, 1844, 6 D. 606; M'Naughtan v. Allhusen and , Dec. 11, 1847, 6 D. 104, and 10 D. 236; "The Druid," April 25, 1842, Wm. Robertson's Reports, 391; Fraser v. Younger and Sons, June 13, 1867, s, vol. v. 861; Parsons on Shipping, ii. 26.
[4] Paterson v. Walker, Nov. 29, 1848, 11 D. 167; Macdonald v. Chisholm, y 16, 1860, 22 D. 1075.
[5] Leddy v. Gibson, Jan. 18, 1873, ante, p. 304.

No. 92.

Mar. 18, 1873. O'Neil v. Rankin & Sons.

mon law. It would be something new if they were held to be liable for a mate —that is, whether first or other mate. There is no common law liability of this sort. It seems that all the persons here enumerated are in pari casu. I think it is impossible that the owners can be responsible for the master and not for the others named in the section. I am the more confirmed in this opinion by the wording of the close of the section,—"And if any such apprehension appear to the Court before which the case is brought to have been made on improper or on insufficient grounds, the master, mate, owner, ship's-husband, or consignee who makes the same, or causes the same to be made, shall incur a penalty not exceeding £20." In the first place, I am led to inquire whether anybody but the person who commits the illegality is to be answerable, and in reply to that I at once say he alone must be liable. No one ever heard of the master of a ship binding the owners in a penalty unless it is expressly so stated in the statute inflicting the penalty. Next we have this provision :—"But such penalty if inflicted, shall be a bar to any action for false imprisonment in respect of such apprehension." Shall this mean that the inflicting of the penalty is to be a bar to action against the master, but not against other people who are responsible for him? It seems to me the clause means that no action for false imprisonment shall lie in respect of actings for which a penalty has been inflicted; and that goes a long way to shew that every person mentioned in the section is liable for himself and for his own actings. That is clearly what was meant by the Legislature in providing that no action for false imprisonment shall lie against any of the enumerated persons. It never was contemplated that any person was to be liable except the wrongdoer. I therefore come to the conclusion that under this statute no liability lies against any one except against the person who has done the wrong.

Several cases were quoted to us during the discussion, and of these I shall notice the two most important. The first is M'Naughtan v. Allhusen and Co., of which there are two separate reports—the first under name M'Naughtan v. Halbert in 6 D. 194, and the second in 10 D. 236. The first contains the report of the proceedings brought by a seaman, M'Naughtan, against the master of a vessel, for the purpose of having a sentence and warrant obtained by the master under the 9th section of 5 and 6 Will. IV. cap 19 (the then Merchant Shipping Act) suspended. That section provided,—"That every seaman who shall absolutely desert the ship to which he shall belong shall forfeit to the owner or master thereof all his clothes and effects which he may have on board and all wages and emoluments to which he might otherwise be entitled . . . and in case any such desertion shall take place in parts beyond the seas and the master of the ship shall be under the necessity of enaging any seaman as a substitute for the deserter at a higher rate of wages than that stipulated in the agreement to be paid to the seaman deserting, the owner or master of the ship shall be entitled to recover from the deserter by summary proceeding, in the same manner as wages are by this Act made recoverable, any excess of wages which such owner or master shall pay to such substitute beyond the amount which shall be payable to the deserter." Here I would observe that the owners and master are in exactly the same category; proceedings may be taken by either. But the object of the process is to obtain possession of the clothes to meet any loss the ship might have suffered by the desertion of the seaman. It is quite obvious that in such circumstances the proceedings are taken for the owners, whether in the name of the master or of themselves; and in that case no doubt the master, in proceeding against the seaman as a deserter, was acting for the owners, and all that was held was that the owners were liable for the expenses awarded to the seaman as against the master. The question which subsequently arose was as to whether the seaman was entitled to recover against the owners expenses incurred by him in a suspension in this Court, but the distinction was drawn there that though the master had a mandate to proceed in the inferior Court he was not entitled on his own responsibility to litigate in the Court of Session.

The other case quoted (Gowans v. Thomson), also in 6 D. 606, approaches somewhat nearer to this one, although there is still a difference. It was under

No. 92.

Mar. 18, 1873.
O'Neil v. Rankin & Sons.

t statute from the present one. By that statute it is put in the power ster, in the management of his ship in a foreign port, to leave behind who has absolutely deserted, but the policy of the statute clearly ap- be that no such step was to be taken except on very clear evidence of , because people so left behind generally became pirates. So the mas-) obtain a certificate from some person setting forth that desertion had :en place. But the duty was laid on the master, and the master alone, s certificate before setting sail and leaving one of his crew behind him. ns' case the master sailed without a certificate of desertion, and did so clothes and whole personal property of the seaman on board his vessel. n was raised in this country against the owners to recover the clothes erty, as having come wrongfully into their possession. The Court held master was wrong, and that he was acting for the owners, as what he was in the ordinary management of the vessel, and also because what was for the benefit of the owners, because he detained the clothes as a r the desertion of the seamen. There the owners were not only repre- y the master, but had taken benefit from his actings. I think we must the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor.

DEAS and LORD JERVISWOODE concurred.

ARDMILLAN absent.

THE COURT adhered to the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor.

RUMMOND & MACKENZIE, S.S.C.—J. W. & J. MACKENZIE, W.S.—Agents.

No. 93.

Mar. 18, 1873.
Cuninghame's Trustees v. Duke et al.

IES MERRY and OTHERS (Alexander Cuninghame's Trustees), First Parties.—Sol.-Gen. Clark—W. J. Mure.
R DUKE and OTHERS, Second Parties.—Marshall—Macdonald.

ion—Annuity—Statute 33 and 34 Vict. c. 35 (Apportionment Act, 1870). itor left an annuity of £200 to his sister "during all the days and her life," payable in equal portions at Whitsunday and Martinmas, ncing the first year's payment" at the first term after his death. He 9th November 1866. She survived till 27th October 1871, having five years' payments of the annuity during the four years and eleven of her survivance. Her representatives maintained that the testator's to make a year's payment at the first term after his death was intended the half year current at the date of his death, and that the annuitant only received four and a half years' payment of the annuity, and was o a proportion for the half year current at the date of her death. Held testator's intention was that the sister should receive payment for the ring which she should survive him at the rate of £200 per annum, she had received full payment.

ion—Trust—Legacy—Discretion of Trustees.—A testator left legacies f his nieces, to be paid "when my trustees shall find it suitable and nt to pay the same, and which shall be so secured to said children as es may consider best for their welfare and benefit . . . . which . . . . . are hereby specially provided and given for the liferent alimen- of my . . . . legatees, exclusive of the jus mariti of their husbands;" ther declaring that the simple receipt and discharge of my said legatees, the consent or concurrence of their respective husbands, shall be a exoneration, acquittance, and discharge to my trustees for said . . . .

Held that although the trust-estate was in a condition conveniently e legacies the trustees were not bound to make immediate payment to nters of the sums bequeathed.

1ST DIVISION B.

ate Alexander Cuninghame, Esquire, of Craigends, left a trust- on and settlement, dated 14th August 1856, whereby he appointed lerry, Esquire, and others, trustees. By the third purpose of the position he provided—"That my trustees shall, from the said

No. 93.

Mar. 18, 1873. Cuninghame's Trustees v. Duke et al.

residue of my estates, make payment of the following annuities and legacies—viz., to my sister Mrs Margaret Cuninghame or Duke, wife of Ro Duke, Esquire, of an annuity of £200 sterling yearly during all the d and years of her life, and after her death each of her children shall paid a legacy of £1000 sterling when my trustees find it suitable and c venient to pay the same, and which shall be so secured to said child as my trustees may consider best for their welfare and benefit; and my sister Mrs Williamina Cuninghame or Main, wife of the Rever Thomas Main, a like annuity of £200 sterling yearly,—payable, both nuities, half-yearly, by equal portions, at the usual terms of Martin and Whitsunday in each year, commencing the first year's payment each of said annuities at the first term of Martinmas or Whitsunday af my death, and continuing the same half-yearly thereafter; and wh annuities to my said sisters, and legacies to the children, where female, my said brothers and sisters, are hereby specially provided and given the liferent alimentary use allenarly of my said annuitants and fem legatees, exclusive of the jus mariti and right of administration of th present or future husbands; and the said annuities and legacies shall no ways be liable to or affectable by the debts or deeds of such husban or in any way subject or liable to the diligence of their creditors; a further declaring that the simple receipt and discharge of my said sist and female legatees respectively, without the consent or concurrence their respective husbands, shall be a sufficient exoneration, acquittan and discharge to my trustees for said annuities and legacies." Mr C inghame died on the 9th day of November 1866. On the 11th of same month, two days after the truster's death, being the term of Mart mas, there was paid to Mrs Duke a sum of £200, being a full ye annuity. Nothing was paid to her at Whitsunday 1867, but she receiv a half year's annuity at Martinmas 1867, and the half-yearly payme were continued down to Whitsunday 1871, being the term immediat preceding her death on the 27th October 1871. She left five children.

A special case was presented by Mr Cuninghame's trustees, and children of Mrs Duke as her representatives and legatees. At the ti of bringing the special case the daughters were of age and unmarri and the trustees were in a position conveniently to pay the legacies.

The parties of the second part contended (1) that the first payme of one year's annuity directed by the testator to be made at the first te after his death was intended to cover the half year current at the date his death, and that Mrs Duke had not received the half year's annu for the half year current at her death, and was entitled to a proporti thereof; that Mrs Duke having died during the currency of the te from Whitsunday to Martinmas 1871 her representatives were entitl to a proportionate part of the annuity which would have been paya to her at the term of Martinmas had she survived till that term; and (2 that the female legatees were each entitled to payment of the legacy £1000 at once, on their own receipt and discharge, and that the trustee were bound to make immediate payment thereof.

The parties of the first part contended (1) that the annuity which wa payable and paid to Mrs Duke at Whitsunday 1871 was paid in advan for the term from Whitsunday to Martinmas 1871, and that her repr sentatives were not entitled to claim any farther sum in name of annuit for the period from Whitsunday 1871 till the date of Mrs Duke's death and (2) that the trustees were not entitled to pay the legacies of £100 each to the female legatees, but were bound to hold the same for the liferent alimentary use allenarly; or, otherwise, that it was in the discre tion of the trustees either to pay or to continue to hold said legacies, an

No. 93.

Mar. 18, 1873.
Cuninghame's Trustees v. Duke et al.

were therefore not bound to make payment thereof until they nsider it to be suitable to do so.

lowing were the questions of law submitted:—"(1) Whether Mrs nnuity was payable in advance, from the 11th day of November , Whether a proportional part was due for the period from 15th l till 27th October 1871, the date of her death? (2) Whether e's daughters were entitled to payment of the legacies to them at their own receipt and discharge? or, Whether the trustees were entitled to continue to hold the capital?"[1]

ising,—

RESIDENT.—The first question regards the annuity of the testator's sister, . Her representatives contend that as she died during the currency of ney are entitled to a proportionate part of her annuity; while the trustees settlement contend that the annuity was payable and was paid in ad- l that consequently nothing more can be claimed. I cannot quite affirm position. The view which I take depends on the precise words of the —(Reads). It is impossible to read the terms of this part of the set- ithout seeing that the testator's true meaning was that his sister should nnuity corresponding in amount to the time that she should survive s to be payable during all the days and years of her life. If she has tained payment to that extent her representatives can claim nothing r Cuninghame died on 9th November 1866, and Mrs Duke on 27th 371. She thus survived him four years eleven months and fourteen w, it appears that the whole amount paid to her was £1000, just five uity. She has therefore obtained payment of rather more than the nd the representatives are not entitled to anything further.

t question regards the legacies left to the children of Mrs Duke. The provides that after her death each of her children shall be paid a £1000 "when my trustees shall find it suitable and convenient to pay and which shall be so secured to said children as my trustees may con- for their welfare and benefit." So far no distinction is made between laughters, but it is further provided that the legacies to the children, ale, are given for their liferent use allenarly, exclusive of the jus mariti sbands. The daughters of Mrs Duke contend that they are entitled ate payment, upon their own receipt and discharge; the trustees con- they are not entitled to pay the legacies, but that they should hold the heir liferent use allenarly, or otherwise, in their discretion, to pay or In this contention there is a confusion of two distinct things. The e not to pay these legacies until they find it suitable and convenient. ts to the convenience of their management of the trust-estate. When which is suitable and convenient to them as trustees arrives another arises,—to wit, that the legacies shall be so secured to the children as s may consider best for their benefit, and, in the case of daughters, gacies shall be secured so as to give them only a liferent use. The of the settlement which creates a little difficulty in so reading it is the that the simple receipt and discharge of the female legatees, without rence of their husbands, is to be a sufficient exoneration to the trustees acies,—a provision which suggests payment of the capital of the lega- to the daughters themselves. When taken in connection with the isions this provision means only this, that whatever the daughters y be discharged by the daughters alone. Even as regards the capital, rities.—33 and 34 Vict. c. 35 (Apportionment Act, 1870), sec. 2; ık v. Sandeman, Feb. 16, 1843, 5 D. 643; Hard v. Anstruther, Nov. ante, vol. i., H. L. 14; Paul v. Anstruther, Feb. 15, 1863, ante, . L. 1; Wood v. Menzies, May 26, 1871, ante, vol. ix., 775; Lady lcott's Trustees, Dec. 5, 1872, supra, p. 173; Lord Herries v. Max- ıtor, Feb. 7, 1873, supra, p. 396.

---

No. 93.

Mar. 18, 1873. Cuninghame's Trustees v. Duke et al.

this provision can be read consistently with the view I have expressed. when the legacies are settled by the trustees so as to secure a liferent use then is the time for the trustees to obtain their exoneration and discharge, w may be done by the daughters without the concurrence of their husbands. leading idea has been that the settlement would take place when the daug were married, and the trustees would for that purpose become parties to marriage-contracts. But what the trustees may hereafter be bound to do I am prepared to state in general terms. That may depend on circumstances, b present they are not bound to pay the legacies at once on discharge by daughters; and that is the only question before us.

LORD DEAS.—I concur in the opinion expressed as to the annuities. the legacies, I likewise concur in holding that the daughters are not entitl insist on immediate payment. In the course of the argument we were ask consider what deed the trustees ought to execute, or what plan they sh adopt in settling these legacies on the daughters. I am not disposed to into those questions, even to the extent of considering whether the leg right was restricted to a liferent. Questions as to the mode of securin legacies are, in the first instance at least, for the consideration of the tru A very considerable discretion is left with them, and I am not disposed to the responsibility of interfering with or superseding that discretion.

LORD ARDMILLAN and LORD JERVISWOODE concurred as to the annuities as to the immediate payment of the legacies, but expressed no opinion as t future duty of the trustees in settling and securing the legacies.

THE following interlocutor was pronounced:—"Having heard co on the special case, in answer to the first question find declare that Mrs Duke obtained payment of the full amou the annuity due to her during her lifetime, and that no thereof is now due to her representatives: In answer to the se question find and declare that Mrs Duke's daughters are entitled to payment of the legacies to them at once on t own receipt and discharge, and that the trustees are not bo to make such payment, and decern."

MACLACHLAN & RODGER, W.S.—MACKENZIE & BLACK, W.S.—Agents.

No. 94.

Mar. 18, 1873. West Calder Oil Co. v. Fell.

THE WEST CALDER OIL COMPANY, Pursuers.—Sol.-Gen. Clark—Mack
ALEXANDER MORRISON FELL, Defender.—Millar—Keir.

Process—All parties not called.—Circumstances in which a pursuer allowed to proceed with an action without transferring the cause against representatives of a person deceased who had been called as a defender fo interest but had not appeared in the action.

1ST DIVISION. Ld. Ormidale. B.

THE WEST CALDER OIL COMPANY raised an action against A. M. F "and also against J. W. Fell, for any right or interest he has in the mises," concluding to have A. M. Fell decerned to assign certain le Expenses were concluded for against A. M. Fell, and also against J. Fell, "but only in the event of his opposing any of the conclusions of summons." This action was met by an action of reduction brought A. M. Fell, to set aside an agreement by which he and J. W. Fell retired from the company. The actions were conjoined. J. W. Fell not appear in the original action, and was not a party to the action of re tion conjoined with it. A similar action as to other leases was bro against J. W. Fell, and was similarly met. J. W. Fell died insol in February 1872. On the pursuers' proposal to have a diet of proof i in the action against A. M. Fell, the Lord Ordinary (Ormidale) refuse

No. 94.

Mar. 18, 1873.
West Calder Oil Co. v. Fell.

stion, "in respect the representatives of the defender, the now deceased hn Wilson Fell, are not yet sisted as parties to this or the relative action the instance of the said pursuers against the said deceased John Wilson ll, and in respect it is expedient that these two actions should be pro- led with together."

The pursuers reclaimed.

At advising,—

LORD PRESIDENT.—This action is directed against Alexander Morrison Fell, d also against John Wilson Fell for any right or interest he has in the pre- es. The conclusions of the summons are that A. M. Fell should be decerned xecute the assignations of certain leases. It is not necessary, nor is it con- ed for, that J. W. Fell should concur in their execution, and the only other tion of him is that in the event of his opposing any of the conclusions of the mons, and in that event only, he should be liable in expenses. J. W. Fell not appear as a party, at which I am not surprised, for he appears to have terest. Another action has been raised by the company against J. W. Fell similar kind to that before us. The Lord Ordinary has refused to appoint t of proof, the effect of which refusal is to postpone the trial of this cause finitely. J. W. Fell died insolvent. Sequestration cannot be awarded l six months after his death, which is practically six months from this date. equently, if the interlocutor stands, the case is sisted for six months, and that very probably the trustee will have nothing to say to it. I think that pursuers should not be put to the hardship of such a delay, unless it is shewn e incompetent or greatly inexpedient to proceed. As to the competency of eeding there is no doubt. The only parties having any interest in this question both before the Court. But then the Lord Ordinary thinks it desirable that two cases should be tried together. No doubt they resemble one another y much, and under ordinary circumstances it would be expedient that the cases should be tried, not together, but at the same time, for many of the esses would do for both cases. But that is a matter of convenience which y be and is outweighed by other considerations of convenience, and it is by , that in consequence of its inability to procure assignations of these leases to ich it thinks itself entitled the company cannot assign or dispose of its busi- s. I think this case must go to proof.

LORD DEAS.—The question of the sisting or delaying for the other action is a stion of discretion, and I am averse to interfering with the Lord Ordinary's cretion in that matter. The other question is, whether this action can com- ently proceed, J. W. Fell being dead, and no person being sisted in his place. ppears on the very face of the summons that J. W. Fell has an interest both s trustee and as an individual. Indeed we may assume that from his being led for his interest. Being so called he must be dealt with as an ordinary fender. If we go on, we may be going on without all the parties interested. may be very inconvenient to delay the case, but that is no reason for going without the proper parties.

LORD ARDMILLAN and LORD JERVISWOODE concurred with the Lord President.

THE following interlocutor was pronounced:—"Recall the interlocutor, and remit to the Lord Ordinary to fix a diet of proof in the conjoined actions, and proceed thereafter as shall be just, and reserve the question of expenses."

J. & R. D. ROSS, W.S.—T. F. WEIR, S.S.C.—Agents.

No. 95.

Mar. 19, 1873.

M'Kernan v. Greenock Lodge of United Operative Masons' Association.

PATRICK M'KERNAN, Pursuer and Appellant.—Brand—M'Kec
THE GREENOCK LODGE OF THE UNITED OPERATIVE MASONS' Assc
OF SCOTLAND, Defenders and Respondents.—Watson—Balfo

Friendly Society.—By the rules of a friendly society, divided into l member who sustained an accident disabling him for life was entitled vision, on the lodge of which he was a member reporting in favour of l cation therefor, and on the same being approved of by a majority of t lodges of the society, in which case the central committee of the soci directed to pay over the sum. Held that an action by a member to re above provision, directed against the lodge to which he belonged, and no the society or its central committee, was incompetent.

Question as to the effect of a rule of a friendly society excluding the tion of Courts of law in questions between the society and its members

Observed (per Lord Deas) that although the society was by its rules mate judge of any claim, a Court of law, notwithstanding the exclusi rules, might compel it to adhere to its rules in arriving at a determinati

1ST DIVISION. Sheriff of Renfrewshire. M.

THIS was an action raised in the Sheriff-court at Greenock by M'Kernan, a member of the Greenock Lodge of the United O Masons' Association of Scotland, against that lodge, to recover provision to which a member of the society was entitled by its r sustaining, while following his employment, an accident disabl for life.*

* The following were the rules of the society applicable to the case:- IV. Law I.—1. Members disabled for life by any real accident receiv following their employment as a mason (and also those specified in la I.) may lay an application before the society, according to law 7 of th and if a majority of those voting on the application consider him ent shall receive the sum of £80 sterling. 3. Members who receive an however trifling it may seem at the time, shall send or cause to be sen to the secretary of the lodge of which he is a member (that is, where hi in), and such notice must be given within six weeks from the date of Any one failing to give such notice within the said six weeks to have r on the provisions of this class; and no lodge shall entertain any appli this law has not been complied with, unless it can be proved to have fault of any lodge office-bearer. On receipt of such notice the lodge point a doctor and delegate to investigate the case, the doctor's and d reports to be submitted to the society, along with the member's app 7. Three months must elapse from the time of accident before any makes application for the provision in law 1 of this class (except in amputation of leg, hand, or arm, by accident—the application to be mad society without restriction to time, and the C. C. to pay over the prov soon as convenient after the decision of the society is known). Members ing to make application within six calendar months after the date of shall have no claim, and their application shall not be entertained by a whatever. 8. When any application is made the lodge applied to shall a doctor and delegate to examine the applicant, and if satisfied that he is for life from following his trade to send such information to the cent mittee, who, if not satisfied, may authorise a lodge, or appoint a delega vestigate the case—the delegate to send a full report to the C. C., w submit the same to the society. A majority of those voting on the ap shall be held binding, without power of appeal to any Court of civi equity; but should any dispute arise between a member and the soc same may be submitted to arbitration, as in law 14, class III., each pay one-half of the expenses; the C. C. to pay over the amount wit month after the decision of the society is known. Any delegate sendir statement shall pay a fine of £1."

No. 95.

Mar. 19, 1873.
M'Kernan v. Greenock Lodge of United Operative Masons' Association.

'Kernan averred that in January 1872 he had sustained an accident, h rendered him blind of one eye; that he duly reported it; that ase was reported on by the medical officer of the lodge; that a majo- of the members of his lodge voted in favour of his application; but the central committee of the society refused to pay the said sum. lso complained of certain irregularities in the proceedings taken with ence to his claim; in particular, that the medical certificates sub- ed to the members voting on an application had been so misprinted o alter their meaning; and further, that to a large number of the es the claim had never been submitted.

he defenders denied the statements as to the alleged irregularities, stated that by the rules a claim was decided on, not by a majority of lodge to which the member belonged, but by a majority of the whole ety, and that a majority of the whole society had voted against the uer's application.

he Sheriff (Fraser), on 9th December 1872, dismissed the action as mpetent, but found no expenses due to either party.

he pursuer appealed to the First Division of the Court of Session.

rgued for appellant;—The society, in dealing with the application, not adhered to its rules, and it was only where that had been done ; the society could avail itself of the provision excluding appeal to the rts of law.

rgued for respondents;—(1) The action was directed against the wrong ties. It was the central committee, and not the Greenock lodge, held the funds from which such provisions were paid. (2) The n had been rejected by a majority of the lodges, and it was the majo- of the lodges who had the right of deciding. (3) The operation of Courts of law was excluded.[1]

t advising,—

ORD PRESIDENT.—My Lords, it appears to me that the title of this pursuer ake the claim embodied in this summons is that of a member of the United rative Masons' Association of Scotland, and that his claim, when properly erstood, is against that association. The association for the purposes of this n, if not otherwise, is properly represented by the central committee, for it e has the power to pay money.

low, he has called not the central committee, nor the association, but the lodge hich he belongs, and the defence is that they are not the proper parties to be ed in such an action. I am inclined to give that defence very great weight, I have not heard any relevant or satisfactory answer to it in the course of discussion.

he laws of the association dealing with accidents such as this one are con- ed under class IV., and provide as follows—"1. Members disabled for life my real accident received while following their employment as a mason (and those specified in law 7, class I.), may lay an application before the society rding to law 7 of this class, and if a majority of those voting on the applica- consider him entitled he shall receive the sum of £80 sterling." Law 7 is his effect—"Three months must elapse from the time of accident before member makes application for the provision in law 1 of this class (except ases of amputation of leg, hand, or arm, by accident—the application to be le to the society without restriction to time, and the central committee to over the provision as soon as convenient after the decision of the society is wn). Members neglecting to make application within six calendar months r the date of accident shall have no claim, and their application shall not be rtained by any lodge whatever." The right to receive assistance depends— n being disabled; 2, on making application; and 3, on a majority of those ng on the application considering him entitled to it. Without complying with these conditions no one can recover any compensation. The 8th law under this class, which is the most important as regards this question, provides—"8 When any application is made the lodge applied to shall appoint a doctor and delegate to examine the applicant, and if satisfied that he is disabled for life from following his trade to send such information to the central committee, who if not satisfied, may authorise a lodge, or appoint a delegate, to investigate the case,—the delegate to send a full report to the C. C., who shall submit the same to the society. A majority of those voting on the application shall be held binding, without power of appeal to any Court of civil law or equity; but should any dispute arise between a member and the society, the same may be submitted to arbitration, as in law 14, class III., each party to pay one-half of the expenses; the C. C. to pay over the amount within one month after the decision of the society is known. Any delegate sending a false statement shall pay a fine of £1." The course of procedure under these laws is quite obvious. The injured person is to apply to his own lodge first, and if they are satisfied that he is disabled for life, after an examination by a doctor and a delegate, they are to report to the central committee, but the central committee are not bound by the opinion of the lodge, and they may accordingly send a delegate to make further inquiry—the delegate to send a full report to the central committee, who have to submit it to the society. A majority of those voting on the application is to be held binding, without power of appeal to any Court of law; but if any dispute arise between a member and the society it may be submitted to arbitration. The parties are agreed on the meaning of this rule, and hold it to be that a majority of the whole lodges in Scotland must vote for it, and if the majority vote in favour of the application the central committee must pay the claim.

[1] Manners v. Fairholme, March 5, 1872, ante, vol. x. 520.

No. 95.

Mar. 19, 1873. M'Kernan v. Greenock Lodge of United Operative Masons' Association.

The lodge to which the applicant belongs has no more to do after reporting the case. The matter then passes into the hands of the society itself, as represented by the central committee. The central committee takes the vote of the whole society, in the manner directed by the laws of the society.

If the whole society had been brought here as defenders there would be a very difficult question. I reserve my opinion as to what would be the effect of the exclusion of Courts of law in the rules.

I cannot help concurring in the Sheriff's expression of sympathy with the pursuer, but we can do nothing for him under this action, the proper parties not having been called.

LORD DEAS.—There have been cases in this Division directed against societies of this kind, in which we held that although they were the judges of the claim yet they must go fairly to work in arriving at a determination. If this action had been properly framed perhaps this society would have had to shew that they had done so. Although we would not interfere with their ultimate judgment yet we might compel them to go properly and regularly to work before arriving at it. But I agree with your Lordship that the action has been directed against the wrong parties; and that is conclusive. I also agree with your Lordship and the Sheriff that, so far as appears, this man's claim was a fair and a just one, and I hope the society will act with liberality, and avoid further litigation on the subject.

LORD ARDMILLAN.—I do not think it necessary to consider the broad question which might have arisen if the central committee had been a party to the action. I avoid giving expression to any opinion on that subject. Looking to the dates mentioned in the record it would appear that the pursuer has been hasty, and not very judicious, in his course of proceeding. Some degree of irritation seems to have arisen which has caused this mistake on his part, and which has probably led to his being less handsomely treated than he ought to have been.

LORD JERVISWOODE concurred.

THE following interlocutor was pronounced:—"Refuse the appeal and decern: Find the appellant liable in expenses," &c.

T. LAWSON, S.S.C.—RHIND & LINDSAY, W.S.—Agents.

JOHN KIRKPATRICK, Pursuer.—Sol.-Gen. Clark—M'Laren—Asher. No. 96.
SIR JAMES EDWARD ALEXANDER AND ANOTHER (Kirkpatrick's Trustees), Defenders.—Millar—Watson—Balfour.

Mar. 19, 1873
Kirkpatrick v. Kirkpatrick's Trustees.

Property—Disposition.—Held that a mortis causa conveyance of heritage executed by a person who died prior to the Titles to Land Consolidation Act, 1868 (31 and 32 Vict. cap. 101), was invalid in respect that the word "dispone" was not used.

Succession—Revocation.—Held (diss. Lords Deas and Benholme) that a revocable deed, conveying the granter's whole estate, heritable and moveable, was revoked by a subsequent deed by necessary implication, although the new deed contained no express revocation, and although, owing to the omission of the word "dispone," it proved ineffectual as a conveyance of heritage.

Writ—Delivery.—Observations (per Lord Deas) on the delivery necessary in the case of gratuitous inter vivos deeds granted by a wife in favour of her husband.

1ST DIVISION, and three consulted Judges. Lord Jervis-woode. B.

JOHN KIRKPATRICK, Esq., advocate, and Chief-Justice of the Ionian Islands, was married in 1820 to Miss Jean Glas, daughter of Mr John Glas, merchant in Glasgow. There was no antenuptial contract of marriage. In 1821 Mrs Kirkpatrick succeeded as heir-at-law to certain heritable estates in Lanarkshire. In June 1866 Mrs Kirkpatrick executed a disposition, whereby, on the narrative of "good and onerous causes and considerations," she, with consent of her husband, and he for his own right and interest, disponed her whole estates, heritable and moveable, to herself and her husband, and the survivor, whom failing, to certain trustees, for the purpose substantially of dividing the property among the eight daughters of the marriage, with this provision, that four of the daughters should have one-fourth more than the others. The name of John Kirkpatrick, the only surviving son of the marriage, was not mentioned in the deed. The deed contained the following clause:—"Reserving always full power to me at any time of my life, and even on deathbed, with consent of my said husband, and to us both with joint consent and assent, and to the survivor of us, to add to, alter, or revoke these presents, either in whole or in part, and to sell, burden, or dispose of the whole subjects, heritable and moveable, hereby conveyed, or any part thereof, at pleasure."

On 4th March 1867 Mrs Kirkpatrick executed a trust-disposition, with consent of her husband, which bore—"In order to regulate the management and distribution of the means and estate of me, the said Mrs Jean Glas or Kirkpatrick, after my death, do hereby give, grant, assign, convey, and make over to and in favour of Miss Annabella Kirkpatrick, our eldest daughter, Colonel Sir James Edward Alexander of Westerton," and others, as trustees, "All and Sundry the property, means, debts, and estates, heritable and moveable, real and personal, presently belonging to me, or which may belong to me, the said Mrs Jean Glas or Kirkpatrick, at the time of my death." The chief purposes of the trust were (1) to pay to her husband, in case of his survivance, the free income of her whole estates; (2) to convey the fee of the said estates after her death to her four daughters, viz. Annabella, Jane, Christina, and Marianne, but burdened with an annuity of £100 per annum to each of her four other daughters, viz. Susan, Margaret, Ellen, and Charlotte, and of a similar annuity to her son, John Kirkpatrick, on the death of his wife. The deed contained no express clause of revocation of the previous deed, but it varied from it in its leading terms and purposes. The deed contained, inter alia, the following clause:—"Reserving always full power to me at any time of my life, and even on deathbed, by myself alone, to add to, alter, or revoke these presents, either in whole or in part, and to sell, burden, or dispose

No. 96. of the whole subjects, heritable and moveable, hereby conveyed, or any part thereof, at pleasure."

Mar. 19, 1873. Kirkpatrick v. Kirkpatrick's Trustees.

On 10th November 1867 Mrs Kirkpatrick died, without having executed any other deeds than those above mentioned.

On 26th June 1868 Mr Kirkpatrick executed a trust-disposition and settlement relative only to the property of his deceased wife, whereby, (the narrative that he was then sole fiar of the estates of his late wife heritable and moveable, he disponed the whole of them to the trustees therein named, for purposes identical with or similar to those of the deed executed by Mrs Kirkpatrick on 4th March 1867.

Mr Kirkpatrick had previously (4th March 1867) executed a settlement disposing of his own property, and by a codicil dated 23d May 1869 he left an annuity to his son of £200 per annum.

Mr Kirkpatrick died on 10th February 1871. Miss Kirkpatrick and Sir James Edward Alexander, two of the trustees nominated in the two prior deeds, were nominated and they accepted office as trustees under this deed, as well as under Mrs Kirkpatrick's deed of 1867.

John Kirkpatrick, the only son of the marriage, as heir-at-law of his mother, raised this action against Sir James E. Alexander and other trustees under the deeds of 1866, 1867, and 1868, concluding for declarator that the said trust-disposition and settlement, dated 18th June 1866, was effectually revoked and recalled in toto by the said trust-disposition and settlement dated 4th March 1867; and for declarator that the said last-mentioned trust-disposition and settlement dated 4th March 1867 did not contain any valid conveyance to the trustees therein named of the heritable property then belonging to the said Mrs Jean Glas or Kirkpatrick, or belonging to her at the time of her death, and that the last-mentioned deed was ineffectual to convey the heritable property; and further, for declarator that on the death of the said Mrs Jean Glas or Kirkpatrick the fee of the whole heritable property, of every description then belonging to her, and in particular of certain specified subjects, fell to and devolved upon the pursuer, as her heir-at-law, as his own exclusive property; and for declarator that the deceased John Kirkpatrick had no right or title whatever to the fee of the heritable property belonging to his spouse after the execution of the trust-disposition and settlement of 4th March 1867, or at any time thereafter, either in virtue of any of the said deeds, or of the death of his said spouse, or on any other ground. There followed conclusions for reduction of the disposition by Mr Kirkpatrick of 26th June 1868, and a disposition granted by the trustees in favour of the Clyde Navigation Trustees, who were also called as defenders.

After the production had been satisfied the action was, in terms of a joint minute, dismissed as against the Clyde Navigation Trustees.

The pursuer pleaded;—(1) The disposition of 18th June 1866 was effectually revoked by the trust-deed of 4th March 1867. (2) The trust-deed of 4th March 1867 contained no dispositive words, and was ineffectual as a conveyance of heritage. (3) Mr Kirkpatrick had no right or title to the heritage of his late wife, and had no power to convey the same by the disposition of 26th June 1868.

The trustees pleaded;—(1) The pursuer has no right to call for production or to sue for reduction of the deeds sought to be reduced, in respect that, assuming the trust-disposition and settlement executed by Mrs Kirkpatrick on 4th March 1867 to be ineffectual as a conveyance of heritage, the pursuer's claims, as her heir-at-law, are excluded by the trust-disposition and settlement of 18th June 1866. (2) The pursuer barred from challenging the deeds sought to be reduced by having accepted payment of an annuity of £200 a-year bequeathed to him by his

No. 96.

Mar. 19, 1873.
Kirkpatrick v. Kirkpatrick's Trustees.

ther. (4) The action cannot be maintained, in respect that the trust-position and settlement of 4th March 1867 contains words of de præsi conveyance, and is in law operative as a conveyance of the heritage hich belonged to Mrs Kirkpatrick. (5) Even assuming the said deed of h March 1867 to be ineffectual as a conveyance of heritage, the pur-r's claims are excluded by the disposition executed by Mr Kirkpatrick 26th June 1868, in virtue of the powers reserved to or conferred upon by the deeds.

On 20th July 1872 the Lord Ordinary pronounced the following terlocutor:—"Finds (1st) that the late Mrs Jean or Jane Glas or kpatrick, died on 10th November 1867; (2d) That no antenuptial tract of marriage was entered into between Mrs Kirkpatrick and said husband, and that the pursuer is the only surviving son of r marriage, and heir-at-law of his said mother; (3d) That Mrs Kirk-ick succeeded as heir-at-law to the whole heritable estates of her t, Miss Janet Semple of Finnieston, Glasgow, and made up a title reto in the year 1821, all as set forth in the record; (4th) That by position and settlement (containing also a conveyance in trust) dated June 1866, and, with relative codicil of same date, recorded in the ks of Session 10th May 1871, Mrs Kirkpatrick, with the special advice consent of her said husband, and he for himself, his own right and erest, and they both with joint consent and assent, 'for certain good onerous causes and considerations,' alienated and disponed, and gave, ated, assigned, conveyed, and made over to and in favour of them and survivor of them, whom failing, to Colonel Sir James Edward Alex-er of Westerton, and the other parties therein named, in trust, for the s, ends, and purposes therein mentioned, all and sundry the property, ans, debts, and estates, heritable and moveable, real and personal, then longing to Mrs Kirkpatrick, or which might belong to her at the time her death; and the said disposition and settlement also contains a use in the following terms, viz., 'Reserving always full power to me at y time of my life, and even on deathbed, with consent of my said hus-nd, and to us both with joint consent and assent, and to the survivor of to add to, alter, or revoke these presents either in whole or in part, d to sell, burden, or dispose of the whole subjects, heritable and moveable, reby conveyed, or any part thereof, at pleasure;' (5th) That by trust-dis-sition and settlement, executed by Mr and Mrs Kirkpatrick of date 4th of rch 1867, she, with the special advice and consent of her said husband, d he for himself, his own right and interest, and they both with joint con-nt and assent, 'in order to regulate the management and distribution of s means and estate of me, the said Mrs Jean Glas or Kirkpatrick, after my ath,' did 'give, grant, assign, convey, and make over,' to and in favour Miss Annabella Kirkpatrick, their eldest daughter, and the other rties therein named, in trust for the uses, ends, and purposes therein ntioned, and to the assignees of the said trustees, heritably and irre-emably, all and sundry the property, means, debts, and estates, heritable d moveable, real and personal, then belonging to Mrs Kirkpatrick, or hich might belong to her at the time of her death; and the said trust-sposition and settlement also contains a clause in these terms, viz.—Reserving always full power to me' (Mrs Kirkpatrick), 'at any time of y life, and even on deathbed, by myself alone, to add to, alter, or revoke ese presents, either in whole or in part, and to sell, burden, or dispose of e whole subjects, heritable and moveable, hereby conveyed, or any part ereof, at pleasure;' (6th) That the said trust-disposition and settlement, hile it contains no express revocation of the previous deed of 18th June 866, varies from it as regards certain of its terms and purposes; (7th)

No. 96.

Mar. 19, 1873. Kirkpatrick v. Kirkpatrick's Trustees.

That after the death of Mrs Kirkpatrick, her husband, the said John Kirkpatrick, executed a disposition, bearing date 26th June 1868 (being the first of the deeds to which the reductive conclusions of the summons apply), and, proceeding upon the narrative of the foresaid disposition and settlement of 18th June 1866, and of the said trust-diposition and settlement of 4th March 1867, and upon the further narrative that, with the view of carrying out the purposes intended by the said last-mentioned deed, he had resolved to grant the said disposition (which purports to be executed by him as the survivor of him and his said spouse, and as such the fiar of the heritable property and estate conveyed by the said disposition and settlement of 18th June 1866, and in virtue of the whole powers conferred upon him by the said deed), and by said disposition he gave granted, assigned and disponed to and in favour of the foresaid Miss Annabella Kirkpatrick, and the other parties therein named, in trust for the uses, ends, and purposes mentioned in the said trust-disposition and settlement, and specified in the said disposition granted by him heritably and irredeemably, the heritable subjects therein particularly described, and which had belonged to his said spouse; and (8th) That the said John Kirkpatrick had previously, on 4th March 1867, executed a disposition mortis causa for the disposal of his own heritable and moveable estate, and that by codicil thereto, dated 23d March 1869, he left and bequeathed to his son, the pursuer, a free yearly annuity of £ sterling during all the days of his life after the testator's death, and by said codicil declared that the said annuity should form a burden upon 'the before-written conveyance, and upon my disponees under the same and shall form a charge upon my estates, heritable and moveable, thereby conveyed;' and with reference to the foregoing findings, Finds as matter of law (First), That the foresaid trust-disposition and settlement of 4th March 1867, having been executed before the date at which 'The Titles to Land Consolidation (Scotland) Act, 1868,' came into operation, and Mrs Kirkpatrick having predeceased the date of the commencement of said Act, the terms of the said trust-disposition and settlement are to be construed and dealt with according to the law and practice subsisting before the commencement of said Act; (Second), That as the disposition clause in the said trust-disposition and settlement does not contain the word 'dispone,' the said deed was ineffectual to convey the heritable estate belonging to Mrs Kirkpatrick; (Third), That the said trust-disposition and settlement must be held to have operated as a revocation of the previous disposition and settlement executed by the spouses on 18th June 1866; (Fourth), That in consequence of such revocation the late Mr Kirkpatrick acquired no right or title through his survivance of his said spouse to the fee of the heritable estate which belonged to her; (Fifth), That therefore the foresaid disposition executed by Mr Kirkpatrick after the death of his said spouse, bearing date the 26th June 1868, and purporting to convey as aforesaid the heritable subjects therein particularly described, and which had belonged to his said spouse, was ineffectual to convey the same, and that the pursuer as heir-at-law foresaid to his mother, Mrs Kirkpatrick, is entitled to sue for reduction of the said disposition, in so far as respects the said heritable subjects; and (Sixth), That the pursuer is not barred from challenging the said disposition in so far as regards the said heritable subjects by having accepted payment of the annuity of £200 provided to him as aforesaid by the codicil to said deed: Therefore, and with reference to the preceding findings, and to the minute of restriction annexed to the summons, repels the defences stated on behalf of the defenders, the said Sir James Edward Alexander and Miss Annabella Kirkpatrick, Mr and Mrs Kirkpatrick

No. 96.

Mar. 19, 1873.
Kirkpatrick v. Kirkpatrick's Trustees.

stees: Finds, decerns, and declares in terms of the declaratory conclu- s of the summons now insisted in against them only, and as respects the l disposition by the deceased John Kirkpatrick, dated 26th June 1868, nces, decerns, and declares, in terms of the conclusions for reduction," &c. The trustees reclaimed, and after a hearing before the First Division, cause was appointed to be argued before the Judges of that Division h the assistance of three Judges of the Second Division.

Argued for the defenders, the trustees;—(1) The use of the word "dis- e" was not essential to the conveyance of heritage. There were obiter s, but there was no express decision to that effect. Stair and Erskine tioned other words as being equally efficacious. It was enough that ds of de præsenti conveyance should be employed; and in the deed of 7 such words were employed. (2) But assuming that the use of the d "dispone" was essential to an effectual conveyance of heritage, and , therefore, the deed of 1867 was ineffectual so far as regarded the itage, how could it operate as a revocation of the deed of 1867? The d of 1867 contained no express clause of revocation which might d although the deed as a conveyance fell. It was simply and solely ull deed. It was only as an inconsistent conveyance that the second d could be regarded as a revocation, but the pursuer's contention being t it was not a conveyance, his only reason for holding it a revocation s destroyed. The principle that a deed which failed of its purpose did , if it contained no express clause of revocation, revoke a prior and nsistent deed, had been established in deathbed cases; that was not n any peculiarity of that class of deeds; indeed these cases were nger applications of the doctrine, because the deathbed deed which d not the effect of revoking the previous deed was not, like the present d, a mere nullity not requiring to be reduced. The intention of the ker of a deed was the ground on which the doctrine of implied revoca- n was founded; but that intention must be clearly shewn, and if any tention was more clearly shewn in these deeds than another it was the tention to exclude the heir-at-law. But was the deed of 1867 so inconsis- nt with the deed of 1866 that both could not stand together? If the deed of 67 revoked anything, it revoked some of the trust purposes and bene- ial provisions—not the conveyance in the deed of 1866. Regarded in s aspect the deed of 1867, though ineffectual as a conveyance, would rate as a direction to the trustees under the first deed, and the first d would remain effectual as a conveyance under which the trustees ght be obliged to make the estate effectual for the purposes of the ond deed. (3) The deed of 1868 by Mr Kirkpatrick was to be regarded one with the two previous deeds. The pursuer who had accepted an nuity of £200 under a codicil was, on the principle of approbate and probate, barred from challenging the other deeds, which were just other rts of the same scheme or plan.[1]

---

[1] Authorities cited at the debate in reference to the word "dispone":—Stair, ii. , 14—iii., 2, 3; Erskine, iii., 8, 20; Bell's Prin., sec. 1692; More's Notes, i., 8; Sandford on Heritable Succession, 56, 61, 65; Mitchell v. Wright, 1759, L. 8082, 8084; Ogilvy v. Mercer, 1793, M., 3336; Simpson v. Barclay, 1752, Br. Sup., 794, 1 Ross, L. C., 1; Stewart v. Stewart, Nov. 16, 1803, Hume, 31 (note per Baron Hume); Hamilton v. Macdowal, March 3, 1815, F. C. per rd Meadowbank; Howden v. Glassford, July 7, 1864, ante, vol. ii., 1317, r Lords Curriehill and Deas; Hardy's Trustees, May 13, 1871, ante, vol. , 736.

Authorities cited at the debate in reference to the question of revocation:— thier, Pandectæ, xxviii. tit. iii., art. i., secs. 2 and 3; Coutts v. Crau-

No. 96.

Mar. 19, 1873. Kirkpatrick v. Kirkpatrick's Trustees.

Argued for the pursuer;—(1) It was trite law that the word "dispone" was essential to an effectual conveyance of heritage; and this view was confirmed by sec. 20 of the Titles to Land Consolidation Act. Mr Erskine, in using other words along with "dispone," was not suggesting words of style to be used in a conveyance, but giving a description of the kind of words necessary to be employed de præsenti, as opposed to de futuro. (2) The deed of 1867 must be held to be a distinct although indirect revocation of the deed of 1866. The first was an inter vivos deed either of the nature of an onerous postnuptial contract, or of a donatio inter virum et uxorem, and bore to be revocable by joint consent. In either view it was revoked by the deed of 1867, that deed having been expressly granted by joint consent of the spouses, and containing an express reservation to Mrs Kirkpatrick of the sole power to revoke the deed, or sell or burden the estate at pleasure. Both deeds dealt with the whole estate, and their provisions were quite inconsistent with each other. Under the first deed Mr Kirkpatrick, on his survivance, had the fee of his wife's estate; under the second deed, only the liferent. The conveyance in the deed of 1866 to the husband, as joint fiar, had clearly been revoked by the express reservation of powersto Mrs Kirkpatrick alone, and the whole deed must therefore fall. The cases as to deathbed, in which a distinction was drawn between a deathbed deed which did and one which did not contain an express clause of revocation, had no application here. It was incorrect to say that, on the pursuer's contention, the deed of 1867 was a nullity, for it was a good deed as regarded the moveable property, and not being a nullity, was perfectly habile to express the intention of the granter in regard to her heritage. It was settled law that a probative deed might contain an effectual revocation of a disposition of heritage, without containing any new conveyance of that heritage, and this was the case with the present deed.

At advising,—

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—The questions which have arisen between the parties

---

furd, March 14, 1806, 2 Bligh's App. 605, 5 Pat. App. 73, 1 Ross, L. C., 61; Rowan v. Alexander, Nov. 22, 1775, 5 Br. Sup., 423, Hailes, 695, 2 Bligh App. 922, 1 Ross, L. C., 653; Mure v. Mure, June 1, 1813, F. C., June 9, 18; 6 Pat. App. 339; Duke of Roxburghe v. Wauchop, Dec. 13, 1816, F. C., H. L., May 25, 1820, 3 Bligh's App. 630, 2 Sh. App. 619, 6 Pat. 548, 1 Ross, C., 659; Ersk. iii. 8, 98, Lord Ivory's note; Bell's Com. i. 96; Bell's Pr. 1812; Wilson v. Henderson, Jan. 31, 1797, M. 15,444, H. of L., March 1802, 4 Pat. 316, 1 Ross, L. C., 594; Dundas v. Dundas, May 21, 178 Ross, L. C., 667 and 724; Leith's Trustees v. Leith, June 9, 1848, 10 D. 11 Purvis's Trs. v. Purvis's Executors, March 23, 1861, 23 D. 812; Somerv and Others (Richmond's Trustees) v. Hunter and Winton, Nov. 25, 1864, vol. iii. 95; M'Ewan v. Dunn's Trustees, March 27, 1865, ante, vol. iii. 7 in H. of L. as Barstow v. Black and Others, July 23, 1868, ante, vol. vi. 1 1 Law Rep. (Sc. App.) 392; Sibbald's Trustees v. Greig, Jan. 13, 1871, vol. ix. 395; Leith v. Leith, June 19, 1863, ante, vol. i. 949; Thomas Tenant, Nov. 12, 1868, ante, vol. vii. 114; Powell on Devises, i. 600 (Jarm edn.); Williams on Executors (6th edn.), i. 142; Onions v. Tryer, 1 Eq. C 1 P. Williams, 343; Earl of Illchester, May 21, 1803, 7 Vesey, 372 (Sir W Grant, 378); Grant v. Stoddart, Feb. 27, 1849, 11 D. 860, H. of L., June 1852, 1 Macq., 165; Millar v. Marsh, July 8, 1853, 15 D. 823; Montgom v. Fowles, June 9, 1795, 2 Bell's Fol. Ca., 203, 1 Ross, L. C., 7; Hende v. Selkrig, June 10, 1795, M. 4489; Cunninghame v. Whitefoords, June 1748, M. 16,119, 5 Brown's Sup. 423; Neilson v. Stewart, Feb. 3, 1860, 22 646; Brack v. Hogg, Feb. 25, 1831, 5 W. and S. 61; Willoch v. Ochterlo Dec. 14, 1769, M. 5539; Sandford on Succession, p. 77; Bell's Prin. 1938-9; M'Laren on Wills, i. 475-8.

No. 96.

Mar. 19, 1873.
Kirkpatrick v. Kirkpatrick's Trustees.

this case depend mainly upon the construction and effect of two deeds of lement between the late Mr Kirkpatrick and his wife, the first dated in 1866 l the second in 1867. Other deeds are brought into question in the case, but ubstantially depends upon the construction and effect of these two instruments. first of these is dated on the 18th of June 1866. It is a joint deed between the band and the wife, having for its purpose to dispose of the estate then belong-; or which might belong, to the wife prior to her death; and it proceeds to state t for certain good and onerous causes and considerations the spouses have nated and disponed, "as I, the said Mrs Jean Glas, otherwise Kirkpatrick, with nsent of my said husband, and we both, with joint consent and assent as said is, hereby alienate and dispone, and give, grant, assign, convey, and make over nd in favour of us, the said John Kirkpatrick and Mrs Jean Glas or Kirk-rick, and the survivor of us, whom failing," to certain trustees, "all and ilry the property, means, debts, and estates, heritable and moveable, real and sonal, presently belonging to me, or which may belong to me, the said Mrs n Glas, otherwise Kirkpatrick, at the time of my death, with the whole titles my said heritable property, and the vouchers and instructions of the said veable property." There then follows a declaration of the purposes for which destination or the substitution in favour of the persons nominated as trustees been made, which are substantially these—that the estate, heritable and veable, when the substitution takes effect, shall be divided among the eight ghters of Mr Kirkpatrick, and his wife, with this provision, that four of the ghters shall be entitled to have one-fourth part more than the others. There a son, but he is not mentioned in this deed at all. The deed then goes on, some further clauses, to revoke two deeds of settlement which had been iously executed by the spouses, and it contains this clause at the end,—serving always full power to me at any time of my life, and even on death-with consent of my said husband, and to us both with joint consent and t, and to the survivor of us, to add to, alter, or revoke these presents either whole or in part, and to sell, burden, or dispose of the whole subjects, heri-le and moveable, hereby conveyed, or any part thereof, at pleasure." There no nomination of executors, and there is no dispensation with delivery of the d.

I stop for a moment to consider what the nature of this deed was; and it does appear to me that there is much difficulty in solving that question as far as form and terms are concerned. In the first place, I think it must be held, tever the effect of that may be, to be a deed that was delivered. It was ed by husband and wife, but their joint interests were involved, and the umption is certainly that it was in the possession of the husband, and there be little doubt that such was the fact. In the second place, in form it was veyance inter vivos. It is quite true that it contains a contingent con-ce of any property which may belong to the wife at the time of her death, s regarded the property which then belonged to her it was a conveyance vivos. It has been said that the deed was entirely testamentary. I do not that is a true or accurate description of it. It contains a contingent testa-ary purpose unquestionably, in the substitution in favour of the trustees; then that is a mere destination, or a bare substitution, failing the survivor ing a different disposition of the property. The main effect of this deed is est the property conveyed by it in the two spouses jointly, as joint or con-t fiars, and the whole of it absolutely in the survivor, and that not by sub-tion, but by the operation of accretion. I think that is the nature of the , according to the terms in which it is expressed. One is liable to be misled the fact that it might be set aside by the wife on the ground of being a dona-inter virum et uxorem, but this cannot enter into the question as to what character of the deed was as long as it stood, or what the nature of the con-t was between the husband and the wife. Now, that is its form, and that, prehend, was also its legal effect. It effected an immediate transference of personal right to the whole estate according to its terms. There could be no n in this case, as there has been in some analogous cases, for limiting either he disponees to a liferent, and for this plain reason, that the right of survivor-ship was protected by a stipulation not to alter without mutual con thus the whole fee was carried absolutely to the survivor jure accresce is a stronger case for such a result than the case of Ferguson v. M'Geo rison, 4202, or the case of Forrester in the House of Lords,[1] which is t authority on this subject. Reference may also be made to the case of v. M'Farquhar, 4 Dunlop, 1484.

No. 96.

Mar. 19, 1873. Kirkpatrick v. Kirkpatrick's Trustees.

So stood the respective rights of the husband and wife in this prop the second deed was executed in the following year. Now, this dee is in every way in contrast to that of 1866. It is, with the excepti provision, purely testamentary. It makes no allusion to the former co but has for its avowed object to settle the estate of the wife after h The spouses accordingly proceed to convey the whole estate of the wi death to trustees, who are named as executors also, and are directed t annual income to her husband in case he should survive her, and on t to divide the property among four out of their eight daughters, bu with an annuity of £100 a-year to the other four daughters, the son b excluded, except that an annuity is left him, which is to commence death of his wife. The dispositive clause of this deed does not contai "dispone." The wife predeceased her husband, who, fearing, I sup this flaw in the dispositive clause would be fatal to the second convey up the property under the trust-conveyance of 1866; and having do veyed to the same body of trustees the whole estates, heritable and which were the subject of these two deeds. In these circumstances th after the death of Mr Kirkpatrick in 1871, conveyed and disponed th to the disponees under the second deed. Accordingly the heir-at-law brought this action to set aside the deed by which Mr Kirkpatrick co the trustees named, and also to set aside a conveyance which the dispo that deed granted to the Clyde Trustees, who purchased part of the est action also has declaratory conclusions to the effect that the deed of ineffectual to convey the property, so far as heritable, and that the dee is not now a subsisting deed, but was set aside and recalled by that o

It is only necessary further to explain that the wife's property at t both deeds, and also at the date of her death, consisted mainly of certai subjects on the banks of the Clyde, which became of the value of about and that she also left at her death about £1000 of personal property siderable portion of the heritable property has been scheduled and tak trustees of the Clyde Navigation at the price of upwards of £39,000. Ordinary has decided in favour of the pursuer, and has found that t 1866 no longer subsists. The case is now before us on a reclaiming n defenders.

The questions raised for judgment are substantially three: first, w trust-settlement of 1867 was effectual to convey Mrs Kirkpatrick's estate; secondly, whether, if it were not so, the deed of 1867 can s declaration of purposes to qualify the trust-conveyance contained in t 1866; and, third, whether the settlement of 1867 had the effect of r revoking the conveyance of 1866.

1. On the first of these questions I am of opinion that the omiss word "dispone" in the dispositive clause of the deed of 1867 is fa deed as a conveyance of heritage. Voces signatæ used in conveya always the growth of time and practice, and probably the word "dispone originally set apart and appropriated to the special signification which wards acquired. It has, perhaps, a certain propriety in expressing the præsenti disposition which other terms sometimes used as equivalents be supposed to possess. This word, however, was so long recognise sense in the practice of our conveyancers that I think it clear that it e essential to a valid disposition. It is unnecessary to quote authorit saying that the opinion of Lord Meadowbank in the case of Hamilton and the unanimous opinion of the whole Court in the case of the L

[1] MacGregor v. Forrester, April 13, 1835, 1 S. and M'L. 441

m to place this matter beyond controversy. Although the recent i altered our forms in that respect I think we have no choice but to e former rule in regard to writs which were executed while it was in t.

he second point I think there is no ground on which the proposition ted can be maintained. The deed of 1867 was in no respect in aid or t of the first. It was wholly inconsistent with and subversive of it.
nded to take effect immediately on the death of the wife, and not on of the survivor of the spouses, and never could have operated as a structions or declaration of purposes to a body of trustees who were e in substitution to the survivor. The case of Willoch v. Ochterlony 5539, Hailes, 321, rev. 3 Pat. 659), and the series of decisions which wed on it, no doubt established the doctrine that when heritable pro-been effectually conveyed to trustees the purposes of the trust may d or varied by a writing without dispositive words. But it is suffiy that the circumstances of this case afford no room for the application nciple.

third point is one of great difficulty. It is whether the deed of 1867 i a revocation or renunciation or extinction of the conveyance of 1866;
ords, whether the defect in the dispositive clause of the deed of 1867, nsequent failure of that deed as an effectual conveyance of heritage, ffect of leaving the deed of 1866 as a subsisting title to the heritable lthough in all other respects it is superseded and recalled. I do not cessary, in order to explain the view at which I have arrived on this o go at any length into the elaborate legal argument which we heard ar in regard to the rules or canons of construction applicable to such Revocation is, of course, a question of intention, to be gathered from r expressed will of the granter or maker of the settlement. There is nothing in law to prevent the revocation of a former settlement being y clear implication from the words of an effectual posterior deed. If the lid and the implication clear, the intention of the granter must receive or, on the other hand, can I think that if a deed be altogether ineffec-fective from want of form or solemnity, the mere fact of the attempted e to another disponee can be held to indicate an intention to revoke settlement.

d to the cases which have occurred in reductions ex capite lecti, I only hem in order to set them aside as having no bearing on the question considering. A deed executed on deathbed is, and always was, a valid expression of the will of the testator; although it was, prior to statute, liable to be set aside by the heir-at-law, in so far as it con-itage to his prejudice. The cases which have been referred to arose may be called a hypothetical issue. The heir-at-law proponed his of the deathbed deed. It was replied by the holder of the deed that ood already excluded by a prior settlement in liege poustie, and there-no interest to reduce the deathbed conveyance, because the former would revive if the posterior settlement were reduced. The heir's o that plea was that the deathbed deed contained an express revocation ttlements, which revocation did not fall under his challenge, but stood expression of the will of the granter. This latter rejoinder was sus-he case of Coutts v. Crauford, and a series of cases which followed on on. The same question was raised in cases in which there was no express contained in the deathbed deed, but in which it was contended that rance of the heritable property, although reducible by the heir, being lid and complete while it stood unreduced, must be held to import a of prior inconsistent settlements. But in Rowan v. Alexander this epelled, and it was held that it was impossible to maintain the con-i a revocation, while it was itself the subject of challenge by the heir-executed on deathbed. Lord Loughborough and Lord Eldon doubted of this view, and seemed to hold that the intention to revoke was as licated in the latter class of cases as in the first, although the principle

No. 96.

Mar. 19, 1873. Kirkpatrick v. Kirkpatrick's Trustees.

was too firmly settled to be disturbed. With that matter, however, we have no concern here. The question is not, whether the deed of 1866 would revive if that of 1867 were out of the way, but whether in point of fact it now subsists —a question which never arose in any of the deathbed cases, in all of which the prior settlement was necessarily extinguished, whether the heir's challenge prevailed or was excluded.

On the other hand, it has been very clearly decided that where a deed is not merely reducible, as in the case of deathbed, but is wholly null from want of form and solemnity, such a deed can have no effect as a revocation, because it is not the completed expression of the granter's will or intention. That was decided in the case of Henderson v. Wilson, and was followed in the case of Law v. Leith, and I conceive that the decisions rested upon clear and sound principles; for a deed which is null and ineffectual expresses no completed intention. But it is manifest that these decisions rest on a totally different basis from the principle adopted in the case of deathbed deeds, and the ground of judgment might apply to express as well as to implied revocation.

In regard to the argument that the clauses of a settlement are always to be understood as conditional on all the other parts of the settlement taking effect, it is manifest that if this were held to its full extent it would be quite as applicable to clauses of express revocation as to revocation only implied from the purport of the deed. It is not sound as a general canon of construction, although such a condition may be deduced from the context of the clause in the particular deed.

But the present case arises in circumstances altogether different, and presents for solution a question depending on different principles. It is a case of two incompatible general settlements of the universitas of the wife's estate, both of which proceed on the joint agreement of the husband and wife, and in which the posterior settlement provides for a distribution and an administration entirely inconsistent with the provisions of the first. The second settlement has failed as a conveyance of the heritable estate, but it has failed no further. It remains in all other respects valid and effectual. It certainly does not follow as matter of course that, although the second settlement has failed as regards part of the property, the administration and distribution are to divide, and that the provisions of the first settlement must regulate the administration and succession to that part of the estate which the second deed has failed effectually to convey. That is a matter to be regulated by the intention of the parties as expressed in the settlement, which, although partly ineffectual, is also in part the complete expression of the will of the granters. The question we have now to decide is whether the second deed of 1867, which is a valid and subsisting deed, operates a recall or extinction or revocation of the inter vivos conveyance of 1866 and the contingent trust purposes.

I have come to the conclusion, not certainly without some hesitation, that this is the effect of the deed of 1867. I found nothing on the fact that the attempted but defective conveyance of the heritable property in the deed of 1867 was one which would have been inconsistent with the previous disposition of it. I rest my opinion on the general scope of the operative and effectual portion of the deed, which not only proceeds on the footing that the conveyance of 1866 was superseded and abandoned, but seems to me to cancel and destroy it. It will not require any minute analysis of the settlement of 1867 to bring out the grounds of this opinion. The view which I take of that settlement is that it was intended to obliterate all trace of the former conveyance,—that it dealt with the property on the footing that it was then, and had all along been, solely vested in the wife, and hitherto undisposed of by her either inter vivos or mortis causa, and so reinstated her in the fee of the whole estate during her life that no one could thereafter pretend that any title to it had ever been vested in the husband. I deduce this result from the following considerations.

At the date of the deed of 1867 there can be no question that the fee of the whole of this estate, heritable and moveable, was vested in the spouses jointly during their lives, and absolutely in the survivor. As I have already shewn the right of survivor was not a right of succession, but was a right of accretion

No. 96.

Mar. 19, 1873.
Kirkpatrick v. Kirkpatrick's Trustees.

ıg entirely upon his or her right of conjunct fee during the marriage. ıing of this kind is recognised in the narrative of the deed of 1867. It f the property as belonging solely to the wife, as if it never had passed ; and the object of the deed is stated to be to settle this property after wife's) death, thus holding the right of survivorship on the husband's er to have existed. Before, therefore, we reach the conveying words of 1 of 1867 its purpose and meaning are sufficiently apparent. It is l precisely in the terms we should expect to find if no previous con- had ever been made.

ɔnveyance to the trustees under the deed of 1867 and their nomination ːors is, of course, perfectly valid as regards the personal property. I do ɜrstand it to be contended that this part of the conveyance was condi- . the whole deed taking effect. It might have taken effect on the whole operty conveyed, for it is a mere accident that at the death of the wife, ssolution of the marriage, the bulk of the property was heritable. It is ːo see how any part of the management provided in the deed of 1867 ɜsibly co-exist with the clause of substitution in the deed of 1866. The ıe trustees under the former, taking by an immediate mortis causa con- from the wife at the moment of her death, does not merely destroy, as estroy, Mr Kirkpatrick's right as survivor under the latter, but implies system of administration of the whole property, which was never in- ɔ be broken up into two. Indeed, on the part of the defenders it was d that although Mr Kirkpatrick was entitled to take up the heritage e deed of 1866 he was still bound by the purposes expressed in the 867,—a concession which goes very far indeed to shew that the expres- ıese purposes, even as regarded the heritage, must have superseded the ce of 1866.

ustees are directed to pay the whole free income of the estate to Mr ick himself, but he is not even given a liferent of it. No doubt, by the defect in the conveyance of the heritage this right of enjoyment ıcome is limited to the personal property, but it is difficult to exclude which this provision throws on the meaning of the settlement. The ate might have been personal property at the wife's death, and yet this 1867 does not so much as allude to the fact that in that event Mr ick would, but for its provisions, have been the absolute proprietor or e whole. I forbear to go at length through the details of the trust passing by most of them with this remark, that no one of them is t in spirit or intention with any part of the property being administered ɔ deed of 1866. I shall only allude specially to two of its provisions.

st is a clause which carefully directs that if any of the four daughters ɔrovided with an annuity should claim legitim the annuity is to be for- The care with which the provision is expressed seems to suggest what ng in the minds of the granters of this deed. It is impossible not to he object of this settlement was quite as much to exclude as to favour. very partial settlement. The eldest son was to be all but excluded, and ɔf the eight daughters to be but scantily provided for. But the law of ives some protection to children against settlements of this kind, as ıeir father's personal estate, but not as regards that of the mother. If rty conveyed, worth some £50,000, had been purchased, as it afterwards he Clyde Trustees, it might have so chanced that at the death of Mr ck the whole estate might have been personal, and under the deed of 1866 legitim. This contingency seems to have been guarded against by the ındonment of all right of fee in the property on the part of Mr Kirk- nd I think this is made perfectly clear by the clause of reservation at f the deed.

lause is very important, and seems to be conclusive upon the question considering. It will be recollected that the deed of 1866 contained a which that deed was only alterable, and the property could only be ɔy the joint consent of the husband and wife. The clause of reserva- h I now refer to in the deed of 1867 is expressed in terms somewhat similar, but with this essential difference, that the power is not reserved to the granters of the deed, the husband and wife, nor is joint consent in any way required, but the words are "by myself alone," and the whole clause runs thus:—"Reserving always full power to me (that is, the wife) at any time of my life, and even on deathbed, by myself alone, to add to, alter, or revoke these presents either in whole or in part, and to sell, burden, or dispose of the whole subjects, heritable and moveable, hereby conveyed, or any part thereof, at pleasure." Now, although this is expressed in the form of a reservation, that is obviously not its nature, for it neither reserves to the granters that which they had prior to the execution of the deed, nor does it reserve to the wife that which she possessed prior to the execution of the deed. It is, in truth, of the nature of a grant, not of a reservation. Under the former deed, according to its terms, the wife could only have revoked with her husband's consent, and therefore this clause, professing to reserve, in reality grants to the wife power of revoking without her husband's consent, and renounces on the part of the husband the right which he had to have the settlement remain entire unless he consented to its alteration. Even as regards this part of the clause it is sufficiently clear that the failure of the words of conveyance would not have had the effect of reviving this right on the part of the husband. But the remainder of the clause admits of no limitation, and gives the wife an absolute power to sell or dispose of the whole estate, heritable and moveable, at her pleasure. The failure of the conveyance of 1867 as regarded heritage could have no effect whatever on this part of the clause, which, if it ever came into effect at all, must have operated during the lifetime of the spouses, and before the trust conveyance could have any effect. Indeed the power reserved would, if it had been exercised, have superseded in whole or in part the trust conveyance of 1867, and therefore I gather that it was to take effect on the inter vivos right in the deed of 1866. Now, the effect which the power thus conferred on the wife of selling or disposing of the estate during the subsistence of the marriage had in the deed of 1866 was simply that of absolute revocation and extinction, because such a power was wholly inconsistent with the right of conjunct fee which had been conferred by the deed of 1866 on the spouses. It can signify nothing that it was not exercised. If the wife resumed the uncontrolled fee of her own property, unburdened by any right or claim on the part of the husband, there was an end absolutely both to the conjunct fee during the marriage, and to the right of survivorship thereafter. When the husband consented that his wife should have this power he renounced, and I think he meant to renounce, all the rights he had as conjunct fiar, including his right of survivorship, which being a right of accretion could only be engrafted on the conjunct fee which he enjoyed during the marriage. I am therefore of opinion that this deed of 1867 effectually terminated and extinguished the former conveyance. I am satisfied that such was its intention, and that such is its legal effect. I think it was intended to replace the wife in the position in which she stood before the execution of the deed of 1866, to leave her thereupon to deal with the property as being exclusively her own, and to give her power not only to regulate the succession to it by this deed of 1867, but so to liberate the fee in her person absolutely from all rights in the husband, present or eventual, as to leave in her the uncontrolled disposal of it at any time during her life, whether before or after the dissolution of the marriage.

No. 96.

Mar. 19, 1873. Kirkpatrick v. Kirkpatrick's Trustees.

I am of opinion that the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary should be adhered to.

Lord Deas.—The late Mr and Mrs Kirkpatrick were married in 1820. There was no antenuptial contract. Mrs Kirkpatrick died in November 1867, Mr Kirkpatrick in February 1871. There are nine children of the marriage, a son and eight daughters, who have all survived both parents. In 1821 Mrs Kirkpatrick had succeeded to and was infeft, as heiress to her aunt, in certain lands or portions of ground on the banks of the Clyde, which have latterly become of the value of about £50,000, in consequence of their becoming available for the purposes of the Clyde Navigation Trustees, who accordingly acquired the lands or portion thereof, by compulsory statutory purchase, in Mr Kirkpatrick's lifetime in 1870, for about £40,000.

In February 1872 the pursuer, as only son and heir of his mother, brought

No. 96.

Mar. 19, 1873.
Kirkpatrick v. Kirkpatrick's Trustees.

tion to have it found and declared that a deed executed by her, 's consent, in June 1866, had been revoked by a deed executed by h 1867, but that this latter deed, owing to the omission of the " in the dispositive clause, is ineffectual to convey the heritable h he is therefore entitled to succeed as his mother's heir-at-law. ial question in the case, of course, comes to be whether the omis- d "dispone" in the dispositive clause of the deed of 1867 is fatal s a conveyance of heritable property. That is a question upon o doubt. In Dallas's Styles, published upwards of a century ago, pone" will be found to occur not only in all the examples given or nsmissions by one vassal to another, but likewise in all examples n charters of lands, whether original or by progress. In Ross's e the history of our deeds is traced from the introduction of the lownwards, he gives, as the dispositive words of an original charter, essisse et disposuisse" (vol. ii. p. 157), and as the dispositive words ice by a vassal to his superior or other purchaser, "have sold, disponed, as I by these presents sell, alienate, and dispone"—(ib., and he says (p. 233), "the proper effective words in all cases of alienate, and dispone.'" The corresponding words given by all for gratuitous conveyances are, "give, grant, and dispone;" and is does not prove the word "dispone" to be essential, it goes to having come to be held to be so in the ruling clause of the deed, s not unnaturally thought that there ought to be some fixed term tter of solemnity, although in modern legislation a different view n, and by express statute the word "dispone" may be dispensed rtis causa deeds subsequent to the periods specified in the statute, said to be the position of this deed. The only authority cited sentiality of the word, previous to the statute, is a passage in Institutes (iii. 8, 20), in which he says that a man may effec- is heritable property by a testamentary—that is, a mortis causa ving his liferent and a power of revocation, provided he makes nveying clause, of the words 'give, grant, or dispone,' in place bequeath,'" and he refers to the case of Mitchell, 21st November nd M. 8082. But it appears to me that Mr Erskine was not here for a disposition, but explaining the necessity for de præsenti reyance in place of de futuro words, which would not do, and e question in the case of Mitchell, which he refers to, was simply ether a sum of money exceeding £100 Scots, handed over on particular purpose, was a de præsenti gift or a verbal legacy, which en inept. Mr Erskine, it is well known, never himself revised his publication, and he seems just to have transferred to it, in the the loose language of the report in the Faculty Collection. skine's death and the publication of the Institutes took place long se of Galloway, 12th January 1802, F. C., in which the passage is quoted, and it was nevertheless decided that the words "I transfer, and make over," although undoubtedly de præsenti t effectual to convey heritage. The Court doubted the efficacy of e on some additional grounds, but the report bears that they "were he proper terms of conveyance of heritage were not used," and ee successive reclaiming petitions against the interlocutor of the , who had held the deed ineffectual, were refused. That judg- nounced upwards of seventy years ago, and since then, besides uthorities which I shall not stop to canvass, we have the succes- of Sir Ilay Campbell, the first Lord Meadowbank, and the nion of the consulted Judges in Glassford's Trustees v. Glassford, 2 Macph. 1324. And I am free to confess that since I came to the -five years ago, I have never looked upon the essentiality of the e" in a conveyance of heritage as being a debatable question, and ubt at all that its omission in the deed now in dispute was a mission, either in the extended deed or in the draft, or it may be

No. 96.
Mar. 19, 1873.
Kirkpatrick v. Kirkpatrick's Trustees.

in both, for I do not suppose that any conveyancer in Scotland, and fa experienced conveyancers who prepared this deed, would ever have k left it out.

But however accidental the omission may have been, we cannot esc giving to that omission its legitimate effect, and that raises the import tion in this case, whether the deed of 1867, although ineffectual as a co revokes the deed of 1866, and so lets in the right of the heir-at-law.

By the deed of 1866 Mrs Kirkpatrick disponed and conveyed t heritable and personal estate then belonging or which might belong to h death to herself and her husband, and the survivor of them, whom f trustees, for the purpose of being converted into money, and the proceed among her eight daughters in the proportions therein mentioned.

The deed of 1867 likewise bears to convey (but without the word "c the whole heritable and personal estate then belonging or which might her at her death, to trustees, for payment of the rents and interest to band during his life, and for distribution in equal shares amongst her fo daughters of the fee of the personal estate, and also the fee of the estate, or the proceeds thereof if sold, subject to certain annuities to ea four younger daughters, certain bequests to servants, and an annuity of her only son (the pursuer) in the event (but in the event only) of his his present wife.

I shall notice the terms of these two deeds somewhat in detail herea the meantime I mention them thus generally for the purpose of e in the outset what the question between the parties really is, and u I think it turns, which may, I hope, tend to make my more detailed upon the deeds, and any observations I may make upon the authorit easily followed.

The deed of 1866 expressly revoked certain previous deeds and codic had been executed by the spouses. But the deed of 1867 contains n clause of revocation either of the deed of 1866 or of deeds generally. obvious, however, even from what I have already said, that if the dee were to take effect it would supersede the deed of 1866 in all its pa question is, whether the mere fact that the one deed was obviously in supersede the other operates a revocation of the earlier deed, so as to heir in heritage, although the later deed is a mere nullity as to the heri fails, indeed, substantially in its purposes, even to the personalty, s have occasion afterwards to explain.

Confessedly, there is no decision to that effect, and none of our ins writers—or any of our commentators upon them—have so laid it down question of intention undoubtedly. But even apart from authority, mother destines (as in this case) the whole means and estate which sh to her at her death for the benefit of her husband and family, with the of one member, and by a subsequent deed varies the distribution amo bringing in, for a certain limited benefit, the member who had been l cannot think that the implication that her intention was to die intest any blunder this last deed should prove ineffectual, so clearly recomme to our acceptance that we ought to require no precedent for adoptin ought even to disregard precedents which, by analogy at least, are oppo

An important question, however, in the case is, whether there are r direct precedents and authorities for the doctrine that where there is n revocation the implication is that the granter does not mean the prior d revoked unless the purposes of the deed intended to supersede it take e

That this is settled law, when the later deed is set aside on the head bed, is clear beyond dispute. Mr Erskine observes (iii. 8, 98) that, as t of a revocable deed is suspended till the granter's death, "therefore, w actually revoked, the heir's right is the same as if it had never existe quently he may pursue reduction of any subsequent deed in lecto to his p Upon which Lord Ivory remarks in his note, "This is true where th express revocation of the liege poustie deed." But where the revocation i conditional, "or where there is no express revocation, so that the p ıbsist but for the contrary provision of the deathbed deed, the heir suf- rejudice by the latter, and his right of challenge is consequently barred." in his Commentaries (vol. 1 edn. p. 95), says,—"The total exclusion of s right by a deed in liege poustie gives efficacy to a deed on deathbed that settlement,"—the heir having then no interest to reduce,—and he ıter alia) to the case of the Duke of Roxburghe, which I shall after- otice. After stating the law applicable to express revocations in differ- mstances, he says,—"5. Where the revocation is not express, but implied n the deathbed deed, it has been held that the testator is to be regarded g virtually declared the efficacy of the new deed to be a condition of the n of the old. This has been greatly doubted in point of principle. But l as a decided point not now to be shaken."

No. 96.

Mar. 19, 1873. Kirkpatrick v. Kirkpatrick's Trustees.

now that in the same high tribunal in which the doubts referred to were l it has been most strongly laid down that the doctrine which was is not now to be shaken. I refer of course to the observations made in se of Lords in the case of Coutts v. Craufurd (March 14, 1806, 5 Pat.), to the consideration of which I shall return immediately.

meantime I have to observe that the case of Rowan v. Alexander, 12th 75 (F. C. and M. 11,371, 2 Hailes, 659, and Brown's Sup. 423), was a sidered case. It is only necessary to glance at the account given of it in 's Leading Cases as to land rights (vol. i. p. 653), to see that the argu- both sides was able and exhaustive. The judgment of the Court was to on a reclaiming petition, full opinions being given at both advisings. desire no more reliable account of the decision than that given by Mr ch is quoted by Mr Ross (p. 659), and is in these terms:—"The defence sisted on was, that the first deed was not expressly revoked by the last; efore, although the last deed should be taken out of the way, the first ill subsist; and so the Lords found. They held a virtual revocation of not sufficient, and assoilzied the defender. And the decision was well ; for if a deathbed deed contains both a disposition and a revocation y be some reason for maintaining that though the disposition be set revocation may subsist, because they are distinct; et utile per inutile tur. But when the deathbed deed contains no revocation, and is cut the head of deathbed, it cannot be maintained, with plausibility, that to subsist as a revocation."

this to be a doctrine which is not now to be shaken, I pause to observe ve heard no ground stated in argument why it is to be limited to deeds on the head of deathbed. The Solicitor-General did not require from couragement I willingly gave him to develope a satisfactory ground for stinction, if it could have been presented to us. The cases of deathbed uld rather appear to me to be a fortiori authorities in a case like the The deathbed deed is good against all the world, if the heir does not personal privilege to reduce it. It might therefore be plausibly main- at he can reduce it so far as adverse to him, and yet leave the implied n untouched, because he has no interest to challenge that implication, than he has an interest to challenge an express revocation. But in the se the deed, which the heir founds upon as a revocation, is an absolute o far as the heritage is concerned. It requires no reduction, and accord- re is no conclusion for reduction of it. What the pursuer asks is, that be found and declared that the deed of 1867 "does not contain any veyance to the trustees therein named of the heritable property then ; to the said Mrs Jean Glas or Kirkpatrick, or belonging to her at the er death, and that the said last-mentioned deed was and is ineffectual the said heritable property, and does not convey and has not conveyed " Even a declarator was not necessary to establish the nullity in this if it had not been for the deed of 1866 the heir might, de plano, have titles to the heritable estate and pleaded the nullity, by exception, y challenge of these titles. And yet it is this null conveyance which ounds upon as a valid revocation of the deed of 1866. And the sum- ordingly, while concluding for a declarator of nullity, inconsistently

No. 96.

Mar. 19, 1873. Kirkpatrick v. Kirkpatrick's Trustees.

as I think, also concludes that it should be found and declared that the 1866 was "effectually revoked and recalled in toto by the said trust-dis and settlement, dated 4th March 1867."

If, therefore, the want of an express clause of revocation in the deed would have been fatal to the heir's challenge on the head of deathbed myself unable to apprehend the argument by which it is supposed deathbed cases are inapplicable here.

I am aware that it is said, and said correctly, that some of the noble including Lord Eldon, in the course of their observations in the case of Craufurd, expressed a difficulty in distinguishing between a case of imp a case of express revocation, and that Lord Eldon said repeatedly that if case had come before him in 1775 he could not have affirmed the ju and, from these observations, the inference is deduced that the princi lished by the case of Rowan, and cases which have followed upon it, c to be extended.

But it appears to me that to apply the doctrine of Rowan's case to th is not an extension but a legitimate application of the principle of tha to which Lord Eldon said in 1806,—"Whatever I might have been di decide in such a case as that of Rowan v. Alexander in 1775 I shoul of the last men in the world, in 1806, to disturb that decided case, in it appears to be a case of implied revocation"—(2 Bligh, Ap., 681). A he said,—"That case must now be held to stand upon this principle, testator did not mean the former deed to be revoked unless the second found to be good. But the same principle will not apply to a case o revocation"—(ib. p. 687).

The principle thus emphatically laid down by Lord Eldon, and stat Bell as not now to be shaken, applicable to the revocation implied in a deed, appears to me, as I have already indicated, to be necessarily, if not a applicable to the revocation implied in a null deed,—null at least as re heritage, which is all that the heir does or can claim. If this be so necessary to consider whether, if the principle had not been so estab would have recommended itself to one's acceptance or not.

But it is right to bear in mind that the question decided in Rowan's only referred to incidentally, and was not argued to the noble Lords i case. A narrow majority in this Court had decided, in Coutts' case, t where there was an express revocation, it could not be held to have tended that the revocation should operate if the deed in which it occ reduced by the heir. And that this result was arrived at by men whose were and are entitled to respect was attested by Lord Eldon himself, —"I think I never saw a more honourable specimen of judicial ab occurred in the discussion of this case when they formed the opinion this second appeal arises. They re-considered this case in all the point in which it had been taken up," &c.—(2 Bligh, Ap., p. 681). It took t of Lords some seven years and upwards, after the first hearing, to make minds to reverse that judgment, and the observations made by them, f time, during that long period, were not in every instance so obvio founded as their ultimate judgment must be held to be, by which the di between express and implied revocations was solemnly fixed.

For instance, on 11th July 1799 the Lord Chancellor, Rosslyn, after ex his high admiration of our Scottish law of deathbed (since abolished), says he had "always looked up to as of great excellence" (2 Bligh, Ap., goes on to say,—"It appears that the judgment of the Court below m proceeded on a fallacy. The deed in favour of Mr Coutts, being exec deathbed, was a nullity; the deed in favour of Sir Hugh was also a because it was revoked both expressly and by implication. But the C some singular way, by splicing these two nullities together, which take were of no effect, formed a deed carrying off the estate from the heir, against a positive law"—(ibid, p. 663). Now, I need not observe to yo ships that there were not two nullities to splice; for the deathbed d ot a nullity, although the heir had the privilege of challenging it if lship then observes upon the doctrine of approbate and reprobate :— is false reasoning. The Court cannot say to the heir-at-law, under do you claim? It is enough for her to say, God and nature have ir-at-law; shew me by what deed my right is cut off"—(ibid, p. 664).

e Lord Eldon came to observe upon the case in August 1803 the nsion under which these last remarks had been made had been cord his Lordship then observed :—"It has been correctly explained to word heir is understood in Scotland in a different sense from what country. In Scotland an heir may be a person pointed out by the of former settlements of an estate. In this country the heir takes lescent; and the person taking by a destination is considered as a
-as a person not taking in the quality of heir. Mrs Howieson was destined to the succession by the settlement of the estates prior to contended that the deed of 1771 was made a nullity by the deed of that the deed of 1793 also was a nullity, being executed upon death-hat you could not (in the phrase of the noble and learned Lord who this House considered this case), by splicing two nullities together, id conveyance of the estate to Mr Coutts"—(ib. p. 668, top).
rd Eldon, while it had been pointed out to him that in the very case House the heir suing was an heir not made by "God and nature," deed under which she claimed, still remained under the misappret a deathbed deed was a nullity which the Court below had spliced er nullity.
these instances merely as indicating that while I entertain the most espect for the noble Lords who dealt with the case of Coutts, and for Lord Eldon, whose deliberate judgment I should deem it heresy mpugn, yet I do not feel compelled to accept their or his incidental on Rowan's case, which was not argued to them, as equally conclu-judgment on the case. It humbly appears to me that, in speaking revocation, they, at no time, assigned any satisfactory reason why operate equally whether the new deed takes effect or not, and, init is not clear that they are uniformly referring to deeds which did fect. For instance, Lord Chancellor Rosslyn, speaking of Rowan's —"The Court of Session have made a distinction between an express and an implied one, which I confess I do not feel. If a person sposition of his estate, and locks it up in his repositories, and at the ten years makes another disposition of the same estate, I should be that the former deed was revoked, and that the posterior one must "—(ib. p. 662). Now, I do not think the Judges in Rowan's case dissented from that observation. The posterior deed would certainly, supposed, have taken effect, and on that supposition, of course cadit nciple of Rowan's case came afterwards to be reconsidered, both in and in the House of Lords, in the case of the Duke of Roxburgh v.

13th December 1816, F. C., affirmed on appeal 25th May 1820 (2 ., 619, and 1 Ross's Leading Cases, p. 659). In that case the Duke ed a settlement of his estate in 1790 in favour of his sisters, reservto alter. In 1803 and 1804 he executed a trust-deed and deed of s, settling his estates in a manner inconsistent with the deed of 1790, t any express clause of revocation. The heir-male of the previous brought a reduction of the trust-deed and deed of instructions, as a deathbed, and at the same time founded on these deeds as an implied of the deed of 1790. Lord Alloway, Ordinary, found, "that if the leed in question were set aside, the deed of 1790, which is not ex-oked by the deathbed deed, must exclude the succession of the heirs and therefore that the pursuer, the heir of entail, had no interest to at reduction.
llies, in giving his opinion in favour of the interlocutor, observed :—

No. 96.

Mar. 19, 1873. Kirkpatrick v. Kirkpatrick's Trustees.

"If there had been an express revocation the case must have been ruled Coutts v. Craufurd, but being an implied revocation it is ruled by Rowa Alexander. That case settled that species of question. Stare decisis is a material in matters of such nicety. In that light Lord Eldon viewed t decision in Coutts's case. Are we now to go back upon it? But furthe Rowan's case were now open for decision, I should be for deciding it in same way. I think it a sound notion that the implied revocation is conditio if the new settlement take effect, and otherwise not"—(1 Ross, p. 665).

The interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary was adhered to by the Court, an reclaiming petition was afterwards refused. Upon appeal the judgment affirmed (25th May 1820), Lord Eldon, who was still Chancellor, observing "As to the question of implied revocation, if we are to act on the maxim stare decisis the judgment cannot be disturbed. The deed in liege pou reserves a power of revocation; by making another disposition under authority of the power it must be supposed that the disponer intended to something effectual; and it cannot be implied that by the exercise of the po he meant to revoke it"—(2 Bligh, Ap., 654, and 1 Ross, 665).

Here it will be observed that while Lord Eldon refers to the point as decid he also enunciates the principle on which Rowan's case proceeded, in te which carry conviction of its soundness, and this as a principle not confine deathbed cases, but of general application, which emboldens me to think it improbable that if Lord Eldon had had to hear and decide Rowan's case as d berately as he heard and decided the case of Coutts the result might have bee affirmance. He hesitated for years before deciding that even an express revoca would do in a deed which failed in its purpose, and it would have been an and natural transition from that state of mind to have come to the conclu that where the clauses from which the revocation is implied are swept away implication from them is necessarily swept away also.

But the principle of Rowan's case is not only, in its nature, applicable to a cases as well as to deathbed cases, but it has been judicially so recognised given effect to. The case of Dundas v. Dundas (1 Ross, 667), is importan two respects, 1st, as recording the opinion of Judges of great eminence, were no parties to the decision in Rowan's case—particularly of Lord Braxf —in favour of the principle of that decision; and 2d, as shewing that nei in this Court nor in the House of Lords has the principle been confine deathbed cases.

In 1768 Sir Laurence Dundas had executed an entail of his whole Sc estates, both those which he had, in his son's marriage articles, destined to son in liferent and the heirs-male of the marriage in fee, and those he had sequently purchased, reserving power to revoke or alter. In 1779 Sir Laur executed an English will, bearing,—"I do give, devise, and bequeath unto dear son, Thomas Dundas, all my real estate in England, Ireland, and Scotl as also in the island of Dominica in the West Indies, and elsewhere, not inclu in the settlement made on his marriage, and all my personal property, of w nature and kind soever; and I do hereby revoke all former and other wills me heretofore made, and constitute my dear son my sole executor." On death of Sir Laurence his son claimed the fee of the estates (except those destin by the marriage articles), on the footing that the will revoked the entail of 17 both expressly and by implication. There were thus two questions—1 whether the word "wills" comprehended the entail? and 2d, supposing it not, whether the will of 1779 revoked the entail of 1768 by implication?

At the advising Lord Braxfield observed as to this last point,—"Virt revocation would not do, because that depends on the validity of the last dee And again,—"If it stood on implied revocation it would not do. Second settlement must be good in order to extinguish the first." On the same point Lo Henderland said,—"Bequest is fee-simple. This is not good by law of Scotla and not an implied revocation"—(1 Ross, Leading Cases, Land Rights, 672-3

On the question as to the meaning of the word "wills," a majority held t word to be so used as to comprehend the entail, and consequently that it w expressly revoked. The judgment was reversed on appeal, Lord Thurlow

No. 96.

Mar. 19, 187
Kirkpatrick
Kirkpatrick'
Trustees.

ving,—"A testament is not good by the law of Scotland to convey land; t, supposing it were, the will here in question would not be sufficient even in gland to revoke the deed formerly made. The deed of entail, although pressly revocable, declares that it shall stand good, unless taken away by a d under his hand. The natural way of doing this was by recalling the in- ument, and saying explicitly 'I revoke the deed.' We can only adopt an plied revocation ex necessitate. We cannot raise conjectures out of the deed lf. No doubt we must take his own meaning of the words; but the expres- n 'other wills' means other instruments of a similar nature—other testa- entary acts—not special settlements of a particular estate"—(1 Ross, 674).

This case, it will be observed, had nothing to do with the law of deathbed. n English will was executed according to the law of the place where it was de. It was good to convey personal estate wherever situated, and validly pointed an executor. It bore, likewise, expressly to give to the son all the ter's real estate in Scotland, so far as not included in the son's marriage tlement. But the words of express revocation being inapplicable to the entail, d the attempt to convey the heritable estate being a failure—just as it is in the sent case—it was held that the prior deed was not revoked by implication, hich was just, in other words, holding that the implied revocation (which in lf was clear enough) was to be construed as conditional—if the new deed uld take effect.

The case of Henderson v. Wilson and Melvilles, decided in the House of ds in March 1802 (1 Ross, 594), is also important as a case in which the trine of implied revocation was discussed and dealt with as a doctrine not fined to cases of deathbed, and in which the result was, as in Dundas's case, t, although the terms of the latter deed were quite incompatible with the ms of the prior deed, there was held to be no implied revocation, because the w deed was inept for its purpose. The first deed in that case was a deed of tail, dated in 1757, in the form of a procuratory of resignation, duly tested cording to the law of Scotland. The second deed was a deed of entail in the ne form, of the same lands, dated in 1763, varying the destination, but thenticated not according to the Scots law but according to the law of England, here it was executed. The second deed, although inconsistent with the first, s held not to revoke the first deed by implication. No doubt there is this ference between the case of Henderson and the case of Dundas, that in Dun- s's case the English will was a good instrument to convey the personal estate luded in it, whereas in Henderson's case, as the procuratory of resignation lated solely to the heritable estate, it was not good for any purpose. The cond procuratory could not, however, be more inept as to the heritable estate an the second deed is here—the want of a dispositive clause being as clearly a lility as a defect in the testing-clause. The Court, on 25th June 1795, found t the destination of the estate fell to be governed by the deed of 1757. rwards, in January, and again in February 1797, they found that the deed 1763, being executed according to the lex loci, contained a sufficient declara- n of the granter's will to vary the destination in the deed of 1757. The ct of the judgment of the House of Lords upon appeal was virtually to return the judgment of the Court below of 25th June 1795, Lord Chancellor Thur- w observing as to the deed of 1763,—"Then it is said to be a revocation. t how can a void deed be a revocation? The operation of a void settlement s be no more to revoke than to convey."

In the case of Leith v. Leith's Trustees, 6th June 1848 (10 D. 1137, and 1 s, 691), Sir George Leith had, in 1835, executed a mortis causa trust-deed d settlement of his whole property, heritable and moveable, for payment of annuity to his widow, and division of the free residue among his sons in cer- n proportions. In July 1841 Sir George executed, in Scotland, a holograph ll, altering the proportions in which his heritable and personal estates were be divided among his family. In December of the same year, being then in gland, he executed a second will in the English form, which, after revoking ll former and other wills, codicils, and testamentary dispositions," bore to be settlement of his whole estate, real and personal, wherever situated,—expressed a special desire that his houses in Melville Street, Edinburgh, and in H burgh, should be held for behoof of his wife in liferent, and his son Alex in fee,—bequeathed certain legacies to his wife, besides an annuity of the amount as formerly, and directed that the residue, whether real or person cluding certain Scotch heritable securities of large amount, should go to hi Alexander and George, in the proportion of two-thirds to the former an third to the latter.

No. 96.

Mar. 19, 1873. Kirkpatrick v. Kirkpatrick's Trustees.

The question at issue was, whether the English will revoked the Scotch deed. The effect of that revocation would have been that all the Scotch age, including the heritable securities, would have gone to the heir-at-law, English will was clearly inhabile as a conveyance of the Scotch heritage. heir-at-law pleaded, 1st, that the will contained an express and effectual of revocation; 2d, that the contents of the will necessarily implied revoc as "by that deed the testator disposes of his whole property, heritabl moveable, exactly as if his former settlements had been cancelled or throw the fire"—(1 Ross, 695).

On the other hand, it was maintained that there was no effectual revoc and it was specially pleaded, 1st, that a Scotch conveyance of heritage cou be revoked by a foreign instrument, which, although authenticated accord the law of the place where it was made, was not authenticated accordi the law of Scotland; 2d, that the words of the revoking clause did not apply to and comprehend the trust-disposition.

By a majority of the whole Judges it was held that the instrument was to have revoked the trust-disposition had its terms been explicit, but th words of the revoking clause did not apply to it, and that the one deed d effectually revoke the other.

It is obvious to remark upon this case of Leith, 1st, that the terms of may be called the dispositive clause of the English will were broad enou comprehend the whole Scotch heritage, and that the reason why it was n ried by the will was simply that the deed was not in the form required l Scotch law for that purpose; and 2d, that if an inept conveyance, in the deed, of the heritage conveyed by the prior deed, operates as an implied r tion of the prior deed, the majority who held the foreign instrument hal revoke must also have held that there was in that case revocation; and ye view, although stated for the heir, was not entertained or given effect to b Judges.

These three last cases had no relation to the law of deathbed; and fro review of the authorities I arrive at the conclusion that the principle of Ro case was neither in its own nature peculiar to deathbed deeds, nor has i been understood or dealt with as being so. Lord Fullerton (than whom we had no abler Judge) expounded the principle in Leith's case as one of g application to testamentary deeds, and none of his brethren controverted he said upon that point, although an opposite view might have been suf to warrant an opposite result to that which was arrived at. His Lordship "Revocation may be of two kinds. One when, without any express re the former deed, the granter executes another essentially inconsistent with for instance, conveying to a particular disponee heritage which he had by a deed conveyed to a different party. The effect of this, which is some termed an implied revocation, will, of course, depend on the efficiency o second conveyance; and in the case of Scotch heritage, if this second d defective in any of the forms requisite to support a disposition of heritage b law of Scotland, the first deed will remain effectual. Without embarrassing selves with the authorities of the civil law on this point I think we may hold that, by the law of Scotland, a revocation of this kind is not effectu less the deed from which it is implied be effectual to convey the subject of veyance to the new disponee. The disponer, though intending to prefe second disponee to the first, is not held absolutely to extinguish the right first disponee, and so to let in the heir-at-law in the event of the second failing of effect. In cases of this kind, then, the efficacy of the second d a revocation must depend on its efficacy as a conveyance, and in this se said that a revocation, in order to be effectual, requires to be executed a way as to be capable of affecting Scotch heritage."

opinion was delivered in a case which was not the case of a deathbed Every word of it is literally applicable to the case now before us. If it been regarded as a sound opinion the decision in Leith's case ought to en the reverse of what it was.

us now look back for a little to the two deeds of 1866 and 1867, and see r there is anything in the nature or terms of these deeds to exclude the bility of the principle which, I think, I have shewn to be firmly estab- in our law and practice.

ough the deed of 1866 were to be regarded as an inter vivos deed which mediate effect, I do not think that that would affect the result, although t affect the mode of stating and considering the question. The only pro- onveyed or attempted to be conveyed by both deeds was the property of e. The only party who could have pretended to found upon it as an vos deed was the husband, and as to him it was a donatio inter virum et , revocable by the wife at her pleasure. Let the nature of the deed of e what it may, she had full power, without the aid of any conventional tion, and without the consent of her husband, to execute the deed of 1867. ould have been the case although that deed had been a delivered deed. ere was no delivery. As an inter vivos deed, delivery was essential to its into operation. The deed was not a mutual deed in any legal or even le sense of the term. It bears, indeed, to have been granted "with joint ; and assent, for certain good and onerous causes and considerations." law cannot infer from these vague and general words any onerous con- on to have been given by the husband to the wife, where none is speci- The husband was a mere consenter to the deed. He conveyed nothing to e, and it is out of the question to hold the deed either to have been or to be a mutual deed which required no delivery.

, as I understand, the foundation of the opinion just delivered by the ustice-Clerk that the effect of this deed of 1866 was at once to divest the one-half of her heritable estate, and to invest the husband in the fee of lf, with an irrevocable right, in the event of his survivorship, to the fee ther half. Surely, if that was so, it was a deed which required delivery. e of a wife stripping herself of her heritable estate to the value of some 0, or, as the case might be, to double that value, in favour of the hus- not the easiest conceivable case for establishing delivery. Even judi- ification on oath of such a deed, for which no consideration had been would not presume delivery to the husband—(Lady Bathgate v. Cochrane, 1685, M. 17,004 and 6077). A husband may be presumed custodier wife, but the wife cannot be presumed custodier for the husband of a us inter vivos deed, in the husband's favour, flowing from herself. Here no averment whatever of delivery. It is not even said that the deed from her hand to his, or that it was not found in her own repositories at th. As Lord Fullerton said in Leith's case,—"While the deed is retained party himself it confers no right of any kind,—it is the evidence of no right kind. It has no existence of any kind except in relation to the party him- d in regard to him it is just as much part of his moveable property as if er or parchment had never been written upon"—(1 Ross, pp. 714-15).

ink we may dismiss this view, therefore, of an immediate divestiture of e to the extent of creating a pro indiviso fee, and a right of survivorship l that is founded on it, as wanting its very foundation, even if it would se have aided the heir's plea of revocation, which I think it would not.

ever it may affect the argument, I cannot doubt that the deed of 1866 its terms, a mortis causa deed, and revocable by Mrs Kirkpatrick, in its as well as upon the ground of donation. The dispositive clause is neces- n the present tense, as by our law and practice every such clause, whether is causa or inter vivos deeds, must be. But what it conveys is "All and the property, means, debts, and estates, heritable and moveable, real and l, presently belonging to me, or which may belong to me, the said Mrs

No. 96.

Mar. 19, 1873. Kirkpatrick v. Kirkpatrick's Trustees.

Jean Glas, otherwise Kirkpatrick, at the time of my death." The conveyance is "to and in favour of us, the said John Kirkpatrick and Mrs Jean Glas or Kirkpatrick, and the survivor of us, whom failing," the trustees therein named, and the survivors or survivor, "and the heir of such survivor, in trust for the uses, ends, and purposes after-mentioned, viz. in the first place, that the said trustees shall pay and make over to our eight daughters," who are then named, in certain specified proportions, the proceeds of the property, means, and estate thereby disponed and assigned, and the whole rents and interest thereof, under deduction of the expenses of management: "And (second) that the said trustees, so soon as they can do so advantageously, of which they shall be the sole judges, shall sell and dispose of the whole estate, property, and effects, heritable and moveable, hereby conveyed," and pay over the proceeds to the daughters in the specified proportions.

Then there comes an express clause of revocation of previous deeds, which the experienced conveyancers who prepared all the deeds knew quite well how to express when the parties wished it. "And I hereby, with consent foresaid, revoke the disposition executed by me and the said John Kirkpatrick, my husband, on the 18th October 1830, and two additions or codicils thereto, dated respectively the 7th January 1856 and 2d April 1863. And I also, with consent foresaid, revoke the disposition executed by me and my said husband on the 1st day of May 1863." This is followed by a reservation of power to the spouses jointly, or to the survivor of them, to alter or revoke, and to sell or dispose of the whole subjects, heritable and moveable, at pleasure. There is no clause dispensing with delivery; but that, although a usual clause of style, is not essential to the effect of a mortis causa deed found in the granter's repositories at death, as has long been decided—(Stark v. Kincaid, 11th Dec. 1679, M. 17,002; Cannon v. Gordon, July 1687, 2 Brown's Sup. 108; Young v. Wauchop's Next of Kin, 5th February 1695, 4 Brown's Sup. 25; Porterfield v. Stewart, 15th May 1821, 1 S. and D. 9—N. E. 6). The clause may possibly have been omitted in the present instance just to avoid even the semblance of an immediate divestiture in favour of the husband, either of one-half or the whole of the property which then belonged or might belong to his wife at her death. The scheme of the deed was to give the husband the power of altering if he was the survivor, but to settle the distribution among the family if he either did not survive, or, surviving, did not alter. The eventual rights thus conferred on the husband did not make the deed the less a mortis causa settlement of Mrs Kirkpatrick's whole heritable and moveable estate, then belonging or which might belong to her at her death, which are the ordinary words of style of all such settlements.

Accordingly, when we come to the deed of 1867 we find that it commences in the very terms of a deed which had not been preceded by any inter vivos deed by the wife which had already taken effect. It does not bear to convey or distribute any property or estate belonging to the spouses jointly. It bears to be granted by the wife with the consent of her husband, in order to regulate the "management and distribution of the means and estate of me, the said Mrs Jean Kirkpatrick, after my death." It then bears to give, grant, assign, convey, and make over to the trustees therein named,—who are not altogether the same with the trustees in the first deed,—"all and sundry the property, means, debts, and estates, heritable and moveable, real and personal, presently belonging or which shall belong to me, the said Mrs Jean Glas or Kirkpatrick, at the time of my death," in trust, 1st and 2d, for payment of debts, expenses, and burdens; 3d, "that the said trustees shall make payment to the said John Kirkpatrick, my husband, during all the days of his life after my decease, in case he shall survive me, of the whole rents and income of the heritable estate, and of the interest or annual proceeds of the moveable means and estate hereby conveyed;" 4th, of an annuity of £15 a-year to a servant (Alison Sheriff), if in the service at the death of the survivor of the spouses; 5th, of a legacy of £200 to another servant (Margaret Galloway) on the same condition, and of such other legacies as Mrs Kirkpatrick might leave by writing under her hand, formal or informal; 6th, on the death of the survivor of the spouses to dispone to the four eldest rs therein named, equally, share and share alike, or the survivors or sur- them, the whole lands and heritages thereby conveyed, under burden nuity of £100 yearly to each of the four younger daughters, also therein "and which annuity shall be made a real burden upon the lands so dis- ' and also under burden of payment to the pursuer, John Kirkpatrick, ould survive his wife, of an annuity of £100; declaring that if the lands itages were sold during the lifetime of the spouses or survivor of them, much should be sold by the trustees as not to leave sufficient security annuities, then corresponding annuities should be purchased, and which s should be accepted in full of all claims, and if any of these annuitants their legal rights then their annuities should be held as revoked. This ther bore—"Reserving always full power to me at any time of my life, n on deathbed, by myself alone, to add to, alter, or revoke these presents, ı whole or in part, and to sell, burden, or dispose of the whole subjects, e and moveable, hereby conveyed, or any part thereof, at pleasure: And ıse with the delivery hereof: And I consent to registration," &c.

here we have as distinct a case as could well occur of a mother convey- mortis causa deed, in 1866, the whole means and estate which should o her at her death, for the benefit of her husband and family, and within : eight months thereafter, while the state of the family was precisely the formerly, varying the distribution among the beneficiaries by the mortis ed of 1867, which, by an unexpected and unintentional blunder or cleri- sion of the writer of the deed, has totally failed in its purpose as regards itable estate worth £50,000, and substantially failed in its purposes er. All the nine children who were alive at the date of the first deed ve at the date of the second deed. Neither death nor marriage had in- l in the family. The wife must have known that although everything ; in the husband's power by the first deed if he happened to be the sur- is great age, which, although not stated in the record, we cannot help rsonally aware of, made his survivance very problematical, and excluded, rents, any probability of a second family, or of his desiring to do other- an to acquiesce in or vary the distribution among the existing family, re his own children. The question is, whether this is a case in which ıter of the second deed, notwithstanding that she has purposely left out)king clause she had inserted in her former deed, must be held to have d two separate and distinct acts of the mind—first, to revoke absolutely ll events the provisions she had previously made for her husband and and second, to prefer the heir-at-law, whom she was cutting off with a ıd contingent annuity, to her eight other children, among whom, although ly, she was still proposing to distribute her estate. It might have turned . the second deed had been executed on deathbed, and if that contingency urred it is undoubted that Rowan's case would have been directly applic- .t would be very anomalous if a different principle were applicable in the tances which have actually occurred, and I have heard no intelligible stated why this should be so. The result would not only be to bring in ; but to produce substantial intestacy. It is not stated in the record s Kirkpatrick had any personal estate exclusive of the jus mariti of her l; but in answer to my question it was said at the bar that there might)0 in that position. Supposing this to be so, it is obvious that, after ıg for the annuity of £15 a-year to one servant, the legacy of £200 to , and expenses, there can be little or nothing left. Except upon the that her heritable estate was effectually conveyed by her deed of 1867, kpatrick would never have divided and distributed her means and estate id by that deed at all. We have no means of knowing what would have r will as to the personal estate if the heritable estate had not been in-

Without the heritable estate, or its value, the deed is not her will to ct whatever. The whole distribution is necessarily a failure, and the on of the former deed is therefore proposed to be implied from a new hich substantially has no effect at all.

ıst not be lost sight of throughout that the question relates to the intention of Mrs Kirkpatrick, the granter of the deed, who had everything in her power. Did she mean that if the deed of 1867 proved a failure there was to be no distribution whatever of her estate among her family? The intention of the husband has very little to do with the matter, except upon the untenable footing that he had become, by the former deed, irrevocably vested with the fee of one-half of his wife's means and estate in her lifetime, and right to the fee of the whole if he happened to be the survivor.

No. 96.

Mar. 19, 1873. Kirkpatrick v. Kirkpatrick's Trustees.

Even in that view no plea of personal bar, founded on the husband's consent to the new deed, can affect the question whether the wife's implied revocation is to be construed as conditional on the new deed taking effect. And this leads me to repeat, what I suggested in the course of the argument, that I do not think we have before us all the parties interested even in the general discussion —and still less in a question with the husband's disponees,—if anything is to be held to turn either upon personal bar or upon mutual agreement between the spouses under the deed of 1867. The trustees under both deeds are called as defenders, but no appearance has been made for the trustees under the deed of 1866, and it does not appear that any of them have accepted. The only parties judicially defending the action are the two accepting trustees under the deed of 1867, viz., Miss Annabella Kirkpatrick, the eldest daughter, and Sir James Alexander who can neither act nor plead without her concurrence, although he might, no doubt, bring the trust to a dead-lock by dissenting from her views. Now, the four eldest daughters have an interest in maintaining their father's deed of 1868, adversely to the interests of the four younger daughters, as beneficiaries under the deed of 1866. If, then, their father were to be held excluded —as I understand some of your Lordships think he was,—from claiming under the deed of 1866, in respect of his consent to the deed of 1867, an important question would arise between him and the four younger daughters, as beneficiaries under the deed of 1866, whether any plea of that kind could go beyond discharging his own interest under the primary destination, to him, in the deed, leaving the trust and trust purposes, to which that destination was introductory, in full force. The father may, possibly, have agreed to give up his own place in that destination, or barred himself from taking advantage of it by becoming a party to the deed of 1867. But I cannot at present see how this could evacuate the substitution, or conditional institution, in favour of the trustees, of whom he was not even one, or defeat any other rights under the deed of 1866 than his own.

Apart from that, however, which cannot be decided except in an action in which the four younger daughters shall be duly represented, I am of opinion that, although the powers of the deed of 1867, if they had taken effect, would no doubt have superseded the provisions of the deed of 1866, with which they are throughout incompatible, the legal and true construction of the deed of 1866 is that this was only to be the result if this latter deed took effect. I should have thought this the sound construction if the question had been open; but I think it has not been open for nearly a century, and that the whole cases on the subject, during that period, go to fix a principle peculiarly applicable to this case, reasonable in itself, and which it would be perilous to depart from.

Lord Benholme.—If there be anything certain at all in this case it is that during the later years of the lives of Mr and Mrs Kirkpatrick their enixa voluntas was to disinherit their son, and to give their heritable property to their daughters. I do not mean to say that intention is the only matter to be considered here, or indeed the chief matter. What has been effectually done, if anything has been done, ought to rule our decision. But if we come to consider the question of revocation, especially of implied revocation, I cannot throw out of view so clear, so consistent, so determined an intention as that of this husband and wife. I do not mean to inquire into the motives, or rather the justice, of that determination. I do not think we have anything to do with that. But I am clear as to the fact that it was their main intention,—I would almost say, their only object,—in the deeds which they executed towards the end of their life, to bring about that result. In the deed of 1866 that object is pro-

No. 96.

Mar. 19, 1873. Kirkpatrick v. Kirkpatrick's Trustees.

r by a substitution subjoined to the conveyance to the husband and wife survivor. The intention is distinctly expressed, although in somewhat terms, in the deed of 1867. The daughters are not preferred in the ık as in the former deed; there was a change of intention as to the to be given to each of the daughters; but as to the son there was no n whatever. I am quite clear that the second deed, as the law of Scotıd at the time when it came into operation, is ineffectual to convey that ; but I am also satisfied that the lady never knew of the defect, and lverted to it during her life; for, had she done so, can it be doubted would have just made another deed containing the word "dispone"? as certain as possible. I am equally clear that the husband had disthe omission after his wife's death, and that his only object in executing l deed, which is more especially under reduction, was to supply the defect ırmer deed, and to carry out effectually the intention of both the parties leed. That was the object of it. I think it must have been executed ısband under a strong conviction of his obligation to supply the unıal defect in the deed that his wife and he had executed the year before. he held himself bound to do so. I think that in honour he was bound ; and I think that by the deed of 1866 he was entitled and enabled to The deed of 1867 is ineffectual to convey the heritage. Had it been to convey the heritage that would have constituted in itself, if not a ɔn, a supersession of the former deed. It is a maxim well known in the law, and established in our law, that a second will, rightly made, rite puts an end to the first. It seems to me to be an equally clear maxim the second deed is null and void as to the subject of conveyance it can ı effect, in that way, against the first deed. Its power of revocation session depends on its own efficacy; and if it be supposed inefficient to it can neither revoke nor supersede. I speak of the case where the ontains no clause of revocation, and nothing amounting to a substantive on of the intention of the party to revoke the first deed,—where all that aid is, that the second deed, had it been effectual, would have put an end rst,—the conclusion being that, if it is not effectual, it cannot have that

Deas has gone over the authorities upon this point in such detail that I would be inexcusable on my part to resume that discussion. To my ad the ground in law of the effect which a second deed, well executed, n any former deed relative to the same subject, is quite clear. I think inction between an express revocation and an implied revocation is equally law. In the present case I should have been very glad indeed could I t my finger upon a single clause in the second deed intimating a revocathe first deed. I should have been very glad to think that the lady had second thought of her duty towards her son, and had intended to revoke inherison of him which had marked her former deeds. I am sorry to nnot find that, or anything approaching to an express revocation. And, I think the able argument which we had from the bar resolved into this, nust be held to constitute an implied revocation,—implied not from its icacy as a conveyance, for that is given up, but from something else in l. A good deal was said upon the suggestion that there might be moveperty effectually conveyed by the second deed. What has that to do ıe heritable property? Nothing whatever. Nor can I discover any e argument from which implied revocation can be inferred. The hope- of the argument in favour of implied revocation was impressed on my nd by the footing on which the Lord Justice-Clerk, in his able opinion, put the idea of revocation. It was the clause of reservation in the deed upon which he especially founded. Now, let me read the clause of ion which is supposed to revoke the deed of 1866, for so it must be put: ving always full power to me at any time of my life, and even on death- myself alone, to add to, alter, or revoke these presents, either in r in part." Now, this is a clause empowering the lady to revoke the at she was executing; but how can that be supposed to have anything to do with the revocation of the deed of 1866? She goes on:—"And burden, or dispose of the whole subjects, heritable and moveable, here veyed, or any part thereof, at pleasure." This is plainly an addition reservation as to revoking the deed of 1867, and in another form reser power to herself, notwithstanding that deed, to burden these estates. I never did burden them; and what is the effect of reserving a power if it exercised? Now, here is a clause of reservation upon which nothing i It may ascertain the powers of the lady, especially in reference to the d was then executing; but if these powers are never in any respect ex which it is clear they were not, can they be held to constitute a revocati former deed which is not mentioned at all? At this late period of the d hardly able, and I am certainly not willing, to detain your Lordships length, but it appears to me that this is a case in which there is not plausible argument in favour of implied revocation. It would operate c to the intention and the wishes of both parents. The conclusion arrive the pursuers is this, that the lady died intestate; for that is the resu notwithstanding the * entire voluntas* expressed in the deed of 1866 in fa her husband, in the first place, and ultimately in favour of her daught spite of the second deed in favour of the daughters, with a reservation in of her husband for his liferent; and in spite of the husband's deed i execution of his wife's intentions, which had been defeated by the unl nullity of her second deed; in spite of all these deeds, in which both concurred in the most express manner in disinheriting the son and ins the daughters, your Lordships are asked to hold that her intention was to the first deed, and consequently to cause the husband's deed to be useless fo pose in which both concurred. I am humbly of opinion that the Lord Or interlocutor ought to be altered, and the defenders assoilzied from the re

No. 96.

Mar. 19, 1873.
Kirkpatrick v. Kirkpatrick's Trustees.

Lord Neaves.—1. The first question in this case is whether the deed contains an effectual disposition of heritage. I am of opinion that it d The want of the word "dispone" seems to me to be fatal to it in that I hold that under the former law it was definitively fixed by dicta, de and practice that the word was essentially necessary to such a disposition law is now changed, but it needed the intervention of the Legislature t such a conveyance as this valid.

2. The next question is whether, after the execution of that deed, the 1867, the previous deed of 1866 still subsisted as a disposition of heritag question is one of nicety and difficulty; but I am of opinion that the ance in the deed of 1866 did not survive the execution of the deed of 18 was wholly revoked or superseded by that deed.

The question seems to involve two inquiries,—1st, what was the nature deed of 1866; 2d, what acts or writings will revoke or supersede a pre-e deed of that kind.

(1) The deed of 1866 is rather anomalous. I consider it myself as pa inter vivos deed, intended to take immediate effect, as regards existing pr of Mrs Kirkpatrick. It is certainly not in the usual form of a mortis deed. According to the law of Scotland as it then existed every deed c ing heritage was in the form of a de præsenti conveyance; and it was chie the subordinate clauses that its operation was shewn to be prospective n Those clauses were mainly a reservation of liferent and a dispensation wi livery. No such clauses exist here; and there is the special peculiarity th deed is in favour of both the spouses and the survivor. Now, although possible that testators may have granted deeds that were absurd in this respec natural presumption seems to be that such a deed of the granter to himself o self is to take immediate effect, and is not to be suspended till the granter's d

At the same time I do not think that although the deed of 1866 were h be mortis causa this would make any essential difference in the case.

It is clear either way that the deed of 1866 was revocable by the join sent of the two spouses. This is expressly declared in it. But, in fact, pendently of any declaration to that effect, the deed was revocable by th

No. 96.

Mar. 19, 1873. Kirkpatrick v. Kirkpatrick's Trustees.

s Kirkpatrick by her own act alone, as being a donation inter virum et wem, which is always revocable by our law.

Further, it is clear that by the deed of 1866 any right conferred on Mr Kirk- rick, whether inter vivos or mortis causa, was not of the nature of a trust t, but was a right of fee, a joint fee during the joint lives of the spouses, l a sole fee in the event of his survivance. The question now is, if that right joint or sole fee continued to exist after the execution of the deed of 1867.

2) The question thus raised, whether, namely, the right of fee bestowed n Mr Kirkpatrick by the deed of 1866 was revoked, surrendered, or super- ed by the deed of 1867, involves the consideration of the principles applic- e to the extinction of such rights.

t seems clear that the rules of law or conveyancing applicable to the creation onstitution of heritable rights do not necessarily apply to their revocation or inction. This matter was fully discussed in the case of Leith, 10 Dunlop, 4; and it was there held by a majority of the Judges that a good conveyance Scotch heritage might if revocable be validly revoked, even as regards that ange, by a will executed in England in the English form, though it was also d there that revocation was not intended by the English deed, and therefore not take place.

The general doctrine there promulgated was that revocations of revocable ts do not require the same technical language as deeds of disposition, or in- d any technical language at all, but that their purpose is effected if it be ly declared. It must, of course, be declared in a deed that is adequate to ess the testator's intention and to shew his will. A deed, therefore, that wholly improbative, that was not the testator's deed at all, would be equal o deed, and would have no effect.

Here, however, this cannot be said. The deed of 1867 is quite a good and ative deed to speak the mind of the testator. In so far as anything could ne by her mere will this deed does it. It fails, indeed, on one point, viz., the conveyance of her heritage, as to which her will is clearly disclosed, but the denied her the power of disposing of her heritage by will. That inability, wer, will not prevent the Court from seeing what her will was, and giving ect so far as they can do so.

t seems to follow, from what has above been said, that if a testator says ly, in negative words, "I no longer wish my former deed to take effect," is enough to revoke it. This would seem to reduce the matter here to simple inquiry,—Did the deceased continue to will that the deed of 1866 ld take effect, or did she change her mind, and sufficiently indicate that nge?

t it is said that there is no express revocation of the prior deed, and conse- ly it is argued that the revocation, being merely implied, is contingent, and the first deed can only cease to operate if the second conveyance takes t. An implied revocation, it is contended, has in it an implied condition that testator's manifest will to discard the first settlement is not to be carried out the new conveyance comes into operation.

greatly doubt the soundness of this view, and I consider that the transfer- of it to cases like the present from cases of deathbed is not a legitimate of reasoning. There is a great difference between the two situations. In of deathbed the deed objected to is not null, but merely reducible at the instance. There the dispositive clause of the deed is, ex hypothesi, not adequate to express the will of the deceased, but adequate also to carry out will by a good feudal conveyance but for the extraneous circumstance that ill of the disease of which he died. That ground of challenge can only ried out by the reduction of the deed, and if the only revocation of a pre- deed is contained in and by virtue of the dispositive clause of the new the heir, by the very act of reducing that clause, would reduce the only ation which the deed contains, and would thus set up the prior deed by of his own reduction of the essential part of the later one. This state of s, therefore, destroys his interest in the reduction he is attempting. But the heir needs no reduction. The later deed stands as a clear expression of the testator's intention, as a complete expression of will, and its only defect is that the will is not a habile mode of effecting the alienation of heritage. It may be, and it is, quite effectual as a declaration of will, and the Court are bound to give effect in that way as far as they can do so, and may no longer be bound to uphold a previous settlement which the testator did not ultimately wish to carry out; nor is it easy to see that they are entitled to import into the deed by implication a condition which the testator has not expressed, and which may be quite adverse to his wishes.

No. 96.

Mar. 19, 1873. Kirkpatrick v. Kirkpatrick's Trustees.

I am not satisfied that any cases have been decided which have extended the doctrine of deathbed to a case like the present. There seem to me to be specialties in all cases founded on that view which do not exist here.

But, further, the argument of the defenders here involves a postulate which I think, cannot be conceded to them. This is that the deed of 1867 contains no other expression of intention except what is implied in the new conveyance. It appears to me that this is not the case. If we compare the deed of 1867 with that of 1867 it will be found, I think, that there are substantive parts of the later deed which expressly interfere with and destroy the operation of the prior one. Some of these have been noticed by the Lord-Justice Clerk, and I shall now only dwell upon those indications that have particularly affected my own mind. By the prior deed the spouses were, in the first instance, made joint fiars, and the survivor the sole fiar of the property, and in accordance with that view is the clause of reservation, which is in these terms:—"Reserving always full power to me, at any time of my life, and even on deathbed, with consent of my said husband, and to us both with joint consent and assent to the survivor of us, to add to, alter, or revoke these presents, either in whole or in part, and to sell, burden, or dispose of the whole subjects, heritable and moveable, hereby conveyed, or any part thereof, at pleasure." But in the deed of 1867 the rights of the parties are put on an essentially different footing. The new clause of reservation,—"Reserving always full power to me, at any time of my life, and even on deathbed, by myself alone, to add to, alter, or revoke these presents, either in whole or in part, and to sell, burden, or dispose of the whole subjects, heritable and moveable, hereby conveyed, or any part thereof, at pleasure." Now, it appears to me that the effect of this change is very important and enters deeply into the present case. Under the first deed the husband and was recognised as getting a jus disponendi, at first jointly and afterwards solely; and it is needless to say that that jus disponendi is of the very essence of the right of property or fee. But by the later deed that jus disponendi which had been given to the husband is manifestly taken away and is vested solely in the wife, and this not merely to the effect of giving her power to alter the settlement, or to deal with the property mortis causa, but also to "sell, burden, or dispose of the subjects at pleasure." It appears to me that, after the execution of that deed, it is impossible to hold that any right of property remained in the husband, either present or prospective. The sole and absolute jus disponendi and concomitant right of property reverted to the wife, from whom it had come as much as if the deed of 1866 had never been executed. It follows from this view that at Mrs Kirkpatrick's death there was no fee remaining in her husband, no joint fee that he could exercise, or which could expand into a full right of fee by his survivance. Her heritable property, therefore, did not pass to her husband, whose rights had been evacuated, surrendered, or resumed, so that the husband formed a part of her inheritance to be taken up by any valid deed executed by her after 1866, if such existed, or by her heir-at-law if no such deed existed. Looking to the state of matters as at Mrs Kirkpatrick's death it seems difficult the question to suppose that her husband could take up the property under the deed of 1866. It is not pretended that he could do so for his own behoof as absolute fiar. It seemed admitted that he was under some restraint in this respect. But if he could not so take up the estate it must have been because his right of property had been entirely superseded, for the deed of 1866, according to its terms, made him sole and absolute fiar upon his wife's death. He was never a trustee, and if his right of absolute fee ceased or was extinguished

No. 96.

Mar. 19, 1873. Kirkpatrick v. Kirkpatrick's Trustees.

r to begin he had no other character in which he could claim the heritage ll.

here is an aspect of the deed of 1867 which deserves special attention. That l was executed with the consent and concurrence of Mr Kirkpatrick, and it inly was intended by him as a surrender of all his rights under the former l. It was, moreover, an effectual surrender in so far as regarded the whole able succession, and I am afraid there was a strong motive for the measure dopted, and a purpose which might be of great importance to the interests, least to the wishes, of these parties. There seems to have been a prospect s Kirkpatrick's heritable property being sold on advantageous terms, as it wards was; and if that had occurred while the deed of 1866 subsisted the of those subjects might have come into Mr Kirkpatrick's person either to xtent of one-half or even to the entire amount. If that sum so falling to him e deed of 1866 could not have been timeously changed in its form, a right pitim would have arisen on the part of his children which would not at all suited the apparent views of the parents. The deed of 1867 averted that and was undoubtedly effectual to that extent. Legitim is not due out of a r's moveable succession, and by the deed of 1867 the parties took care that rt of any moveables, including any price for the mother's heritage, could to the father.

the deed of 1866 had remained unaffected at Mrs Kirkpatrick's death it is that her estates, heritable and moveable, would have belonged wholly to husband, and would have been liable for his debts and deeds; and if he had e bankrupt they might have been attached by his creditors. This con- lly cannot be the case now as regards the fee of her moveable estate. But the fee of her heritage have remained liable for his debts after the deed 67, upon the ground that there was no effectual new conveyance of that ge, although the deed contains a clear declaration that the wife alone was in the jus disponendi of her whole property? I think not; but if not, must proceed on the footing that the conveyance of the heritage to the hus- had been recalled or surrendered, and consequently that he was no longer which is the character in which he grants the deed of 1868. If he had not haracter he could not grant that deed, and the defenders have no conveyance y kind to this heritable estate.

is is the main question here at issue. Was Mr Kirkpatrick, after the exe- n of the deed of 1867 by himself and his wife, entitled to fall back on the of 1866, and take up the heritable estate as if he was fiar? That is the ter in which he did so, and it is on his title in that character that the lders are obliged to found.

e true history and position of the case seems to me to be this:—The heri- e question was originally vested solely in Mrs Kirkpatrick by a title in her rson. By the deed of 1866 she changed that state of things for a time, nferred on her husband a joint, and eventually a total, right of fee. But deed of 1867 she undid that arrangement, and declared, with his own t, that he should have no control over the property, but that she alone titled to dispose of it. This brought matters back to their original condi- nd her full right to the property revived, as vested in her by her primary If she had at the same time validly conveyed away the heritage to new s that would have been effectual; but as she did not do so, the property in her hereditas jacens, as if neither the deed of 1866 nor the deed of had ever been granted, and her heir-at-law must take it out as connecting lf with his mother and her original title.

ave said that I consider it of little importance in the case whether the of 1866 be considered as mainly an inter vivos or wholly a mortis causa If it be wholly a mortis causa deed, as the defenders seem inclined to ain, it is all the more easily revoked or superseded by any declaration s to its main objects. Other questions of nicety too would arise, not able to the defenders; for a mortis causa deed is not presumed to be ed in the granter's lifetime, and it is doubtful if it would have become a ed deed as regards heritage merely by the wife's death, where there is not the usual clause dispensing with delivery, nor any reservation of liferent. The deed, as a mere mortis causa deed, would become extremely anomalous, and very difficult to sustain.

No. 96.

Mar. 19, 1873. Kirkpatrick v. Kirkpatrick's Trustees.

In narrating the circumstances of the case I have already noticed the power which the wife had to revoke the deed of 1866 as having been a donation, and independent of her husband's will and consent. But the deed of 1867 excludes question on this head, as it is granted with the husband's full consent, and if clauses amount to a renunciation or resumption of the powers or rights which had been gifted to him by the previous deed it seems impossible for him interfere further, or to exert any control over the property beyond at least legal right of courtesy, which is a mere liferent. It seems out of the question that after the terms of the latter deed he should put himself forward as a under the donation contained in the prior one. The second deed, by its declarations, restores the status quo which existed before the first deed of was granted, and so much so that even the liferents given by this deed of are defeasible by the ample powers reserved and restored to the wife.

The more I consider the special clause referred to the more I feel convinced that it is a substantive and immediately operative recall and extinction of rights conferred on the husband by the deed of 1866. It is not merely a reservation, but a declaration of right, emanating from the wife, who had power as wife to revoke any previous gift, and moreover expressly consented to by husband, even if he had had power to oppose it. If by the deed of 1867 it is declared or recognised by both husband and wife that the wife alone, and herself alone, is now to have power to "sell, burden, or dispose of the subjects," heritable as well as moveable, it seems to me impossible to deny Mrs Kirkpatrick was thus constituted, or reconstituted, sole fiar, and it was possible that another person could be even joint fiar, or could have any right of disposition. I cannot conceive how there can be two persons that independent rights of burdening or disposing of a heritable subject. If the can sell, burden, or dispose of the whole or any part of her heritage by alone, at her own pleasure, it seems clear that the husband has no power or to do the same thing to any extent; and this is all the clearer when we consider that the feudal right and title were originally in the wife. The encroachment on the wife's right introduced by the deed of 1866 could clearly have been done away with without any definite technical language and form, provided the of the parties were expressed, and I cannot imagine a clearer expression of will, both of wife and husband, that the husband should no longer have power over the fee of the estate. This was plainly intended, and it seems to clearly expressed both by the general scope and purpose of the deed and specially by the explicit clause I have referred to.

It only remains for me to notice the attempt to support the defence on authority of Richmond v. Wilson, 3 Macph. 95. That case was essentially ferent from the present, in respect that the original conveyance was a trust veyance, and when that is the case it is always competent for the testator declare the purposes of the trust by any deed expressive of his will. Here original conveyance in the deed of 1866 was not a trust but a conveyance to husband in absolute fee, and a right of that kind cannot be converted into trust right without a new conveyance. The conveyance in trust in the deed is only a substitution or secondary deed, and did not come into operation. The husband by his survivance would have become the fiar, and thus excluded the trustees. The renunciation or resumption of his jus disponendi accrescing the wife, and prevented that result, but did not make way for the trustees under the first deed. The case of Richmond therefore has no application.

I am therefore for adhering to the interlocutor under review.

LORD ARDMILLAN.—On the first question raised in regard to the validity the dispositive clause in the deed of 1867 I do not think it necessary to anything. I concur in the opinion that, at the date of this deed, and at the of the death of Mrs Kirkpatrick, the word "dispone" was indispensable dispositive clause purporting to convey heritage.

No. 96.

Mar. 19, 1873.
Kirkpatrick v. Kirkpatrick's Trustees.

considering the next question which arises I assume that the deed of 1867 the ground which I have mentioned, and which has been already explained, actual as a conveyance of heritage. But it is in all other respects a good , duly signed and attested, authentic and complete in all respects as a clear ssion of will on the part of the granter and her husband, and as validly ying and distributing personal estate.

is now important to ascertain the true position and effect of this deed of in relation to the other deeds in process, viz., the deed of 18th June 1866 the deed of Mr Kirkpatrick of 26th June 1868.

he first of these deeds, that of 1866, bears to be granted by Mrs Kirkpatrick, advice and consent of her husband, and with joint consent and assent, for s and considerations which are not explained, but which are stated to be l and onerous." By that deed Mrs Kirkpatrick, with such consent, dis- s and conveys to her husband and herself, and the survivor, whom failing, stain trustees, her whole property, real and personal, then belonging to her, hich might belong to her at the time of her death. It is not necessary again te the particular terms or purposes of the trust, except to say that the pur- the only son and heir-at-law, was not provided for. A previous disposi- nd settlement, in April 1863, and another in May 1863, were revoked. e is a clause of reservation in this deed of 1866 in the following terms:— erving always full power to me, at any time of my life, and even on death- with consent of my said husband, and to us both with joint consent and , and to the survivor of us, to add to, alter, or revoke these presents, either ole or in part, and to sell, burden, or dispose of the whole subjects, herit- nd moveable, hereby conveyed, or any part thereof, at pleasure." It is im- t to observe that by this clause Mrs Kirkpatrick does not reserve power oke the deed at her own hand, and without consent of her husband, or to dispose of any part of the subjects without his consent. The only power cation or disposal which is reserved is to both spouses with joint consent, the survivor. It is obvious that if, in a subsequent deed, there shall be a tion of power to Mrs Kirkpatrick, acting alone and without her husband's t, to revoke their settlement, or to sell or dispose of the subjects, that e a most important alteration, and quite inconsistent with the deed of character of the deed of 1866 is, I think, somewhat different in regard to t part of the deed, wherein the whole estate, heritable and moveable, is ed directly to the two spouses, and the survivor of them, and in regard to cond part of the deed, in which a trust is created, and trust purposes ed, and trust administration and distribution directed. In one sense the ay be called a mortis causa deed, by which I mean that the property ed comprehends the whole estate at the date of Mrs Kirkpatrick's death; e trustees have no powers or duties before that date. But, in another a person can scarcely make a last will in his own favour, and certainly the y purpose and effect of the deed is direct disposition and conveyance in of the two spouses and the survivor; and it is only failing both spouses, ther words, after the death of the survivor of the spouses,—that the trust, e provisions to the daughters in certain proportions, comes into existence, any right or interest in the trust-estate can arise.

disposed to think that, as matter of conveyancing, Mr Kirkpatrick had unct fee with his wife during the subsistence of the marriage, and an ent fee in his own person after the decease of his wife. This right in him t of primary disponee under the deed of 1866; and the trust, charged all the trust interests, was substituted to the two spouses and the survivor. heritable subjects were the property of Mrs Kirkpatrick a question of vocation of the conveyance in 1866, as of a donatio inter virum et uxorem, have been raised. It is not necessary to question it. She never did it as a donation. The defenders' case is that it never was revoked. and on the deed of 1868 executed by Mr Kirkpatrick after his wife's and they maintain that deed by Mr Kirkpatrick to be effectual. Apart t species of revocation as of a gift by the wife, the only revocation to which Mr Kirkpatrick's right and interest was liable under the deed o was a revocation by both spouses with mutual consent, or by his wife survived him, which she did not.

No. 96.

Mar. 19, 1873. Kirkpatrick v. Kirkpatrick's Trustees.

So standing the rights of the spouses under the deed of 1866, we ha to consider the deed of 1867, subtracting from it the clause purporting vey the heritage. It is enough to say of this deed of 1867 that its mea not doubtful. It certainly seems to have been meant to be a complet mentary deed, and the only expression of the will of the maker. The tion of the first deed appears to be contemplated in the second deed at commencement. The very words of the clause in the deed of 1866, r power to revoke, are set forth in the opening of the deed of 1867, whi to be granted by Mrs Kirkpatrick with consent of her husband, and b with joint consent and assent, in order to regulate the management and tion of the means and estate of Mrs Kirkpatrick." Plainly the regul the whole succession was intended. Plainly the exercise of the joint p revocation was intended. Plainly the substitution of the deed of 1867 deed of 1866 is what was intended. Of this I think there can be n Then observe, as a marked difference between the two deeds, that no fee, whether conjunct during the marriage, or arising on survivorship, i deed of 1867 given to Mr Kirkpatrick. No right to the personal given to him except in liferent and through the medium of the trust. of trustees, differing in some respects from those under the former deed pointed; and while the first trustees had been substituted to the spous second trustees are made the primary disponees, and are directed to pa husband the income of the whole estate during his survivorship of l In the first deed he had a right of fee direct and primary coming in b trust. By the second deed he had only a liferent annuity on survivo be paid by the new trustees. But, further, the purposes of the trust distribution of the estate, more particularly the personal estate (for the estate was not validly conveyed), are quite different under the deed of 1 what they had been under the deed of 1866. The will of the parties the deeds had changed. I need not explain these points of differen have been pointed out by your Lordships, and there is no doubt about th Then there is provided, as a burden on the heritable estate, an annuity a-year to the pursuer, John Kirkpatrick, the only son of the family, an annuity is attached the very singular condition,—certainly a severe cor should say a cruel condition,—that it shall commence only from and death of his own wife. By this deed, executed by the parents who sho guarded their only son against a temptation to evil, these parents con him an interest in the death of his own wife. I have heard no expla defence of this singular stipulation. But at least it is not surprising heir should seek to vindicate his rights, and to escape from the unnatu tion in which the deed of 1867 placed him. It is not possible to r two deeds without being satisfied that they were not intended to form of writings constituting one settlement. In every important respect th Each professes to be a general settlement. They cannot stand togeth ensa voluntas of the maker of both deeds is expressed in the last dee is clearly different from what it was as expressed in the first deed. I impossible to read the deed of 1867 as an addition or supplement to the 1866, even after subtracting from the later deed the inept clause purp convey heritage.

But then the deed of 1867 contains a clause of reservation very differ that which was in the deed of 1866,—"Reserving always full power t any time of my life, and even on deathbed, by myself alone, to add to, revoke these presents, either in whole or in part;" nor is that all. It p —"And to sell, burden, or dispose of the whole subjects, heritable an able, hereby conveyed, or any part thereof, at pleasure." This is a mos tant alteration; and I concur in the remarks made by the Lord Justice- its meaning and effect. Observe, there has been no attempt to revoke of 1866 on the footing of donation; and these defenders, trustees who

No. 96.

Mar. 19, 1873.
Kirkpatrick v. Kirkpatrick's Trustees.

deed of 1868 by Mr Kirkpatrick, repudiate any such intersponsal revoca- Revocation in any form, or for any purpose, is fatal to their case. They ld have no case at all if the heritable estate had reverted to the wife; for has not disposed of it, and the pursuer is her heir-at-law. But what was in the deed of 1867 was to convert Mr Kirkpatrick's right into a mere for a liferent from the new trustees, and to make even that claim de- ent on the sole pleasure of his wife. This alteration is quite inconsistent the deed of 1866, and equally inconsistent with the idea of a series of suc- ve testamentary writings to be read together as a settlement. It is clear to at you cannot use the one deed to work out the purposes of the other deed, you cannot use the one trust to administer the estate set forth in the other . Thus the case of Richmond is not in point. There is nothing whatever ggest that the granters of the deed of 1867 intended to keep alive and keep ce the deed of 1866. Mr Kirkpatrick assented to the deed of 1867. He ribed it not only as expressing his consent to his wife's deed, but as record- is will and intention, "for himself, his own right and interest," in regulat- e management and distribution of the whole estate which he concurs with wife in describing, and disposing of, as her estate,—her estate in 1867. is everything to suggest, and indeed to make it clear, that the parties t the new deed to be a general settlement of the whole estate, and to stand ce of the old deed.

in the deed of 1867 there had been an express revocation of the deed of , a revocation to which Mr Kirkpatrick was himself a party, I think it clear that on the death of the wife he could not have made up his title to e of the estate, as under the deed of 1866. The heir of the mother would succeeded to the fee of the estate. But if the revocation be clearly im- that is sufficient. In such a case as this it is not necessary that it be ex- . The point raised is precisely the same as would have been raised if Mr patrick had, on the death of his wife, claimed the fee of the estate under eed of 1866. His right to execute the deed of 1868 depends on his right e fee of the subjects after his wife's death. If he had not the fee the deed 868 is void as flowing a non habente potestatem. The defenders have no except on the assumption that Mr Kirkpatrick had in 1868 the fee of the , and could then dispose of it, and did effectually dispose of it, after his 's death. Such disposal, I think, he could not, and did not, make.

oth of these two deeds purport to be deeds disposing of the universal estate rs Kirkpatrick; and it is settled law that, in such circumstances, the second operates as a revocation of the first. If the second deed were not signed, s not tested,—so that it was not legally signed,—or if the maker of the was in a position in which the law forbids the expression of his will in re- to heritage, as in the case of deathbed, then it might be argued that there ot two deeds. But here it is not so. There are two deeds, and both are ntic, and both deal with the universitas of the estate. The will of the r remains as finally expressed in the last deed. In the case of Sibbald's tees v. Greig, 13th January 1871, this point in regard to the last of a series stamentary deeds was carefully considered, and the decision is clearly an ority apt and weighty in support of the proposition which I have now d. The maxims of the civil law, when rightly understood, are, in my ion, to the same effect. The words "Tunc autem testamentum rumpitur si posterius rite factum est" have been quoted to us as implying that, in r to sustain revocation, the second deed must be effectual as a conveyance. hink not. The expression "rite factum est" does not, I think, mean effec- lly done, but regularly, formally, correctly done. It is so understood, I k, in our own law. The presumption that "omnia rite acta sunt" is not a mption that the thing done is valid in regard to effect. It may not be so. ay be too late. It may be by the wrong party, or against the wrong party. presumption is merely that the procedure is regular and formal,—done duly in the usual manner. This is, I think, the meaning of the word "rite" such a question, and in so far as the maxim of the civil law may be held cable.

No. 96.

Mar. 19, 1873. Kirkpatrick v. Kirkpatrick's Trustees.

The question whether there was revocation of the first deed wh second deed was executed is a question of intention. The implication tention to revoke arises, not from the antagonism of results, but from t tagonism of will. The incompatibility of the first deed with the will ex in the second—the will, be it observed, of both parties, the husband as the wife,—raises the implication of intention to revoke. In this case t deed did not express the last will,—the final and deliberate mind of t poner. It was only her deed conditionally, and it conferred no right under condition. That condition was that the granter and her husband survivor, did not revoke it. Revocation by them was in their own powe question is, did they so will it? I do not again resume the explanation reasons on which I think it clear that, by the deed of 1867, Mrs Kirk expressed her will, and Mr Kirkpatrick concurred in the expression of h that the deed of 1866 should not stand. I feel very strongly the force Solicitor-General's remark, that to set up the deed of 1866 now as a con of the fee to Mr Kirkpatrick would be to defeat the will of Mrs Kirk It may be that she had no will to give the real estate to her son and he the heir's title stands not upon will. His right emerges when a contr posal fails. There can be no disinherison without a conveyance to anothe surviving husband could not have been permitted to withdraw his renu of his own right, and his concurrence in his wife's deed as expressed i If he could not then have maintained his right to the fee of his wife' then these trustees cannot resist the pursuer's case, for the deed of 18 not convey the subjects, and the trustees cannot maintain the deed of 1 their right under the deed of 1868, which is under reduction. That 1868 was granted by one having no power to grant it, unless Mr Kirk himself could have claimed the fee immediately on the death of his wife.

I have considered all the authorities referred to, and have carefully s to the comment on them in the very powerful opinion of Lord Deas. B not able to concur in the view which he has taken; and I have come conclusion that, except in so far as reliance is placed on the decisions in deathbed, there is no authority to support the defenders' contention; an of opinion that the decisions in the cases of deathbed,—a chapter of law now closed by statute,—though very interesting, are not applicable question now before us. A deed is here necessary to exclude the heir; deed of 1866 is the only deed which can exclude him. But the analogy law of deathbed supplies no argument to support the deed of 1866. case has the prior deed been sustained in a case of deathbed. It is th bed deed which stands when the heir is shut out. On this point I co entirely in the opinion which has been given by the Lord Justice-Cl by Lord Neaves that I have nothing to add. On the whole cause, I opinion that the pursuer, the only son and the heir-at-law, is entitled to s

Lord Jerviswoode.—This interlocutor was pronounced by me, and conscious when I pronounced it, and am conscious still, of the very gre culty and delicacy which attend the decision of the case; but on the v remain of the opinion which I formerly held, and I am contented to refe views expressed by the Judges who have come to the same result.

Lord President.—There are two questions which have been argue which I shall say nothing, except merely to indicate my concurrence wi whole of your Lordships. I think the disposition of 1867 is ineffectual vey heritage; and I think that it cannot be read as constituting, along wi deed of 1866, the settlement of Mrs Kirkpatrick; nor can it be read as s of instructions addressed to the trustees under the prior deed. But the tant question remains behind. Mr John Kirkpatrick comes here to vi his rights as heir-at-law of his mother, against a very determined attempt inherit him. I agree with Lord Benholme that nothing can be clearer th obstinate intention to disinherit the heir; but to that I attach not the sl importance. The only question is, whether those who set themselves to have succeeded in doing it in the only way that the law can recognise

No. 96.

Mar. 19, 1873. Kirkpatrick v. Kirkpatrick's Trustees.

r, at the time of his mother's death (she being infeft in the estate), was itled to be served in special to her, unless there could be produced a deed ich effectually conveyed that estate to some other person; for that is the y deed of disinheritance that the law of Scotland knows. Now, the first d that is appealed to is the deed of 1867; and the answer of the heir-at-law —that deed does not convey the estate. If it had been a deed executed upon thbed it would have conveyed the estate, and it would in one sense have ctually conveyed the estate, and therefore it would have been a deed of disritance according to the law of Scotland. But just because it was a d of disinheritance, and at the same time was executed on deathbed, it uld have been liable to challenge by the heir in the exercise of the peculiar rilege given to him by the law. In such cases, if the deed executed upon thbed contained a mere conveyance of the heritable estate, and contained ther clauses, and no other expression of the mind or will of the maker, then heir-at-law would not be entitled to set aside the deed, if there was in existe a prior deed also conveying the estate, although it might be not to the same son. That rule is well fixed; but I am of opinion, with those of your Lordps who are in favour of the interlocutor, that that rule has no application to present case. The heir here requires to reduce nothing in so far as the deed 867 is concerned, and indeed he requires to reduce nothing at all that was behind by Mrs Kirkpatrick, or that had any existence at the date of her th. His answer to the deed of 1867 is that it does not convey the estate, therefore does not exclude him. But the reason why he says it does not ey the estate is not that it is a null deed, for to many effects it is a valid d, and a deed that must receive effect. Of that I shall have more to say after; but what I wish to observe in the meantime is, that it is not the obion of the heir to this deed that it does not represent the mind of the maker, it is not duly tested, and therefore is not to be taken as an expression of her l. The objection is simply that in its form and structure it is not capable of eying that part of the deceased's estate to which the heir lays claim. There- I think that other class of cases, of which Henderson v. Wilson is the most rtant example, has in like manner no application to the present case, because all depend upon the principle embodied in Lord Thurlow's question, How s null deed be a revocation?

We come next to consider the substance and effect of the deed of 1866; and if be a subsisting deed left by Mrs Kirkpatrick to regulate her succession, or if it deed which took effect during Mrs Kirkpatrick's life, and stood unrevoked at death, then unquestionably the heir-at-law is excluded. I am not sure that it ential to the argument on either side to determine whether it is a deed inter or a deed mortis causa. But for the sake of clearness I think it is desirable we should address our minds to that question, and see what was the effect of the when it existed, and what would have been the effect of the deed if no other had been subsequently made. Now, the first part of the dispositive clause con- the entire estate of Mrs Kirkpatrick, heritable and moveable, to herself and husband in conjunct fee, and to the survivor, and I do not apprehend there be any difficulty in the construction of such words of conveyance. I have not d it suggested that they can mean any but one thing, viz., that the parties are made disponees under that deed in the first instance,—the husband and who are also the makers of the deed,—become joint disponees, and that the ivor of them takes the entire fee upon the predecease of the other. Now, the survivor can take the entire fee upon the predecease of the spouse, in equence of a conjunct fee having been vested in them, if no conjunct fee was vested in them, I do not quite see. It seems to me that the clause is unligible if it is not intended to have effect during the lifetime of the two ses. It can have no meaning and no practical effect. Whether there is anyg else in the deed that prevents that part of the dispositive clause from reing effect is another matter, but the clause itself is plainly in its expression meaning a clause that ought to receive effect as soon as the disposition is vered, and during the lifetime of the two spouses. But then it is said that deed after all is not intended to have that effect, but is only a mortis causa deed, and that the effect of it is to give the fee of the estate to the sur then to give effect to the subsequent destination failing the survivor. see any evidence of that intention in the deed. I am of opinion that effects and in a certain event this deed would operate to regulate the to the estate, and in that sense it is a mortis causa deed. If Mr K turned out to be, as he was, the survivor of the two spouses, and did no the substitution, the effect of the deed would be, after his death, to trustees therein named heirs of provision in trust for the daughters,— would be a deed regulating the succession. But it would not be a dee ing the succession until that event occurred,—until Mr Kirkpatrick o vivor of the spouses died and left the destination to take effect. In so fore as the spouses were concerned, it was, in my opinion, a deed inter so far as the ultimate destination was concerned it would, if allowed b vivor to take effect, have operated as a deed mortis causa. But it se thought that even supposing this is the proper construction of the fir the dispositive clause, the deed could have no effect without delivery, it was not delivered. Now, I am disposed to concur in the opinion by the Lord Justice-Clerk, that a deed of this kind, not a mutual dee do not understand his Lordship to have suggested that it was a mutu but a joint deed executed by the spouses in favour of themselves, an themselves joint disponees, may be held to be a delivered deed, especi it is left in the custody of the husband, and disposes of the wife's esta that that was the condition of matters is fairly presumable. My brother I suggests that if this matter of the delivery of the deed was of momen to have been averred and proved on the part of the pursuer that it was while there is no statement of that kind on the record. It would ha very strange thing for the pursuer to have undertaken any such proof o made any such averment, his contention being that that deed is not a deed, but was revoked by a subsequent deed, and whether it was del not is therefore a matter of indifference to him. I make the observat the probability of its being in such a position as to operate as a delive only for the purpose of making more clear my construction of that fir the dispositive clause. Now, this being the nature of the deed, and t of alteration being expressed in the terms which have been so frequentl to, reserving to the spouses during their joint lives and to the survivo to alter, the position in which the parties stood after its execution app to be this,—Mrs Kirkpatrick undoubtedly had a power to revoke the donation inter virum et uxorem. I think that cannot admit of doubt. had also a power, either jointly with her husband or by herself alone i vived, to alter the deed without exercising her right to revoke it as a and these are two totally different things. Such was the position of t when they changed their minds as to the mode in which this estate settled, and proceeded to make the deed of 1867. Now, I think they deed of 1867 in exercise of the power reserved to them in the deed of think they are very careful to shew that that is so,—that Mrs Kirk not revoking a donation which she made to her husband, but that spouses, with joint consent and assent, in the very terms of the reservati end of the previous deed, proceed to make a new one. The plan of deed is quite obvious. The estate of Mrs Kirkpatrick was almost enti able, but if it had been converted into moveable, and had become death the absolute property of her husband, and he had failed to conve not had an opportunity of again converting it into heritage, the obj spouses in making both the deeds would have been defeated, and legitim would have been opened up to all the children. This second made, among other purposes, for the purpose of cutting off such claims that was the only purpose, or whether it was the chief purpose, I undertake to say, but it was one of the purposes that the spouses had i making this deed. In order to attain that object it was indispensable Mr Kirkpatrick of the fee that was given to him in the previous deed. not be done without that. They therefore proceed to deal with this

No. 96.

Mar. 19, 1873. Kirkpatrick v. Kirkpatrick's Trustees.

No. 96.

Mar. 19, 1873
Kirkpatrick v Kirkpatrick's Trustees.

he estate of Mrs Kirkpatrick alone, and in the expression of the inductive cause f the deed of 1867 we have this statement, that it is in order "to regulate the nagement and distribution of the means and estate of me, the said Mrs Jean Kirkpatrick, after my death." That is the declared object, and the only lared object, of the deed under the hands of both the spouses. Now, that is tally inconsistent with the existence of a fee in the husband,—either a joint fee ing with his wife, or a fee in the event of his surviving her. If the deed of 866 is to subsist, the estate is not the estate of Mrs Kirkpatrick. It is an tate already disposed of, and disposed of in such a way that from the date of execution of the previous deed it ceased to be her estate. The deed pro- s to convey both heritage and moveables, and being ineffectual as a convey- ce of heritage, my brother Lord Deas seems to think that it is a very unim- rtant deed in its effect altogether,—that the conveyance of moveables is practi- lly inoperative, because there was really very little moveable estate left by Mrs irkpatrick, and he seems also to have imagined that such moveables as she did ve were not bestowed upon her daughters. But that is a mistake, for the veable estate is by very express words directed to be given to certain of the ghters. But what is of far more importance to observe is, that the convey- ce of the moveable estate, if the Clyde Trustees had by compulsory sale taken land, would have been the only operative part of the deed, and if the Clyde stees had taken a portion of the land then both the heads of the conveyance uld have been important, both the conveyance of the heritable estate and the veyance of the moveable estate. In short, the deed is not more important the eyes of those who made it, and might have been less important in their e, in respect of the conveyance of heritage than in respect of the conveyance moveables. At all events it is perfectly clear that it does subsist as a con- yance of moveables, and is effectual; and it subsists not only as a convey- ce of moveables, but it subsists also as a very strong and distinct expression the mind and intention of the parties as to the regulation of Mrs Kirk- rick's succession, and the condition in which her estate is to remain during r survivance and down to the day of her death, because the effect of the deed, art altogether from the conveyance of moveables, is in my opinion to operate the one hand a renunciation by Mr Kirkpatrick of the right of fee given to m under the deed of 1866, and a restoration of Mrs Kirkpatrick to her full ht of fee in that estate, and all that, I apprehend, can be operated by a decla- tion of purpose without the necessity of dispositive words. I put this ques- on as a test of Mr Kirkpatrick's position under this second deed. Suppose at the heir had not interfered, but that Mr Kirkpatrick had come forward er his wife's death and said, "This is not a good conveyance of the heritable tate, and consequently the deed of 1866 stands in force as regards the heritable tate, and I claim the right of fee adversely to my daughters," could he have ne that? He certainly could if the deed of 1866 subsists. If the deed of 866 is not destroyed by the deed of 1867 that was his right. But can any- dy be heard to maintain that after this arrangement with his wife for the gulation of her succession, and after he had given up his right as fiar under the ed of 1866, and restored her to the full right and management of her own tate, he could still at her death claim under the deed which was so superseded? apprehend that is impossible. And that appears to me to be a crucial test, cause this defect of the deed of 1867 is not a defect available to the heir only, in the case of deathbed. It is a defect available to everybody having interest; nd if Mr Kirkpatrick had a fee under the deed of 1866, and that fee was not stroyed by the deed of 1867, he could have claimed that fee adversely to his wn children. But I think that he would have been barred most effectually by hat to which he agreed under the deed of 1867, and that he would have made hat claim in vain. The clause of reservation to which reference has been made n the deed of 1867 is one of very great importance, but I take it not by itself but in connection with the whole of the rest of this deed, as shewing very clearly hat Mr Kirkpatrick gave up his right of fee, and consented to be reduced to hat position which the law would have assigned to him at any rate as regards he heritable estate, viz., to have a liferent by courtesy. I say this reservation

No. 96.
Mar. 19, 1873.
Kirkpatrick v. Kirkpatrick's Trustees.

at the end of the deed is most important when taken in connection with all the other clauses of the deed, indicating that purpose and desire. But the clause of reservation itself, as it is called, though it is a great deal more than a clause of reservation, does in so many words distinctly declare that from that time forward Mrs Kirkpatrick is full and unlimited fiar of the estate. It does not give her a faculty. That is not the nature of the thing at all. It is a reservation to her of that which naturally belongs to her, viz., the full property and right of disposal of the estate. And supposing that she, not revoking the deed of 1866, not asserting her original right as fiar of the estate before any deeds were executed at all, but reciting this clause of reservation at the end of the deed of 1867, and professing to act upon that and that alone, had conveyed the estate either gratuitously or onerously, could any one have competed with her disponee's title? If she had sold it would the purchaser not have had a good title in competition with Mr Kirkprtrick? If she had given it gratuitously, would the gratuitous disponee not have been entitled to it in competition with Mr Kirkpatrick? Now, if that is so, how is it possible that there could still subsist, notwithstanding of that right and power in Mrs Kirkpatrick, a present right of joint fee, and a prospective right of sole fee in her husband? The two things are utterly inconsistent. They cannot stand together. And yet the whole of this deed, except that part of the dispositive clause which professes to convey heritage, is a subsisting and valid deed expressive of the wishes, desires, and intentions of the two spouses. For these reasons I come to the conclusion that the deed of 1867 operates as a revocation of the deed of 1866, and I am not sure that I should be quite content to say that it implies a revocation of the deed of 1866. At all events, I do not say that at all in the same sense in which a revocation is implied from a mere new conveyance. The case is very different from that. This revocation depends not on the new conveyance, but on the express desire,—the explanation of the arrangement which is made between the spouses for the disposal of Mrs Kirkpatrick's estate after death. Their whole intention and purpose as expressed in this deed are so inconsistent with the subsistence of the previous deed that if it does not amount to an express revocation it is at all events an implication of a very different and a much stronger kind than that which arises from the mere execution of a new conveyance. For these reasons I concur with the majority of your Lordships in holding that the interlocutor ought to be adhered to.

THE COURT adhered to the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary.

ALEX. HOWE, W.S.—MURRAY, BEITH, & MURRAY, W.S.—Agents.

No. 97.
Mar. 20, 1873.
Bridges v. Lord Saltoun.

The Rev. ALEXANDER HENRY BRIDGES, Pursuer.—Watson—Mackintosh.
LORD SALTOUN, Defender.—Balfour—W. F. Hunter.

Property—Servitude—River.—Held that a riparian proprietor, who had, by possession for more than forty years, acquired a right of diverting water from a stream for the use of his mill, was not bound to continue the exercise of this right; but that if he abandoned it, and restored the water to its original channel, he was bound to do so in such a manner as not to expose the servient tenement to injury.

1ST DIVISION.
Lord Gifford.
M.

THE Reverend Mr Bridges was proprietor of the lands of Ardlaw, and Lord Saltoun was proprietor of the lands of Tyrie, both in the county of Aberdeen. The march between their lands was the burn of Tyrie. At some period not precisely known, but prior to 1798, a lade was formed for the purpose of diverting water from the burn in order to supply a mill on Lord Saltoun's property, and the water had continued to flow through that lade until the operations to be afterwards mentioned. There was a weir across the burn at the intake of the lade (at the point afterwards referred to as B). After passing the mill, the water returned to the burn either by a watercourse used when the mill was going, or by another used when the mill was not going. There was no sluice upon the lade at the

No. 97.

Mar. 20, 1873.
Bridges v.
Lord Saltoun.

ke, but there was one upon it 500 yards therefrom. When the ce was shut the water sometimes overflowed, and found its way to the n at a point (D[1]) nearer to the intake than the two regular outlets of lade (E and F). The intake of the lade was opposite to the lands of law, but all these three outlets of the water into the burn were below e lands—the main outlets (E and F) considerably below them. In sequence of the diversion of the water by the lade very little water ed in the course of the burn, except when the sluices were closed the mill was not working.

n 1871 the water of the burn ceased to be used for the mill, and, with ew of preventing it flowing in the mill-lade, part of the weir which been built at the intake was removed, and the lade was closed. the land on the Ardlaw side was lower than that on the Tyrie side, result of these operations was that the water overflowed part of the ls of Ardlaw, and the drainage on the Ardlaw side was also completely eded.

fr Bridges caused the weir to be rebuilt, and Lord Saltoun, with the v of relieving the lands of Ardlaw of the overflow, cut a new channel llel to the burn from the intake to the nearest of the three outlets, ; and having done so, filled up the old lade, and placed the old sluice ediately below the intake. Mr Bridges was not satisfied with these rations, for, as there was little fall at the outlet of the new channel which was situated below the lands of Ardlaw, the effect of the water g returned there was to cause it to regurge or come back on the lands Ardlaw at the point D[1].

n these circumstances Mr Bridges raised this action of declarator and rdict against Lord Saltoun. The summons concluded that it "should found and declared that the defender had and has no right to shut up bstruct the watercourse or mill-lade taken off from the burn of Tyrie, point in said burn where it forms the boundary between the lands of law and Tyrie, respectively belonging to the pursuer and the defender, thence proceeding through the defender's said lands to the Nether l of Tyrie, and thence proceeding through the defender's said lands l it joins the burn of Tyrie at a point below the pursuer's lands of law, or to do anything whereby the flow of water throughout the le course of the said watercourse or mill-lade may be in any way im- d or obstructed;" and that it "should be found and declared that operations of the defender upon the said watercourse and mill-lade, the diversion of the water thereof by him, are and were illegal and arrantable;" and that "the defender should be decerned and ordained rwith to restore the said watercourse or mill-lade to its former state, t least to restore or open up the same, so that the water may flow as ly as before along the whole course thereof, and that at the sight of a of skill to be appointed by" the Court; and that upon matters being ored to their original state, the defender should be interdicted "from ring the water now taken, or that was in use to be taken into the mill-lade from the said burn, to be returned thereto at any other nt than that at which it has from time immemorial, and prior to said illegal operations, been returned, and from interfering with the er of the burn of Tyrie, or with said burn itself, so as to make the said er flow, in the course of that burn, over the intake, and between that nt and the point where the way-lead from the Nether Mill used to the said course, to any greater extent than it flowed prior to the said nder's illegal operations;" or that, at all events, the defender should nterdicted "from altering the place at which the water now taken, or was in use to be taken, into the said mill-lade from the said burn, has from time immemorial, or prior to the said illegal operations, been returned thereto, and interfering with the said water to the effect foresaid, until he shall, at his own expense, have taken all necessary precautions, at the sight of a person to be appointed by" the Court, "to protect the lands of the pursuer from injury."

No. 97.

Mar. 20, 1873. Bridges v. Lord Saltoun.

In the second article of his condescendence the pursuer stated—"The boundary between the lands of Ardlaw and the lands of Tyrie is a burn. This burn, which is now called the burn of Tyrie, and which contains a large body of water, had, prior to the sale of the lands of Easter and Wester Tyrie in 1798, been diverted from its natural course, and was carried through the lands by means of various artificial channels. One of these artificial channels was formed and used as a lade for supplying the Nether Mill of Tyrie, which is situated on the lands of Tyrie belonging to the defender."

The pursuer pleaded;—(1) The defender's operations being illegal, and to the pursuer's injury and damage, the pursuer is entitled to obtain decree to that effect, and ordaining the defender to restore matters to their original position. (2) The defender is not entitled to disturb the state of matters in regard to the water of the burn of Tyrie, which have existed from time immemorial, or at all events since the estates of Ardlaw and Tyrie have been held by different proprietors. (3) The defender is not entitled to return the water taken by him from the burn of Tyrie to the said burn at any point opposite to the pursuer's lands, or different from that at which the same has hitherto been returned. (4) The defender is not entitled to disuse the said mill-lade without at least taking all necessary precautions against injury arising to the pursuer's lands. (5) Matters having been restored to their original position, the pursuer is entitled to protect his property from the risk of injury by obtaining decree interdicting the defender in all time coming from returning the water taken into the mill-lade to the burn at any point opposite the pursuer's lands or different from the point at which the said water has hitherto been returned, and from interfering with the water of the said burn. (6) At all events, the pursuer is entitled to obtain such interdict until all necessary precautions are adopted by the defender, at his own expense, for preventing injury to the pursuer's property.

The defender pleaded;—(2) The defender was entitled to shut up the said mill-lade, in respect that the same was exclusively within his own lands, and had been made and used, as well as controlled, exclusively by the proprietor of these lands. (3) At all events, the defender was entitled to shut up the said lade upon providing the substitute channel, whereby the water is conveyed in a line parallel to the burn, and restored to the burn at a point below that at which the pursuer is proprietor of any lands. (4) The action cannot be maintained, in respect that the operations complained of have not caused and will not cause injury or damage to the pursuer or his lands.

The Lord Ordinary allowed a proof, and after this had been taken he, on 24th December 1872, pronounced this interlocutor:—"Finds in point of fact, 1st, That for more than forty years preceding the present action, and preceding the operations to which the present action refers, the burn of Tyrie formed the boundary between the lands of Ardlaw, belonging to the pursuer, and the lands of Tyrie, belonging to the defender; 2d, That for more than forty years preceding the present action and the operations foresaid part of the water of the said burn of Tyrie has been in use to be diverted from the main course of the said burn into a mill-lade constructed through the defender's lands for supplying the Nether Mill of Tyrie, on the lands of Tyrie, belonging to the defender; 3d, That during the period

No. 97.
Mar. 20, 1873.
Bridges v. Lord Saltoun.

aid, the water, or part thereof, was diverted from the main channel e said burn into the said lade by means of a weir constructed across nain bed of the burn, and by means of which weir or intake the water diverted into the lade; 4th, That during said period there was no e upon the said lade, at the head of the lade, or at the intake, but during the whole period there was a sluice on the lade near the mill, about 500 yards from the intake, which sluice was used at the plea- of the defender's tenant of the mill; and 5th, That when this sluice shut, the water flowing down the said lade, so far as not dammed by the sluice, escaped by a back ditch, and rejoined the burn at a t immediately above the bridge over the said burn, and some distance r the pursuer's lands of Ardlaw: Finds in point of law that the der is entitled to discontinue, if he pleases, the use of the said mill- and is not bound to uphold or keep up the same for the purpose of ting from the burn the water which for the last forty years the lade been in use to receive: Farther, finds that the defender, without pre- e to his legal pleas, has made through his own lands a new cut, com- cing at the said burn at the intake, where the defender's said original commenced, and ending at the said burn at a point considerably r the lowest point of the Ardlaw march, and that for the purpose of ving from the burn, and carrying past the pursuer's lands, the same tity of water as was formerly in use to be taken by the said mill-; and finds, that although the old sluice of the said mill-lade has been d upon the said new cut, yet, before the raising of the present action, efender offered to remove the said sluice, and to receive into the said cut as much or as little water as the pursuer might desire: Finds in ; of law, and without prejudice to the finding in law above written, the defender cannot be required to do more than he has done, and d to do, before the present action was raised: Therefore assoilzies efender from the whole conclusions of the action as laid, and decerns, ving always to the pursuer to have the sluice removed from the new n terms of the defender's offer, if the pursuer shall wish this to be : Finds the defender entitled to expenses," &c.*

---

* NOTE.—It rather appears from the evidence of some of the skilled wit- s in this case, as well as from the correspondence, that the whole dispute een the parties, as well as the whole of the somewhat complicated and s litigation, might have been avoided by an amicable arrangement, and by paratively small outlay expended in deepening and rendering equable the nel of the Tyrie Burn where it forms the march between the pursuer and efender, and for a little way further down. So far as the Lord Ordinary udge, this would have been an improvement to both parties, and it certainly l have been accomplished at much less expense than either party has in- d in the present litigation.

The parties, however, failed in effecting any amicable arrangement, and each em now stands on his summum jus, or his strict and highest legal right; although regretting that the litigation was not avoided, the Lord Ordinary ndeavoured to decide the case according to the strictest principles of law, out considering, and, indeed, without inquiring which party was to blame he failure to effect an amicable settlement.

The case raises points of considerable difficulty both in law and in fact. It his striking peculiarity, that it is a complaint by a riparian proprietor against l owner on the opposite bank, complaining, not that the miller is taking much water, or at too high a level, which are the usual challenges, but that miller is not taking enough water, or not taking so much as he used to take, that he is restoring it at too high a point. These are unusual complaints, gh it is quite possible in certain cases that they may be well founded in

No. 97. The pursuer reclaimed.[1] At advising,—

Mar. 20, 1873. Bridges v. Lord Saltoun.

LORD PRESIDENT.—This case has become altered in the course of ment.

" The first question in point of fact is, which is the main or proper the Tyrie Burn, and which is the lade, or are the two channels both both artificial lades? These questions lie at the root of the dispute, and in one aspect of the case their decision may be avoided, yet the gene the case cannot be satisfactorily applied without answering these que point of fact.

" The Lord Ordinary has thought it his duty to exhaust the case by both in fact and in law, instead of resting his judgment, as perhaps I have done, upon the sufficiency of the works and tenders made by the

" Now, the Lord Ordinary thinks, looking to the whole evidence a whole circumstances, that it is sufficiently proved that the main chann Tyrie Burn is in the line of the march between the pursuer's lands o and the defender's lands of Tyrie. In short, the Tyrie Burn is th between the two properties, and the channel diverting some of the wa Nether Mill of Tyrie is not the main channel, or a main channel of t but is merely a mill-lade.

" The Lord Ordinary thinks this is the result of the evidence as The old maps, the old witnesses whose evidence was taken in retentis, t of the ground, and the manner in which the mill water was used, tre ultimately disposed of, all point to this result. No doubt both chann a certain extent artificial. The old burn of Tyrie seems originally to ha out in the flat and marshy ground, and wandered somewhat irregul pool to pool. But long since it was straighted and confined, and be march burn, which it now is. This early operation, as well as the construction of the mill-lade, are beyond living memory, but enough tions remain to enable us to say, with some confidence,—'This is forming the march, and this, which runs exclusively through the l lands of Tyrie, is a mere mill-lade for the use of Tyrie Mills.' To no one circumstance, omitting others, the weir, the use of which is to d water, is built across the main channel, and, by itself, indicates whi burn and which is the lade. A weir or dam-dyke is never erected acr lade, but only across a stream or burn from which water is to be divert use of it is to stop and raise the water, in order to send it down the and as the weir has existed for more than forty years the Lord Ordina it is by itself almost conclusive of the question which is the burn and the lade. In connection with the other evidence the Lord Ordinar much doubt on this matter of fact, which is very important in referen present case.

" In the next place, however, it seems equally clear that during t prescriptive period there was no sluice on the mill-lade at its upper en of junction with the burn, and the result of this is that the mill-lade could receive, but must receive, and must have received, all the water directly diverted or stopped into it by the weir. It may be noticed i that in the evidence the word 'intake' is somewhat improperly applie of the witnesses to the weir. The intake, strictly speaking, is not the the opening of the lade, which takes in the water, and where an int is usually placed.

" The fact that there was no intake sluice in this case is an unusual might found some kind of right in the pursuer, for if there had been sluice at the weir always in use, or always capable of being used, and b which the miller might at his pleasure have sent the whole water ove and prevented any from coming down the mill-lade, there would ha remained any question in the present case.

[1] Authorities cited.—Blantyre v. Dunn, Jan. 28, 1848, 10 D. 509; zie v. Woddrop, Jan. 24, 1854, 16 D. 381.

No. 97.

Mar. 20, 1873.
Bridges v. Lord Saltoun.

he original contention of the pursuer was that the defender was not entitled hut up the lade upon any condition whatever. The pursuer's ground for this

But although there was no sluice at the intake there was a sluice on the lade a good way further down, about 500 yards from the intake, and within ry short distance of the mill itself, and the Lord Ordinary thinks it suffi-ly proved in evidence that this sluice was always in use, or capable of being , and was at the entire command of the miller, the defender's tenant. This ery important fact, for by that sluice, at A^2 on the plan No. 61 of process, whole water in the mill-lade could be stopped, and dammed back at the r's pleasure (that is, at the defender's pleasure), and the miller often did so. e is a dispute whether this sluice could dam the water back beyond the e, but this is not very material, for it seems proved that when the sluice at as shut, the water, if not dammed back to the intake, escaped over the bank e mill-lade, which acted as a sort of waste or spill-water, and the water so ing being the whole surplus water of the lade, flowed down a back ditch, rejoined the main burn above the bridge at the point D^1 on the plan No. f process. This is extremely material, for D^1 is the point where the de-er's new, or substitute cut aftermentioned, rejoins the burn, and it seems to roved in evidence that while the lade was in use the defender's miller t at his pleasure, by shutting the sluice at A^2, have made the whole surplus nts of the lade flow back to the burn at D^1.

t may be noticed, in passing, that the fact of the complete shut-off sluice at well as the spill-water sluice close to the mill, speak volumes as to the being a proper mill-lade, and not a natural channel of the burn.

Matters stood thus from time immemorial, or at least for more than forty . Recently, however, the defender has given up his mill at Nether Tyrie, having no farther use for the mill-lade he became desirous of filling it up improving his land. The question is, is he entitled to do so; and if so, on conditions.

After a great deal of communing, the defender, in order to avoid question, ved to make a new cut, leaving the burn at the old weir at B, and rejoining burn at D^1, which is more than 200 feet lower down than the defender's rty, intending this new cut to carry the same quantity of water that the ade had done, and in order to shew or to secure this, the defender caused ld sluice—the identical structure which had formerly been on the old lade ², to be placed on the new cut but a great deal further up, and near the a. The defender offered, however, long before the present action was l, to take into and send down the new cut 'as much or as little water as ridges (the pursuer) may desire,' and again he offered 'not only to take the new cut whatever quantity of water he (the pursuer) may desire, but o remove the sluice at present at the head of the cut altogether.'

Now, the Lord Ordinary is of opinion that the offers made by the defender reasonable, and were all that the pursuer could either in law or in reason nd. The whole water taken by the old mill-lade might undoubtedly at any by shutting the sluice at A^2, have been returned to the sluice at D^1, and s exactly what is done by the new cut. And if there was any doubt about luice passing more or less water in its new position than it did formerly could be more reasonable than the defender's offer to take it away altogether, o send down the new cut just as much or just as little water as the pursuer t please.

f the Lord Ordinary is right in the view now suggested there would be ph to settle the case without going to the somewhat nice question of law a lies beyond.

But the question of law is really raised by the summons, and the Lord ary does not think that in fairness he is entitled to avoid it, and he feels elled to negative the conclusions of the action.

f, in point of fact, the march is the main course of the Tyrie Burn, and the rough the defender's lands to the mill of Tyrie is a mere mill-lade, then ght is very near the recognised right or servitude of aquæhaustus. The

No. 97.

Mar. 20, 1873.
Bridges v. Lord Saltoun.

was, that the lade was the natural channel of the burn, and that the burn was a mere ditch. But this is not at all a reasonable or tenable ground, looking to article 2 of the condescendence for the pursuer.

This mill-lade has existed from time immemorial, and the right of diverting the water from the burn was acquired, like all rights of that kind, by agreement or by prescription. It is a servitude in which the mill is the dominant tenement and the estate of Ardlaw is the servient tenement. It is a servitude well known to the law, but a servitude which the dominant tenement is not bound to continue to exercise when it becomes unnecessary to do so. But a servitude of this kind cannot be abandoned unless the works for doing so are so executed as to be innoxious to the servient tenement. This is clearly laid down in the cases of Blantyre v. Dunn, and Mackenzie v. Woddrop. Ardlaw must not be exposed to any disadvantage to which it has not been exposed past the memory of man. If the effect of the defender's operations is not to expose Ardlaw to injury or risk of injury it is not necessary for him to do anything, but if it is the case that Ardlaw is so exposed then the defender is bound to take all proper precautions.

These are the principles on which I found my judgment.

What are the facts?

The water in the lade was diverted from the burn at the point marked B on the plan, and it then came down through the lands of Tyrie until it reached the mill. At the mill there were two courses, by either of which the diverted water could be returned to the main channel of the burn; one of these was that which joined the main channel at F, and it is the course the water took when the mill was working. The other course is that which enters the main channel at E, and it was the proper bye-water of the mill by means of which the water went into the main channel when the mill was not used. These channels were both of them necessary for the proper working of the mill.

But it is said that there was another channel which entered the burn at the letter D[1], and as it appears to me to be very important in its bearing upon the decision of the case I will consider the facts as laid before us.

The evidence is not very direct, but there is one witness who had the best means of knowing about the matter. That is the witness Andrew Bruce, who was tenant of the mill, and whose father and grandfather were tenants before him.

His evidence is to the effect that there is no such thing as a water-course defender and his mill of Tyrie are the dominant tenement, the stream or the lands interested in it are the servient. In such a case the servient tenement can hardly, without circumstances which do not occur here, compel the dominant tenement, to exercise its right, that is, to take water whether it will or not, that is, to use and maintain the lade though the mill have disappeared. A servitude is a burden on the servient tenement, and a right mere facultatis in the dominant. There is no instance in any of the known servitudes, whether of way, of aqueduct, of water, of light, or of support, of compelling the dominant tenement to exercise a right which it wishes to relinquish. This would be reversing the relation of the properties, and the only alternative is to suppose that the pursuer as owner of Ardlaw, has acquired a servitude or some kind of right over the lands of Tyrie. It might be suggested that while Tyrie had a right of aquæ haustus from the stream, Ardlaw had a right of aquæductus, or of sending the same water through the lands of Tyrie. But this is really untenable. Ardlaw has no mill to serve, and he would probably shrink from the burden which the dominant owner must bear of upholding the dam-dykes and aqueducts.

---

"It is needless to enter farther into the details of the case. The dispute as to the backwater at Bodychell Mill, the question how, and how far the lower corner of the lands of Ardlaw is flooded or prevented from being drained, the action and effect of the Glashiemyre Burn, are all matters on which there is a good deal of contradictory evidence. In some aspects of the case these matters of fact may be material, but the Lord Ordinary prefers to rest his judgment on the broad general grounds which he has above shortly indicated."

No. 97.

Mar. 20, 1878.
Bridges v.
Lord Saltoun.

between the sluice and the point D[1]. When the sluice was put in the object was to dam back the water for the use of the mill. It was not unnatural that the water should run over the dam. And what became of it then? It ran into the field beside the dam, and of course ultimately fell into the nearest ditch and ran into the burn. This was the fault of the miller, but it was not his object to do so. He had no interest to do so, and it was not his common practice to do so.

The defender states that the sluice at the head of the new cut, which he has substituted for the old water-course, will be kept open to its full extent or removed altogether, the effect of which is to throw the whole water into the cut, and so remove all ground of complaint in regard to regorging of the water above that point. But then the effect of the water being returned to the burn at D[1] will cause it to regorge or come back upon the lands of Ardlaw at the point D. If this cut had been carried down to E or F that would not have been the case, and that would have been in accordance with the real state of possession for the prescriptive period.

There is a peculiarity in regard to the levels of the ground at the point D. There is a fall below D[1], and very little fall at D.

The hardship complained of by the pursuer, viz., the regorging of the water upon his lands at D, could easily have been removed by deepening the channel of the burn at that point.

But there are other ways of removing the regorging; one of these is to carry the cut down to F.

It is much to be regretted that this cut should have been made by the defender in his own hand without having got an assurance from the pursuer that he would be satisfied with it. It was that taking the matter into his own hands that chiefly prevented this difficulty from being removed by agreement of parties. During the whole correspondence that passed between the agents for the parties before the case came into Court, and even after the summons had been prepared, the pursuer offered to bear a portion of expense of making the alterations proposed by him to remedy the evil complained of, viz., to deepen the burn below the point D, as is shewn by his letters.

That was a most reasonable proposal, and if the parties had come to an agreement upon that the whole expense of this litigation would have been avoided.

We are now in a position to make this proposal be carried out by finding that the right of the defender to shut up the lade can only be exercised on condition of his keeping the pursuer free from any damage.

It has been argued by the defender that the pursuer has not suffered any loss, & that is a very weak argument. The defender is bound so to conduct his works as not to expose the pursuer to any disadvantage to which he was not exposed before the alterations.

I therefore cannot concur with the Lord Ordinary. His findings are,—"Finds in point of law that the defender is entitled to discontinue, if he pleases, the use of the said mill-lade, and is not bound to uphold or keep up the same for the purpose of diverting from the burn the water which for the last forty years the mill has been in use to receive." I think that finding is bad law. The defender is bound to construct his works so as not to hurt the pursuer. But the Lord Ordinary finds further, "that the defender, without prejudice to his legal pleas, has made through his own lands a new cut commencing at the said burn at the place where the defender's said original lade commenced, and ending at the said burn at a point considerably below the lowest point of the Ardlaw march, and that for the purpose of receiving from the burn and carrying past the pursuer's lands the same quantity of water as was formerly in use to be taken by the said mill-lade, and finds that, although the old sluice of the said mill-lade has been placed upon the said new cut, yet, before the raising of the present action, the defender offered to remove the said sluice and to receive into the said new cut as much or as little water as the pursuer might desire: Finds in point of law, and without prejudice to the finding in law above written, that the defender cannot be required to do more than he has done and offered to do before the present action was raised." I think, on the contrary, that he can be required to do more than he has done or offered to do, and that is to continue the cut to the point F, or to deepen the burn between D and E. He must als the sluice at B.

No. 97. Mar. 20, 1873. Bridges v. Lord Saltoun.

LORD DEAS.—In so far as your Lordship has stated the import of t and the substance of the correspondence I concur, and will not go over ground.

Upon the question of law involved I also concur. I think that Lor was quite entitled at any time to do away with the mill-lade, and to di using the water; but although he was so entitled, I agree with your that, after the years of prescription had run, he could not legally re water to the burn without making sure that no injury should ensue to of Ardlaw. That, the proof shews, he has not sufficiently done. I do i it necessary in such a case as this for the proprietor of Ardlaw to prov and absolutely that real damage has been sustained. I think he is enti protected against any greater risk of future damage by floods and overfl he was formerly exposed to. The pursuer seems prepared to be sa either the new cut be continued to E, or the burn between D[1] and E c and I think Lord Saltoun is bound to do one or other of these two thi

LORD ARDMILLAN.—I concur in the observations made by your Lor the proof in this case, and on the law applicable to that proof. The w was taken off from the stream and used for far more than the prescripti for Lord Saltoun's mill, and during that time there was growing a pr right on the part of the proprietor or the estate of Ardlaw—a right to to be relieved of that water if the relief was a benefit to the estate. with your Lordships that Lord Saltoun is entitled to give up the us water, which he no longer requires, but he is not entitled to do so al Assuming that he is entitled to give it up and return it to the stream must not injure his neighbour by so returning the water, as to flood or injure the lands of Ardlaw. It is clear to my mind that the defenda tions throw on the lands of Ardlaw a burden and disadvantage from wh have been free for upwards of forty years. This is an injury which the is not entitled to inflict.

LORD JERVISWOODE concurred.

THE following interlocutor was pronounced:—"Recall the locutor: Find that the mill-lade which has been recently by the defender has existed for time immemorial, and l effect of diverting the greater part of the water of the Tyr at a point where that burn forms the boundary between th of the pursuer and those of the defender, and returning t diverted water to the main channel of the burn at a poin it runs through the estate of the defender: Find that the d is entitled to shut up the said lade, but only on the conditi the operations executed for that purpose shall not in an injuriously affect the lands of the pursuer, or expose t greater risk of flooding than they were exposed to while th lade existed: Find that the manner in which the water is re ducted and returned to the burn is calculated to expose, an expose, the pursuer to flooding of his lands, to which he w exposed while the said mill-lade existed: Find that the d is bound, as the condition of his being allowed to keep t mill-lade closed, to protect the pursuer against such flo his lands, and that by keeping the mouth of the additional constructed by the defender open and without a sluice point marked B on the plan No. 61 of process, and also ei extending the said additional channel down to the points E on the said plan, or by deepening the main channel

Tyrie Burn between the points marked D and F on the said plan, so as to increase the fall between the points marked D and D^1 on the said plan; and whichever of these two last-mentioned operations the defender elects to execute, appoint the said operations to be executed at the sight and to the satisfaction of James Forbes Beattie, land-surveyor and engineer, Aberdeen, and appoint the said James Forbes Beattie to report the execution of said operations when completed; reserving in the meantime all questions of expenses."

No. 97.

Mar. 20, 1873.
Bridges v. Lord Saltoun.

STUART & CHEYNE, W.S.—W. & J. COOK, W.S.—Agents.

No. 98.

Mar. 20, 1873.
Leith, Hull, and Hamburg Steam-Packet Co. v. Lord Advocate.

E LEITH, HULL, AND HAMBURG STEAM-PACKET COMPANY, Pursuers.—Watson—Lancaster.
HE LORD ADVOCATE (for the Board of Trade and Commissioners and Board of Customs), Defenders.—Sol.-Gen. Clark—Rutherfurd.

hip-Measurement—Merchant Shipping Act, 1854 (17 and 18 Vict. c. 104), 21, subsec. 4—Hurricane Deck—Permanent closed-in space.—A steamship constructed with a bridge extending across the vessel and connected with bulwarks on either side, and below the bridge at its centre there was a small d house. A hurricane deck or covering was subsequently added, extending the forecastle to the bridge. The space below this covering was not entirely d in, there being a passage on either side of the round house, and no means losing these passages in. It being proved that this hurricane deck did not nt the shipment of seas, and that the working of the ship was almost ely conducted on the main deck, held (by Lord Gifford) that the space below hurricane deck was not "a closed-in space on the upper deck available for or stores, or for the berthing or accommodation of passengers or crew," in the meaning of subsection 4 of section 21 of the Merchant Shipping Act, , and therefore did not fall to be included in the measurement of the ship.

Outer-House. Lord Gifford.

HIS action was brought by the Leith, Hull, and Hamburg Steamcet Company against the Lord Advocate, as representing the Board rade and the Commissioners and Board of Customs. The summons luded that it "should be found and declared, by decree of the Lords ur Council and Session, as to the said steamship 'Danzig,' belonging he pursuers, that the space measuring or equivalent to 84·78 tons, ained between the ordinary upper deck and the hurricane deck or ring extending over part of the said upper deck, and which extends the after-end of the forecastle to the after-end of the bridge, does form a break, or a poop, or permanent closed-in space available for or stores, or for the berthing or accommodation of passengers or r, or space which can be lawfully included in the ship's register ton- within the meaning of the Merchant Shipping Act, 1854; and it ht and should be found and declared that, under the Merchant Shipping , 1854, no part of such space can be lawfully included in the register nage of the ship," and to have the defenders ordained to remeasure the

he pursuers pleaded;—(1) The pursuers are entitled to have the nship "Danzig" remeasured, in conformity with the provisions of the chant Shipping Act, 1854. (2) The defenders having insisted on suring the said ship in violation of section 26, and on a principle not tioned by the said Act, the pursuers are entitled to decree as coned for.

he defenders pleaded;—The declaratory conclusions of the summons

No. 98.

Mar. 20, 1873. Leith, Hull, and Hamburg Steam-Packet Co. v. Lord Advocate.

being inconsistent with the provisions of the Merchant Shipp 1854, and in particular with the rules provided by that Act for ment of tonnage, the defenders are entitled to absolvitor, with ex

By interlocutor, dated the 14th November 1871, the Lord before answer, remitted to Mr Thomas H. Eastlake, Lloyd's Leith, to examine the steamship "Danzig," and to report as to and condition of her main deck, and of the erections, struct coverings thereon, so far as the same related to the question measurement for the registered tonnage of the said steamsh interlocutor being reclaimed against, was affirmed on 2d Decemb

Mr Eastlake reported, inter alia, that the working of the ship ducted on the main deck, the fittings thereof being the same as the erection of the structure above, with the exceptions that a a steam winch had been removed to the top of the covering. T ing did not prevent the shipment of beam seas abaft its after although it was thick enough for an awning deck it was too t spar deck.

The Lord Ordinary, on 30th January 1872, pronounced this int adding the subjoined note:—"Having heard parties' procurators, ar considered the closed record, the report by Thomas H. Eastlake, objections thereto, and whole process, repels the objections state defenders to Mr Eastlake's report, in so far as said objections are to specific statements contained in said report upon matters of fac to the structure of the ship in question, or of erections or thereon: Quoad ultra finds that the said objections do not rend sary or expedient any further remit to Mr Eastlake or to a reporter, and refuses the defenders' motion for such further remi and declares in favour of the pursuers in terms of the whole de conclusions of the summons, and decerns: And in reference to the conclusion of the action, finds that the pursuers' steamship ought to be remeasured in terms of the preceding declaratory j and in terms of the Merchant Shipping Act, 1854, and Acts an lations relative thereto, and, if necessary, appoints the case to be for further procedure in reference to said remeasurement: Finds suers entitled to expenses, and remits the account thereof, wher to the Auditor to tax and report."

"NOTE.—The Lord Ordinary is fully sensible of the very wide an importance of the question raised in the present action. He feels that sion will not only affect the pursuers and the particular ship now in largely diminishing the dues and burdens payable on said ship and th of trading with the vessel, but will also govern the cases of other ships constructed, and not only so, but will affect the plan and structure of s which may hereafter be built. The question may even influence bene injuriously the safety and sea-going qualities of steam vessels, and thus it touches the highest interests of life and property.

"The Lord Ordinary feels bound, however, to a great extent to disre considerations, and to confine himself to the fair and sound constructi statutory provisions contained in the Merchant Shipping Act of 1854, relative Acts and Regulations. If these statutory provisions, fairly applied, are injurious to shipping interests, and, still more, if they p encourage a dangerous or unseaworthy construction of vessel, the reme the Legislature and not with the Court.

"At the same time it gives the Lord Ordinary satisfaction to think far as he can understand the matter, the judgment now pronounced, doubtedly favourable to ships constructed like the 'Danzig,' will n danger either to passengers or to cargo. It appears to the Lord Ord a ship with deck coverings like those with which the 'Danzig' is fitt

No. 98.

Mar. 20, 1873.

Leith, Hull, and Hamburg Steam-Packet Co. v. Lord Advocate.

...reby rendered unsafe, but that the coverings contribute to its safety in heavy ...s; provided always (and this is a proviso which applies to all ships whatever) ...t it be not overloaded, and that its cargo is not improperly distributed.

"The leading provision which is made the subject of construction in the pre...t action is the 4th subsection of the 21st clause of the Merchant Shipping ...t, 1854 (17 and 18 Vict. cap. 104). The opening words of the subsection ...vide for the measurement of certain spaces on or above the upper deck of the ...sel. In the present action there is no question relating to spaces below the ...per or weather deck. The words of the Act are,—'If there be a break, a ...op, or any other permanent closed-in space on the upper deck available for ...go or stores, or for the berthing or accommodation of passengers or crew, the ...nage of such space shall be ascertained as follows.' The rules for measure...nt are then given.

"The words above quoted do not seem to be affected by any regulations made ...issued under the authority of the Act. It appears that such regulations exist, ...ugh they are not mentioned on record.

"The steamship 'Danzig' has a poop or closed-in space on the after part of ...e upper deck. It has also a forecastle or closed-in space for the crew con...ted on the upper deck at the bow of the vessel. There are also certain ...k-houses amidships for the accommodation of the officers, and for other pur...s. Regarding all these there is no question. They are all measured in the ...nage, or, as it might with more accuracy be called, the roomage of the ship, ...hundred cubic feet of space being called a ton.

"As the ship was originally constructed, there were, and there are still, a ...dge and a hurricane deck, both of which constitute partial coverings of the ...per or weather deck of the vessel; but the spaces under the bridge and under ...e hurricane deck, so far as not enclosed into deck-houses, was not measured, ...d, as the ship was originally made, it was admitted would not be measurable ...der the statute. So stood the ship when finally measured in 1866, her tonnage ...s being at 466·65 tons.

"In 1870 a round house was built for steerage passengers, and this being ...asured added about 20 tons, making the whole tonnage 480·48 tons, but still ...attempt was made to measure the covered spaces under the bridge and hurri...e deck. In the beginning of 1871 the pursuers constructed an additional ...ering over the upper deck of the vessel, extending from the after-end of the ...castle, and joining with the front edge of the bridge. The Custom-house ...horities immediately claimed that this made the whole space so covered a ...ed-in space in the sense of the statute, and that it fell to be measured and ...ded to the tonnage. After some communings this was ultimately done, and ...e added tonnage came to no less than 84·78 tons. It is of this addition that ...e pursuers complain, and to try the question the present action has been ...ught.

"In the Lord Ordinary's view the question depends on the words of the ...tute, and on a comparison of the statutory words with the actual condition ...d structure of the vessel. He found it necessary to make a remit to Lloyd's ...veyor to ascertain some disputed matters of fact relating to structure; but he ...sed to allow a proof at large, which would have embraced a great many ...tters. The interlocutor of remit was affirmed of this date (2d December ...71).

"The reporter, Mr Eastlake, has made a very clear and distinct report, which, ...th the model in process and with the admissions on record, seem to embrace ...l the elements necessary for judgment. The defenders have objected to Mr ...stlake's report, and they asked a new remit to him or to some one else. The ...rd Ordinary has refused this motion. The objections resolve themselves into ...o classes. First, Those which allege that Mr Eastlake has reported wrongly ...n matters of fact within his own observation as to the structure of the vessel. ...e Lord Ordinary sees no ground for this class of objections, and he repels ...m. The second class of objections is that Mr Eastlake has omitted to report ...on a great variety of matters specified. The Lord Ordinary has carefully gone ...er all these matters, and he thinks that they may either be assumed as fairly within the knowledge of the Court, or that they are immaterial to the q at issue. No new remit therefore seems necessary.

No. 98.

Mar. 20, 1873.
Leith, Hull, and Hamburg Steam-Packet Co. v. Lord Advocate.

"After the best consideration which the Lord Ordinary can give, h opinion that the space under the new covering which has been constru the 'Danzig' is not in the sense of the statute 'a break, a poop, or an permanent closed-in space on the upper deck, available for cargo or store the berthing or accommodation of passengers or crew.' His grounds f opinion are shortly the following:—

"(1) The space in question is not a 'break' or 'poop.' Of course it i 'poop,' but there was originally some question whether it might not be a ' though the word is not reported upon by Mr Eastlake. It seems clear, h that a break is an interruption or termination in structure of the deck, the deck remains unbroken from poop or forecastle, it was not ultimate tended that that word applies.

"(2) The space is not 'a permanent closed-in space.' In one sen covering may be said to be 'permanent,' for it is not intended to be re and access is given through it by a hatchway; but then the space is not fair sense 'closed-in.' The space is not shut off from the deck as a round or deck house is; but though covered it is just part of the weather d before. Leaving out of view for the present the water-ports, mooring mooring-bits, and scuppers, all of which open under the covering, it is su to observe that the space is not at all closed in aft, and that there are no for closing it aft. No doubt the round house on the deck is at the aft the covered space, but on either side of the round house there is left 7 inches of clear deck leading under the covering, and these spaces are open. In short, the covered space, though closed more or less on three is open on the fourth side—that it is open aft—and this seems enough vent it from being, in the sense of the statute, a 'closed-in space.' It i that the words must be reasonably construed, and the Lord Ordinary wou have touched the decision of the surveyors if there had been a mere prete leaving openings to evade the statute. He thinks, however, that this can contended, and that there is in the present case a clear distinction betw covered or sheltered space and a 'closed-in space.'

"(3) In another sense the space in question is not closed in, beca remains really part of the main deck of the vessel, which is at least some needed for the working or management of the ship. The water-ports open this space, and though they may be closed more or less tightly (even tallow be used to make the door fit sweetly and closely), they cannot be made, a not intended to be made, water-tight. The mooring-bits and mooring-pip under the covering, and although they are only used when the ship is n in harbour, or at moorings, they are really on the weather deck. The sca open into the space in question, and they must always be left open, for ho tight the ports and mooring-pipes may be made water will always flow for example, from aft or beam seas—and must have a way of escape. (the pumps is worked under the covering, and although the defenders in objections say it is only a small pump, it is not the less one of the ordinary appliances. In short, notwithstanding the covering, the deck under it re deck as before, although necessarily the sails are worked from the top covering.

"(4) It is admitted by the minute in process that the space under the which was not measured before is now included in the 84·78 tons. It wa ceded that this is wrong, but the concession can hardly stop there, for the under the bridge opening only aft is quite as much 'closed in' as the space the new covering, which opens aft in precisely the same way.

"(5) The Lord Ordinary concedes at once that the case might be qui ferent if additional coverings were put abaft the bridge and abaft the hum deck, connecting the whole with the roof of the poop. The front of the would then close in the aft end, and thus close in the whole space from for to poop, and supply what is wanting now, a closing of the end or fourth If this were done there would be room for maintaining that an entire new

No. 98.

Mar. 20, 1873.

Leith, Hull, and Hamburg Steam-Packet Co. v. Lord Advocate.

l been constructed, whether it be called a spar deck or an awning deck; and sibly it would not be enough merely to leave scuppers and mooring-bits as y were originally, to exclude the space below from being considered as one the 'tween decks of the ship. Indeed, ultimately the question might come be one of degree, and when such a question arises the Court will not lightly erfere with the judgment of the official surveyor. The present case, however, not run up to any such point.

'(6) The space in question is not, in the sense of the statute, available for go. The word 'cargo,' it is thought, does not mean deck cargo, for deck go is cargo carried on deck, and spaces for deck cargo, in cases where such go is lawful, are not to be measured. There is nothing in itself illegal in rying some kinds of cargo on deck, with proper and usual precautions, hough certain rights arise in regard to risk and liability with deck cargo ferent from ordinary cargoes. Indeed some things must always be carried on k, either from their size or structure or from their dangerous qualities. Now, ems clear that the space in question is not available for perishable cargo. Eastlake's report explains this, and it is plain that every aft or beam sea ped would, by the motion of the vessel, be sent washing the whole length the deck. It is true deck cargo will be carried better under the covering, and more comfortably and more safely, than without it; but this is not enough ake the space measurable. The same result might be attained in a lesser ee by heightening the bulwarks, without a covering at all; but this would make a space above deck measurable as tonnage. The place will always in stormy weather more or less a wet place. Beam seas will always wash e, and even the dipping of the bows in rough weather will send water in by scuppers and ports.

(7) The space in question is not 'available for berthing or accommodation assengers or crew.' A berth means generally, or at least often, a sleeping e, and that must be, or should be, reasonably dry. Passengers under the rings would plainly not have dry berths of it. Though partially sheltered, would to all intents and purposes be deck passengers, just like the cattle; badly as crews are sometimes accommodated it can hardly be said that under covering they would in any sense be lodged or berthed.

Without going into further details, and specially reserving other cases where mpts may possibly be made to evade the fair meaning of the statute, the l Ordinary thinks that in the present case the pursuers' demand is well ded, and should be given effect to. Fairly looked at, and reasonably used, covering does not enable the ship to carry more tonnage—using the word in sense of cargo—than before, but only to carry its former complements better easier; and it is to be hoped that a comparative freedom from ordinary for- l seas will not tempt the owners to load to a deeper load-line than they ld otherwise have done.

The Lord Ordinary has only given decree in terms of the declaratory con- ions. If his judgment is acquiesced in or affirmed no further difficulty will ; but if it should, any question of detail may yet be disposed of under the tory conclusions. If the pursuers are right, they seem to be entitled to ases."

THE Lord Ordinary's judgment was acquiesced in.

WEBSTER & WILL, S.S.C.—W. J. SANDS, W.S.—Agents.

SUMMER SESSION.

No. 99.

May 13, 1873.

White v. M'Ewen's Trustees.

JOHN C. WHITE, Suspender.—Scott.
JAMES M'EWEN'S TRUSTEES, Respondents.—Watson—Balfour.

Decree—Correction of Clerical Error—Judge.—Observations on the incompetency of an inferior Judge, ex proprio motu, correcting an error in an interlocutor after it had been issued and seen by the parties.

2D DIVISION. Lord Mure. I.

THIS was a suspension of a decree pronounced by the Dean of Guild Glasgow, on the ground that in one of the previous interlocutors in the process a clerical error—using the word "respondent" instead of "pursuer" had been incompetently and unwarrantably corrected by the Clerk Court and the Dean of Guild after the interlocutor had been signed the Dean of Guild and seen by the parties.

The Lord Ordinary refused the suspension, on the ground that interlocutor sought to be suspended did not bear any reference to, was not necessarily dependent on, the interlocutor which had been rected. On the question of the competency of the correction the L Ordinary (Mure), in his note, said :—"The interlocutor of 22d vember 1870 . . . had been altered after it had been signed issued officially, by substituting the word 'respondents' for 'p suer' in that part of it which deals with the question of expen Because, although this alteration upon the interlocutor of the 22d November was one which, having regard to the decisions in the ca of Duguid, June 3, 1824, 3 S. 396; Wright, December 6, 1832, 11 180; Kerr, December 17, 1835, 14 S. 180; and Walker, June 11, 18 20 D. 1102, may be said to fall within the category of what are cal clerical errors, which have in the Court of Session been corrected recenti in presence of the parties, the Lord Ordinary is not aware of authority for holding that such an alteration may be made upon an in locutor, after it has been signed and issued, at the Judge's own h outwith the presence of parties, and without any formal motion ha been made to that effect; and were any such practice to be sanctione the inferior Courts it might, he conceives, tend to create a preju against the administration of justice in those Courts in material resp For the alteration of an interlocutor after it has been signed and is is at all times a very delicate matter, and has in the ordinary case b supposed to be competent only ex nobili officio to the Supreme Court the Court of Session, accordingly, the Lord Ordinary is authorised alter interlocutors, but only 'of consent of both parties,' and that minute duly signed by both parties (Act of Sederunt, July 1828, sec. And although it is made competent by the 20th section of the Act and 17 Vict., c. 80, for Sheriffs 'to correct any mere clerical error' befo the proceedings were transmitted to the Court of review, but not late than seven days from the date of that judgment, that Act does not appl to Burgh Courts. So that if the alteration in the present case had be made within seven days from the date of the interlocutor, which is the opinion of the Lord Ordinary not proved, the proceedings in questi could not, it is thought, have been supported by the provisions of th statute, especially in a case where the interlocutor had been official issued; and it is pretty plain, from the evidence of the Dean of Gui that he signed the alteration in the belief that the interlocutor was st under his control, and that he would not have signed it had he kno

No. 99.

May 13, 1873.
White v. M'Ewen's Trustees.

the interlocutor had been already issued. It was, therefore, in the l Ordinary's view, an irregular proceeding to alter an interlocutor." he suspender reclaimed.[1]

RD JUSTICE-CLERK.—It is in vain to disguise the fact that the correction of nterlocutor of the 22d November was irregular. Such a short-hand mode of ing a judgment cannot be sanctioned. If an error has occurred it can only rrected de recenti, and in presence of the parties. It is a different matter effect it has on this suspension. I agree in the result at which the Lord nary has arrived.

RD COWAN.—I concur that the correction was irregularly and incompetently

RD BENHOLME.—The first interlocutor was vitiated; but, taking the worst of it, and holding it pro non scripto, I do not think that it concerned an rtant or irretrievable matter; and, though the irregularity cannot be de- d, the suspension must be refused.

RD NEAVES.—I am quite of the same opinion. It was most irregular and per to make this alteration, and it is a great pity it was attempted. But, , that interlocutor decided nothing; it was not necessary to correct it for purpose of putting things right; and as the interlocutor on which the e proceeds is in itself complete, and is not incompetent, I agree that the sus- ion should be refused.

THE COURT adhered, with expenses, subject to modification.

RHIND & LINDSAY, W.S.—GRAHAM & JOHNSTON, W.S.—Agents.

No. 100.

May 14, 1873.
Kennedy v. Taylor.

1ST DIVISION.
Lord Gifford.
M.

EUPHEMIA CAMERON KENNEDY, Reclaimer.—M'Laren.
JOHN PATERSON TAYLOR AND OTHERS, Respondents.—Pattison.

ocess—Reclaiming Note—Leave of Lord Ordinary—Court of Session 1868 (31 and 32 Vict. cap. 100), secs. 53 and 54.—In an action of iplepoinding the Lord Ordinary pronounced an interlocutor exhaust- ll the questions of law between the different claimants, settling the s of the fund in medio (the amount of which had not been ascer- d) to which they were respectively entitled, appointing the case to nrolled for further procedure, and finding no expenses due to or by of the competing claimants.

ennedy having reclaimed, Taylor and others objected that the reclaim- note was incompetent, on the ground that the leave of the Lord Ordi- had not been obtained.

he reclaimer maintained that the interlocutor reclaimed against was which disposed "of the competition between the parties in a pro- of competition,"[2] in the sense of sec. 53 of the above Act.*

THE COURT held that the reclaiming note was incompetent.

A. HASTIE, S.S.C.—M'EWEN & CARMENT, W.S.—J. & W. C. MURRAY, W.S.—Agents.

---

16 and 17 Vict. c. 8, sec. 80; Act of Seder., 1839, sec. 63; Miller v. Lind- June 8, 1850, 12 D. 964; Fell v. Lyon, Feb. 16, 1830, 8 S. 543; Palmer tewart, Jan. 28, 1832, 10 S. 252; Kerr v. Bremner, Dec. 17, 1835, 14 S. ; Gilmour, Feb. 7, 1839, 1 D. 467; Gray v. Young, Nov. 22, 1839, 2 .28.

Fraser v. Fraser, Jan. 30, 1872, ante, vol. x., p. 420; Lamond's Trustees v. er, May 14, 1872, ante, vol. x., p. 692.

Sec. 53.—"It shall be held that the whole cause has been decided in the e-House when an interlocutor has been pronounced by the Lord Ordinary

No. 101.

May 16, 1873.
Balfour v. Simpson.

JAMES BALFOUR AND OTHERS, Pursuers and Respondents.—J. A. Reid.
ALEXANDER SIMPSON, Defender and Appellant.—Rhind.

Reference to Oath—Extrinsic and Intrinsic—Bill of Exchange—Discharge.—In an action on a prescribed bill the defender, on a reference to his oath, deponed that he had received the money and had paid interest for some years, that he offered repayment of the principal sum, but that the creditor told him he did not want it, and that he was to keep it for his own use. The debtor paid no interest after that time, but the bill was not given to him or destroyed. Held that the oath was affirmative of the reference, in so far as regarded the capital sum.

2D DIVISION. Sheriff of Aberdeenshire. R.

ON 1st July 1861 Simpson borrowed £140 from George Ironside, and accepted a bill for that amount. He paid interest regularly until 1st July 1866. Since then no interest was paid. Ironside died in January 18[illegible]. The bill was indorsed in these terms:—"Pay to James Balfour and Mrs Jane Balfour for behoof of the family of the late Wm. Balfour. GEORGE IRONSIDE." It did not appear when this indorsement was written. In 1872 the indorsees raised this action against Simpson, concluding for payment of the sum in the bill, with interest from 1st July 1866. They produced the bill. The defender pleaded the sexennial prescription. The pursuers referred to his oath. He deponed,—"The bill is addressed to me, signed by me. I received the amount of £140 mentioned in it from George Ironside. I paid interest on it for five years, up till 1st July 1866. I paid it at 4 per cent; and to Ironside I have repaid no part of the £140. After I paid the interest in 1866 I offered him repayment of the principal sum, but he told me that he did not want it—that I had done a good deal for his comfort, more than his own sons had done, and that he wanted to make me a present of it. Ironside said positively when I offered him the money back in 1866 that he did'nt want it, and that I was to keep it for my own use. The indorsement on the bill is neither written nor signed by Ironside. I know Ironside's handwriting."

The Sheriff-substitute allowed the pursuers a proof that the bill was indorsed to them by Ironside.

The defender appealed to the Sheriff (Guthrie Smith) who found the oath affirmative of the reference, and decerned in terms of the conclusions of the summons.*

---

which, either by itself or taken along with a previous interlocutor or interlocutors, disposes of the whole subject-matter of the cause, or of the competition between the parties in a process of competition, although judgment shall not have been pronounced upon all the questions of law or fact raised in the cause; but it shall not prevent a cause from being held as so decided that expenses, if found due, have not been taxed, modified, or decerned for."

* "NOTE.—The defender admits the receipt of £140, the sum sued for, the granting of the bill, and the regular payment of interest to the lender, Mr Ironside, down to 1st July 1866, conform to the markings on the back of the instrument.

"But he says he took the money on the assurance that payment would probably never be asked unless Mr Ironside came to need it himself, and that when he tendered payment in 1866 he was told to keep it. Mr Ironside, however, did not give up the bill, which would have been the right way of making him a present of the debt, and he seems subsequently to have changed his mind, because he left it indorsed 'Pay to James Balfour and Mrs Jane Balfour for behoof of the family of the late Wm. Balfour.' (Signed) 'GEORGE IRONSIDE.'

"It is quite clear that, on the defender's own shewing, nothing passed between him and Mr Ironside at the time when the money was advanced which entitled him to consider it as a gift. On the contrary, whatever good-natured assurances

nder appealed, and argued that the oath was negative of the f resting owing.[1] suers replied.[2]

No. 101.
May 16, 1873.
Balfour v. Simpson.

OURT pronounced this interlocutor:—"Hold the oath as regards capital sum sued for affirmative, and to that extent affirm the gment appealed from: Find no interest due prior to the date of i action: Find the defender liable in the principal sum sued for, h interest from the date of the summons, and decern, the purs always obtaining before extract the concurrence of the trustees executors of the late George Ironside to the discharge: Find appellants liable in two-thirds of the expenses in both Courts: nit to the Auditor to tax and report."

A. & J. Bruce, W.S.—William Officer, S.S.C.—Agents.

S Dick Lauder, Bart., Pursuer.—Sol-Gen. Clark—R. Johnstone.
Daniel Shiels, Defender.—Marshall—Jameson.

No. 102.
May 17, 1873.
Lauder v. Shiels.

and Vassal—Writ of Confirmation—Statute 31 and 32 Vict. c. 101 Land Consolidation Act, 1868), secs. 10, 98, 100—Private Act, 6 xxviii.—By a private Act of Parliament the proprietor of an entailed power, under certain conditions, to feu the estate, the Act providing nditions should be inserted in all subsequent investitures, and that nitting to do so should incur an irritancy. Held (diss. Lord Deas, nt of Lord Mure) that notwithstanding the provisions of the 10th, 00th sections of the Titles to Land Consolidation Act, 1868, a feuar tled to object to a writ of confirmation which deviated from the statuy the insertion of a clause declaring that the writ was granted under ns specified in the Act of Parliament.

s an action of declarator of non-entry, irritancy, and removing at e of Sir Thomas N. Dick Lauder, heir of entail in possession tes of Grange, against Daniel Shiels, Edinburgh, who was feuar n portion of the entailed estates.

1st Division. Lord Mure M.

---

s may have expressed, he took care to assure himself as far as stamped L. Nay, for his further safety he insisted on an additional name ured besides that of the defender, and interest was regularly paid 66.

nstitution of the debt being thus established, it is well settled that an to arrangement for discharging the debtor otherwise than by payment to his oath, and must be proved aliunde. But the defender is unable does not swear, that there was ever any agreement on the subject. o have had an easy creditor. But as he retained possession of the prehended that no mere promise never to insist on payment could fect of either annulling the instrument or extinguishing the relation nd creditor which it created.

fender, in the last place, impugns the genuineness of the indorsation. believes it is forged. If so, he should have averred it specifically in s. He would have then been allowed to prove it, and had he succ discussion of any further question in the case would have been super- e record is however entirely silent on the subject, and seeing that ry is alleged the onus of proof falls on the party making the allegation o the Sheriff that at this late stage of the case it would be wholly unto require the pursuers to shew by evidence that the suspicions of the e unfounded."

ith v. Cuthbertson, Jan. 18, 1866, ante, iv. 295; Forester v. Lord e, 1742, M. 13,215; Grant v. Grant's Creditors, 1793, M. 13,221.

. Allison, March 10, 1841, 3 D. 874.

No. 102.

May 17, 1873.
Lauder v. Shiels.

By the Act 6 Geo. IV., c. xxviii., entituled "An Act to enable Sir Thomas Dick Lauder, Baronet, and the heirs of entail succeeding to him in the estate of Grange, to grant feus thereof upon certain terms and conditions," Thomas Dick Lauder and the heirs of entail succeeding to him and in possession of the estate were authorised to grant feus upon the conditions therein set forth.

Section 4 of the Act provided that every charter or contract by which a feu-right in the said lands was granted should contain the following clauses:—(1) A clause declaring it to be incompetent for the vassal to assign the precepts of sasine contained in the feu-charters or feu-contracts; (2) a clause declaring it unlawful to interject any mid-superior; (3) a clause providing that the feu-duties and casualties should be paid to the heir of entail in possession entitled to receive the rents for the time being; (4) a clause providing that the conveyances and infeftments should be made out, taken, and extended by the agent of the heir of entail.

Then followed a declaration that any sale or conveyance inconsistent with these conditions should be null and void; and then there was a provision:—"All which clauses, and the conditions, declarations, and provisions thereof, with this present clause or provision respecting the same, shall be repeated in the instrument or instruments of sasine to follow upon such feu-charter or feu-charters, or feu-contract or feu-contracts, and the same shall also be repeated in all the after conveyances, transmissions, charters, and investitures of the said feu or feus, other than such feu-charter or feu-charters, feu-contract or feu-contracts, and the sasines, conveyances, transmissions, charters, and investiture of any such feu or feus, shall not only be void and null, but the said Sir Thomas Dick Lauder, and every other heir of entail in possession of the said entailed lands and estates omitting to insert the same in the original feu-charter or feu-charters, feu-contract or feu-contracts, or omitting to repeat the same in the subsequent charters or other investitures granted by him of them, of such feu or feus, shall thereupon, for himself or herself only, incur an irritancy, as in a case of contravention of the said entail; and in the like manner, the said vassal or vassals, or other person or persons in the right of the said feu or feus, contravening any of the conditions, declarations, and provisions above expressed, or omitting to insert the said clauses in any instrument or instruments of sasine to be taken of the said feu or feus, or in any of the transmissions or conveyances thereof, such sasines, transmissions, and conveyances shall not only be void and null, but such vassal or vassals, or other person or persons in right of the said feu or feus, shall forfeit and lose all right and title thereto, and the same shall belong to the said Sir Thomas Dick Lauder, or the heir of entail in possession as said is, in the same manner as if such feu or feus had never been granted."

In 1865 Sir John Dick Lauder feued a portion of the estate to Donald Mackay, by whom it was disponed to William Alexander Aikman, who in turn conveyed it to the defender. In the conveyances of the subjects and also in the infeftments of Messrs Mackay and Aikman, the provisions of the Act of Parliament were observed. The defender, however, refused to take a writ of confirmation containing a reference to the Act of Parliament, and in terms similar to the writ of confirmation of the disposition by Mr Mackay to Mr Aikman.

The defender consented to a clause being inserted in the writ to the following effect:—"With and under the whole provisions and conditions contained in the said feu-contract, dated and recorded as aforesaid," but refused to allow any reference to the Act of Parliament, holding that r sections 10, 98, and 100 of the Titles to Land Consolidation Act, No. 102.

, any such reference was incompetent.
e pursuer pleaded;—(1) Under and in terms of the Act of Parlia- May 17, 1873.
foresaid the pursuer is required to repeat or refer to the provisions Lauder v. Shiels.
of in all charters or other investitures granted by him of the feus ued by virtue of the powers contained in said Act. (2) Under and ms of the provisions contained in the feu-contract and other deeds scended on, and of the said Act of Parliament, the defender is l to enter with the pursuer within three months after his purchase e subjects libelled; and he having failed duly to enter within the l specified, has contravened the terms of said feu-contract and other mentioned, and Acts of Parliament foresaid, and incurred the irritherein specified, and forfeited and lost all right and title to said
sts. (3) In the circumstances above condescended on the pursuer itled to decree of declarator and removing in terms of the conclu-of the summons.
e defender pleaded;—(1) As the special reference to the pursuer's e Act of Parliament in the writ offered to the defender, and to h the defender objected, was unnecessary if the feu was originally ed, and is still held under its burdens and conditions, and illegal if rdens and conditions had not been previously imposed on the feu, efender's objections to the writ offered were good, and he should be ssed from this action, with expenses. (2) In view of the defender's ns he is in any view entitled to have this action sisted until he ve such writ as the Court may fix that he is bound to accept, and after, and on payment of feu-duties, casualties, and fees, as offered, ill be entitled to absolvitor with expenses.
e Lord Ordinary pronounced the following interlocutors:—
h February 1873.— . . . . "Finds that, in the special circumstances of ase, the pursuer is entitled to have the conditions and declarations r which the feu in question was granted, which are prescribed by the te Act of Parliament founded on, referred to as conditions of this stitute, ex facie of the writ of confirmation to be granted by him, and either in some such terms as those contained in the declaration at nd of the draft writ of confirmation, ... and proposed to be deleted e defender, or by inserting a reference to that Act of Parliament, as as to the original feu-contract, at the marginal addition proposed to serted in the draft writ by the defender, in lieu of the above declan." *

---

* NOTE.—If the Lord Ordinary was now called upon to decide whether the er, by granting a writ of confirmation in the precise form given in schedule the Titles to Land Consolidation Act, 1868, and without mention of or nce to the conditions and declarations of the private Act of Parliament, r which alone the estate is authorised to be feued, would thereby commit ritancy of the entail in respect of his non-compliance with the provisions of rivate Act, he would be disposed to hold that no such irritancy had been nitted, provided the whole clauses, burdens, and conditions prescribed by rivate Act were validly referred to, in terms of the 10th section of the Act 868, in the deed or instrument confirmed by the writ of confirmation. This, wever, in the view the Lord Ordinary takes of the case, would not be an alto-r satisfactory solution of the question raised between the parties, because opinion entertained, or even any judgment pronounced by the Lord Ordi-as to the validity of the reference contained in the deed to be confirmed, d not, he conceives, be res judicata in a question with an heir of entail nging the validity of the reference, or seeking to have an irritancy ded in respect of the omission to comply with the requirements of the private

No. 102.

May 17, 1873. Lauder v. Shiels.

1st March 1873.— .... Approves of the draft writ of confirma the form of the writ of confirmation to be granted in favour of fender, and sists process for ten days that the defender may co an entry to the subjects in question by writ of confirmation in t the said form." *

Act. In these circumstances it appears to the Lord Ordinary that any able proposal made on the part of an entailed proprietor, who is only au to feu under the provisions of a private Act which is not specially repe the Act of 1868, to have the conditions of the private Act referred t writ by which the vassal's title is to be completed, so as thereby t the risk of after challenge, is one which may be given effect to, provi proposed reference will not be prejudicial to the rights and interests of sal, and is not expressly prohibited by the provisions of the statute unde the writ of confirmation is to be expede.

"In the present case it is not alleged in the record, and it was not s on the part of the defender at the debate, that his rights would in any be prejudiced, or that any injury would be sustained by him by the inse the writ of confirmation of the words proposed by the pursuer, which stantially the same as those inserted in the writ by which the title of entered vassal was confirmed in January 1868, so that the solution of t tion here raised appears to the Lord Ordinary to depend upon whet addition of any such reference as that here proposed is prohibited by t solidation Act of 1868; and although the point is not free from diffic Lord Ordinary is not satisfied that the Act of 1868 contains any such bition.

"The clauses on which the question mainly depends are sections 98 a They are, however, not distinct upon the subject; and as the main objec Act was merely to consolidate the clauses in the earlier statutes, under was not considered incompetent to refer to such conditions in a writ of mation, as the titles in the present case shew, it would, the Lord Ordin ceives, require some very express prohibition to the effect that the superi in no circumstances be entitled or allowed to alter the form of the wr insert a reference to burdens, or to the conditions of a private Act of Par to exclude such a reference if reasonable in itself and necessary in the superior takes of the obligation prescribed by the private Act to prot from challenge at the instance of any of the heirs of entail, on the grou he had committed a contravention of the entail.

"Now, the Lord Ordinary does not think that either of these sectio necessarily be read as containing a prohibition against any such alteration sections, on the contrary, rather appear to him, by implication at least, t of reasonable alterations being made on the examples given in the sc Because, although by section 98 it is made competent for a superior, an taken bound in one view to confirm a conveyance in one or other of th forms given in the Act, he is not taken bound to do so in the precise w those forms, but only as nearly as may be in the forms given. While 100 expressly authorises such necessary alterations to be made on th given as the denomination or nature of the particular charter or writ quire, and with reference to real burdens and conditions all that it pro that 'it shall not be necessary' in writs of confirmation or resignation t or refer to burdens or conditions, if the same are inserted in, or validly to, in terms of the 10th section of the Act, in the deed or conveyance o the writ is to be engrossed. But, as the Lord Ordinary reads these sec is nowhere declared to be incompetent or illegal to insert a reference conditions; and it therefore appears to him that in this case a referenc to the conditions of the private Act may be allowed."

* "NOTE.—The Lord Ordinary has adopted the general outline of t of writ proposed by the pursuer, in preference to that with the margin tions proposed by the defender, because the former appears to him to be

No. 102

May 17, 1873.

Lauder v. Shiels.

The defender's writ of confirmation, approved of by the Lord Ordinary, contained the following clause:—"Declaring that these presents are granted by me, as commissioner foresaid, always with and under the obligations, conditions, declarations, and provisions specified and prescribed in an Act of Parliament dated the 22d day of June 1825, entituled 'An Act to enable Sir Thomas Dick Lauder, Baronet, and the heirs of entail succeeding to him in the estate of Grange, to grant feus thereof upon certain terms and conditions,' and in the said feu-contract recorded as aforesaid on 6th November 1865."

The defender reclaimed.

At advising,—

LORD PRESIDENT.—Sir Thomas Dick Lauder, as heir of entail in possession of the estate of Grange, is empowered to grant feus by a private Act of Parliament, notwithstanding the fetters of the entail. But he can do so only upon condition of complying with all the provisions and limitations contained in the Act. These are very numerous and very important; and one of them is—"All which obligations, and the conditions, declarations, and provisions thereof, with this present clause or provision respecting the same, shall be repeated in the instrument or instruments of sasine to follow upon such feu-charter or feu-charters, or feu-contract or feu-contracts, and the same shall also be repeated in all charters and other conveyances, transmissions, charters, and investitures of the said feu or feus." There is a further provision that if this duty be omitted on the part of the heir in possession he shall incur a forfeiture. Prior to the passing of the conveyancing statutes every charter of confirmation must have contained within itself the whole provisions and declarations of this private Act. One of these statutes has a very important and useful provision, that in place of repeating such clauses and provisions in deeds it is sufficient to refer to them as contained in some prior title to the subjects recorded in the appropriate register of sasines. This was introduced in 10 and 11 Vict. cap. 48, sec. 5, and repeated in the 10th section of the Titles to Land Consolidation Act of 1868. It is not matter of doubt that, in a charter or writ of confirmation granted by Sir Thomas Dick Lauder, it is sufficient to make reference to the provisions of the private Act, as contained in some prior recorded instrument. But a further question arises, whether sections 98 and 100 of the Act of 1868 do not dispense with even any reference to the provisions of the private Act in the writ of confirmation. For certain purposes, I think, it is provided by these two sections, taken together, that, where the deed to be confirmed contains clauses or real burdens appointed to be inserted in the investitures, or refers to them in the manner provided by the 10th section, it is not necessary to repeat or refer to them in the writ of confirmation endorsed on the deed. Though this is not necessary in the ordinary case there may be a question whether the obligation imposed on Sir Thomas Dick Lauder by the private Act is not still incumbent on him. I am not prepared to form an opinion on this question, and it is not expedient to do so, for no judgment which we could pronounce in this action would decide the question as between Sir Thomas Dick Lauder and a substitute heir of entail conformity with the form given in the Titles to Land Consolidation Act, 1868, down to the words, 'and with the said Sir Thomas Dick Lauder's own rights;' and he has restricted the additional declaration to the words 'obligations, conditions, declarations, and provisions,' because these words appear to him sufficient to cover everything which the private Act prescribes; and it is with reference to the statutory requirements alone of that Act that the pursuer maintained the necessity, as a matter of safety, of making an addition to the form of writ given in the general Act. In this view of the matter the line at the end of the declaration beginning with the words, 'and in the said feu-contract,' &c., might have been omitted; but as the defender, in the form proposed by him as noted in one of the marginal additions, did not object to some such reference to the original feu-contract, he has allowed these words to remain."

---

No. 102.

May 17, 1873. Lauder v. Shiels.

bringing a declarator of irritancy in respect of the omission to comply w provisions of the private Act. All that I find it necessary to decide i there may be a risk in his granting a writ of confirmation without sue ence to the Act of 1825. If so, I cannot say that it is unreasonable on t of the superior to propose to introduce such a clause. Opinions may diff the amount of such risk, but surely, if there is any risk, the vassal cannot to the introduction of such a clause, unless it can be shewn to be prejudi him, or expose him to any risk. It is not shewn that there is any risk vassal here. The expense of confirmation is not to be increased, and, in the vassal has no sort of interest to object. The only thing he can say the insertion of such a clause tends to lengthen the deed, and so is not compliance with the Act of Parliament. But I think this is untenable face of the good reason which the superior has for its insertion.

I need hardly add that, unless the superior had a good reason, I shou allow him to do so. Any unnecessary lengthening of the deed would be tion of an Act which aims at simplicity in conveyancing. I should be di to watch very strictly any attempt to amplify a form prescribed by s But this is a very special case, and as I find nothing to prohibit the inser the clause I am for adhering to the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary.

Lord Deas.—The statute provides two short forms for granting confir one in schedule D and the other in schedule V. It is the second w here proposed to be adopted. Under the form in schedule D there is ence to conditions, provisions, and limitations. But under the form in sc V, No. 1, there is no mention of conditions, provisions, and limitations but merely a reference to the charter, and a statement that the confirma granted in so far as consistent with the charter and with the superio rights. The writ of confirmation approved of by the Lord Ordinary is q accordance with the form V, No. 1, until you come to the words "and de that these presents are granted," &c. All that goes before is framed principle laid down by the statute that a reference to the feu-charter or c includes a reference to all the obligations and conditions therein con Had the writ then finished with the words "and the statute therein menti I do not think there would have been any objection to the reference so m the private Act. But the moment you introduce such a clause as is intr here, commencing with the words "and declaring that these presen granted," &c., you are out of the form prescribed by the statute. You h longer the sanction of the Act for the form of the writ, and unless the ration is made complete according to the requirements of the common l variation is equally dangerous for both parties; if possible, more so for th rior than the vassal. I am not for sanctioning a variation from the sta form calculated to raise the inference that the parties are not trusting to t of Parliament, but to the enumeration of particular prohibitions, condition while that enumeration is not made complete. My objection to the pr clause is not based upon the views urged for the vassal, but because I dangerous equally to superiors and vassals to countenance such a departu the statutory form, where the statute and not the common law is mean relied on.

Lord Ardmillan.—It is of importance to remember that the purpo which this statute was passed was that of regulating procedure, and of greater simplicity, expedition, and economy in conveyancing, and not f purpose of impairing the patrimonial rights of either party. We ough construe the Act as to provide the remedy which it was intended to confe

When the statute confers a right or benefit on the vassal we ought so it as, in that matter, to promote the vassal's legitimate interest. Wh statute gives to the superior a right to substitute a reference to prior deeds of inserting the words ad longum, that is a provision in favour of the s which ought to be construed by the Court so as to protect his rights, if t room for such construction.

No. 102.

May 17, 1873.

Lauder v. Shiels.

I think that the superior was bound to give the vassal a writ of confirmation of the kind and style of schedule V. I read the words "but only in so far as consistent with" as the characteristic words of the schedule. The proposal to introduce the words "declaring that," &c., into the writ is not in conformity with the Act. The words would be out of place. I would suggest that the words should be "with and under the condition that," &c. I think that this addition would make the wording of the deed more in accordance with the schedule, and more consistent with the simplicity desirable in deeds of this kind.

I have no doubt that the superior cannot be compelled to grant a writ which might put his own right to the estate in peril. He is not bound to run that risk. On the other hand, no harm can be done to the vassal by the adoption of such form of expression as I have suggested. I therefore think that we should adhere to the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary.

LORD JERVISWOODE concurred with the Lord President and Lord Ardmillan.

THE COURT adhered to the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor.

SCOTT, BRUCE, & GLOVER, W.S.—LINDSAY MACKERSY, W.S.—Agents.

No. 103.

May 17, 1873.

Duke of Argyll v. Campbell.

HIS GRACE THE DUKE OF ARGYLL, Pursuer.—Rutherfurd.
REV. JOHN CAMPBELL, Defender.—Duncan.

Proving the Tenor—Teinds.—A report of the sub-commissioners appointed to the valuation of the stock and teind of the lands within the presbytery of Argyll, dated in 1629, had been repeatedly given effect to in approbations and ratifications. Part of the original document had become illegible apparently from damp, and part appeared to have been worn away. A copy of the entire document, supposed to be made about 1720, was preserved in the teind office, but the writer was not known. From this copy, which was not in all respects a faithful transcript, the deficiencies in the original could be supplied. In an action of proving the tenor of a portion of that part of the report which had been destroyed, held (1) that in the circumstances no special casus amissionis need be averred, and (2) that the tenor had been sufficiently instructed by the proceedings in the localities, &c., together with the copy produced.

2D DIVISION. Ld. Mackenzie. Teind-Clerk.

THIS was an action by the Duke of Argyll, proprietor of the lands of Kellachane and others in the parish of Kilninver, now united to the parish of Kilmelford, in the county of Argyll, for the purpose of proving the tenor of the report of a valuation of the presbytery of Argyll by the sub-commissioners of teinds, dated in 1629, in so far as it regarded these lands. The Earl of Breadalbane, as patron of the parish of Kilninver, and others, were called as defenders, but the Reverend Colin Campbell, minister of the united parishes of Kilninver and Kilmelford, alone appeared.

The pursuer averred;—" (Cond. 3.) The said report or valuation of the said sub-commissioners of teinds is in the custody of the keeper of teind records, but it has been partially destroyed, mutilated, and defaced by exposure to handling, and from the tear and wear to which it has been subjected in course of time. The paper upon which it was written is very durable, and bears traces of having been injured by damp. More particularly that part of the document upon which the valuation of the pursuer's said lands was written is in a very tattered condition. The valuation of the pursuer's said lands was written very near the end of the report, and the document exhibits marks of having been folded or rolled in such manner that the concluding pages must have been upon the outside, and consequently most exposed to injury. So far as can be ascertained, the said report has always been kept among the records of the High Commission, and within the memory of man it has never been in any other condition than that in which it now is. (Cond. 5.) There is in the custody of the keeper of teind records an old copy of said valuation of the sub-commissioners. The precise date at which said copy was made is not known, but the pursuer believes and avers that it was about the time of the proceedings referred to in the process of augmentation, &c., of 1758."

No. 103.

May 17, 1873.
Duke of Argyll v. Campbell.

The defender averred;—"1. The said alleged report of the sub-commissioners of the presbytery of Argyll does not appear or bear to be, and is not, a completed or concluded report. It is an unauthenticated document. It terminates abruptly, without any docquet, and is not subscribed by a quorum or by any of the persons mentioned at the outset of the document, as the sub-commissioners appointed to make and report to the High Commissioners a valuation of the lands and teinds therein referred to. At the foot of some of the pages occurs the signature 'Geo. Campbell;' but no such person is mentioned at the outset of the alleged report. Numerous pages of the said 'report' are entirely unsigned. 2. The history of this alleged report, which is extensively and throughout mutilated and vitiated in essentialibus, is entirely unknown. In particular it is not known when or whence the document came into the teind office, or by whom it was brought thither. It is further unknown when or how the said alleged report came to be in its present dilapidated and fragmentary condition, and the pursuer has not made any definite or satisfactory averment on this subject. 3. The history of the 'old copy' of the alleged report is also unknown. This 'old copy' does not bear to be, and is not alleged to have been, made by judicial authority or under judicial examination, control, or supervision of any kind. 5. Not merely, however, is the accuracy of the 'old copy' of the alleged report on which the pursuer founds not admitted; it is further, as the defender avers, demonstrably incorrect and inaccurate in various respects. 6. Among other errors and inaccuracies in the 'old copy' are the two following:—In the text of that part of the 'old copy' which refers to the parish of Kilmelford, the parsonage teinds of the lands of Kendmoir and others are stated at 'twa three' bolls oatmeal. This word 'twentie' is deleted, and in lieu of it the word 'threttie' is written in a different hand in the 'old copy.' Again in that portion of the 'old copy' relating to the parish of Kilninver, and immediately after the lands of that name, occur these words 'omitted here as below,' and at the foot of the page is this passage 'and his lands of Barrindromane, of rent 12 bolls meal, four bolls bear of parsonage teind, four , and for the vicarage £4 money.'"

The defender pleaded;—(1) The pursuer has not made any relevant and sufficient averments of the occasion or cause of the loss or mutilation of the said alleged report, or of that part of it to which the conclusions for proving the tenor relate. (2) As the said alleged report is not duly authenticated, and is ex facie an incomplete and unfinished document, it is not one which can competently be made the subject of a proving of the tenor. (3) The pursuer has not condescended on any adminicles relevant or sufficient to instruct the tenor of the writ sought to be set up, and if such adminicles exist.

The adminicles of evidence founded on by the pursuer were—(1) the principal report; (2) the "old copy"; (3) proceedings in the processes of augmentation, modification, and locality of 1758 and 1795, in both of which the report was sustained by interlocutors of Court as sufficient for ascertaining the rental of the lands in the united parishes, including the pursuer's lands; and (4) several decreets of approbation of other old valuations in the same report.

d Ordinary (Mackenzie) made great avizandum to the Second No. 103.

May 17, 1873.
Duke of Argyll v. Campbell.

f was led before the Lord Justice-Clerk. Mr Alexander per of the teind records, deponed—"The original document, so ve examined it, does not bear in any part of it to be signed by a the sub-commissioners; but a signature occurs on every alternate ıe original document, which I believe to be that of Robert of Glenfalloch, the first of the sub-commissioners. That signature one face of every sheet, and on the other facing it is the signa- ɔrge Campbell, which I believe to be that of the clerk. He is ıned in the preamble; but at the bottom of the preamble, on ıge of the valuation, there is the signature 'R. Campbell of ı, moderatour;' and on the opposite page 'Geo. Campbell, ik, clark to the wa [here there is a blank, part of the writing ırently rubbed out] to the presbeterie of Argyle.' There is no the original that I have seen, but the latter part of the report ktract now. There is not so much of the original extant now in the old copy. (Q.) Was any search made for any report of ımmissioners of 1629? (A.) We have no documents in the e now to my knowledge, except the volume of sub-commis- ports and this. There is a copy of another valuation of n also in the office, but it is not an original document. I ıch search. There was no other source where a search could Shaw deponed—"I have examined a great deal of old writing, had occasion to become acquainted with the handwriting of eriods, and to note its characteristics. Being shewn the old ited by the teind clerk, titled 'Valuation of the Presbetrey of pones, I was asked to examine that document with the view ıing the date at which it had been written, and I have done so. l it with some other writings, but I judged of it mostly from ı. I had no doubt as to its period when I looked at it. It judgment written at the time when the old hand began to ıd the new hand commenced, which would be about 1715-20. it is impossible to assign an exact date to it, but I should ; was written at some time from 1720 to 1760. I have no n that subject. It has not the characteristics of the writ- o 1720. (Q.) Has it the characteristics of the writing sub- 1760? (A.) It has the characteristic that it is in the le, but that is all. (Q.) But it has not the particular charac- the period subsequent to 1760? (A.) No. (Q.) And that on why you assign it to the particular period you have men- A.) Yes."

ɜuer argued;—(1) He was not bound to prove a special casus The document was a public document in the hands of a tionary.[1] (2) The tenor was proved.[2] ɜnder argued;—The tenor had not been proved. No search ıade for a true and authentic original valuation.

OURT pronounced this interlocutor:—"Sustain the adminicles:

---

ie, 1811, 1 Connell, 300.

r. 1, 54; Richmond v. Officers of State, July 2, 1869, ante, vol. vii., wal, 1713, 5 Brown's Sup., 98; Dickson on Evidence, sec. 1299; tate v. Earl of Breadalbane, 1770, M. 14,796—F. C. Scss. Papers,

No. 103.

May 17, 1873. Duke of Argyll v. Campbell.

Find the tenor of the sub-valuation sufficiently established evidence adduced, and decern and declare in terms of the sions of the summons."

ALEX. HOWE, W.S.—M'NEILL & SIME, W.S.—Agents.

No. 104.

May 20, 1873. Macdonald & Co. v. Highland Railway Co.

MACDONALD AND COMPANY, Pursuers and Appellants.—Watson—Mackintosh.

THE HIGHLAND RAILWAY COMPANY, Defenders and Respondent Sol.-Gen. Clark—Lancaster.

Reparation — Damages — Perishable Goods — Railway Company.- marked perishable were delivered to a railway company, whose custo to forward those so marked in preference to others. The truck in wh were was not marked perishable, and was taken off the train along wit in order to lighten it, while goods not of a perishable nature were fo In an action brought against the company for damage incurred in con of the detention of the goods, held that the company had failed to the goods with reasonable expedition, in respect, according to ordinary perishable goods were sent on preferably to goods not perishable, wh the occasion in question, goods not perishable had been sent on in pref the pursuers' goods, and that the company were liable for the damag by the delay.

1st DIVISION. Sheriff of Inverness-shire. I.

MACDONALD AND COMPANY, confectioners, Inverness, sent goo perishable nature, and marked "perishable," "immediate," by th land Railway to Dingwall and Strome Ferry, and thence per ste Broadford, in Skye. The goods were delivered to the railway c on 30th September 1870, and were forwarded by the 5.30 A.M. t the following morning, reaching Dingwall in time to proceed by t forenoon train to Strome Ferry. Although the goods were marked able," the truck in which they were was not so marked, and wa Dingwall along with other trucks, in order to lighten the train, not reaching Strome Ferry until too late for the steamer of t Goods not of a perishable nature had been forwarded by the tr consequence of this delay the goods were too late for the celebr the coming of age of Lord Macdonald, for which they had been s they were much spoiled otherwise by the detention. It was the of the company to give a preference to goods of a perishable char

Macdonald and Company brought this action against the railw pany for damages on account of the detention.

They pleaded ;—(1) The defenders having, by their negligence wise, failed to deliver the goods contracted to be conveyed by th due and ordinary despatch to their destination, were liable in all damage thereby incurred.

The defenders pleaded ;—(2) There having been no fault or n the part of the defenders, and no undue or unavoidable delay, th to be assoilzied.

After a proof, the Sheriff-substitute (Blair) found for the pursu the Sheriff (Ivory) altered, and assoilzied the defenders.

The pursuers appealed, and argued that there had been negligc

The defenders argued ;—Unless there was express contract t not liable. They had forwarded the truck in the usual course and without undue delay.[1]

[1] Finlay v. North British Railway Co., July 8, 1870, ante, vol. vii

No. 104.

May 20, 1873.

Macdonald & Co. v. Highland Railway Co.

RD JUSTICE-CLERK.—The contract with the railway company in this case an ordinary contract of carriage. The goods, which were perishable articles, to be conveyed from Inverness to Broadford by the first train on the 1st ctober, if that were reasonably practicable. The nature of the goods was osed, and that laid on the company a further obligation, in accordance with usual practice, as well as with reasonable dealing, to give these goods a rence over articles not perishable, should the train be unable to convey all oods sent for carriage. The goods were not so sent on, but the truck con- g them was detained at Dingwall, and the articles it contained were thus ged when it ultimately arrived, while it is proved that trucks containing odities not perishable were sent on. I think in these circumstances the any are liable. It is not properly a case of special contract, but one of an ary contract for the carriage of perishable articles, and the question is, her, in the knowledge of their nature, the company failed to convey them reasonable expedition. Being of opinion that they did so fail, I think the ers of the action must prevail.

RD COWAN.—This must be looked upon in the light of a general contract, h the company come under to all persons sending goods of the quality and e manner which the pursuers did. Whenever perishable goods are put into hands marked "perishable" they come under an obligation to forward them mably. This is an obligation which they incur in consequence of their ordi- and understood mode of conducting their business. This is clearly estab- l by the proof to be their practice, and on this the public were entitled to The pursuers did so; their goods were marked perishable, and yet they not forwarded, but left behind, while other trucks of goods were forwarded e first train, and hence the damage. I think the pursuers are entitled to er.

RD BENHOLME and LORD NEAVES concurred.

THIS interlocutor was pronounced:—"Find that the appellants, on the 30th day of September 1870, delivered to the servants of the respondents at Inverness the goods referred to in the first conclusion of the summons, and that the respondents undertook to convey the same with reasonable expedition to Broadford in the Isle of Skye: Find that these goods were perishable, and were so marked when delivered to the respondents: Find that the respondents did not forward these goods to Broadford in ordinary course by the first train to Strome, but allowed the truck containing them to be detained at Dingwall, and sent them forward next day: Find that in so doing the respondents neglected and failed to forward the goods with reasonable expedition, in respect, according to ordinary practice, perishable goods are sent on preferably to goods not perishable, whereas goods not perishable were, on the occasion libelled, sent on in preference to those of the appellants: Find that, in consequence of the detention of the goods, the appellants have suffered damage to the extent of £11, 3s. 6d.: Therefore sustain the appeal: Recall the judgment appealed from: Find the respondents liable in the sum of £11, 3s. 6d.," &c.

MORTON, NEILSON, & SMART, W.S.—H. & A. INGLIS, W.S.—Agents.

No. 105.

May 23, 1873. Duke of Argyll v. Dalgleish's Trustees.

THE DUKE OF ARGYLL, Pursuer.—Sol.-Gen. Clark—Mackay.
HARRY YOUNG AND OTHERS (Dalgleish's Trustees), Defenders.—Marsh —Keir.

Superior and Vassal—Mid-superiority.—A, who was mid-superior of cert lands, conveyed the mid-superiority to B, the proprietor of the dominium u by a disposition containing an a me manner of holding, and B was in thereon. Thereafter A granted to B another disposition of the mid-superior bearing to be in supplement of the former disposition, and containing an a vel de me manner of holding, and B was infeft on this also. The over-supe granted a deed confirming both these dispositions, and the infeftments follow upon them. Held that the two dispositions were to be read together as conveyance of the mid-superiority, and were both confirmed as one estate.

Charter of Confirmation—Error in date of Sasine confirmed.—In a cha of confirmation an instrument of sasine was described correctly by its date, an error was made in stating the date of recording. Held that as the ins was sufficiently identified otherwise the error in the date of recording did invalidate the confirmation of the instrument.

Instrument of Resignation ad remanentiam—Designation of Procurator. Question, Whether in an instrument of resignation ad remanentiam the p curator must be designed.

1ST DIVISION. Ld. Mackenzie. B.

THIS was an action of declarator of non-entry, &c., at the instance the Duke of Argyll against Harry Young, Esq., and others, the trustees the late James Dalgleish, Esq. of Westgrange and Ardnamurchan, W who died in 1870.

The titles to the lands in question were thus set out in the Lord Ord nary's note :—" By feu-disposition, dated 21st September 1696, Archib Duke of Argyll conveyed the lands and barony of Ardnamurchan Alexander Campbell of Lochnell in liferent, and to Duncan Campb his eldest son, in fee, for payment of 500 merks yearly of feu-duty, a for certain services of hosting, hunting, and warding. Infeftment w taken by these persons on this deed.

" By contract of sub-feu, dated 12th October 1722, the said Dunc Campbell sub-feued the said lands and barony to Alexander Murray f payment of 6000 merks of feu-duty, and also for payment to the Duke Argyll, the over-superior, of the foresaid sum of 500 merks, and for rel of all services due by him to the Duke as over-superior. Infeftment w taken by Alexander Murray, and the dominium utile of the said lands a barony, after passing through several hands, descended to the now decea Sir James Milles Riddell as heir of entail, who completed his title there by precept of clare constat from General Duncan Campbell as undivest mid-superior, dated 21st January and 14th July 1834, and instrument sasine thereon, dated 21st July and recorded 8th September 1834.

" By disposition dated 19th August 1808 General Duncan Campb sold and disponed to Sir James Milles Riddell the foresaid estate of mi superiority, to be holden of and under the Duke of Argyll, his heirs a successors, in feu-farm, for payment of the foresaid feu-duty of 500 mer and also of the sum of £27, 18s. Scots money in lieu and place of t foresaid services of hosting, hunting, and warding. Sir James was inf on this disposition, conform to instrument of sasine dated 5th and 6 June and recorded 15th July 1811.

" Sir James also afterwards obtained a supplementary disposition fr General Duncan Campbell of the said estate of mid-superiority, dat 13th February 1834. This deed proceeds upon the narrative of the fo said sale and disposition of 19th August 1808, and of that disposit containing only an obligation to infeft Sir James by a single manner

No. 105.

May 23, 1873.
Duke of Argyll v. Dalgleish' Trustees.

lding a se, and upon the further narrative that Sir James had requested at he should grant in Sir James' favour a supplementary disposition of e said lands containing a warrant for infefting him therein a se vel se. On this narrative General Campbell, without prejudice to the id disposition of 1808 formerly granted by him, but in supplement reof, sold and disponed to Sir James the said estate of mid-superiority.
e said disposition contains an obligation to infeft a se vel de se, with curatory of resignation and precept of sasine. Sir James was infeft n this deed, conform to instrument of sasine dated 21st July and re-led 18th September 1834.

By charter of confirmation, dated 5th July 1849, the pursuer con-ed to and in favour of Sir James Milles Riddell, his heirs and assignees, said lands and barony, the disposition of the mid-superiority, dated 808, and the sasine in 1811 thereon, the supplementary disposition of , and the sasine thereon, which last-mentioned sasine is described in charter as 'dated the 21st day of July, and recorded in the General ister of Sasines at Edinburgh the 18th day of December 1834, or of ever other dates or tenor the said writs may be,' while the correct of recording was 18th September 1834. This charter of confirmation s that the said lands and barony are to be holden by Sir James and foresaids immediately of and under the pursuer, his heirs and succes-
, in feu-farm, fee, and heritage for ever, giving therefor yearly to the suer and his foresaids the sum of 500 merks, and also paying to them sum of £27, 18s. Scots money in lieu and place of the services of ing, hunting, and warding.

The dominium utile of the said lands and barony, which was entailed, disentailed by Sir James Milles Riddell by instrument of disentail d 12th July and recorded in the Register of Tailzies on 10th Septem-1851. He thereafter, being thus in right of the property and mid-eriority, conveyed by trust-deed the said lands and barony, both pro-y and superiority, to Mr Barstow, who was infeft as trustee, conform nstrument of sasine recorded on 10th September 1851.

On 8th December 1851 Sir James, as superior of the said lands and ny, and as proprietor of the same, holding of himself, on the narrative is infeftment in the dominium utile thereof, and upon the further ative that by the disposition granted by General Campbell in 1834, his infeftment in 1834 following thereon, the said lands are now held him of himself, as superior thereof, and that it was proper that his t of property in the lands should be consolidated with the right of eriority of the same in his person, granted a procuratory of resignation remanentiam for consolidating the same, together with all right, title, interest which he had or could pretend to the same. An instrument esignation ad remanentiam was expede thereon on 12th December, ch was recorded on 22d December 1851. The defender objects to instrument, that the person who acted as procurator is, although ed, not designed.

On 16th and 19th December 1851 Sir James, with consent of Mr stow as trustee, executed a deed of entail, by which, on the narrative when he succeeded to the estate previously entailed the same was ened with a feu-duty of £300 sterling or thereabouts, and that he hased the superiority, which thus became vested in him in fee-simple, reby the estate was relieved of the said feu-duty, he conveyed to him-and the heirs of tailzie therein mentioned the said lands and barony, h property and mid-superiority thereof, now consolidated in the per-of me, the said Sir James Milles Riddell.' Infeftment in favour of James followed upon this deed.

No. 105.

May 23, 1873. Duke of Argyll v. Dalgleish's Trustees.

"Thereafter a portion of the said estate was sold for payment of debts, under the authority of the Court, and was purchased by the late Mr James Dalgleish, whose trustees are the defenders in the present action. The disposition in favour of Mr Dalgleish contains obligation to infeft to be holden a me vel de me, clause of resignation, and precept of sasine, and binds Mr Dalgleish to free and relieve Sir James Milles Riddell of all cess, feu, blench, and teind duties, minister's stipend, and other burdens payable after Whitsunday 1856, the term of his entry, it being thereby 'declared that of the feu and other duties payable to the Duke of Argyll for the said whole lands and barony there shall be payable by Mr Dalgleish, for the lands disponed to him, 'the sum of £16, 14s. sterling, or as many merks Scots money as shall correspond to that sum of feu-duty to the Duke of Argyll, Sir James being bound to free and relieve Mr Dalgleish of the remainder of the said feu-duty 'payable for and out of the said whole lands and barony of Ardnamurchan.' On this disposition Mr Dalgleish was infeft, conform to instrument of sasine recorded 12th June 1856."

Sir James Milles Riddell died in 1861, and the pursuer maintained that on that event the estate of Ardnamurchan fell in non-entry.

The defenders averred that prior to the charter of confirmation in 1849 "the plenum dominium of the lands and barony of Ardnamurchan and Sunart was by the several deeds decomposed into four distinct estates—(1) The original dominium directum under the original feu-right of 1696 belonged to the Duke of Argyll as successor of Archibald Earl of Argyll, held of him for payment of 500 merks Scots, and other prestations. (2) An estate of mid-superiority, held under his titles of 1792 by General Duncan Campbell, of and under the Duke for payment of the said feu-duty of 500 merks, &c., but of which Sir James Milles Riddell was in a position feudally to divest him at any time, by obtaining from the Duke a confirmation of the disposition thereof in his favour by the General granted in 1808, and the infeftment thereon of 1811. (3) A lower estate of mid-superiority, created by the supplementary disposition granted by General Duncan Campbell to Sir James in 1834, and the infeftment thereon, which was held base of the General for payment of the elusory duty of one penny sterling, and had the effect of rendering the original mid-superiority, still remaining feudally vested in the General, a barren estate of mid-superiority; and (4) The dominium utile of the said lands and barony held by Sir James as heir of entail foresaid, under his infeftment on the precept of clare constat already mentioned, immediately of himself as mid-superior, in virtue of his foresaid infeftment, mentioned in the third head of this article, for payment to himself of 6000 merks Scots. 15. The dominium utile alone was entailed. None of the estates of mid-superiority were included within the deed of entail above mentioned. 17. The effect of that charter of confirmation was . . . to confirm and render public Sir James Milles Riddell's hitherto unconfirmed and unpublished infeftment of 1811, completely invest him with the mid-superiority as it stood in the person of the General at the date of the confirmation, and completely divest the General thereof. But in consequence of the base infeftment in favour of Sir James proceeding on the General's supplementary disposition of 1834 the only estate remaining in the General at the date of the confirmation, and which admitted of being vested in Sir James by the confirmation of his infeftment of 1811, was the barren estate of mid-superiority held immediately of the Duke of Argyll for payment of the original feu-duty of 500 merks and other prestations. The attempted confirmation of the disposition and infeftment of 1834 had as the effect of making that infeftment of Sir James Milles Riddell a public

No. 105.

May 23, 1873.
Duke of Argyll v. Dalgleish's Trustees.

ftment holden directly of the Duke; it operated simply as a confirmation by the Duke of the sub-feu created by said disposition and investment, and held immediately of Sir James as mid-superior of the barren te of superiority above mentioned, in virtue of the confirmation of his r infeftment of 1811, which operated as a mid-impediment to the lic confirmation by the Duke of the said disposition and infeftment 834 . . . . 18. After the date of the said charter of confirma- the different estates of property and superiority above explained s held as follows:—(First) The original dominium directum was held efore by the Duke of Argyll; (Second) The barren mid-superiority held by Sir James Milles Riddell of the Duke for payment of the inal feu-duty of 500 merks Scots, and other prestations; (Third) substantial estate of mid-superiority was held by Sir James base of self, as mid-superior foresaid, for payment of the elusory feu-duty of penny, under his infeftment on the general supplementary disposition 834; and (Fourth) The dominium utile was held by Sir James as heir ntail of himself as proprietor in fee-simple of the substantial mid-eriority for payment of the sub-feu-duty of 6000 merks Scots, and other restations. 21. Even if the procuratory of resignation and instrument gnation expede in 1851 had effectually consolidated the estate of pro-ty and the estate of superiority, being the dominium utile and the sub-tial mid-superiority held by Sir James under the two infeftments tioned in the procuratory, there still remained feudally vested in his son the original estate of mid-superiority, in which he was publicly ft in virtue of his sasine of 1811, and confirmation thereof in 1849, dy mentioned. That original superiority was not even attempted to consolidated by the proceedings in 1851, and it was not then, and er has been, consolidated with the subordinate estate of mid-superiority with the dominium utile; and the same continued to be a separate te feudally vested in the person of Sir James Milles Riddell until his th. It is believed to be still in hereditate jacente of him and his son. Thomas Milles Riddell (the third baronet), is his heir, and is the ty entitled and bound to enter with the pursuer as vassal. He has been made a party to the present action."

The pursuer pleaded;—(4) The pursuer was not bound to call Sir omas Milles Riddell, the heir of Sir James Milles Riddell, second onet of Ardnamurchan, the last vassal entered, who had disponed the d lands and others to Mr Dalgleish, with obligation to infeft a me vel me, procuratory of resignation, and precept of sasine, and the action ght not to be dismissed or sisted in respect he has not been called as a rty. (5) The charter of confirmation by the pursuer to Sir James illes Riddell, second baronet of Ardnamurchan, in 1849, did not create confirm a sub-feu in his favour, holding of himself for payment of a b-feu-duty of one penny Scots, but made the said Sir James Milles iddell the immediate vassal of the pursuer in the mid-superiority, and ble directly to the pursuer in payment of the feu-duty of 500 merks ots, and other prestations, as expressed therein. (6) The instrument resignation ad remanentiam in 1851 had the effect of consolidating the id-superiority and property or dominium utile of the said lands and hers in the person of the said Sir James Milles Riddell, and made him e immediate vassal of the pursuer in the property or dominium utile of e said lands and others. (7) Even assuming a mid-superiority or mid-periorities of the said lands and others to have existed in the person of e said Sir James Milles Riddell after the execution of the instrument resignation ad remanentiam in 1851, which is denied, the whole rights, hether of mid-superiority or property in said lands and others, belonging to the said Sir James Milles Riddell, were comprehended in the new entail executed by him on the 16th and 19th December 1851, and were thereafter, under the authority of the Court, conveyed by him to Mr Dalgleish, and the said lands and others having been in non-entry since the death of the said Sir James Milles Riddell in 1861 the pursuer is entitled to decree of declarator of non-entry against the defenders, Mr Dalgleish's representatives, and successors therein.

No. 105.

May 23, 1873. Duke of Argyll v. Dalgleish's Trustees.

The defenders pleaded;—(1) The pursuer not being the immediate lawful superior of the defenders he has no title to sue the present action and the defenders should therefore be assoilzied from the whole conclusions thereof, with expenses. (2) The action cannot proceed, and ought to be dismissed, with expenses, in respect that the true vassal of the superior is Sir Thomas Milles Riddell, the heir of the last vassal entered and that he has not been called as a party to the action. (3) The defenders and their predecessors having been in possession of the subjects libelled for a period of nearly a century and a half, upon titles flowing from others than the pursuer, and held of other superiors for payment of a different reddendo and performance of entirely different prestations from those set forth in the original feu-right, the present action is entirely unfounded, and the defenders should be assoilzied therefrom, with expenses. (4) The pursuer, as over-superior, having confirmed the sub-feu granted by General Duncan Campbell to Sir James Milles Riddell in 1834, he is not now entitled, even if the lands should be held to be in non-entry, to the rents of the lands to a greater amount than the sub-feu duty payable under that sub-feu, viz., one penny Scots.

The Lord Ordinary pronounced the following interlocutor:—"Repels the first and second pleas in law for the defenders: Finds that the lands and subjects specified and described in the conclusions of the summons are in non-entry as libelled, and appoints the cause to be put to the roll in order to the application of this finding." *

---

* "NOTE.—(After the narrative given above)—Such being the state of the title, the defenders, Mr Dalgleish's trustees, maintain that the charter of confirmation of 1849 did not confirm the instrument of sasine which was taken on the supplementary disposition of 1834 in favour of Sir James Milles Riddell, because that instrument of sasine is therein described as recorded on 18th December, whereas the correct date of recording is 18th September 1834. The Lord Ordinary is of opinion that this objection is not well-founded, because the date of the sasine as following on that disposition is correctly given, which is sufficient for its identification. The charter also, after giving the erroneous date of recording, contains the words, 'or of whatever other dates or tenor' the same may be—(Adam v. Drummond, 12th June 1810, F. C.)

"The defenders maintained that as the charter of confirmation is in the form set forth in schedule D annexed to the Transference of Lands Acts, 1847 (10 and 11 Vict. chap. 48), and as that schedule only specifies the instrument of sasine as recorded, it is essential that the date of recording should be correctly set forth in the charter. The Lord Ordinary considers this objection untenable. The reason why the date of recording only is mentioned in schedule D is, that in the form of an instrument of sasine, given in the Infeftment Acts of 1845 (8 and 9 Vict. chap. 35), there is no date, and that by the said statute it is provided, sec. 3, that, after 1st October 1845, the instrument may be recorded at any time during the life of the party in whose favour it has been expede, and that the date thereof shall be taken to be the date of presentment and entry marked thereon by the keeper of the record. The adoption of the form given in the Transference of Lands Acts of 1847 does not prevent the identification in such a charter of an instrument of sasine expede prior to 1st October 1845 by the date thereof. Schedule D, annexed to the Act of 1847, provides for

No. 105.

May 23, 1873.
Duke of Argyll v. Dalgleish's Trustees.

The defenders reclaimed.

They argued;—The pursuer was not the immediate lawful superior of the defenders, as the mid-superiority conveyed to Sir J. M. Riddell under [illegible] by containing the directory words in italics, 'or of whatever other date or [illegible] the said instrument of sasine may be.'

"It was also argued by the defenders that the charter of confirmation did not [illegible] the infeftment of 1834 on the supplementary disposition of that year a [illegible] infeftment holden directly of the Duke of Argyll, because Sir James's [illegible]ment of 1811, which was confirmed at the same time by the charter of [illegible]rmation, operated as a mid-impediment to the public confirmation by the [illegible] of that disposition and sasine of 1834, so that Sir James held base of him- [illegible] as mid-superior, in virtue of his confirmed infeftment of 1811, a substantial [illegible] of mid-superiority under the supplementary disposition and infeftment of [illegible]4. The Lord Ordinary is of opinion that this was not the effect of the [illegible]ter of confirmation of 1849. The disposition of 1834 is in all respects [illegible]plementary to that of 1808, and is another disposition of the same subjects [illegible] interest, granted, as it expressly bears, in supplement thereof, with an [illegible]rmative manner of holding. The charter of 1849 confirmed both rights at [illegible] same time, and made, the Lord Ordinary thinks, both public, and it expressly [illegible]rs that the lands and barony are to be held by Sir James of the Duke of [illegible]gyll in feu, for payment of 500 merks of feu-duty, and of £27, 18s. in lieu of [illegible] services of hosting, hunting, and warding. Sir James thus, according to the [illegible]w which the Lord Ordinary takes, held, by virtue of the confirmation of the [illegible]position of 1808, the supplementary disposition of 1834, and the sasines fol- [illegible]wing thereon, the mid-superiority of the Duke in feu; and by the resignation [illegible] remanentiam of 1851, which Sir James expede for the express purpose of [illegible]solidating the dominium utile of the lands and barony with the said mid- [illegible]periority, he consolidated the same. He thereafter divested himself of the [illegible]ction thereof sold to Mr Dalgleish by disposition, containing procuratory and [illegible]ecept. He had no intention of keeping up any mid-superiority, and he accord- [illegible]gly granted to Mr Dalgleish a disposition of the lands with his whole right [illegible]d interest therein, by virtue of which Mr Dalgleish could at once enter with [illegible]e Duke of Argyll as superior, and by which Mr Dalgleish is, as vassal, taken [illegible]ound to pay to the Duke as his immediate superior in the subjects bought by [illegible]m a certain proportion of the original feu-duty. No mention is made in that [illegible]position of the sub-feu-duty of 6000 merks, which was considered by all con- [illegible]rned as extinguished by the purchase of the mid-superiority by Sir James and [illegible] the consolidation above-mentioned.

"It is unnecessary, therefore, the Lord Ordinary thinks, to call as a party to [illegible]s action the heir of Sir James Milles Riddell, the last entered vassal—(Scott [illegible] Falconer, 18th July 1863, 1 Macph. 1164, and cases there cited).

"It is further objected by the defenders that the instrument of resignation [illegible]d remanentiam is inept, and that no effectual consolidation of the property and [illegible]periority took place, because the person who acted as procurator, 'Hypolite [illegible]illiam Cornillon,' though named, is not designed. The Lord Ordinary con- [illegible]rs this objection to be too critical. Any person can act as procurator, and it [illegible] he conceives, sufficient if it is clearly shewn on the face of the instrument [illegible]t there appeared before the notary a procurator to give resignation different [illegible]m the superior's commissioner or agent and the witnesses, and so distinctly [illegible]med as to distinguish him from others—(Morton v. Hunters and Company, [illegible]th November 1830, 4 Wilson and Shaw, 379). But even if such want of [illegible]signation were held fatal to the instrument, that would not, in the opinion of [illegible]e Lord Ordinary, avail the defenders, because they are in right of a disposition [illegible] the lands, both property and superiority, and if there is any defect in the [illegible]strument of resignation that cannot affect the right of the pursuer as superior [illegible] call upon them, the trustees of the true proprietor of the subjects to whom [illegible] whole right therein has been made over, to enter as his vassals, seeing that [illegible]e lands are in non-entry."

No. 105. May 23, 1873. Duke of Argyll v. Dalgleish's Trustees.

the deed of 1808 never was conveyed to the defenders. It remained st in the hæreditas jacens of Sir J. M. Riddell.[1] The charter of confirmati of 1849 was not effectual from the mistake in the date of one of t sasines confirmed.[2] The instrument of resignation of 1851 was ineffectu as the person who acted as procurator was not designed.[3]

The pursuer's counsel was called upon to reply only on the last poi He argued;—It was quite sufficient that the procurator be named in t deed. There was no statutory requirement that he should also be d signed, and it is quite enough if the instrument shews that a procura was present. Besides, even if this were a good objection to the defende title, they are not entitled to object to their own titles.

At advising,—

LORD PRESIDENT.—In this case it cannot seriously be maintained that th lands are not in non-entry, for the last entered vassal, Sir James Milles Riddel died in 1861. But the defences relied on in argument are, in the first plac that the pursuer is not the immediate lawful superior of the defenders, and con sequently has no title to sue, and, therefore, that he cannot sue the defende without calling the heir of the last entered vassal. Now, in order to dispose o these two defences it is necessary to examine the state of the titles. The estat in question was first created by a feu-grant in the year 1696, by which the Ea of Argyll conveyed the lands and barony of Ardnamurchan to Campbell o Lochnell in liferent, and his eldest son in fee, for payment of 500 merks of fe duty, and Campbell of Lochnell granted a sub-feu of the same lands on payme of a larger amount of feu-duty in the year 1722. Now, as regards this sub-fe what may be called the dominium utile of the lands in question came into th person of Sir James Milles Riddell as heir of entail in 1834, and he was infe in the dominium utile on the 8th of September of that year. At a date con siderably anterior to that, however, he had acquired the mid-superiority of th lands by a disposition dated the 19th of August 1808; and so, when he su ceeded as heir of entail to the dominium utile, he had in his own person a ba zied title to that estate, and a fee-simple title to the mid-superiority. But the was a peculiarity about the conveyance of the mid-superiority by the deed o 1808, in respect it contained only one manner of holding,—a holding a se, an consequently Sir James Milles Riddell, in order to make his title to the mi superiority effectual, would have required an immediate entry with the superi That, apparently, was not desirable. Probably the fee was full, and it was n necessary, except for the peculiarity of the holding, to take any such entry t that time. And accordingly he obtained another disposition to the mid-sup riority from the same disponer, General Campbell of Lochnell, which is dated t 13th February 1834. Now, this disposition of 1834 is entirely of the nature o a supplementary disposition. There can be no doubt that the granter, Gene Campbell of Lochnell, was effectually divested of the mid-superiority by the d position of 1808, upon which infeftment followed in 1811. He had no long therefore, any estate to convey, and consequently the disposition of 1834 cou be nothing else than a mere deed to fortify and make more effectual the title his disponee of 1808. He had no additional estate to give. There was nothi in him. He had already given all that he had to give, viz., the estate in t superiority. Therefore, the disposition of 1834 was intended merely, and h merely the effect of giving to the disponee that which he had not by the dis sition of 1808, a double manner of holding as regards the said estate of m superiority. Infeftment was taken upon this supplementary disposition of 18

[1] Mags. of Hamilton v. Swim, Feb. 2, 1854, 16 D. 437.

[2] Macmillan v. Campbell, March 4, 1831, 9 S. 551; Kirkham v. Campb May 21, 1822, 1 Sh. 423 (1st ed.)

[3] Morton v. Hunters, Dec. 10, 1828, 7 S. 172, affd. Nov. 26, 1830, 4 W. & S. 379; Duff's Feudal Conveyancing, p. 105; Menzies, 571-572; M. Be Lectures, i. p. 609.

No. 105.

May 23, 1873.
Duke of Argyll v. Dalgleish's Trustees.

d both the disposition of 1808, with its sasine of 1811, and the disposition of 34, with its sasine in the same year, were confirmed at the same time by the ke of Argyll in 1849. Now, it is maintained upon the part of the defenders t the effect of this confirmation was to create two estates of superiority in the son of Sir James Riddell, one of them holding of the Duke,—the mid-superity conveyed by the deed of 1808,—and another estate of mid-superiority, ich it is said came into existence by means of the infeftment taken upon the plementary disposition of 1834, and which other estate of superiority, it is , is held in virtue of that infeftment by Sir James Riddell of himself as the al of the Duke of Argyll. Now, it seems to me that that is a mere subtle gination, and nothing else, and that the true view of these two dispositions their sasines as confirmed in 1849 is this, that, taken together, they give disponee a good title to the mid-superiority with a double manner of hold-,—just exactly to the same effect as if the original deed of 1808 had con-ed that double manner of holding. In short, it appears to me that the true w of this piece of conveyancing is that the disposition of 1834 did nothing e than supply the defect which existed in the disposition of 1808. Now, next step in the progress of the titles which it is necessary to attend to is Sir James Riddell, having thus a good title both to the dominium utile to the mid-superiority, and having entered with the superior, was, as owner the dominium utile, his own vassal; and he proceeded very properly in 1851 take steps for consolidating the property with the superiority. And that he in the ordinary form, by a procuratory of resignation ad remanentiam, which horised resignation in his own hands as immediate superior, and by an instru-t of resignation following upon that, which bears date 12th of December 51. Sir James being thus vested with the consolidated estate, and holding entire estate of the Duke of Argyll, having in his own person the plenum minium, a portion of the estate was sold for the purpose of paying debt, and purchaser at the sale was the late Mr James Dalgleish. The conveyance to Dalgleish by Sir James Milles Riddell and his trustee is dated 30th May 3d June 1856; and that deed contained a procuratory of resignation and a cept of sasine, or at least it contains the clauses which in virtue of certain re-t Acts of Parliament come in place of the ancient form of procuratory and cept, and Mr Dalgleish was infeft upon this disposition. Now, Sir James les Riddell, being the vassal last entered with the superior, died in 1861, the superior now requires Mr Dalgleish's trustees to take an entry. The defence, viz., that the Duke is not the immediate lawful superior of the de-ders, rests upon that peculiar view of the double conveyance of the mid-eriority to which I have already adverted; and the argument founded upon e two dispositions being, in my opinion, entirely groundless, the whole foun-ion of this defence is removed, because the Duke is unquestionably the im-diate lawful superior of the estate,—the plenum dominium of the lands as they d in the person of Sir James Milles Riddell, and as it was transferred to Mr gleish by the disposition of 1856.

But there are certain other objections stated, which seem rather to be in-ded to support the defence that the superior cannot sue this declarator of non-ry without calling the heir of the vassal last entered. The first of these is , in the charter of confirmation which constitutes the last entry, there is a take in the description of one of the sasines confirmed. It is described in charter as being recorded in the General Register of Sasines upon the 18th December 1834, whereas, in point of fact, it is recorded upon the 18th of tember of that year; and it seems to be thought that this creates such a loulty in the way of the defender's title that he is entitled to say that the r of the vassal last entered must be called in this declarator. I confess I e not been able to follow the reasoning by which that conclusion is reached, it is of less interest to attempt to do so because it appears to me that the ction itself, whatever the effect of it might be if well founded, is entirely ounded. It is one of those mistakes which, although it is very desirable to id them, are yet of very little consequence when they do occur. The sasine con-ed is completely identified by its date, which is quite correctly given as being

No. 105.
— —
May 23, 1873.
Duke of Argyll v. Dalgleish's Trustees.

21st of July in the year 1834. There can be no doubt what is the sasin confirmed, and the general words which follow the description of that sa the other writs, viz., "or whatever other dates or tenor the said writs are intended to cover, and do, in the practice of conveyancing, co cover, small mistakes of this description. The objection, I think, is untenable.

But it is said, further, that the consolidation is ineffectual, and that, of result, the property was not consolidated with the superiority in the Sir James Milles Riddell, because of a mistake in the instrument of res The procurator who acted on behalf of the vassal,—the person making t nation,—is named in the instrument, but is not designed. Hypolite Cornillon is the name, but there is no designation added, and it is said fatal objection to the instrument of resignation. I should be very little to give any countenance to that objection. There is no statute requi procurator to be designed, or the bailie either; and the important thin set forth, and to be made very clear upon the face of an instrument of res is that one person makes the resignation and another person receives i is unquestionable. But there is certainly no statute, although there practice, requiring the designation of these persons. But I confess I find it necessary to consider this objection upon its merits, because I th quite a sufficient answer to it to say that it does not lie in the mouth defender to state that objection. He is not entitled, I think, in a decl non-entry, to take technical objections to his own title, which this un ably is. I think he must be held to be founding upon this instrument nation as an indispensable part of his title to the estate; and if he h good title to the estate he would have no defence against this declarato entry at all; and, therefore, I think, for that reason, this objection c listened to or stated by him.

That exhausts all the points that were brought before us by the d and I have no hesitation, for the reasons I have already stated, in adl the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor, by which he finds that the lands an specified and described in the summons are in non-entry as libelled.

Lord Deas.—There are two objections taken to this declarator of n —the one that the pursuer, the Duke of Argyll, is not the immediate of the defenders, and the other that the heir of investiture ought to h called for his interest. It is very difficult to see any plausible found the first of these objections, because whatever transferences may ha place since the original grant the superior is always entitled to com and enforce an entry. But I agree with your Lordship that the Duke is the immediate superior of the dominium utile of these lands, as w any mid-superiority that may exist. In 1722 Duncan Campbell con Sir James the mid-superiority held under the Duke, with one manner ing, on which infeftment passed. It is on that infeftment of 1811 particular objection is rested. But, then, in 1834, Sir James got th mentary disposition from Duncan Campbell, with two manners of hol was infeft on that disposition in September 1834. Now, I agree w Lordship that one of these deeds, being upon the face of it supplem the other, and being obviously intended to remedy the very inconvenien would have resulted from the one manner of holding in the deed these two deeds are to be read as one deed; and that the legitima is, that the whole were to be held with two manners of holding. 1849 he grants confirmation of these deeds and infeftments,—the deed the supplementary deed of 1834, and the sasines upon both of them. that deed of 1849 that the error occurs in describing the instrument of 1834 as having been recorded upon the 18th of December in pla 18th of September of that year. I agree with your Lordship that nothing in that objection. The question simply is, whether the sasi is confirmed is sufficiently identified. It is identified by its date, and (if you go beyond the face of it) by the circumstances,—there being position that would answer the description. There is no doubt at all about identity of the sasine confirmed, and therefore I think that objection totally founded. In 1851 Sir James consolidates the property and the superiority in person, and in 1856 he dispones the whole to Mr Dalgleish, or Mr Dalgleish's trustees, with two manners of holding.

No. 105.

May 23, 1873.
Duke of Argyll v. Dalgleish's Trustees.

Objection is taken to the instrument of resignation that the procurator named is not designed. Now, if that objection were raised by a singular successor uting with the party who held this particular title the objection certainly t require consideration, because, although it is true enough, as your Lordhas said, that there is no statute requiring the procurator to be designed, ame thing may be said with regard to the designations of all the parties otarial instruments and in feudal titles; and it would be a strong thing to that in none of these deeds, constituting the actual title to heritable subs, is it necessary that the parties whose act or presence is essential shall be signed as to identify them, and distinguish them from others; for with a designation I do not see the practicability of identification. The alleged y named may be anybody or nobody,—a pupil, or a woman, or other disified person; and it might be difficult to see good ground for distinguishing ween the identification by designation of the procurator and of anybody else e name is necessary. All that would require great consideration before we ld affirm the immateriality of this omission, especially as there is no practice nction it. But I agree with your Lordship that it is quite unnecessary to nto that, because I think it is not in the mouth of this party to take that obion to his own title.

s regards calling the heir, the old law undoubtedly was that the heir must ays be called; but it has been settled by decisions that if the former vassal granted a conveyance with procuratory and precept, or, in other words, a veyance upon which the disponee is in a position to obtain an infeftment ich shall denude the previous vassal, then you do not require to call the heir. w, I am disposed to think that that is the case here, whether there was a d consolidation or not. If the consolidation was good it is conceded that e is an end of the objection. But even supposing there was no good conidation, I think the same result would follow. In order to pass the property one party to another it is not necessary that the disponee should be in a tion to hold directly under any particular superior, if the vassal who is conng conveys all that he has, and gives the disponee every right that he has self to enter in the one way or in the other. Suppose that each of these s was in a totally different position, the disponee could still take a valid ment, which, from the date of recording, would be good to him against e world. It would not even require separate instruments, for in one inment you may have infeftment in different subjects, and in different ways; even supposing there was no consolidation at all I do not see anything to Mr Dalgleish's trustees here from taking an infeftment which shall make title complete, subject to any right which any superior or mid-superior have to call upon them to enter. They might have granted separate procuies or precepts applicable to the mid-superiority and to the property. These to be held embodied in this deed of 1834, which is equally available as if authorised infeftment in the mid-superiority by one manner of holding, in the property by another. Therefore, in no point of view can I see that leish's trustees are in any other position than that in which the Court have d that it is not necessary to call the heir.

LORD ARDMILLAN.—I have studied this case carefully, and I have come to the conclusion. The only thing I would like to add is, that I rather think objection taken to the want of designation of the procurator would not be a objection after the decision in the case of Morton in 1830, apart from the that this party cannot take the objection.

LORD JERVISWOODE concurred.

THE COURT adhered to the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor.

ALEXANDER HOWE, W.S.—DALGLEISH & BELL, W.S.—Agents.

No. 106.

May 23, 1873.
Balleny v. Cree.

ARCHIBALD BALLENY, Pursuer and Appellant.—Mair.
ROBERT SCOTT CREE, Defender and Respondent.—Trayner.

Reparation—Master and Servant—Collaborateur.—In an action of da for personal injury raised by a workman in a paper-work against his mas was proved that the pursuer had been injured in consequence of the machi which he was employed being in a defective state through the negligence o manager and a mechanic employed in the works, and that there had be personal negligence on the part of the master. Held that the master wa liable for the fault of those employed by him, seeing that he had taken reas care to employ competent workmen.

2D DIVISION. Sheriff of Renfrewshire. I.

ARCHIBALD BALLENY, a workman employed in a paper-work in Pol shaws, raised this action against his employer, Mr Cree, paper manu turer there, concluding for damages for bodily injury.

The pursuer was a machineman in the defender's paper-works while working at his machine his hand was caught between the felt and so injured that his arm had to be amputated.

The circumstances of the accident were thus described in the The pursuer deponed;—". . . . Mr Cree had a manager under him, Baillie, who superintended, and there was a mechanic, Benjamin Ste who looked after the machine being in working order, and made necessary repairs. On 25th August last, about two o'clock afterno was at work at the machine as usual, when an accident occurred. hand was caught between the felt-roll and one of the cylinders, drawn in and crushed and burned. It was the first felt-roll with w the paper comes in contact. . . . . The cylinder at which it happen known as the first cylinder. It was revolving at the time, as als the felt-roll, and the paper was being drawn downwards between t . . . . I ascribe the accident to the want of the guide-roll for the roller. That guide-roll was of brass, and should have been placed a above the point where my hand was caught. There was a brass g roll in that position all the time I was working there until a fort before the accident occurred. I found it removed one night when I to work, and saw it lying beside the machine. The 'journal' . . . . off it. It would not bide in when screwed on, being too loose. W the screw of the journal is loose the guide-roll will not work, an paper could pass over into the machine without being torn and br About two days after I told Mr Baillie that he would require eith get a new guide-roll or to have the old one sorted. He said they getting a new one. The reason I spoke to him of it then was, t thought it should have been sorted immediately on the guide-roll I found deficient, but seeing that nothing was done in two days I thi it right to speak to him about it. I did not speak to the mechanic a it; he saw the guide-roll every day, for it was lying about. The ma and defender must also have seen it, and could not fail to notice th was out of its place. It lay on a stance for holding paper in the pas down the room by the side of the machine, about six inches above ground. It lay there till three or four days before the accident, wh noticed that it had been placed under a table in the same room as machine. On the same occasion as I noticed that the brass guide- was removed out of its place I found that a wooden roll had been pla on a bracket close by the cylinder. It was on the same frame as bracket supporting the felt-roll, but further out from the cylinder. T wooden roll did not supply the place of the brass guide-roll. It was suitable from its position to supply its place. If the brass guide-roll en in its place I could not have sustained this injury to my hand and n. My hand could not have been drawn in. There is very little risk danger if the brass roll is in its place; very little indeed, with ordinary e and attention. . . . . The felt-roll is about the height of my shoulder. e purpose of the brass guide-roll is to guide the paper down to the felt-l, and it prevents our hands from getting down to the felt-roll. The chine worked well enough, and made good paper during the fortnight t the brass guide-roll was not in its place. During that fortnight I sidered that there was danger in working the machine, owing to the nt of the brass guide-roll." . . . .

eorge Preston, also machineman with the defender, and working alter-e shifts on the same machine with the pursuer, deponed—". . . . About se weeks before the accident to the pursuer the brass guide-roll lead-to the first cylinder went wrong and would not work. I found it uld not revolve, and was breaking the paper. I removed it. . . . . The t morning after I took out the guide-roll I mentioned that I had done to Benjamin Stewart, the mechanic, and told him what was wrong h it. I also told him I could not do without it. He said he would e to get it sorted, but he did not say when. I spoke to him again ut it—a week before the accident. Pursuer had at that time nearly ; his hand caught by it, and I mentioned this to the mechanic, and said was dangerous to work without it. I do not remember what he said. lso spoke to the manager, Mr Baillie, about it. It was the same time a week before the accident—that I spoke to him. I said it would be ch better to get it sorted, or a new one in its place; and I also men-ned about pursuer having nearly had his hand caught in it. I also ntioned to him that I had put in the wooden one to try and save the per from being crushed in the back side. His only answer was that he uld have to tell Ben—meaning the mechanic—about it. Nothing was ne till after the accident. If that brass guide-roll had been in its place was nearly impossible that such an accident could have occurred as ppened to pursuer. I do not think it could have occurred. If that ss guide-roll had been in its place pursuer would not have had any casion in doing his work to have had his hand near the place where it s caught. He must then have gone out of his way to put it in either relessly or very stupidly. The wooden roll which I put in did not in y way serve as a protection from coming near to the felt-roll. . . . . I ver spoke to Mr Cree, the defender, before the accident about the roll ing taken out. Baillie was the manager, and I spoke to him." . . . .

On the other hand, Andrew Mason, managing engineer of James Ber-n and Sons, who had constructed the machine in question, deponed—. . . . As constructed by us the normal mode of working that machine that the paper should be led to the cylinder by means of the guide-l, and so be conducted to the felt-roll. The purpose of the brass guide-l is to place the paper so that it shall lie flat on the cylinder before it ches the felt-roll; also, it enables the paper to get all the advantage of cylinder. The guide-roll places the paper on the heated cylinder, so t the paper is flat against it before it reaches the felt. There is ther guide-roll represented on the plan—it is at the bottom of and ond the fourth cylinder. Its purpose is to guide the paper from the inders to the calender presses. In constructing this machine these de-rolls were intended solely for leading the paper, and had no refer-e to providing for the safety of the workmen. Each of the cylinders a framework of iron four inches in thickness, and that framework is open one, and is between the revolving cylinder and any person who y be standing at the end of the cylinders. . . . . If the brass guide-roll were away from defender's machine, and a wooden roller were placed on same bracket as the felt-roll, there would, in my opinion, be as great safety to a machineman as if the brass guide-roll were in position. A machineman's is a dangerous kind of work. . . . . When the machine was wrought by means of a wooden roller in place as above, and without brass guide-roll, I consider that it could only have been through carelessness that a workman could have his hand and arm drawn in between the cylinder and the felt-roll."

No. 106.

May 23, 1873.
Balleny v. Cree.

The pursuer pleaded;—The pursuer having, while engaged in the defender's service, been injured through or by a defective machine or apparatus belonging to the defender, the defender is liable to him in damages and solatium.

The defender pleaded;—(1) The injury sustained by the pursuer having been occasioned by or through his own want of care, skill, and attention or at least not by and through any fault, negligence, or carelessness of the defender, or those for whom he is responsible, no liability rests on the defender. (2) At the time of the occurrence of the accident libelled the pursuer was engaged in a hazardous employment, and any risk or danger to which he was thereby subjected being equally apparent to him as to the defender the pursuer was bound to look to his own safety.

The Sheriff-substitute (Cowan) and the Sheriff (Fraser) assoilzied the defender.

The pursuer appealed.[1]

At advising,—

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—It is quite clear that this accident was caused by the want of a brass roller to protect the hands of the workmen.

There had been such a brass roller, but it was not in its place at the time of the accident; in its absence an inefficient temporary substitute had been put up.

The next question is, how did it come that the machine was thus defective. This is not doubtful. As the brass roller, from its fastenings having given way, would not stay in its place, it ought to have been replaced by Stewart, a mechanic employed on weekly wages. There was also a foreman or manager of the name of Baillie. It seems that the defender, the owner of the works, was constantly on the spot, but that he was not acquainted with machinery, or qualified to judge of it.

The pursuer complained of the want of the brass roller, and the manager and Stewart were both quite aware that it was not in its place. Stewart affects to say that the machine was quite good without it. I do not go into that, for it is clear that the roller was an important and necessary part of the machine.

The first question comes to be, is there any reason to say that the pursuer went into danger knowingly? I have come to the clear opinion that the pursuer did not go into danger with his eyes open. His duty was to work the machine. No doubt he knew that the roller ought to have been there; but although the hazard was increased, still it was possible to work the machine, and I cannot hold that the pursuer contributed to the accident by continuing to work.

The next question is, was the defender responsible for the defective state of the machine? Personally he did nothing to make himself responsible. He had opportunities of seeing that the machine was defective, but he was not and did not profess to be a skilled mechanist, so as to be a judge of what was necessary. There seems no ground for charging him with personal fault.

Is he, then, responsible for the undoubted neglect of Stewart and Baillie, his servants? It cannot be disputed that they were guilty of the grossest neglect;

[1] M'Neill v. Wallace & Co., July 7, 1853, 15 D. 818; Alsop v. Yates, Jan. 18, 1858, 27 Law Journal (Exch.), 156; Fraser on Master and Servant, 2d edit. p. 94, et seq.

No. 106.

May 23, 1873.
Balleny v. Cree.

the evidence does not shew that they were not qualified for the situations held. Stewart perhaps was not a very steady man, but he was undoubtedly fied, and he had been highly recommended. The case resolves into the appli- n of the rule that if an accident occur through the fault of a fellow-servant master is not liable. I am of the same opinion as the Sheriff-principal, and ally on the same grounds,—that as the accident occurred from the fault of ow-workman the master is not liable, seeing that individually and person- he was not to blame.

D COWAN.—I am of opinion with your Lordship that there is no blame hable to the pursuer, so as to exclude on that ground his claim for repara- The evidence proves that his conduct was that of a skilled workmen. an I hold on the proof that he wilfully went into a seen danger. The d of judgment, however, adopted by both Sheriffs is sufficient for the e. I do not agree with that part of the Sheriff's note to his interlocutor e he says that it is of no moment that the defender was practically not inted with machinery. I think that fact is far from being immaterial, for l on him the duty of being all the more careful in the selection of those to a he entrusted the superintendence and management. I think, however, he fully discharged his duty in this respect. As he himself was unac- ted with machinery he entrusted the charge of his work to a properly fied and skilled mechanic, and to a superintendent and manager. They cted their duty to get the machine properly repaired, and hence the acci- ; whether both or only one of them was in fault is not of consequence, se both were collaborateurs or fellow-workmen of the pursuer. I concur in ng that the defender is not liable on that ground.

D BENHOLME.—I concur generally, though not in everything which has said by your Lordships. What strikes me as sufficient to suppor the ment is, that there was no fault on the part of the defender. He himself ot a skilled mechanist, and he cannot be made responsible for the defect in achinery.
ardly concur regarding the pursuer's own conduct. I do not think he was om blame. He had had a previous warning by having his hand nearly ht by the machine.
was not prudent in him to continue to work while the brass roller was not ced, and as the manager refused or delayed to do so the pursuer ought to applied to the defender. If he had done so, and if the defender had ted to have the defect remedied, I would have held him liable, as the acci- would then have been plainly due to his personal fault.

D NEAVES.—I concur, and on the grounds stated by your Lordship in the t. I only add that I think the fact that the pursuer did not appeal to the ter, his master, when the machine was not repaired by the mechanic, con- the view that there was no personal fault in the defender. His being ntly on the spot gave the pursuer an opportunity of so complaining, and ursuer's silence justified the defender, in the circumstances, in thinking that s right. I give no opinion what would have been the result if the pursuer omplained and his complaint had not been attended to.

THE following interlocutor was pronounced:—"Find it proved that the injuries sustained by the pursuer were occasioned by the machine in question having become defective and dangerous, in respect of the absence of the brass guide-roll: Find that this state of the machine was occasioned by the fault and negligence of the manager, Baillie, and of the mechanic, Stewart: Find that the defender was not personally guilty of any fault or negligence in the matter: Find that he is not liable for the fault or negligence of those who were employed by him, seeing he took reasonable care to employ competent workmen: Find that the manager,

No. 106.

May 23, 1873. Balleny v. Cree.

Baillie, and the mechanic, Stewart, were fellow-workmen v pursuer in a common employment: Therefore dismiss the affirm the judgment appealed against, and decern: Find penses due in this Court."

THOMAS LAWSON, S.S.C.—CAMPBELL & SMITH, S.S.C.—Agents.

No. 107.

May 29, 1873. Smith's Trustees v. Graham and Others.

MISS JEMIMA RUSSELL AND ANOTHER (Smith's Trustees), Pursue Real Raisers.—Fraser—M'Laren.

MRS J. W. GRAHAM or MORTYN now FERGUSSON AND OTHERS (D of Peter Graham), Claimants.—Watson—Mackintosh.

ALEXANDER GOODSIR AND OTHERS (Trustees of Robert Graham Sr J. P. Wilson.

MRS JEMIMA GRAHAM OR RICHARDSON AND ANOTHER (William G Children), Claimants.—Adam—Johnstone.

Succession—Testament—Vesting—Power.—A truster directed his tr pay the free yearly interest of the residue of his estate to his widow, an death to make over the fee to his two sisters and three nephews, and t of their bodies, in such proportions as his widow should appoint, faili appointment, to the beneficiaries equally, the share of any nephew dyi out issue, or of either sister who should die without settling, or shoul cease, the same to be divided equally among the survivors and their issu of the sisters survived the testator but predeceased the widow, leaving ment of, inter alia, her share of the fee of her brother's estate. Held the fee did not vest till the death of the truster's widow; and (2) that t of the trust-deed did not authorise the truster's sister to settle her sha fee until it had vested.

Apportionment—Illusory Payments—Statute 11 Geo. IV. and 1 W c. 46.—Question, Whether the enactment in the above statute that all a ments under a power shall be valid, whether illusory or not, applies to S

2D DIVISION. Ld. Ormidale. I.

THE late Dr Peter Smith of Dunesk died on 7th July 1833, l trust-disposition and settlement dated 20th May 1822.

After disposing of his landed estates of Dunesk and Bilbow, s viding certain liferent annuities from the revenue of his moveabl to his sisters, the testator directed his trustees—"Sixthly, I direct my said trustees to pay to my said wife, in case she shall me, during all the days of her lifetime, the residue of the free interest or return arising from any moneys or other moveable me estate I may die possessed of: And lastly, with regard to the fee s residue of my moveable means and estate, I hereby direct my said t to make over the same to and in favour of my said sisters, Mi Smith, and the said Miss Anne Smith, and my said nephews, Graham, William Graham, and Peter Graham, and the heirs o bodies, in such proportions as my said wife, in case she shall surv shall direct and appoint by any writing under her hand, and faili appointment, then to my said sisters and nephews equally among share and share alike; it being hereby expressly declared th children of any of my said nephews predeceasing me shall succeed share which would have fallen to their parent, to be divided amon equally, share and share alike; and the share of any of my said n dying without issue, or of my said sisters who shall die without i the same, or shall predecease me, shall be divided among the su and their issue as above provided, equally, share and share alik which shares, except in so far as liferented by my said sisters, s paid over to my said sisters and nephews, or their issue, at the fir of Whitsunday or Martinmas that shall happen next after the l one year from my decease or my said wife's decease, whichever o

No. 107.
May 29, 1873.
Smith's Trustees v. Graham and Others.

shall last happen; and the said sums so to be liferented by my isters shall in like manner, at the first term of Whitsunday or amas after the death of the said annuitants, be divided among my esiduary legatees as before provided; providing always, that if my shall then be in life, the division shall be suspended till the first after her death, she being always entitled to the liferent thereof, as provided; and also that either of my said sisters shall be entitled pose by will of one-fifth part of the sum liferented by her."

truster's sisters and nephews above named all survived him, but eased his widow, Mrs Henrietta Erskine or Smith. Miss Jane died in 1835, leaving a settlement dated 5th November 1834, by she conveyed to her nephew Robert Graham (afterwards Robert m Smith),—"her whole moveable means and estate, and, in par-r, 'that portion or share of the means and estate to which she had under the deeds of settlement executed by her said deceased brother, ter Smith of Dunesk, or to which she might otherwise have right e of the executors and successors of the said Peter Smith in his and estate.'" testator's widow, Mrs Smith, who liferented the residue of his able estate, died on 8th July 1871, leaving a deed of apportionment 26th June 1866, in which, after stating that as it was doubtful ier the shares thereof destined to Jane Smith, Anne Smith, and t Graham Smith had vested in them in consequence of their deaths the date of division, she proceeded to apportion £20 to the repre-tives of each of them in the event of vesting having taken place, and heirs of Peter Graham £1000, and the balance to William Graham children.

on the death of Mrs Smith, Dr Smith's trustees proceeded to divide rust-estate, which consisted of £9000 consolidated stock, and £500 of the British Linen Company. Various questions having arisen g the beneficiaries, the trustees raised the present action of multi-inding and exoneration.

e competition chiefly depended upon two questions—First, Whether e of the residue vested a morte testatoris, or not till the death of the or's widow? Second, Whether the apportionment made by the or's widow under the power contained in the settlement was valid ffectual?

s Isabella Graham or Mortyn and others, daughters of Peter Graham, tained that the fee of the residue vested a morte testatoris, and dingly that the representatives of the testator's three nephews and isters were all entitled to share in the division. But if it should be held he fee did not vest till the death of the widow, that a special power pointing their shares was conferred by the testator upon his sisters, hat this power had been exercised by Miss Jane Smith. According latter view, the persons entitled to share in the division were—(1) Graham's children; (2) William Graham's children; (3) Miss Jane 's appointee. But whether the apportionment fell to be made in hares or into three it could not be regarded as valid, seeing that one re of the parties entitled to share received an illusory share.

s Richardson and others maintained;—The fee of the residue did est till the death of the widow,[1] and upon a sound construction of ttlement no power of appointing her share was conferred upon Miss Smith. Peter Graham's children and William Graham's children thus the only parties entitled to share in the residue. The appor-

[1] Young v. Robertson, Feb. 13, 1862, 4 Macq. 314.

No. 107.

May 29, 1873. Smith's Trustees v. Graham and Others.

tionment was therefore tripartite, and in this view it was admittedly Even supposing that Miss Jane Smith had a power of appointing share, there was no authority for holding that an apportionment of out of such a fund was illusory.[1]

The Lord Ordinary pronounced this interlocutor:—"Finds that competition in this case relates to the residue of the moveable means estate left by the late Dr Peter Smith under his trust-disposition settlement, and that it chiefly depends upon two questions, viz.,- Whether the fee or capital of said residue is to be held as having ve a morte testatoris, or not till the death of the testator's widow, to w the liferent enjoyment of it is destined; and 2d, Whether the appoi ment made by the testator's widow of the residue under a power tained in his deed of settlement is, or is not, to be held valid and effec Finds, in regard to the former of these questions, that the bequests b testator of the fee or capital of said residue must be held to have ve not at the death of the testator, but at the death of his widow, the rentrix, being the date of its payment or distribution; and finds in re to the latter question that said apportionment is to be held as valid effectual."*

---

[1] Watson v. Marjoribanks, Feb. 17, 1837, 15 S. 586; Sivright v. D Jan. 27, 1824, 2 S. 643; Crawcour v. Graham, Feb. 3, 1844, 6 D. 589.

* "NOTE.—The sixth and last purposes of the testator's deed of settle are the important ones to be kept in view in considering the questions w have now been determined by the Lord Ordinary.

"The testator, after some special bequests in the sixth purpose of his s ment, leaves the residue of his moveable means and estate to his wife, i event of her surviving him, in liferent, and then proceeds, in the last purpo his deed, to dispose of the fee or capital of the residue so to be lifere Notwithstanding the apparent complication, not to say confusion, arising fro manner in which the last purpose is expressed, the Lord Ordinary thin clear—1st, that the liferent of the whole residue has been destined by the te to his wife in the event of her survivance, an event which happened; 2d, consequently no part of the capital of the residue could be paid or distrib till after the death of his wife, it being moreover expressly directed that respective shares of the residuary legatees—sisters and nephews—should be over to them only after the death of the testator or liferentrix, whichev these events should first happen; and 3d, that the shares of the residue le his nephews dying without issue, or of his sisters who should die without sett the same or should predecease himself, must be divided among the survi and their issue. There is thus both a liferent and survivorship in the pre case, and accordingly the capital or fee of the residue cannot be benefici possessed or enjoyed by, or be paid to, or distributed amongst, the parties na by the testator as his residuary legatees and their issue, or the survivors of th and their issue, till after the death of his widow, the liferentrix.

"In this state of matters, and supposing there are no specialties to render necessary to treat the present case as an exceptional one, a matter which will afterwards adverted to, it falls, in the opinion of the Lord Ordinary, to governed by that of Young v. Robertson, as decided in the House of Lords February 1862 (4 Macqueen's Appeal Cases, p. 314). There it was held in words of the Lord Chancellor (Westbury), to be a settled rule of construct equally in the law of Scotland as of England, 'that the words of survivor in a settlement (that is, in a will), should be referred to the period appointed that settlement for the payment or distribution of the subject-matter of the g And again, dealing with a case such as the present, the learned Lord says,— a testator gives a life estate in a sum of money, or in the residue of his est and at the expiration of that life estate directs the money to be paid or residue to be divided among a number of objects, and then refers to the pe rs Jemima Graham and others reclaimed. No. 107.

; advising,—

May 29, 1873.
Smith's Trustees v. Graham and Others.

RD JUSTICE-CLERK.—We have had a very able argument from Mr Watson, of some one or more of these persons dying without specifying the time, lirects in that event the payment or distribution to be made among the sur-s, it is understood by the law that he means the contingency to extend the whole period of time that must elapse before the payment or distribu-takes place. The result, therefore, is that in such a gift the survivors are ascertained in like manner by a reference to the period of distribution, ly, the expiration of the life estate.' There can be no doubt, therefore, nless this principle of construction has been rendered inapplicable to the nt case by some specialty or peculiarity, the Lord Ordinary is right in hold-nat the vesting of the fee or capital of the residue in question did not take until after the death of the liferentrix, when it fell to be paid or dis-ed.

The Lord Ordinary does not think that there is any such specialty or pecu-r in the present case. On the contrary, it appears to him that the peculi-s—such as they are—of the destination of the residue in the present case e testator tend rather to support than otherwise the conclusion which has arrived at. Thus, the destination by the testator of the capital or fee of sidue of his estate to his sisters and nephews, not as a class, but individu-y name, is only in the proportions that may be directed and appointed by ife in the event of her surviving him. Now, although this may not be usive of the point, it is at least strongly indicative of the period of vesting r postponed till after the death of his wife; for until then the precise nt which each of the residuary legatees may be entitled to cannot be known. clause, again, to the effect that, failing a direction and apportionment by estator's widow, his sisters and nephews should succeed equally, tends to ame conclusion; for until the death of the testator's widow it cannot be n whether she has failed to direct and appoint what shares the residuary ees are to have. Nor is it unimportant to observe that no part of the income he residue goes to the residuary legatees, or any of them, till the period of payment or distribution of the capital or fee, and that the assignees of the tees are not mentioned in the destination at all. Neither can the Lord nary find any sufficient reason for holding that the fee of that portion of the estate out of which the annuities of the testator's sisters are to be paid be held to vest a morte testatoris, for that portion of the estate, on being ee by the death of the annuitants, falls into residue to be treated just as the

On the principles therefore established in the House of Lords in the case of g v. Robertson, and being of opinion that there is no specialty in the nt case to exclude it from the operation of these principles, the Lord Ordi-thinks it must be held that the fee of the residue in question did not vest he period of payment or distribution after the death of the testator's widow. In regard to the other question, viz., whether the apportionment by the tor's widow of the residue among the residuary legatees is a valid and ual one, the Lord Ordinary has been unable to see sufficient ground for ing that it is not. The question, however, is not one which he can say is tended with difficulty.

It was maintained on the part of some of the claimants that the apportion-by the widow of £20 to legatees whose share of the residue would other-be about £3000 must be held to be illusory, and a fraudulent exercise of power of apportionment committed by the testator to his widow. No case, wer, was cited in which such a contention has been sustained by this Court. e, on the contrary, conceded, that in no case which has yet occurred in this t has an apportionment been held to be void on the ground that the sums tioned were illusory, and consequently that the exercise of the power was dulent. Cases, however, were cited in which the question was raised, the

No. 107.

May 29, 1873.
Smith's Trustees v. Graham and Others.

but the views for which he contended can only receive effect if we a proposition on which the argument proceeded, that a power to settle l more important of these being Watson v. Marjoribanks, 17th Febru 15 Sh. 586; Crawcour v. Graham, 3d February 1844, 6 D. 589; and Trustees v. Marder, 30th March 1853, 15 D. 633. In the first of th there was no decision on the precise point, the deed of apportionmen been set aside on a ground which has no place here. Neither was t decision of the question in the case of Crawcour v. Graham, although tions relating to it of more or less value are reported to have been made of the Judges. In the remaining case of Marder's Trustees v. Marde held that an apportionment of £50 out of £2000 to one of two daughte the remaining £1950 were given to the other, could not be set aside as

"So standing the authorities, the Lord Ordinary does not see tha derive much aid from them in deciding whether the apportionment o some of the residuary legatees in the present case is illusory or not. Th the cases referred to is the nearest in point to the present, and, so far a the Lord Ordinary thinks it is calculated to support rather than othe conclusion at which he has here arrived. It must be kept in view testator himself might undoubtedly have apportioned the residue of l just as his widow has done, and if so, why should the apportionment his widow not be equally good. The Lord Ordinary thinks it clear testator's object in regard to this matter was to substitute her into place; and he has certainly, neither expressly nor by implication, imp limits or conditions upon her discretionary exercise of the power he c to her. The residuary legatees are not said, and do not appear, to have legal claim at all for a share of the residue in question. Not being ch the testator or his widow they did not stand even in that favourable Keeping these considerations in view, the Lord Ordinary has been unal how he either ought, or could, on any satisfactory ground, set aside th tionment in question as illusory or fraudulent. He feels himself a unable to say that an apportionment of £20 in the circumstances wh occur must be held to be illusory. No rule or principle has been indicated by the testator or his widow for determining such a point. fore, the Lord Ordinary were to disturb the apportionment which has be he would be interfering with the discretionary power committed to h by the testator, not on any principle that he could define, but simply if he had been in the widow's place, he would have divided the fund di from what she has done. But surely no proceeding could be more arbit haphazard than that; and none could partake less of a judicial characte

"Entertaining these views, it is unnecessary for the Lord Ordinary mine the question which was raised by the parties, whether the statute IV. and 1 William IV. cap. 46, which declares that all apportionmen under such a power as that in question should be valid and effectual, e only nominal and illusory, applies to Scotland or not. The Lord Ordin here remark, however, that this statute appears to have been noticed and in some of the cases above referred to as if it were applicable to Englan and of course since the passing of that statute such a question as the could not occur in England. But the report of the case of Butcher v. (9 Vesey's Chancery Reports, p. 382), decided by Sir William Grant, m of the Rolls, in 1804, is very instructive on the subject. There, as apportionment was challenged as illusory and fraudulent, but the Maste Rolls, in an elaborate judgment, in which he reviewed the authorities in l and entered into the inquiry whether there was or could be any sound on which a Court could disturb the discretionary exercise of such a p the party to whom it had been committed, held, as the Lord Ordinary here, that he was unable to discover any such principle.

"The Lord Ordinary understood at the debate that on the two which have now been determined being disposed of they would pro

onferred by the truster on his sister, Miss Jane Smith, even if she prede- d the term of payment. There are two questions which we must consider, as to the term of vesting, and second, as to the supposed power of settle- conferred on Miss Jane Smith. In regard to the first point I am of the on of the Lord Ordinary that the shares did not vest till the death of the ntrix. Though every case depends on its own circumstances I consider this case clearly falls within the principle of Young v. Robertson. Not is there postponement of the term of payment by the interposition of a nt, but there is a right of survivorship or destination over, and there is a r of distribution given to the testator's widow. None of these circumstances ecessarily conclusive, but the coincidence of all, and especially of the last, h renders the amount of each share altogether uncertain till the death of iferentrix, shews that vesting is postponed until the death of the liferentrix.

regard to the second question, notwithstanding a good deal of ambiguity in rust-deed, I am of opinion that no such power as is contended for was con- d on Miss Jane Smith of leaving by will the amount to which she would been entitled if she had survived the term of payment. It was maintained, e first place, that such a power was given, and, in the second place, that the of Miss Jane Smith, though not specifically bearing to be a settlement of hare, yet, referring as it does to her interest in the succession of her brother, be held to be a sufficient exercise of that power. Had the success of the iners' argument depended only on the second point I should have been osed to hold that if the power existed it was sufficiently exercised by im- ation. But I do not think that the words of the trust-deed which are said nfer the power warrant that conclusion. The words are,—"And the share y of my said nephews dying without issue, or of my said sisters who shall without settling the same, or shall predecease me, shall be divided among survivors and their issue as above provided, equally, share and share alike." w, the general context and syntax of the clause does not confer a power, but er refers to a power already existing. It is not immaterial to observe that re the testator intended to give a power of settlement which would not erwise have existed he has used distinct words to express his meaning. It pears to me that the meaning of the clause comes to this, "if either of my ters survives the term of vesting, but dies without a settlement, her share all go, not according to law, but by the terms of my settlement." It imposes striction, and does not confer a privilege. The testator intended to bring k to his general estate the share of either of his sisters who died without king a settlement.

On these grounds, I am of opinion that the fee did not vest till the death of liferentrix, and that no power of settling her share was conferred upon Miss e Smith if she predeceased the term of vesting. If this be the case, it is ceded that the appointment by Mrs Smith is good. I am therefore for ad- ing to the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary; and on the question whether apportionment of £20 to the representatives of Miss Jane Smith would have n illusory I indicate no opinion.

LORD COWAN.—I do not adopt all the observations of the Lord Ordinary, but ncur in the result to which he has come,—that the period of distribution s the death of the widow; and that, first, because there is no indication of any er period of vesting than the period of payment; secondly, because of the ver of apportionment given to the widow, which is an element of importance; l thirdly, because there is a provision over, and a taking by survivors under distribution, and until the widow's death it was impossible to know who uld, or who would not, have a share.

As to the other question, regarding the right of the sister to regulate the suc- sion to the share she would have been entitled to had she survived, I am of e to adjust the necessary interlocutor of ranking so as to exhaust the case, of course if any point should be found still to require discussion before the d Ordinary the parties can have a further opportunity of being heard."

---

No. 107.
May 29, 1873.
Smith's Trustees v. Graham and Others.

opinion that the words "dying without settling the same" did not confer on her such a right. If she had the power she undoubtedly exercised it, but I am clear that she never had it at all.

LORD BENHOLME.—I agree with the Lord Ordinary as to the period of vesting, and there only remains the question whether the division is bipartite or tripartite.

In order to bring in the question of an illusory apportionment it was necessary to make out that the division was tripartite, and that the third party had not got a substantial share, but as in my opinion the division was bipartite only we have no occasion to consider whether the distribution was illusory or not.

I will only say that the Courts in England had gone very far in carrying the question of illusory into the question of adequacy, so that almost every case of apportionment was brought into Court. This became a nuisance, and the remedy was the Act of Parliament which has been so often referred to.

In Scotland the Courts have never interfered. The decided cases shew that illusory may be pleaded, but there is no case in which it has been successfully pleaded. I do not think, however, that our Courts would ever, like the English Courts, merge the question of illusory into that of adequacy. It is altogether different. The question of illusory stands by itself. It consists in a fraud against the trust, making an apportionment which is altogether a mockery. But in the circumstances of this case that does not arise, for I am clearly of opinion that the division was bipartite only.

LORD NEAVES concurred.

THIS interlocutor was pronounced:—"Refuse the note, and adhere to the first finding of the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor: Find that the apportionment in question only takes effect between the children of Peter Graham and the children of William Graham, the other claimants having no interest therein: Find that the settlement in question did not confer power on Jane Smith to settle by will any part of the succession before the period of vesting; and therefore adhere also to the second finding of the said interlocutor: Find no expenses due since the date of the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor, and remit the cause to the Lord Ordinary to proceed further with the same."

JARDINE, STODART, & FRASERS, W.S.—DALMAHOY & COWAN, W.S.—A. & A. CAMPBELL, W.S.—JOHN GALLETLY, S.S.C.—A. J. NAPIER, W.S.—Agents.

No. 108.
May 30, 1873.
Mackintosh, &c. v. Ross.

AGNES STUART ROSS OR MACKINTOSH, Petitioner.—Sol.-Gen. Clark—Mackintosh.
MRS ANN ROSS OR ROBERTSON AND OTHERS, Petitioners.—Pattison—Thoms.
ANDREW GILDART REID, Petitioner.—Millar—Blair.
WILLIAM MUNRO ROSS, Petitioner.—Watson—Keir.

Succession—Heir of Line—Heir of Conquest—Entail.—A person purchased an estate, and entailed it upon himself and his heirs-male, and, after various substitutions, on his own heirs whatsoever. Held that, under the destination to his own heirs whatsoever, the heir of line was to be preferred to the heir of conquest.

Process—Jury Trial.—In general questions of pedigree are sent to trial by jury.

1ST DIVISION. Sheriff of Chancery. M.

IN 1790 William Ross of Shandwick executed an entail of certain lands, which he had purchased, "in favour of himself and the heirs-male lawfully to be procreated of his body, whom failing, to the lawful heirs-female of his body, the eldest daughter or heir-female always succeeding without division, whom failing, &c., whom all failing, such other heirs

No. 108.

May 30, 1873.
Mackintosh, &c. v. Ross.

l members of taillie as he should thereafter nominate and appoint by a ting under his hand at any time during his life, whom failing, his heirs l assignees whatsoever."

Mrs Christina Cockburn Ross, daughter of the entailer's niece, Mrs e Ross or Cockburn, the last substitute heir of entail, died on 16th y 1872, vest and seised in the said lands. The other branches of the ination being exhausted, the estate devolved upon the "heirs whatso- r" of the entailer.

he petitioners, Agnes Stuart Ross or Mackintosh, Ann Ross or Robert- , and Andrew Gildart Reid, claimed to be heirs of line of the iler. The petitioner, William Munro Ross, claimed as heir of con- st of the entailer.

he petitions were conjoined by the Sheriff of Chancery, and brought re the Court by Mrs Agnes Stuart Ross or Mackintosh by an appeal r the Titles to Land Consolidation Act, 1868, 31 and 32 Vict. c. 101.

he three other petitioners objected that William Munro Ross had no to appear, as the deed of entail did not call the heir of conquest, but heir of line. He had therefore no title to appear.[1]

he petitioner, William Munro Ross, answered that the estate being quest in the person of the entailer the person who succeeded under title of heir whatsoever was the heir of conquest, and not the heir of [2]

t advising,—

ORD PRESIDENT.—Mrs Christina Cockburn Ross died on 16th May 1872 vest and seized in the entailed estate of Shandwick, in the county of Ross. have before us four different sets of claimants to the succession of that e, each claiming to be served as heir of provision in special to the deceased Christina Cockburn Ross. Three of them ask to be served as heir of pro- n to Mrs Cockburn Ross, in respect of being the heir of line of the entailer. Mr Munro Ross, asks to be served as heir of provision to Mrs Cockburn in respect of being the heir of conquest of the entailer.

he question arises on the construction of the deed of entail executed by am Ross of Shandwick on 5th May 1790. There is no doubt that the e of Shandwick was conquest in his person. By the deed of entail he made stination in favour of himself and the heirs-male of his body, whom failing, he heirs-female of his body; then follow several substitutions in favour of es of his own; lastly, he calls his cousin, Captain David Ross, and the heirs- e of his body, whom all failing, such other heirs and members of taillie as he uld thereafter nominate and appoint by a writing under his hand at any time ng his life, whom failing, his heirs and assignees whatsoever. It is admitted Mrs Cockburn Ross was the last substitute heir of tailzie, the whole branches he destination being now exhausted, and that the estate has devolved upon heirs whatsoever of the entailer, there being no deed under which any one claim as assignee.

he question is, whether the words "heir whatsoever" signify heir of line or of conquest. If the heir of conquest be the party designated, then Mr o Ross, on proving his propinquity, is entitled to be served as heir of pro- n to Mrs Christina Cockburn Ross, and the petitions of the other claimants fall to be dismissed. If the heir of line is to be held as the person entitled served, Mr Munro Ross has no case, and his petition must be dismissed. of opinion that the question has been settled by authority, and the cases

---

[1] Boyd v. Boyd, June 28, 1774, M. 3070; Robison v. Robison, June 3, 1859, 905; Grant v. Shepherd, July 5, 1836, 14 S. 1096; Innes v. Kerr, June 807, M. App. voce Tailzie, No. 13.

[2] Miller v. Miller, Jan. 19, 1831, 7 W. & S. 1; Aitchison v. Aitchison, March 29, 7 S. 558.

No. 108.
May 30, 1873.
Mackintosh, &c. v. Ross.

of Boyd v. Boyd, Miller v. Miller, and Robison v. Robison establish a ge rule which is applicable to this case. No doubt all these cases were differe their circumstances. In the case of Boyd two subjects in dispute were in ditate jacente of John Boyd, as conquest in his person, one destined to his heirs and assignees, and the other to his father's heirs and assignees. The was held to go to John Boyd's heir of conquest, as the legal order of succe But as regards the second, the Court found that "in respect that the substi in said disposition is not in favour of his own heirs whatsoever, but in favo the heirs whatsoever of Mr Robert Boyd, his father, which might have different from the heirs whatsoever of the son, that the pursuer, as heir o to the father, was entitled to take as heir of provision called by said sub tion." This decision laid down the principle that where a destination o kind is to the heirs whatsoever of a third party, and where that third takes no right of fee, the construction is the heir of line, and not the conquest, even although the lands may have been conquest in the person disponer. In the case of Miller the property was held in trust for the p of being conveyed to William Miller and his heirs and assignees what William Miller predeceased the time at which the conveyance was to be and no right vested in him. The heir of line was preferred to the heir quest as the party designed by the term "heir whatsoever."

Neither of these cases is precisely on all-fours with the present. Here dealing with a case in which the disponer calls his own heirs whatsoeve case of Robison comes much nearer. Lands were disponed by a post contract to the longest liver of the spouses in liferent, and in fee to grandc the heirs of their bodies and their assignees, whom failing, one-half to th whatsoever of each of the spouses. One of the grandchildren having s the spouses, but having died in pupillarity, it was held, in a competition b the heir of line and the heir of conquest of the husband, that the heir must be preferred.

That case comes exceedingly near the present. A distinction between t of Robison and this has been pointed out by Mr Keir. In the case of R the conveyance was to the spouses in liferent and the grandchildren in fe failing grandchildren, to the heirs whatsoever of the respective spouses. was no conveyance of the fee either to the husband or wife. In the pres William Ross conveyed the estate in the first place to himself and the he of his body. The distinction in point of fact exists, but I am unable to difference in the law applicable to the case. I look upon the case of Rob a direct authority for the decision of the present case, and I am ther opinion that the petition of Mr Munro Ross should be dismissed.

LORD DEAS, LORD ARDMILLAN, and LORD JERVISWOODE concurred.

Andrew Gildart Reid moved that the case should not be tried b but a proof should be allowed before one of the Judges. It was that the proof would be chiefly documentary and of an intricate an cult character, and that a jury would be apt to go wrong.

At advising,—

LORD PRESIDENT.—This case does not differ from other cases of pe We are told that there is much documentary evidence, but so there is i cases of pedigree. It is said that there is a great deal of evidence to be abroad, but that does not appear to me to affect the question whether th should be tried by jury or not. I do not dispute that it would be con for us to send this case before the Lord Ordinary without a jury. I find of More,[1] 9th July 1870, in which proof was taken before one of the Ju the Second Division. The question is one of propriety and convenience. tainly the practice has been, except in a particular class of cases, to sen cases to a jury. We have all had experience of them, and I do not thin tribunal has been found unsuitable. I quite understand that cases like the No. 108.

[1] 7 S. L. R. 623.

dalbane case[1] and Livingstone v. Fenton,[2] would be unsuitable to send to a ; from the peculiar nature of the questions which they involved. But this May 30, 1873.
mply a question of propinquity, and I do not see that the fact of there being Mackintosh, &c. v. Ross.
several issues to be sent to the jury ought to create any inconvenience.

ND DEAS.—The great advantage of trial by jury is, that the verdict fixes matter of fact which otherwise would be open to controversy in this Court in the House of Lords. This is a question of pedigree, and consequently a tion of fact, and I think we ought to follow the ordinary practice, which seen to send such cases to a jury, and from which practice it is not alleged any miscarriage or inconvenience has arisen.

e other Judges concurred.

THE COURT dismissed the petition of W. M. Ross, and appointed the other petitioners to lodge issues.

& A. INGLIS, W.S.—GEORGE WILSON, S.S.C.—HUNTER, BLAIR, & COWAN, W.S.—STUART & CHEYNE, W.S.—Agents.

JOHN SMITH (Robertsons' Factor) and MISS ISABELLA CAMPBELL, Petitioners.— Watson—Readman. No. 109.

May 30, 1873.
Smith and Campbell.

imentary Provision — Discharge — Judicial Factor— Trust. — By trust-ment an annuity was directed to be paid, and was declared to be alimennd "not assignable for causes onerous or gratuitous, and not subject to ment or other legal diligence, and not subject to the debts or deeds" of onee. A judicial factor, who was appointed on failure of the trustees, car-out all the purposes of the trust except two. These were payment of the ity and handing over the estate to the residuary legatee. The judicial fache annuitant, and the residuary legatee came to an agreement that the uary legatee should grant a personal bond for payment of the annuity to nnuitant, who was to grant a discharge to the judicial factor, and that the estate should be wound up and the residue paid over to the residuary ee. The judicial factor presented a petition praying for exoneration and arge on this arrangement being carried out. Held that the annuitant had ower to grant a discharge of the alimentary provision, and petition refused.

1ST DIVISION. Lord Shand. B.

)HN SMITH, judicial factor on the trust-estate of the late Misses rtson, presented a petition, with concurrence of Miss Isabella Campthe residuary legatee on that estate, praying the Court for authority to e up a title to certain heritable subjects, and to convey the trust-estate iss Isabella Campbell, and upon that being done that the petitioner, as r, should be discharged. The petition set forth,—By trust-disposition settlement, dated 2d December 1848, Misses Mary Robertson, Eliza-Robertson, and John Robertson, Largs, gave, granted, assigned, and ned to themselves, and the survivors of them, their whole estate, able and moveable; and, on the death of the survivor of them, they by disponed, assigned, and conveyed to Mungo Campbell, Esq., r, merchant in Glasgow, and various other persons therein named, either predeceased the survivor of the testators (the said Miss John rtson) or declined to accept and act, as trustees, for executing the thereby created, the whole heritable and moveable, real and personal e which might belong to them, or either of them, at the time of the h of the survivor of them, in trust for the purposes therein written, payment of certain annuities and legacies; and, lastly, the trustees thereby directed and appointed, after fulfilment of the other pur-

[1] June 26, 1866, ante, vol. iv. 867. [2] Nov. 25, 1853, 16 D. 104.

No. 109.

May 30, 1873.
Smith and Campbell.

poses of the trust, to dispone, assign, pay, and make over to M Campbell, merchant in Glasgow, and his heirs, the residue and rem of their means and estate, whether heritable or moveable.

Miss John Robertson, who was the last survivor of the said testators, died on or about 16th January 1861, and the trust creat the trust-disposition and settlement and codicils then came into tion. Of the trustees named in the trust-disposition the only on accepted office and intromitted with the trust means and estat Mungo Campbell junior, who in the course of his management pai handed over to the beneficiaries legacies and bequests to the amoun value of £5000 or thereby. Mr Campbell, the residuary legatee, ceased Miss John Robertson. The concurring petitioner, Miss Is Anne Hay Janet Campbell, was his only surviving child and hei thus the party entitled to the residue and remainder of the trust-e Mr Mungo Campbell junior, the only accepting trustee, having di 20th December 1866, the Court, upon a petition presented by the curring petitioner, Miss Campbell, on 25th March 1867, appointed the tioner, John Smith, to be judicial factor upon the trust-estate of M Robertson. The purposes of the trust, so far as unfulfilled, consist (1) the payment of an annuity of £100 to Miss Helen Campbell; (2 payment of the annual interest of £500 to Miss Helen Campbell yearly during her lifetime, and upon her death the payment of the cipal sum to the concurring petitioner, Miss Isabella Anne Hay Campbell; and, lastly, the payment to the said petitioner of the residue and remainder of the estate. These sums were payable und following clauses in Misses Robertson's trust-settlement :—

"Fourthly, for payment of an annuity to the said Helen Campb £100 during her lifetime, commencing the first half-yearly paym the first term of Whitsunday or Martinmas after the death of the vivor of us for the half year preceding, and so forth half-yearly termly thereafter during her lifetime. Fifthly, for payment to th Helen Campbell of . . . . and the annual interest of a sum of £5 the event of her brother, the said Mungo Campbell, predeceasing (an event which happened), "payable at the first term of Whitsund Martinmas occurring six months after the death of the survivor o . . . . and continuing the payment of the said interest of £500 yearly and termly during her lifetime; . . . . and we direct and ap our said trustees or trustee to set apart or lend out, upon heritable or sonal, or such other security as to them or him may appear satisfac such sum or sums out of our means and estate as will yield to the Helen Campbell the foresaid annuity of £100, ... and to take rights and title-deeds of the said securities in name of the said truste trustee, themselves or himself, in trust for payment of the said a ties, during their respective lives, of the said Helen Campbell, ... thereafter for payment of the principal sums so secured to the Mungo Campbell and his heirs and successors in fee: Declaring al that the trustees or trustee shall have power, if they see fit and required by the said Mungo Campbell, to purchase from any respon life assurance company annuities of the foresaid amounts in favo the said Helen Campbell, ... instead of investing a sum to yield said amount as above; and we further direct and appoint our truste set apart . . . . £500 in liferent for her (Helen Campbell's) use allen . . . . And it is hereby specially declared that the said annuities of to the said Helen Campbell, ... and the said contingent lif interests in the sum of £500 provided to the said Helen Campbell all purely alimentary provisions in favour of the said Helen Cam

No. 109.

May 30, 1873.
Smith and Campbell.

. . and not assignable for causes onerous and gratuitous, and not sub- to arrestment or other legal diligence of the creditors of any of them, l not affectable by the debts or deeds of any of them."

By discharge, dated 9th November 1872, Miss Helen Campbell exonered, mitted, and discharged the judicial factor, and the estate of the Misses bertson, of the annuity of £100, and of her right during her lifetime to annual interest of the sum of £500, and of all other claims and demands petent at her instance against the judicial factor. The discharge pro- ded on the following narrative:—"And further considering that all purposes of the said trust-disposition and settlement have now been filled, excepting the payment of the foresaid annuity of £100, and the erest of the said sum of £500, to me, and the payment of the residue the said Isabella Anne Hay Janet Campbell; that the said judicial tor has expressed a desire that the trust be now closed and himself and trust-estate finally discharged, and that for that purpose, instead of chasing an annuity from a life assurance company, or of a certain sum money being set apart and invested in the name of the said judicial tor to meet my foresaid annuity and the interest on the said sum of 00, it has been arranged between the said judicial factor, the said bella Anne Hay Janet Campbell, and myself, that the said sum of 00, and the whole residue of the said trust-estate, be now disponed and l over to the said Isabella Anne Hay Janet Campbell, as legatee and duary legatee foresaid; that she should grant in my favour a per- al bond of annuity for the sum of £125, consisting of the foresaid uity of £100 and £25, the agreed on fixed sum at the rate of 5 per t as the interest of the said sum of £500; and that I should discharge said trust-estate of the said annuity and interest, and the said judicial tor thereof, and of all the obligations thereanent contained in the said t-disposition and settlement."

A personal bond was accordingly executed by the residuary legatee, aining, inter alia, a declaration in similar terms to the trust-deed that annuity should be strictly alimentary, &c.

The petitioner further stated,—"As the whole purposes of the trust ted by the said trust-disposition and settlement by the said Misses rtson, and codicils thereto, have now been satisfied or discharged, the exception, as before-mentioned, of the payment to the concurring ioner, Miss Campbell, of the sum of £500 liferented by the said Miss n Campbell, and of the whole residue and remainder of the estate, it been arranged between the petitioner, John Smith, as judicial factor said, and the concurring petitioner, Miss Campbell, that the factor close the factory by completing a title to the said property at . . . . and conveying and paying over the same, and the residue remainder of the estate, to the concurring petitioner, Miss Campbell, tisfaction of her claim to the said sum of £500 liferented by the Miss Helen Campbell, and to the residue and remainder of the e, and that on his doing so he shall be discharged of his office."

The Lord Ordinary pronounced an interlocutor by which he authorised ctor to complete a title to the heritable and moveable estate, and, e disposing of the prayer of the petition remitted to Mr Ralph Dun- W.S., to inquire into the facts, and to Mr William Ross, C.A., to ire into the petitioner's accounts.

Mr Dundas gave a detailed report on the trust-estate, and concluded port as follows:—"Subject to these observations, and if your Lord- shall be of opinion that the bond of annuity granted in favour of n Campbell by the residuary legatee is a sufficient substitute for the ection of the trust, the reporter begs to report to your Lordship that, in his opinion, the whole prior purposes of the trust have been fu and the concurring petitioner, Miss Campbell, is the proper per have the whole residue made over to her, and that there appears to reason why that should not be done now, and the trust at once and the bond of caution delivered up in the event of the judicial accounts being found correct."

No. 109.

May 30, 1873. Smith and Campbell.

Thereafter the Lord Ordinary pronounced this interlocutor:— Lord Ordinary having resumed consideration of the petition and pr ings, with the report by Mr Ralph Dundas, W.S., on the petitione plication for authority to the petitioner, John Smith, as judicial foresaid, in terms of the second branch of the prayer of the petit convey to the concurring petitioner, Isabella Anne Hay Janet Ca the whole residue of the trust-estate, and thereupon, in terms of th branch of the prayer of the petition, for discharge of the petitioner Smith, as judicial factor foresaid, of his whole intromissions and m ment, and for an order for delivery to him of the bond of caution g by him and his cautioner, refuses the application for authority fo and for discharge, and dismisses the petition, and decerns." *

* "NOTE.—The Lord Ordinary, by interlocutor of 23d December last, g authority to the petitioner, Mr Smith, as judicial factor, to complete titles person to the various heritable subjects belonging to the trust-estate of th Misses Mary, Elizabeth, and John Robertson, on which estate the petitio March 1867 was appointed judicial factor after the death of Mr Mungo bell junior, the only trustee who accepted of the trust created by the tru position and settlement of the late Misses Robertson; and at the same before disposing of the prayer of the petition otherwise, remitted to Mr Dundas, W.S., to inquire into the facts and to report, and to Mr William C.A., Edinburgh, to report as to the petitioner's accounts with a view to h taining a judicial discharge.

"The petitioner has not proceeded with the remit to Mr Ross, but a by Mr Dundas has been lodged, by which, with reference to the position trust-estate, the question is raised whether the petitioner, Mr Smith, i position in which he is entitled now to wind up the estate finally as pro and is thereupon entitled to be discharged of his whole actings and int sions. The Lord Ordinary, after having made avizandum with Mr Dund port, intimated to the petitioner his opinion that the application could n granted in the present state of the trust, and thereafter, at the petitione quest, heard counsel in support of the application. Farther consideration application has, however, confirmed the Lord Ordinary in his original vie he has therefore refused the application.

"The purposes of the trust created by the trust-disposition and sett have all been executed with the exception of the payment and conveyance residue, and the payment of an annuity of £100, and the interest of a f sum of £500, to Miss Helen Campbell, who is still in life, and which th tees were directed to pay to her during her lifetime.

"The residue of the trust-estate was appointed to be paid and conveyed fulfilment of the other purposes of the trust' (which included the paym debts and various legacies and annuities) to Mungo Campbell, the nephew trusters, and his heirs. The concurring petitioner, Miss Isabella Anne Janet Campbell, the surviving child of Mr Mungo Campbell, the residuary tee, who predeceased the trusters, has right to the residue of the trust and, subject to the observation made by Mr Dundas in his report as to h taining service and confirmation to her late brother, she would be entitl payment and conveyance of the whole residue of the trust-estate, if the purposes had been entirely fulfilled.

"The provisions in favour of Miss Helen Campbell are contained in the and fifth purposes of the trust, and are thus expressed:—'Fourthly, for pa of an annuity to the said Helen Campbell of £100 during her lifetime

No. 109.

May 30, 1873.
Smith and Campbell.

The petitioner reclaimed, and argued;—The beneficiaries are entitled to enter into the arrangement they propose. All the cases where the Courts

mencing the first half-yearly payment at the first term of Whitsunday or Martinmas after the death of the survivor of us, for the half year preceding, and so th half-yearly and termly thereafter during her lifetime. Fifthly, for payment the said Helen Campbell of a further legacy of £500, and the annual interest the further sum of £500 in the event of her brother, the said Mungo Campll, predeceasing her, payable at the first term of Whitsunday or Martinmas occurg six months after the death of the survivor of us, if he should predecease us, d failing his predeceasing us, at the first term of Whitsunday or Martinmas occurg six months after his death, and continuing the payment of the said interest £500 half-yearly and termly during her lifetime.' On the death of the ther, Mungo Campbell, Miss Helen Campbell received payment of the legacy £500 mentioned in the fifth purpose of the trust, and became entitled to the erest half-yearly of the further sum of £500 there mentioned. The deed ther contains directions to pay annuities of £80 each to Elizabeth and therine Munro, and a direction and appointment to the trustees to set apart d lend out, upon heritable, or personal, or such other security as to them may pear satisfactory, such sum or sums as will yield to the different annuitants e amounts of their annuities, and to take the rights and title-deeds of the secuies in name of the trustees, in trust for payment of the annuities during the pective lives of the annuitants, and thereafter for payment of the principal es to Mr Mungo Campbell and his heirs and successors in fee: Declaring t the trustees should have power, if they saw fit and were required by Mr mpbell, to purchase from any responsible life assurance company annuities of foresaid amounts in favour of Miss Helen Campbell and the other annuitants ve named, or any of them, 'instead of investing a sum to yield the said unt as above.' There is a similar provision in the deed for setting apart a m of £1000, and lending and securing the same in name of the trustees, for yment, inter alia, of the liferent interest of £500 which now subsists in favour Miss Campbell.

"The deed further contains this important clause,—'And it is hereby specially ared that the said annuities of £100 to the said Helen Campbell, and of £80 h to the said Elizabeth and Catherine Munro, and the said contingent life-t interest in the sum of £500 provided to the said Helen Campbell, are all ely alimentary provisions in favour of the said Helen Campbell and Elizah and Catherine Munro respectively, and not assignable for causes, onerous or ituitous, and not subject to arrestment or other legal diligence of the creditors y of them, and not affectable by the debts or deeds of any of them.'

"The petitioner and concurring petitioner have produced with the applica a discharge by Miss Helen Campbell, dated 9th November 1872, by which, the narrative, inter alia, that she had obtained a personal bond by the conring petitioner, Miss Isabella Anne Hay Janet Campbell, in her favour for annuity of £125, she has discharged the judicial factor and the trust-estate the foresaid annuity of £100, and of her right to the interest or liferent of said sum of £500. With reference to this discharge, it is stated in the peti that the whole purposes of the trust have now been satisfied or discharged, epting the conveyance of the residue, and that it has been arranged between petitioner, and the concurring petitioner, Miss Campbell, that the factor shall the factory, convey the residue of the estate to the concurring petitioner, l be discharged of his office,—and the authority of the Court is asked for carg out this arrangement, to be followed by a judicial discharge of the whole ings of the judicial factor.

"The Lord Ordinary is of opinion that the arrangement which the Court is ed to sanction is in violation of the trust, and cannot be granted. The Court not asked to approve of any security being granted for the payment of Miss len Campbell's annuity. But even if an appication for such approval had n presented the Lord Ordinary is of opinion, notwithstanding the general wer conferred on the trustees to lend out the necessary sum 'upon heritable

No. 109.

May 30, 1873. Smith and Campbell.

have held that such an arrangemont was illegal have been questions between husband and wife, and the ratio decidendi was that the wife's interest must be protected. A testator who leaves an alimentary provision to a person whom he is under no obligation to aliment cannot prevent the annuitant from refusing the gift. The proposed arrangement is a reasonable one, and should be sanctioned by the Court. The trustees would have been able to make such an arrangement with the concurrence of the beneficiaries, and the judicial factor has the same power. The testators shewed that they contemplated that the trust should be brought to an end before Miss Campbell's death, by allowing the trustees to purchase an annuity for her.[1]

At advising,—

LORD PRESIDENT.—The petitioner, John Smith, is judicial factor upon the trust-estate of three old ladies, who died some time ago leaving considerable means. The person who concurs in the petition is Miss Isabella Campbell, the residuary legatee, and also a special legatee to a considerable extent. The condition of the estate is such that the only other beneficial interest now remaining is that of a certain annuitant, Miss Helen Campbell, who is entitled to an annuity of £100 a-year out of the estate, and to the annual interest of a sum of £500. What the petitioner proposes to do is to wind up the trust after making or personal, or such other security as to them may appear satisfactory,' that the Court would not authorise a judicial officer to accept of a mere personal obligation by the residuary legatee as a satisfactory security.

---

"The position maintained by the judicial factor and the residuary legatee that Miss Helen Campbell might have discharged her rights, if she had thought fit, gratuitously, and that her rights under the deed have been validly and effectually discharged by an arrangement satisfactory to her, so that nothing remains to be done except to dispose of the whole residue, as directed by the trust-deed. Had the case been one of a fee burdened by a simple liferent the view thus maintained would have been unquestionably sound, but if the arrangement founded on is to receive effect the important clause of the trust-deed last quoted, by which the provisions in favour of Miss Helen Campbell are declared to be purely alimentary, not assignable for causes onerous or gratuitous, nor subject to arrestment or other legal diligence, and not affectable by her debts or deeds, will be simply treated as of no effect whatever. Under this clause it appears to be obvious that an assignation by Miss Helen Campbell of her right to the annuity would be ineffectual, but a discharge in favour of the residuary legatee is just an assignation to her of the annuitant's right, and is in the opinion of the Lord Ordinary one of the deeds by which it is declared in terms that the right to the annuity shall not be affectable.

"It was pleaded for the petitioners that Miss Helen Campbell might decline to receive her annuity from time to time if she thought fit, and that in the same way she must be entitled to renounce the right itself; but the Lord Ordinary is of opinion that the right to discharge the provision entirely does not result from the power, which no doubt the annuitant has, to refuse to take each half-yearly payment as it falls due.

"The application, so far as the Lord Ordinary is aware, is novel. It is not said that any precedent at present exists in the law for the discharge of alimentary rights granted as in the present case, and if the present application were successful it appears to the Lord Ordinary that serious and important results might follow in the case of many existing trusts. The authorities appear to the Lord Ordinary to be against the contention of the petitioners—Rennie v. Ritchie, 25th April 1845, H. of L., 4 Bell's App. 221; Balderstone v. Fulton, 23d January 1857, 19 D. 293; Martin v. Bannatyne, &c., 8th March 1861, 23 D. 705.

[1] Paterson v. Paterson, Jan. 26, 1849, 11 D. 441; Lewis v. Australian, June 11, 1852, 14 D. 857, Dec. 15, 1852, 15 D. 260; Ramsay's Trustees v. Ramsay, Nov. 24, 1871, ante, vol. x. 120.

No. 109.

May 30, 1873.
Smith and Campbell.

for payment of these annuities. The provision which he proposes to that Miss Helen Campbell shall grant a discharge to the judicial factor, Miss Isabella Campbell shall grant a bond of annuity in favour of Miss umpbell, proceeding on the provision which the trusters made in her . the trust-settlement. Now, if this had been a simple annuity, and the security of Miss Isabella Campbell had been sufficient, there might n no legal objection to the arrangement. But the annuity provided in ment is of a peculiar kind, and it is necessary to see if the proposed ent is not in violation of the intention of the trusters. The settlement in the 4th head—(Reads 4th head of settlement). Then there is the . of £500—(Reads 5th head of settlement). Then there is the provi- if the trustees see fit they are to purchase an annuity. And, lastly, special declaration that the annuities are purely alimentary provisions, t assignable for causes onerous or gratuitous, and not subject to arrest- other legal diligence of the creditors of any of them, and not affectable lebts or deeds of any of them." In short, by this clause both the f £100 and the life interest in the £500 are declared to be alimentary ost stringent terms. This indicates a most serious desire on the part of ers that Miss Helen Campbell should be restricted during her lifetime nentary provision, and we must take care that she should not be liber- this restriction. It was suggested that, as the trustees have power to an annuity from an insurance company, it is to be inferred that the lid not intend that the trust should be kept up for ever. But if the ad exercised this power they would have been bound to take the an- der the same restraint as in the trust-deed. But even if the judicial d the same power of purchasing an annuity as the trustees he could ise that power now. The trustees were not authorised to purchase the unless called upon by Mr Campbell, and he is now dead; so that there ver in the deed to authorise the purchase of an annuity.

ubt the bond of annuity repeats the alimentary clause of the trust- t, and that clause might be effectual. But the bond of annuity does the same security as the existence of the trust. The existence of the not be put an end to except by the carrying out the purposes, and so he annuity remains payable the trust must subsist. But what security that the bond may not be cancelled, and the whole provision made in- ? I think that it would be a violation of the trust purposes to put it ower of these two ladies to dispense with the provision. I therefore t the Lord Ordinary is right in refusing to sanction this arrangement.

DEAS.—The testators in this case were three old ladies, who conveyed ite to trustees to be distributed in a certain way, to take effect on the the last survivor of them. Among these purposes was a direction to cified annuity to Miss Helen Campbell during her life, with a certain t addition, which, for brevity, may be conveniently included in the erm annuity, specially declared to be a purely alimentary provision, ignable for causes onerous or gratuitous, and not subject to arrestment legal diligence" of her creditors, and not affectable by the annuitant's leeds. Then there is an express direction that the trustees shall lend out t capital sum on heritable, or personal, or other satisfactory security, and he rights and securities thereof in their own names, as trustees, for pay- the annuity, and thereafter for payment of the principal sum to Mr ampbell, the residuary legatee, and his heirs and successors in fee, with ative power that, if required by Mr Campbell, they might purchase an f corresponding amount from any responsible life assurance company. these conditions are perfectly clear and explicit. The question, there- es to be, whether, when a testator makes a gratuitous provision in this a legatee, the conditions on which alone the provision is given can be by the legatee with consent of the person on whom the testator has con- s ultimate residuary interest?

uction a view of that kind would, I think, be inconsistent with prin-

No. 109.
May 30, 1873.
Smith and Campbell.

ciples recognised in our law and practice from the earliest period,—nam that the donor may attach to his gratuitous legacy any lawful cond thinks proper; and, second, that it is a lawful condition to restrict th of the legatee in the way which has been done here for the benefit of th himself or herself as the case may be.

The legacy must be taken under the condition on which it is given, or altogether. It is for the interest of the party intended to be favoured should be so, for if the law were understood to be otherwise the lega very often not be given at all. To a prodigal son, for instance, a fath feel it better to leave nothing than to bequeath what he knew would in riot and dissipation.

In many other cases the principle is equally advantageous, and it is f recognised by conveyancers, and carried out in our practice. A child n weak intellect and easily imposed upon, although neither addicted to prodigality, and consequently liable to be reduced to poverty in the ab any such restriction. A married woman may be known to have a v husband, on whom, from blind affection, she would be likely to beste thing which had been left to her from personal regard for herself. In t many other cases parties may require to be protected against themselv the law cannot practically ascertain and discriminate between the p circumstances of each case, and consequently the rule must be general t conditions shall be recognised as lawful, and receive effect wherever conceived in the appropriate form.

This has been done here by the instrumentality of a trust. I am pared to say that, as in a question with creditors, it could be done in a way. The trustees are directed to keep up that trust. It is now pro substitute for the trust a personal bond of annuity by the representativ residuary legatee, deceased, which the reporter, Mr Dundas, states he l and that it embodies all the alimentary clauses contained in the tr
Upon the narrative of an arrangement that some such bond should be Miss Campbell has executed an extrajudicial discharge of the trust in f the judicial factor. That discharge bears that all this had been done a sire of the judicial factor. If that narrative be correct the judicial fa misapprehended his duty, and he has at all events proceeded adventu obtaining these deeds without first coming to the Court for authority t them, which would have been the proper course even if the truste have had a discretionary power to obtain them, which they would n trust-deed is not printed, and its terms are not fully and satisfactorily s in the petition. But on attending to them it is clear that even the would not have been entitled to substitute a personal bond by the r legatee for the deeds of security in favour of themselves prescribed by th deed, and we cannot authorise a judicial factor to exercise discretionary which the truster did not confer on the trustees appointed by himself.
over, I am by no means satisfied that the purpose which the truster view would be equally secured by a bond in the proposed terms in favou annuitant. On the contrary, I am disposed to concur with the observa the reporter on this point, and to hold that if the prayer of this petiti granted the truster's purpose might be altogether defeated, which just ab danger of taking away the protection which the truster himself wisely pr

LORD ARDMILLAN and LORD JERVISWOODE concurred.

THE COURT pronounced this interlocutor:—"Adhere to the locutor, except in so far as it 'dismisses the petition, and d Recall that part of the interlocutor, and remit to the Lor uary to consider whether any and what part of the trus may now be conveyed or made over to Miss Isabella C the residuary beneficiary, consistently with maintaining the a security for the alimentary provisions in favour of Mis Campbell."

C. & A. S. DOUGLAS, W.S.—Agents.

No. 110.

June 3, 1873.
Girdwood v. Paterson.

ROBERT GIRDWOOD, Pursuer.—Sol.-Gen. Clark—Balfour.
RGE PATERSON and ELIZABETH PATERSON, Defenders.—Marshall —Mair.

erty—Boundary—Proof of Possession—Condition—Singular Successor.

858 the owners of a shop, who were tenants of the sunk flat below, d, from the owner of the sunk flat, permission to enlarge their shop win- lowering the sill, whereby the window of the sunk flat was diminished on condition that on demand the latter window should be restored to its state. The owners of the shop sold their property in 1867.

n action raised against the purchaser by the owner of the sunk flat to s window restored to its former condition, held that the purchaser's right extend beyond the boundary of his property, and that as the titles of jects did not define the boundary between the flats, it fell to be deter- by the possession of the defenders' authors under their title as proprietors hop.

1ST DIVISION. Ld. Ormidale. B.

present action was raised by Robert Girdwood, proprietor of a at in Bank Street, Edinburgh, concluding that the defenders, G. and rson, proprietors of the shop above, should be ordained to restore dow of the said flat to the size, height, and level in which it was year 1858, when the pursuer permitted D. & P. Mackinlay, then tors of the shop and tenants of the sunk flat, to alter the window hop by lowering its sill and enlarging it so as to encroach on the r of the pursuer's premises, &c.

following narrative is taken from the note of the Lord Ordinary :— roperty both of the pursuer and of the defenders forms part of mer tenement fronting the Lawnmarket and Bank Street, Edin- erected by Andrew Irving. The defenders' property consists of the nd back shop No. 1 Bank Street, which was conveyed by the rates and Town Council, and Andrew Irving, to George Strachan,), and which has been transmitted to the defenders by a regular s of titles. The pursuer's property consists of the shop No. 2 Bank and also of the dwelling-house or tavern, with cellarage and nts forming the ground flat or sunk storey situated under the f the said tenement, with certain exceptions, and entering from ay's or Morocco Close. The pursuer acquired these subjects in In 1858 Peter Mackinlay, a partner of the firm of D. & P. Mac- general drapers and outfitters, was proprietor of the shop No. 1 treet, and the firm of D. & P. Mackinlay were tenants of the said o. 1 Bank Street, and also of the pursuer's shop No. 2 Bank Street, und flat or sunk storey, under a lease for ten years from Whit- 1858. The level of Bank Street had been lowered by the Im- ent Commissioners, and the window of the shop No. 1 Bank Street ; well suited to show off shop goods. But it could not be lowered arged without encroaching upon the window of the room in the 's ground flat, which was situated immediately below the shop r. This window, as is proved, was originally constructed in the all of the tenement, which is two feet six inches or thereby thick, the top thereof was fifteen inches or thereby above the level of r of the shop No. 1 Bank Street. In these circumstances the firm P. Mackinlay applied in 1858 to the pursuer, their landlord, for nission to encroach upon his window and room in the ground flat, they might enlarge the window of the shop No. 1 Bank Street, ng it nearer the level of the street. The pursuer consented there- the condition, as is clearly proved, that his window should be to its original height and position in the front wall of the tenement whenever he should require this to be done. Upon this condition the firm of D. & P. Mackinlay enlarged the window of their shop No. 1 Bank Street, by taking fifteen inches off the height of the pursuer's window, and extending their shop window downwards so as to include within their shop window the said fifteen inches, and the space behind the same, which was part of the pursuer's ground flat.

No. 110.

June 8, 1873. Girdwood v. Paterson.

"In the year 1864 Messrs D. & P. Mackinlay proposed to the pursuer that Mr Stark, ironmonger, should become the tenant of his shop and ground flat. To this the pursuer consented, and an agreement was entered into, which was signed by D. & P. Mackinlay, whereby it was provided 'that if necessary Mr Stark must give every facility to Messrs Girdwood and Mackinlay to alter the window of No. 1 Bank Street when required.' A lease of the said subjects for ten years from Whitsunday 1865 was thereupon granted by the pursuer to Mr Stark, in which a similar provision was inserted.

"Thereafter in 1867 the pursuer raised an action against the firm of D. & P. Mackinlay, and against Peter Mackinlay, for the purpose of obtaining decree ordaining them to restore his window to its former height and position, and interdicting Peter Mackinlay as proprietor of the shop No. 1 Bank Street from selling or disponing the same until the pursuer's window should be restored. Inhibition was raised on the dependence of this action, which was executed on 3d and recorded on 17th May 1867. The pursuer obtained decree in absence in this action on 24th February 1871. On 25th February 1867 the defenders' predecessor, John Stevenson, purchased the shop No. 1 Bank Street, conform to missives of sale interchanged by him and Peter Mackinlay of that date, and his title was completed by disposition dated 31st May, which, with warrant of registration, was recorded in the Burgh Register of Sasines on 30th September 1867. The defenders purchased and acquired the said shop from Stevenson, conform to disposition, dated 13th and recorded in the Burgh Register of Sasines on 20th May 1870." There was no mention of the obligation in favour of the pursuer in either of the dispositions or on the records.

The pursuer pleaded;—(1) The permission given by the pursuer to make the alterations on the window of the shop No. 1 Bank Street, and thereby to encroach upon and take a portion of the pursuer's window having been given on the condition and understanding that the pursuer's window was to be restored to its original height or level whenever the pursuer required it, and the defenders having refused to restore it, the pursuer is entitled to decree in terms of the first conclusion of the summons.

The defenders pleaded;—(3) It is incompetent for the pursuer to prove excepting by writ, that any part of the shop No. 1 Bank Street, as now possessed by the defenders or their tenants, is the property of the pursuer. (4) The pursuer cannot prove, excepting by writ or by the defenders' oath, the agreement which he avers to have been made to restore the window to its alleged original level. (5) Assuming the agreement in question to be set forth in the letter of D. & P. Mackinlay,* quoted in article 5 of the condescendence, the only claim competent to the pursuer is one for "reasonable compensation" against the sequestrated estates of D. & P. Mackinlay and the said Peter Mackinlay. (6) The action of April and

* "29th August 1865.—Dear Sir,—In reference to the window of our shop No. 1 Bank Street, the window of which you permitted us to lower, taking a portion from the window of your premises beneath, we of course agreeing, when you required us, to raise it to the original level, or a reasonable compensation.—We are, dear sir, yours respectfully, D. & P. MACKINLAY."

ibition of May 1867 have no bearing upon the acquisition of Mr Stevenson, in respect that his purchase thereof was com- 5th February 1867. Separatim, the inhibition became ineffect that no decree was obtained in terms of the conclusions of Further, it was an inappropriate diligence, quoad the ad standum and interdict conclusions said to have been contained nons. (7) The pursuer having permitted the defenders' authors nd occupy said shop in such manner as to lead the public and ers to believe that their right of property was co-extensive possession, and the defenders having in said belief (which was icted by the titles), purchased and paid for the said shop, the arred from insisting in the present action against them.

s of both properties contained no description of the boundary em, and no reference to the obligation to restore the window.

. Ordinary, after a proof, pronounced an interlocutor finding— n the year 1858 the pursuer was proprietor of the shop No. 2 t, Edinburgh, and of the ground flat or sunk storey of the tenening from Galloway's or Morocco Close, with certain exceptions, ester Mackinlay, a partner of the firm of D. & P. Mackinlay, . outfitters, was proprietor of the shop No. 1 Bank Street, confront and back shop; (2) That the said firm of D. & P. Mac- tenants, in 1858, of the whole foresaid subjects, their lease of r's subjects being for ten years from Whitsunday 1858; (3) ursuer consented, in or about the year 1858, to the alteration firm of D. & P. Mackinlay upon the window of the room in flat or sunk storey, which is situated below the shop No. 1 t, Edinburgh, which now belongs to the defenders, upon the at the said window should be restored by the said D. & P. Macs original size and position in the front wall of the tenement e should require this to be done; (4) That the said alteration l immediately, or soon thereafter, upon the said condition, for of enlarging the window of the shop No. 1 Bank Street; and executing the said alteration fifteen inches were taken from he pursuer's said window, and that the window of the shop Street was proportionally enlarged: Finds that Peter Macof the partners of the said firm, and proprietor of the shop Street, never acquired any right as heritable proprietor to the he pursuer's foresaid window and ground flat or sunk storey, nder the foresaid agreement and condition been encroached e purpose of enlarging the window of the said shop, and that rs, as the singular successors of the said Peter Mackinlay red right thereto: Finds that the pursuer is entitled to have of his ground flat or sunk storey altered and restored to the , and level in the front wall of the tenement in which it was, the year 1858, previous to the foresaid alteration, and derves consideration of the question whether the said restoration nade at the expense of the pursuer, or at the expense of the nd appoints the cause to be put to the roll, with a view to edure." *

(After the narrative above given the Lord Ordinary's note pro-:—"Such being, as the Lord Ordinary conceives, the facts estabe proof, he is of opinion that the pursuer is entitled to have the is room below the defenders' shop restored to its former size and he front wall of the tenement. Neither Peter Mackinlay nor the his successors ever acquired right to that portion of the pursuer's

No. 110.

June 3, 1873. Girdwood v. Paterson.

The defenders reclaimed;—There was no direct authority question of this kind as to the boundary between an upper a tenement. We must look at the position of the parties at the ti conveyance by Stevenson to the defenders; and that dispositio the subjects as described in the disposition by P. Mackinlay to that described them as possessed by Mackinlay's firm. T nothing in Girdwood's title to shew that he ever had a right to in question.

At advising,—

Lord President.—The interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary gives a exhaustive account of the facts of the case, and I am of opinion tha inference his Lordship has drawn from the facts is a correct one. assumed from the circumstances before us that the arrangement betwe suer and the Mackinlays in 1858 was entered into for the purpose light to the shop. That was more necessary then than afterwards, level of Bank Street had been lowered in consequence of the operati Improvement Commissioners. There is distinct evidence that in 1858 tion was made by the Mackinlays when they were occupants of both and the sunk floors. This could only have been done with the cons proprietors of both. We have evidence that it was done with such co that a very natural condition was added, viz., that whenever the pursue the window in his premises should be restored to its former size, l level. Now, it is said that the defenders, as singular successors, are by that arrangement. Certainly that is so; but that is not the f question before us. The question is whether that part of the buil which the alteration was made is the property of the pursuer or of the If the titles settle that question we can look no further. But then t settle that. They only tell the length and breadth superficially, an former possession. It might be said that we do not require to have t dary—the boundary between the upper and lower floors—set forth, b joists are there the natural boundary. Here, however, there is n boundary, because the property of the lower proprietor now exte inches above that natural boundary, and formerly extended above it t extent. The boundary, therefore, is undefined, and where a necessity determining such a boundary I know of no mode of doing so except b possession. The question turns into a case of disputed boundary, j march fence had been removed. That being so, I am of opinion that is quite clear, and that the Lord Ordinary's judgment is correct.

---

window and ground flat into which the window of the shop No. 1 B had been extended by the firm of Messrs D. & P. Mackinlay with th consent under the temporary agreement between them. Peter Mac quired right to, and was infeft in, the shop No. 1 Bank Street, pre stood when conveyed in 1800 to George Strachan, the disponee of t trates and Andrew Irving. He never had, and neither he nor his Stevenson could convey, any right of property in that part of the te which the pursuer's window was originally constructed, and in wh situated previous to the temporary alteration by D. & P. Mackinlay. perty thereof, and right thereto, belonged to and remained vested in th and he is entitled to vindicate the same. It is proved that the dimi the window seriously affects the light of the pursuer's low room, and portion of the tenement in question which originally was included in a part of the pursuer's low room is of considerable value.

"Further, John Stevenson, the disponee of Peter Mackinlay, was v of the pursuer's claims in regard to the said window and portion of ment before he purchased the shop No. 1 Bank Street. So also defenders' agent, Mr James Paterson, before the disposition in their fa executed and the price paid, and both of them relied upon the absolut dice of their predecessor as regards that matter."

D DEAS.—There is here a question of some novelty and delicacy, so far as No. 110.
the effect to be given to the disposition in favour of Mr and Mrs Paterson.
e whole, however, I think that there is no incompetency in the parole June 3, 1873.
ny, and that the Lord Ordinary has arrived at a right result. I do not Girdwood v. Paterson.
it necessary to go into particulars.

D ARDMILLAN.—I agree with Lord Deas that apart from the question of fides there is some difficulty, but it is clear that both Stevenson and on were in the knowledge of the agreement. The delicacy is this, that we o authority to support the proposition that an heritable right conveyed ormal disposition and infeftment can be qualified by means of parole testi-
The case of Lang v. The Magistrates of Dumbarton, June 29, 1813, is very strong for giving effect to parole proof, but in that case the original
:tion was clearly within the knowledge of, and had been acquiesced in by, rson standing upon his infeftment. I think that the specialty which your hip pointed out in the present case is a most important point. The only ption is of the superficial extent, and there is no description that touches mediate question here raised as to depth as distinguished from superficial rement, or the length and breadth of the subjects. Hence you are not ng proof of a verbal agreement to contradict the written description, but o qualify the apparent possession in a matter where the description is not r conclusive.

D JERVISWOODE concurred.

THE COURT adhered to the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor.

DEWAR & DEAS, W.S.—SKENE, WEBSTER, & PEACOCK, W.S.—Agents.

IAM EDWARD COOPER AND MANDATARIES, Pursuers.—Sol.-Gen. Clark No. 111.
—Mackintosh.
BARR AND SHEARER, Defenders.—Watson—Balfour. June 6, 1873.
Cooper v. Barr and Shearer.

—Lien for Repairs—Possession.—A vessel was placed in a patent slip ing to a firm of shipbuilders for repair. When certain outside repairs ompleted she was removed into a public wet dock, into which the patent ened, and the repairs were there completed, the vessel being attached to situated within the premises of the shipbuilders, and lying close to their From time to time she was moved for the convenience of those using the d an adjacent crane, this being done at the order of the harbour-master, iefly by the shipbuilders' men. During the whole time the master was t in the ship during the day, and at night a ship-keeper. Held (rev.
ent of Lord Gifford) that the lien which the shipbuilders had for the cost repairs while the vessel was in their slip ceased when she was removed he public wet dock, and became subject to the orders of the harbourr, the power of detention being absolutely necessary to the right of lien.

IS action was brought by W. E. Cooper, as mortgagee of the barque 1st DIVISION.
n Cunllo" of Aberystwith, against Barr and Shearer, shipbuilders at Lord Gifford.
ossan, concluding for delivery to the pursuer in virtue of his mortgage M. e said ship, described as "at present lying in the defenders' patent at Ardrossan," and in the event of their failure to do so for payment 3000.
e owner of the ship, Mr Lewis, in September 1872, had put her into ands of the defenders to have certain repairs done, and by them she put on their patent slip in their shipbuilding yard, which opens into ublic wet dock in the harbour of Ardrossan. After a portion of the rs had been executed she was removed from the slip to make room nother vessel, and was moored in the wet dock, where the defenders' men continued their work upon her. On 18th December she was

No. 111.

June 6, 1873.
Cooper v. Barr and Shearer.

again placed upon the patent slip by the defenders, who claim her in virtue of their lien for the cost of the repairs executed l

On 8th January 1873 the pursuer took possession, or clain possession, of the "Joan Cunllo," in virtue of his mortgage, notarial instrument of intimation.

The pursuer pleaded;—(1) The pursuer, in virtue of th libelled, is entitled to possession of the ship or barque thereby and to sell the same in payment of his debt preferably t creditors. (2) The defenders, having lost their lien or retentio vessel, are not entitled to withhold delivery thereof from the p

The defenders pleaded;—(1) In respect of the defenders l cuted the said alterations and repairs upon the said "Joan Cu have a lien or right of retention over her, preferable to any r the pursuer has as mortgagee, and, in virtue of their said lien retention the defenders are entitled to retain possession of her said account is paid. (2) In respect of the arrestments used in of the defenders they cannot be compelled to cede possession c vessel until the said arrestments are withdrawn or otherwis (3) The pursuer's whole material statements being unfounded defenders ought to be assoilzied, with expenses.

Proof was led before the Lord Ordinary, the import of whi in the note of the Lord Ordinary and the opinion of the Lord The following are the more important passages of the eviden Murray, master of the "Joan Cunllo," deponed,—"The shi upon the slip on the 2d or 3d October. There was a go outside work to be done to her, such as caulking, and three r were required outside. These repairs could not be done with her out of the water. The outside work was done about or 16th November, and she was launched off the slip in dock about the 18th. All the deck work repairs were t after that. We had to get a new mast in, and a new d and little jobs about the deck were to be done. After launched I was ordered by the deputy harbour-master to p the north side of the dock, opposite the patent slip, and I o order. She was moored there about half-past ten in the morn had come off the slip about ten. She lay on the north side till past one, and then moved over to the other side. I asked the master previously to give me a berth closer to the slip as I had working, and there was material to bring down from the slip, an be more convenient to have her there. He said he would gi in the afternoon; accordingly he moored me at the foot of t four o'clock. She was moored right across the bottom of the lay at the foot of the slip till about 12th December. She was n lying at the same place till that date. I had to shift her head at various times to let vessels off and on the slip. There w ballast crane astern, and I had to shift to let them get to it. 12th December the vessel was moved away altogether from th the slip, and was put into the west corner of the dock, the gra being between the ship and the slip. She was moored there by hawsers. She was moved to that place because I had been sp the harbour-master a few days before that to give me a quieter the carpenters were about off work, and I had only the second ship-keeper on board. I expected the ship to be chartered Accordingly he put me into that berth, and he put me into it on December. After the 12th December very little repairs remain executed. On the 17th the ship was still in the corner. I return ight on the morning of the 18th, and found the vessel still in the same ion. The carpenter was at work, and I stayed till half-past eleven. I went up to the town to write a letter to the owner. On returning about o'clock the ship was not there, and they were just entering her on the slip. took her up upon the slip. I had given no authority, and I had no idea as going to be done. I asked the foreman why they were doing it, he said they had been instructed by the manager to do it. I went ok for the manager (Mr Thomson), and when I found him I asked the reason. He said it was done by Barr and Shearer's orders. I plained, and demanded the ship off the slip, but he refused. He told the vessel had been taken back to the slip for payment of their unt. I asked a letter from Barr and Shearer in consequence, and got dated 18th December 1872."

No. 111.
June 6, 1873.
Cooper v. Barr and Shearer.

rchibald Steele, harbour-master, deponed,—"The wet dock is a public . It is part of the harbour, and is used by vessels resorting to the our, whether they require repairs or not. It is my duty to assign hs to all vessels. I had nothing to do with the mooring of the 'Joan llo' after she came off the slip. I consider I am entitled to give rs as to mooring vessels within the wet dock. They are under my rol when they are there, and I give orders for them to be berthed as ase. I do not know any of the pawls by the name of the shipyard ls. There are some in the defenders' yard. Those on the east side he slip are within their enclosure. The one opposite the crane is not in their enclosure. By land the pawls are shut in by the enclosure, there is always access to them by water. (Q.) I suppose that with-these pawls they neither can take a ship on or off the slip? (A.) It uite possible they may, but the pawls are used for that purpose. (Q.) they constantly used and useful for that purpose? (A.) Yes; Barr Shearer sometimes complete the repairs on vessels in the wet dock; hat case the vessels are sometimes moored in one place and sometimes nother. The usual place is across the mouth of the slip, which is the convenient place for them. I am not in the habit of moving them f that place unless there is some necessity for it."

arles Adair, deputy harbour-master, deponed,—"I remember the n Cunllo' being taken off the patent slip about the middle of No-er. I saw her launched, and took her under my orders as soon as she afloat. When she came off the master asked me where he would her, and I told him to take her to the north side right opposite the He took her over, but asked me to give her a more convenient , and I told him that as soon as I could get another schooner up on patent slip I would lay across there again. By-and-bye I let her , about four o'clock in the afternoon. The vessel had come off t ten o'clock. At four o'clock she was moored off the patent slip. lay there about a week, and then I ordered her to be removed to the h-west corner of the dock. Her stern ropes were moored to the pawls ween the graving dock and the patent slip. I am in the way of ing vessels loading and unloading to those pawls. All the vessels ch lie in the same berth are moored to those pawls. When we can-get over the gate we have access to the pawls by steps from the dock, at the corner of the patent slip. The vessel remained a considerable e at the south-west corner. I cannot say how long. She remained she was on the slip again. I had no communication ever with Barr Shearer's people about shifting the vessel. I gave my orders, not to , but to the master, when I could find him, or the mate."

hn Thomson, manager of defenders' shipyard (examined for de-ers), deponed,—"There was no other reason for the 'Joan Cunllo'

No. 111.
June 6, 1873.
Cooper v. Barr and Shearer.

being put off the slip except the convenience of Barr and Sh accommodate the 'James Annan.' There was a great deal of wo to the 'Joan Cunllo.' Taking the proportion of the account, nea half of the work was to be done when she was put off. She ready to put to sea at that time, or to be delivered to the owner one on his behalf. She had her mainmast to be taken out and a put in. The old mainmast was a sprung one, and part of the rep to take it out and put in a whole one. That was done after afloat. She was not in a condition to have carried cargo. (Q.) In the vessel off the slip did you consult at all with the captain, o done by Barr and Shearer at their own hand? (A.) At their ow (Q.) Was the vessel delivered over to the captain or in his charg way when she was put off? (A.) No. (Q.) Or any one else on b the owner? (A.) No. (Q.) In putting the vessel off the slip h any intention of relinquishing possession of her? (A.) None w After she was put off Barr and Shearer's men were working at same as before. It is quite usual, when the hull of a vessel i repaired that she can float, to put her into the water and finish th in the water inside the dock. After she was put off she required deal of iron keel fastening in the between decks, a new deck-house crew, a water-closet, main hatch altered, and new coombings, and ber of other things. All these were done after she was put off. T place I saw her at after she was put off was across the entrance slip, the men working at her all the time. She was attached to the pawls there. Till she was put on the slip again she was mostl across the mouth of the slip, sometimes moved when vessels req be put on or off or for other reasons, and when she was moved it w a little to the one way or other, a distance of perhaps half her On the occasion of these movements she was always fastened to th which were in Barr and Shearer's yard, two to the north and tw south of the patent slip, between that and the graving dock. It foreman who moved her off the slip. The captain had nothing to it to my knowledge. When she was moved about it was done foreman and the carpenters. They were on board daily during th working hours. I cannot say how many would be on board at the number would vary, but a full staff of men was kept on for the to be done. I kept the 'berths' of the men full—a berth being i building language the space for a man to work in. I gave instruc the foreman as to the pawls to which she was to be moored, and t to be particular in keeping these moorings there, and to see no o them off."

The Lord Ordinary, on 11th March 1873, pronounced this interl —"Finds it sufficiently instructed in point of fact,—First, That fenders, Messrs Barr and Shearer, were employed by Thomas L Walcott, Bath, the owner of the ship or barque 'Joan Cunllo' of A with, and who was in possession and management of the said ship, to certain repairs upon the said ship; Second, That under and in v this employment the defenders, Messrs Barr and Shearer, obtain session of the said ship or barque, and placed her upon their Ardrossan for the purpose of executing the said repairs, or part t Third, That under the said employment the defenders, Messrs Ba Shearer, executed extensive repairs upon the said ship, in respect of a large account is now due to them; Fourth, That the defenders, Barr and Shearer, never gave up, surrendered, or lost possession said ship or barque, but that they still retain possession thereof in s of the payment of their said account for repairs and work ex

: Finds in point of law that the defenders, Messrs Barr and , have a valid and effectual lien over the said ship or barque, or a retain the same in security of their said account, and finds that the is not entitled to demand or enforce possession of the said ship or without paying or securing the said debt due to the defenders; the above effect sustains the defenders' pleas, and assoilzies the rs from the conclusions of the action, and decerns: Finds the de- entitled to expenses, and remits the account thereof, when lodged, Auditor of Court to tax the same, and to report." *

No. 111.

June 6, 1873.
Cooper v. Barr and Shearer.

[OTE.—It is quite fixed that a shipwright in a home port who builds or vessel, and who has the entire possession thereof, has, so long as he possession, a lien or right of retention over the ship for the amount of unt for building or repairing the same, unless there is a contract, express ied, to the contrary—See Bell's Comm. (M'Laren's ed.) ii. 93. A ght in this respect is in the same position as any other tradesman to moveable subject is delivered or handed over in order that work may nted thereon. The tradesman who executes the work may retain the e subject until his account for the work is paid, unless he have expressly o give credit or to give up the article before the term of payment. This le both in England and Scotland, although there are certain places,—for , the Thames,—where, by local usage, there is no lien for repairs on ie custom and implied contract being to give credit.

ras conceded in argument, and indeed seems quite clear, that the owner hip now in question, Mr Lewis, was entitled to employ the defenders to er, and to hand her over or deliver her to the defenders for that purpose. ot the ship was under mortgage to the present pursuer, Mr Cooper. But per allowed the vessel to remain under the full control and management wner, Mr Lewis, and he cannot object to Mr Lewis having exercised nary and necessary acts of management. It is sufficiently proved that was absolutely in need of an overhaul and of extensive repairs. With- a she could not continue to trade. Her classification at Lloyds' had and she could not be re-classed without being surveyed and repaired at it of Lloyds' surveyor. Without re-classification she would not have ployed to carry any ordinary cargo. To get her repaired at the sight of surveyor, and get her re-classed, was an ordinary, a prudent, and indeed necessary act of administration or management, and this is just what Mr id. It seems also sufficiently proved that the repairs actually executed defenders have enhanced the value of the vessel to an extent at least , if not greater than, the amount of the defenders' account, so that the f the repairs have been profitably and beneficially in rem versa of the alf. It is in these circumstances that the pursuer, the mortgagee, now s delivery of the vessel from the defenders, the shipwrights, without any part of their account.

s shipwrights, the defenders, Messrs Barr and Shearer, resist the pursuer's , on the ground that they have a lien over the ship for the amount of count, and the question in the present case is whether the defenders ch lien or not. There is a subordinate question about arrestments, but restments, if valid at all, which the Lord Ordinary strongly doubts, could e withdrawn or loosed, and the sole question really in dispute is the rs' lien. The Lord Ordinary is of opinion that a valid and effectual er the ship was created in favour of the defenders, and that it still .

) The lien was duly created. The defenders obtained entire and absolute ion of the ship in order to execute the repairs thereon. The ship was into the defenders' private shipbuilding yard. She was placed upon the rs' private slip, where she remained for a considerable time. This was ely necessary. The hull of the ship had to be opened up, and her bottom ng, or part thereof, removed, and this could not be done while she

No. 111. June 6, 1873. Cooper v. Barr and Shearer.

The pursuer reclaimed, and argued;—Even if it were conce the ship so long as she lay on the slip was in the possession o remained afloat. There seems no doubt, therefore, that the vessel pa the legal possession of the shipwrights just as much as if she had bee them in their yard, or upon their slip.

"Indeed, this was not seriously disputed by the pursuer, whose chiefly rested upon the plea that the defenders' lien and possession afterwards lost, and it seemed to be conceded that if the ship ha remained upon the defenders' slip their claim of lien could not h resisted. Still, with special reference to the alleged loss of possess necessary to keep in view the state of matters, even when the ship rem the defenders' slip.

"The crew had all been discharged and paid off except the master, a who seems to have acted as a sort of mate. When the ship wa defenders' slip nobody lived on board of her—both the captain and ma lodgings in town; but captain and mate, as well as the owner, were f going about the ship. At night also there seems to have been a w employed by the captain, called a ship-keeper, whose duty it was to be or beside the ship, and to see that nothing was pilfered or taken awa was necessary, for although the ship was wholly in the defenders' yar their private slip the defenders' premises were quite exposed, unfence on one side, and themselves protected only by watchmen. So matt till the repairs had proceeded so far that the ship could again b Undoubtedly up to this point the defenders had a valid lien.

"(2) The Lord Ordinary thinks that the defenders never lost the p so attained by them. No doubt about the middle of November, and defenders' contract was not nearly completed, the ship was taken off th moved into the public dock in order that the repairs might be there c It is said that this was a surrendering or giving up of possession, and the very act of launching her from the slip the defenders lost their p and lost their whole right of lien. The Lord Ordinary does not think thinks the possession once completely attained by the defenders was n merely shifting the vessel's place for the sake of convenience.

"The removal of the vessel from the slip was not the act of the ow the pursuer, or of any one representing them. She was removed defenders themselves, exclusively by the defenders' workmen, and solel defenders' convenience. Their slip was required for another vessel, a simply for this reason that the defenders took the 'Joan Cunllo' off the put her into the dock. The owner wished her to remain on the sl seems to have thought the repairs would get on faster there. Then the launched, not with the view of delivering her to the owner, or of giving session, but simply that the repairs contracted for might go on with afloat. It often happens that some kinds of work can only be done, c best done, with the ship afloat, for example, rigging, taking in engine on. The defenders launched the ship, not to hand her over, but to h till the repairs were done. Accordingly she remained under the contro defenders just as before, only, instead of her being on the defenders' priv she was moored to the defenders' quay. No doubt on one occasion, f hours, she was on the other side of the dock, but this was merely te till a berth next the defenders' yard could be got, and the defenders' m working on her all the time. Ever after this she was actually moored, one end of her, to the defenders' pawls, that is, to mooring-posts, situate the defenders' ground. It is true also that she had occasionally to be either to allow vessels to get off or on the defenders' slip, or to give the h master the use of an important loading crane at the corner of the doc this was solely for the convenience of the defenders themselves, or of t bour-master, and could not alter the legal possession of the ship. Pla harbour-master, who ordered some of the removals, was in no sense in s, so as to give them a lien for the cost of the repairs which they executing, this possession was clearly lost as soon as she was put e public harbour. The existence of such a lien as was here claimed ng doubted in the maritime law of Great Britain, and, when it was ted, was subject to the limitation that there must be distinct and te possession by the ship-carpenter in order to its constitution and uance.[1] This possession did not exist where repairs were executed essel lying in an open roadstead or harbour.[2] Here the ship was l in a public dock, and it could not reasonably be held that her ttachment to pawls was sufficient either to give or to continue the ite possession. The connection between workmen and a vessel in a public harbour could be severed at any moment. Then, mere ce on board a ship could not by any process of reasoning be held fer a real or constructive possession on them or their master as t the shipowner. The presence of a joiner repairing a private might just as well be held to transfer the possession of the house its owner to the tradesman by whom he is employed.

No. 111.
June 6, 1873.
Cooper v. Barr and Shearer.

was argued for the defenders;—The subsistence of a lien while the l lay on the slip was admitted; but at that time the master, mate, hip-keeper were about her just as much as they were afterwards she was removed to the dock. It was enough to preserve the lien vessel continued to be physically attached to the shipbuilders' pre-, as in this case she was, by the pawls belonging to the defenders. ad been so attached all along, except during the short time she was

---

f the ship, and the removals were always effected by the defenders' own en. Still farther, no change occurred in the mode of looking after the . Neither master nor mate came to live in her, but just visited her as . The night watchman watched just as before till he also was given up or ed at last, and by day the repairs went on just as formerly. There is a e how much of the repairs were done on the slip and how much in dock, e preponderance of evidence seems to be that about a half was executed the vessel was floating. The account does not shew exactly.

n the whole, the Lord Ordinary holds, without much difficulty, that the lers having once attained possession of the ship did not lose possession r by themselves floating her for the express purpose of continuing the . This would be a very startling conclusion, and would be both dan- and unjust to shipbuilding interests. For example, it would prevent ilders from launching vessels, even to get in machinery, until their ts were paid. The Lord Ordinary cannot think that the moment the ship d the water at the foot of the defenders' slip she could have been seized by the pursuer, as mortgagee, or by the owner himself, or by the owner's ers, and towed off, all dismantled as she was, and incomplete, to defeat the ilders' rights.

n the Lord Ordinary's view nothing turns upon the ship having been ed on the defenders' slip. If the defenders had once surrendered posses-hey could not have regained their lien by taking possession of new at their hand, and without the owner's or master's consent. But if they never lost sion they were quite entitled to make the custody secure by placing the in a safe place.

The Lord Ordinary has not the means in the present action of determining exact amount of the defenders' account. The owner is not a party to the nt action, and is being separately sued. All that the Lord Ordinary can to sustain the defenders' lien, and to this effect assoilzie the defenders from pursuer's unqualified demand."

[1] Bell's Com. 98; Bell's Prin. 1420; Abbott on Shipping, 117; Franklin Ionia, 4 B. and Ald. 341; Hartley v. Hitchcock, 1 Starkie, 408.

[2] Authorities above cited.

No. 111.

June 6, 1873.
Cooper v. Barr and Shearer.

at the other side of the dock, being then truly in transitu to the she finally occupied close to the defenders' slip. This was differen the case referred to by the authorities, which was plainly that of a in an open roadstead or harbour with a full crew. Here the vess no crew, was dismantled, could not go to sea, and was not even about the harbour except by the defenders' workmen. The lien ship-carpenter, which confessedly existed when she was on the slip, be lost only by putting her in the complete "nautical" possession owner or master. There had been nothing like delivery to them, actual or constructive. The contract for repairs had not been fi the ship-carpenter had not completed the obligation he had unde and was not entitled to turn her over into the hands of the owner had done his part of the contract. By the contract she had been over to him for repair, and remained in his custody until the contr fulfilled.

At advising,—

LORD PRESIDENT.—I confess I was rather disposed all along, if I co adhere to this interlocutor, because the case seems a hard one for the shipb but I have formed the opinion that the facts will not justify the conclu the Lord Ordinary.

Although the kind of lien pleaded on the part of the defenders is ve defined, there is not much authority on the point. The law was laid authoritatively in the case of Franklin v. Hosier, 4 Barn. and Alderson, 3 that law has since been followed in the books and decisions. In that c Lord Chancellor sent a question to the Court of King's Bench in the fo terms:—"Whether Daniel Brent, &c., as shipwrights, having the sa 'Northumberland' in their actual possession in their dock, at the time bankruptcy of William Masson, the managing owner of the said ship, ha on the said ship for the repairs of the said ship?"

It had been contended that this lien, even when there was actual pos was unknown to the law of England. The answer made under the pre of Chief-Justice Abbott, who is a high authority on this branch of the la "We are of opinion that Daniel Brent, &c., as shipwrights, having the sa 'Northumberland' in their actual possession in their dock, at the time bankruptcy of William Masson, had a lien on the whole ship or vessel the 'Northumberland.'"

The meaning of this answer is quite plain. It says, in point of law, t shipwrights, having had the ship in their actual possession in their dock time of the bankruptcy, had a lien over her.

Accordingly, not only in the latest edition of Abbott on Shipping, but writings of Professor Bell, both in his Commentaries and in his Principl law is laid down to the same effect. In section 1420 of his Principles, Pr Bell lays down, "Retention of a ship is competent for repairs. . . . right of retention depends on possession, and is not, like hypothec, confi the case of repairs made abroad. It is effectual for repairs made on a vess home port. But ship-carpenters repairing a ship in an open harbour or stead have not the possession necessary to retain the right."

Now, applying that doctrine to the present case, it seems to me that wh vessel was launched from the slip of the defenders after a portion of the r had been executed, and was placed in a berth in harbour, that the pos necessary to secure a lien had altogether come to an end.

The history of the matter is as follows:—The owner of the vessel, Mr L sent her to Ardrossan to be repaired, so as to get her class at Lloyd's r When she arrived she went into the old harbour, and from that into the dock, and remained there for some days, waiting her turn for the defen patent slip. It was necessary that she should go upon the slip, because t was some outside work to be done on her, such as caulking, and three planks to be put on. When the work, which could not be done except on nt slip, was completed, the shipbuilders, for their own convenience, removed to make room for another vessel. Accordingly they launched her into the dock, and when launched into it she was, by the orders of the deputy harbour- ter removed to a berth at the north side of the dock opposite the patent slip. lay there for a few hours, and then, because the master persuaded the harbour- ter, for the convenience of the carpenters, to have her shifted, she was removed berth at the foot of the slip, where she lay moored by her own ropes for some s. She was afterwards moved into the west corner of the dock. All that is about her then is that her stern ropes were attached to pawls in the premises he defenders. It seems to me that these pawls, though locally situated in the nders' yard, were really a part of the ordinary dock apparatus. I am of nion that as soon as she left the premises of the defenders she was no longer hat "actual possession" which is necessary to sustain a lien. In these cir- stances it appears to me she was no longer, after she left the slip, under the ody or control of the defenders,—she was then under the orders of her master the harbour-master. The power of detention appears to me to be absolutely essary to the right of lien.

No. 111.

June 6, 1873.

Cooper v. Barr and Shearer.

For these short reasons I cannot concur with the view taken by the Lord linary.

LORD DEAS.—I come to the same conclusion very unwillingly, because I think equity is on the other side.

We must not, however, interfere with the settled rule of law in such matters. seems quite clear that if the vessel had never been taken out of the wet dock, the whole repairs had been executed there, the defenders would have had no t at all.

What might have been the case if the wet dock had been used solely for the poses of a wet dock would be a different question. But the wet dock here is of the public harbour. The owner was never altogether out of possession of vessel. Some of his men remained in her even when she was on the patent . The only fact which gave custody and lien was the single fact that she did on to the slip. Neither when on nor off the slip were the defenders ever lly in possession of the vessel. If the owner had devolved the whole re- nsibility and safety of the vessel, when in the dock, on the shipbuilders, it ht have been different, but this was not so.

he single fact, as I have said, out of which lien arose was, that the vessel was he slip, and so soon as she was lawfully taken off the slip that lien neces- y ceased.

LORD ARDMILLAN.—I have not without some degree of reluctance formed the opinion. The shipbuilders have a strong equitable claim. But the law is nst them, and the legal question is important. I find that the definition of lock" given both by legal and commercial authorities is "an artificial basin ception of a ship,"—not necessarily for repairs. And accordingly, it is the that vessels may enter and lie for a time in dock which are not under repair, are not in any sense in possession of those who have slips in connection with dock. To give a right of lien over a ship it is necessary that the ship should n possession of the person claiming the lien; not indeed a possession adverse hat of the owner, but still a distinct separate possession of the ship by the on repairing her, the person who claims the lien. When such possession is the lien is at an end. In this case I think we must hold that whenever the el left the slip the lien was gone. When she was launched into the dock ther vessel might take her place on the slip, and indeed I imagine did so, it is plain that whenever that second vessel was placed there the shipbuilders uld have a lien over her. By the slip the possession which sustains the lien maintained, and when the ship was no longer on the slip she was no longer hin the lien.

I see no alternative but to come to the same conclusion with your Lordships.

LORD JERVISWOODE concurred.

No. 111.

June 6, 1873.
Cooper v. Barr and Shearer.

THE following interlocutor was pronounced:—"Recall the locutor: Repel the defences, and decern and ordain the defe forthwith to deliver to the pursuer the barque 'Joan Cunl present lying on the defenders' patent slip at Ardrossan, and at the sight of Archibald Steele, harbour-master of Ardr Authorise interim extract of the decree, and dispense wit minute-book: Find the defenders liable in expenses; allo account," &c.

MORTON, NEILSON, & SMART, W.S.—WEBSTER & WILL, S.S.C.—Agents.

No. 112.

June 7, 1873.
Shirra v. Robertson.

MRS GRACE EDMONSTONE OR SHIRRA, Pursuer.—Brand.
GEORGE BISHOP ROBERTSON, Defender.—Asher.

Process—Sheriff—Appeal.—An interlocutor by a Sheriff-substitute re the defences in an action as irrelevant. The Sheriff on appeal recalled the locutor, and allowed the defender a proof before answer of certain averme the writ or oath of the pursuer. The pursuer having appealed to the Co Session, held that the Sheriff's interlocutor was not a final judgment with meaning of the Sheriff-court Act, 1853, section 24, and Court of Sessio 1868, sections 53, 54, and therefore was not appealable at the instance pursuer.

Opinion that the interlocutor was not appealable under the 40th sect the Judicature Act.

Expenses.—Where no objection was taken to the competency of an app the Single Bills, but an objection taken by the Court at the hearing was and sustained, no expenses were allowed to either party.

1ST DIVISION. Sheriff of Edinburgh. M.

MRS SHIRRA brought this action in the Sheriff-court of Edinburgh, cluding for £100 contained in a promissory-note dated 26th July granted by George Bishop Robertson in favour of the pursuer.

The defender stated in defence (article 1), that he believed the su the note had been lent by the pursuer to his brother, James Robertso whom interest thereon had been paid, and who had been treated by pursuer as the proper debtor therein. He averred that no debt was to the pursuer in respect of the note libelled on, the same having paid or otherwise extinguished by arrangement between the pursuer the said James Robertson. The defender set forth in detail cer arrangements between him and his brothers William and James, whe William became bound to relieve the defender of this among other de and stated that it was a debt for which James Robertson was liable; (article 7) that the present action had not been raised with the con or authority of the pursuer, but at the instigation of the said Ja Robertson, who was the real dominus litis.

He pleaded;—(1) The present action not having been raised by authority or instructions of the pursuer, but by the said James Robert who is the real dominus litis, the action ought to be dismissed. (2) defender not being indebted in the sum sued for ought to be assoil (3) The said James Robertson being the true debtor for the amount tained in the said bill, and the pursuer having dealt with and treated as such, and no debt being due to the pursuer in respect of said bill, is barred from now suing the defender.

The pursuer pleaded;—The promissory-note founded on being ex for value, and its contents being admitted by the defender to have paid by the pursuer, the defender is not entitled to prove non-onero even by the writ or oath of the holder.

The Sheriff-substitute (Hallard), on 13th December 1872, pronou an interlocutor finding "that this is an action upon a promissory-no

No. 112.

June 7, 1873.

Shirra v. Robertson.

istance of the proper creditor and against the proper debtor therein: s that the signature 'G. B. Robertson' appended to said promissory- is the true and genuine signature of the defender, on the faith of h the pursuer advanced the sum contained in said note: Finds that ayment of interest indorsed on said promissory-note was so indorsed e hand of the defender: Finds that said promissory-note is a liquid merous document of debt: Finds that no sufficiently specific aver- ; of payment has been made by the defender on the record, nor any iently specific allegation of extinction of said liquid and constituted such as it would be competent to refer to the pursuer's oath: There- repels the defences, and decerns in terms of the conclusions of the "

e Sheriff (Davidson) on appeal, on 28th February 1873, recalled the locutor appealed against, and before answer allowed "the defender a f of the first and seventh statements in his revised defences by the or oath of the pursuer."

e pursuer appealed.

e defender did not object to the competency of the appeal when the appeared in the Single Bills, but the Court having suggested at the ing that the appeal was incompetent, he argued that it was so, in re- ; that the judgment was in no respect a final one, nor one falling in the 24th section of the Sheriff-court Act, 1853. Neither was it alable under the 40th section of the Judicature Act.[1]

e pursuer argued that the appeal was competent, as its practical re- was to dispose of the whole merits of the cause. He also referred to erms of the Court of Session Act of 1868 (31 and 32 Vict. c. 100) 53 and 54, as clearly shewing it to be appealable.[2] The effect of the locutor, if adhered to, would be to prevent the pursuer from objecting e relevancy of the defences. The terms of the Judicature Act, sec. hewed that it was intended that an order for proof should be the ct of an advocation if either of the parties thought fit.

; advising,—

RD PRESIDENT.—The question which we have now to dispose of is as to the etency of this appeal, and as the question thus raised is one of importance ave verbally consulted the Judges of the Second Division, and we have imously arrived at the same result. The Sheriff-substitute, by his inter- or of December 13, 1872, repelled the defences, but on appeal the Sheriff led that interlocutor, and allowed the defender a proof before answer of the nd seventh statements in his revised defences by the writ or oath of the er. The peculiarity of the case is that this appeal is by the pursuer, to e oath reference is made by the interlocutor appealed against. The pursuer nds that the judgment of the Sheriff-substitute is well founded, and she that if the judgment of the Sheriff is to stand, and her oath is taken, she lose the benefit of any objection she might have taken on the relevancy. is not quite correct, but still there is a good deal in the complaint, and we lt considerable sympathy for the pursuer, and if we could have held the locutor appealable we should have done so. But unfortunately the 24th on of the Act 16 and 17 Vict. is conclusive, for it not only enumerates what locutors shall be appealable, but it further enacts that it shall not be com- t to review any others; and, as regards the last class of interlocutors men- d, namely, those disposing of the whole merits of the case, we are further htened as to what they are by sec. 53 of the Court of Session Act of 1868. s been suggested as matter for consideration whether this case does not under sec. 40 of the Judicature Act, but all the authorities are against that

[1] Primrose v. Mackenzie, Nov. 18, 1859, 22 D. 1.

[2] Lamond v. Croom's Trustees, May 14, 1872, ante, vol. x., 690.

No. 112.
June 7, 1873.
Shirra v. Robertson.

view, and so, on the whole matter, I, with reluctance, am of opinion that this appeal is incompetent.

The other Judges concurred.

The respondent moved for expenses.

The appellant objected that the objection to the competency of the appeal had not been taken by the respondent in the Single Bills, but had only been raised by the Court at the hearing, and therefore argued that no expenses should be found due.

THE COURT pronounced the following interlocutor:—"Having heard counsel on the competency of the appeal, refuse the appeal as incompetent: Find no expenses due to or by either party, and decern."

A. W. HASTIE, S.S.C.—MILLAR, ALLARDICE, & ROBSON, W.S.—Agents.

No. 113.
June 7, 1873.
Buchan, &c.
1ST DIVISION. B.

C. F. FORDYCE BUCHAN AND OTHERS (Fordyce Buchan's Tutors), Petitioners—Pearson.

Process—Petition—Tutor.—In an action of giving up tutorial inventories at the instance of the tutors of George C. Fordyce Buchan and others, the pursuers called as defenders the nearest relatives of the pupil resident in Scotland, and presented a petition to the Court to dispense with the citation of the next of kin who were resident in England. The Court expressed some doubt as to the necessity of the application, and remitted to Mr Archibald Broun, P.C.S., "to inquire into the practice of requiring a petition of this nature, where the summons calls kindred on both the father's and mother's side who are within Scotland and of full age, though the nearest kindred on both sides are out of Scotland."

Mr Broun reported * that the general practice was in favour of the

* "The practice of applying to the Court to dispense with the citation of one or more of the nearest of kin, where all or any of them were non-resident, appears to have been early introduced in the process for making up tutorial and curatorial inventories. The penal provisions of the Act 1672, c. 2, having been stringently enforced against tutors and curators who had neglected to comply with the precise regulations of that statute—(See cases of Bruce, M. 16,337; Lothian, M. 16,337; Henderson, M. 16,375, affd. on appeal; and Kilpatrick, M. 16,381)—parties gladly availed themselves of a form of procedure which lessened the risk of subsequent challenge. The earliest reported case of dispensation appears to be that of Cruikshank (Faculty Collection, Feb. 11, 1813), where the petition proceeded on the narrative of there being 'no relations of the pupils within Scotland, their only relations being resident in Ireland,' and 'in respect of the particular circumstances' the Court granted dispensation.

"In the subsequent case of Hobbs (June 29, 1831, 9 Sh. 841), the summons set forth the fact of 'no relations on the mother's side being resident in Scotland,' when, upon the report of Lord Medwyn, the Court directed a written petition for dispensation to be presented, and afterwards 'in the circumstances' dispensed as craved.

"In Shields (Feb. 2, 1832, 10 Sh. 282), dispensation was again granted to meet the case of none of the 'next of kin' on the mother's side, being minors, residing in Scotland.

"In the case of Lady Blantyre (June 23, 1832, 10 Sh. 702), the petition for dispensing craved leave to cite those of the next of kin resident in England, but the Court 'in respect it is stated that there are no relations on the mother's side followed by the petitioners, and the Court accordingly ordered ion in common form. No. 113.

June 7, 1873.
Buchan, &c.

GIBSON-CRAIG, DALZIEL, & BRODIES, W.S.—Agents.

nd, except one who is disqualified, being the wife of a tutor, found it ary to cite the next of kin on the mother's side in England.' The of the Lord President (Hope) may be referred to.

Fordyce (June 23, 1836, 14 Sh. 992), where the nearest cognates of a ere resident abroad, the Court, 'in conformity with previous practice,' d with their citation, upon a petition which set forth that 'the only of the minor on the mother's side resided in the East Indies.'

in, in a case reported in the Faculty Collection (A v. B, June 11, 1841, pon an application to the Lord Ordinary, setting forth that 'the next of re out of the country, his Lordship reported to the Court, who advised mmons should be first raised before the Judge Ordinary of the bounds, ı that 'application should be made to the Court to dispense with the of the next of kin.'

in the more recent case of Thomson (Dec. 6, 1855, 18 D. 193), the Division of the Court ordered personal intimation to be made to two kin abroad, whose addresses were known to the petitioner, and there- pensed with their citation.

the still more recent case of Kyle (June 15, 1861, 23 D. 1104), the fter ordering a minute as to the grounds of the application, and on full ation of the authorities, dispensed with citation of the next of kin of a where he (the petitioner) had no next of kin on the mother's side resi- Scotland.

nerous other cases of dispensation are to be found, reported petitions to rt for that purpose having become general, whenever any of the 'nearest to the pupil or minor were non-resident. But while none of these cases expressly deal with the construction of the statute in regard to icular matter now before the Court they cannot be said to fix any con- practice. On the one hand, they cannot be viewed as establishing that ie whole class of nearest of kin reside abroad, parties are entitled, without for or obtaining judicial authority, to dispense with citation of such of kin, and call in their room more distant kindred, who, though resident and, may be too remotely related to have any interest in the minor's doubt the case of Guthrie (M. 16,319, June 24, 1701), goes far to sup- broader construction of 'next of kin' as a flexible term including the ıvailable kindred. But that decision was pronounced before any prac- lispensing with citation had arisen, and is scarcely an authority for not g to the nobile officium of the Court where the species facti renders sanction desirable.

the other hand, the reporter has not discovered, either in the reported orted cases, any unequivocal course of decisions or practice which would er exclude the construction of the statute contended for by Mr Fraser on Guardian and Ward, second edition, p. 200), as the only true con- ı. Probably any usage which can be traced down to the present time ather tend to support the earlier statement of the same author, that the next of kin are so situated that it would be difficult or impossible them notice of the proceeding the early practice was to cite the next y the later practice, however, intimation to the nearest of kin so dis- l will be dispensed with altogether'—(Personal and Domestic Relations, 03). But it must be admitted that the later usage is not so clear as e desired, and leaves too much to be gathered by inference from the ance that amidst the great multitude of petitions for dispensing, in terms, with citation of 'the nearest of kin' resident abroad, no inquiry ever to have been suggested or made, whether more remote kindred did t 'within Scotland' for purposes of legal citation under the statute.

or a diligent search, both in the Register House, and among a valuable

No. 114.

June 7, 1873.
Potter v.
North British Railway Co.

STEPHEN POTTER, Pursuer.—Scott—Rhind.
THE NORTH BRITISH RAILWAY COMPANY, Defenders.—Sol.-Gen. Clark—Marshall—Moncreiff.

Reparation—Contributory Negligence—Railway.—In an action of damages against a railway company raised by a passenger for injuries received in alighting from a train at a railway station it was proved that the carriage in which the pursuer was seated had been stopped short of the platform, that in consequence of the darkness of the night and the absence of artificial light the pursuer had not observed this, and in leaving the carriage backwards had fallen and injured himself. The jury returned a verdict for the pursuer.

In a motion for a new trial, on the ground that the verdict was against evidence, held (1) that it was the duty of the railway company to have given the passengers some notice or warning of the danger, or assistance in alighting; and (2) that the question of contributory negligence on the part of the pursuer was one for the jury.

---

collection of petitions preserved in the Advocates' Library, the reporter has found only a very few cases at all resembling, and perhaps no more than one or two of these very analogous to the present. He may notice the following:—

"1. The petition Davidson (Feb. 7, 1848, Pet. Adv. Lib. 1847–52, vol. vii.), set forth that the petitioner had called as defenders to the summons his next of kin by the father's and mother's side, but as all these parties were 'furth of the kingdom' he had also called as defenders Mr Cosmo Innes, advocate, his nearest of kin by the father's side in Scotland, and two other persons, his nearest of kin by the mother's side in Scotland. The application bore to proceed with the concurrence of Lady Grant, the petitioner's nearest relation, but residing in England, and it prayed the Court to dispense with the citation of any of the next of kin other than those named as resident in Scotland, and the Court dispensed accordingly —(Minute Book, Feb. 3, 1848).

"2. The petition Cooper Millar (Nov. 24, 1848, Petitions, Adv. Lib. 1847–52, vol. vii.), stated that the petitioner's maternal uncle, his nearest of kin on the mother's side, was resident in London, and that two cousins of his mother, who were major and resident in Scotland had been cited. But 'as it was doubtful how far the citation of these remoter relations was authorised by the statute' (Minute Book, Nov. 28, 1848), the petition craved to dispense with the citation of the nearest of kin on the mother's side, which was accordingly done.

"3. The petition Lord Macdonald (Dec. 17, 1863, Petitions, Adv. Lib. vol. xxv. 1860–64), on the narrative that there were only one sister and cousins of the petitioner's father resident in Scotland, the other brothers and sisters of his father being all resident abroad, and that his relations on his mother's side, except his mother, were also resident abroad, and that the petitioner was therefore unable to comply with the statutory regulations, craved dispensation: Whereupon the Court pronounced decree (Minute Book, Jan. 6, 1864), 'dispensing with the citation of such of the nearest of kin of the petitioner on his father's and mother's side respectively as are resident furth of Scotland as prayed for.'

"4. The petition Gordon (Nov. 15, 1859, same vol. Adv. Lib.), bore that action had been raised against certain relations more distant than the nearest of kin on the father's side, but being the only relations on that side majors and within the kingdom, and prayed to dispense with the citation of the nearest of kin on both the father's and mother's side, on the ground of their being all non-resident, and this prayer the Court granted—(Minute Book, Nov. 26, 1859).

"In conclusion, the reporter may state, that, with the view of ascertaining any other instances of professional practice in regard to the subject of the remit he addressed a letter of inquiry to six well-known legal firms in Edinburgh, but the answers received furnish no farther information than that already submitted."

No. 114.

June 7, 1873.

Potter v. North British Railway Co.

1ST DIVISION. M.

THIS action of damages was brought against the North British Railway Company by Mr Stephen Potter, a painter in Dalkeith, who held a season ticket on that railway between Dalkeith and Heriot stations. The issue put to the jury was,—"Whether, on or about 30th September 1872, and at or near Heriot Station on the defenders' line of railway, the pursuer fell and was injured, through the fault of the defenders, to the loss, injury, and damage of the pursuer. Damages laid at £1000."

It appeared in evidence that the train in which the pursuer was travelling, in a third-class carriage, the second from the guard's van, arrived at Heriot, on 30th September, a little after eight o'clock in the evening. The pursuer deponed,—"Train stopped, and I heard porter calling out word 'Heriot.' I thought we were at platform, and opened carriage door and stepped out. I stepped on iron step of carriage as I got out. With next foot I intended to take platform, and fell. I fell on my back with my feet towards wheel of carriage. I fell across a rail—one of rails of a siding..... Carriage had stopped short of platform. Night was very dark by time we arrived at Heriot. There was no light to shew me where I was stepping..... I travelled every night but Sunday by same train. Never paid particular station to station, but knew it well. Train did not always draw up opposite platform; one night it went a good deal beyond it. It generally overshot platform; night in question first time it was short of platform all that night I had always got down at platform..... I looked out of carriage window before I opened door; was looking towards Heriot at first. Saw lamp which I think man was moving in his hand. He was calling out 'Heriot' as he was waving 'lamp.' I understood he meant it was station to get out at. Did not understand why he was waving. I did not see lamp of station. The man with lamp passed the carriage before I got out. Did not see him do so, as I was arranging parcel and shawl; window was closed, and I was sitting on seat. I opened window, but cannot say whether I opened door from outside or inside. Don't know if you can open it from inside. Think I would open door from outside. Did not look where I was before opening door. Knew I was at Heriot station, but did not take any trouble to see whether opposite platform or not. Stepped on to iron step with back outwards; I always do that when at platform. I did not get out with face to platform that night, because not my custom. There was light in carriage, and I saw helped by that. I was holding on by handle and feeling for platform with other foot. Put down parcel on floor to be ready to get it away. Don't know why I did not leave it on seat, except that I thought it handier to have it on floor..... There was light in carriage. Did not see light put down on ground behind carriage. Knew porter had passed to the end of train because he came from there to help me up. Had not seen him pass. ... There is light at station on side at which train stopped. It is beside the shed. This is before you come to the level crossing going to Eskbank. If you have not passed this lamp you know you have to come to crossing. We had not passed lamp that night. The light of the lamp did not shine on the place where I fell..... The way I came out of carriage on that night was my usual way. The handle I laid hold of was on left-hand side of door as I came down. I took hold of it with left hand. I came out with my usual care."

William Murray, porter, Heriot Station, deponed,—"From end of platform to where pursuer fell it would be about fifteen yards. Carriage went out of platform that distance. There is siding where pursuer fell. He must have fallen across one of rails..... I saw no one offering to come out. If I had seen any one I would have cautioned him to take care. Carriage was lighted, and there was a light on guard's van on side next station. It shone along carriages towards engine..... Was there light enough for person in carriage to see that train not opposite platform? Can't say as to that, as never experienced it..... My lamp might throw light twenty-five yards, but not distinctly. Light at station is in passengers' shed, and no light outside."

No. 114.

June 7, 1873.
Potter v. North British Railway Co.

Thomas Robertson, station-master, Heriot, deponed,—"There are two platforms on the same side at Heriot, with separation between the two at level crossing. The two platforms and level crossing extend 245 feet. Level crossing may be thirty feet. Platform is lighted by one lamp in shed. Paraffin oil light. This only light. It is in centre of shed in inner wall. Can't tell depth of shed. Shed is enclosed on both sides and open to front. Don't think rays of that lamp could reach place where pursuer fell. Lamp would not shew light along whole platform..... The height of platform is twenty inches above level of rail. The place where pursuer had to get out on night in question would be a little lower than the level of the rails at level crossing."

The jury returned a verdict for the pursuer; damages £600.

The defenders obtained a rule upon the pursuer to shew cause why the verdict should not be set aside as contrary to evidence, and on the ground that the damages were excessive.

At advising,[1]—

LORD PRESIDENT.—The defenders in this action obtained a rule upon three different grounds. The first ground was that there was no evidence to go to the jury of negligence on their part causing the injury for which damages are sought by the pursuer. The second ground was that, even on the assumption that there was negligence on the part of the defenders, there was contributory negligence on the part of the pursuer leading to the accident. The third ground was excessive damages.

We have now heard the pursuer shew cause against the rule, and a reply from the defenders, and we are to dispose of the case upon these three different grounds. It is a case of some nicety undoubtedly, but as regards the first ground,—want of evidence of negligence on the part of the defenders,—I think the case is pretty clear. The train by which the pursuer was travelling was to stop at the Heriot Station, and the proximate cause of the accident was that the carriage in which the pursuer was travelling was not brought opposite the platform, and he required, in leaving the carriage, to descend from the floor of the carriage to the level of the rails; and, the place being dark, he came out expecting to find a platform, and descended much further than he had expected, and so fell over and was injured. Now, this Heriot platform was of sufficient length to have accommodated the whole train. The length of the platform was very considerably greater than the length of this particular train. The platform is divided into two near the middle by a level crossing, and where the level crossing exists there is no platform, and a person getting out of a carriage there would require to descend to the level of the rails; but upon one side of this level crossing the platform extends eighty-nine feet, and upon the other side of it it extends eighty-two feet, so that, with the interruption of the level crossing, there was ample platform accommodation for this or even a much larger train than [1] Pursuer's authorities:—Foy v. London, Brighton, &c., Ry. Co., 18 C. B. N. S. 225; Cockle v. London and S.-E. Ry. Co., L. R. 7 C. P. 321, 336; Adamson v. Whitson, Feb. 21, 1849, 11 D. 680.

Defenders' authorities:—Bridges v. N. London Ry. Co., L. R., 6 Q. B. 377, 40 L. J. Q. B. 188; Praeger v. Bristol, &c. Ry. Co., 24 Law Times, 105; Slater v. G.-W. Ry. Co., L. R. 4 Ex. 117; Harrold v. G.-W. Ry. Co., 14 L. T., N. S. 440; Houlden v. Couper, Dec. 20, 1871, 44 Jur. 144; Stewart v. Cal. Ry. Co., Oct. 27, 1869, ante, vol. viii. 486; Hunter v. Miller, Nov. 23, 1865, ante, vol. iv. p. 78; Snare v. Earl of Fife, June 18, 1852, 14 D. 895.

No. 114.

June 7, 1873.

Potter v. North British Railway Co.

ras. It is not explained in any way why the train was not brought up to latform; in short, it is left to be inferred that it was a mere accident that s not so,—some slight miscalculation probably in the driver of the engine pping a little too soon. That certainly in itself cannot be called negli- on the part of the company or the company's servants, because it is a sort ing that may occur frequently without any fault at all. Arresting a train e application of drags and the stopping of the engine is a thing which will affect more or less readily according to circumstances, according to the state e rails as affected by wet, or according to the state of the atmosphere as wet also, and also in some degree it may depend on whether the wind is rable or the reverse. In short, there are a great many circumstances affecting which will easily account for a train not being brought exactly opposite to latform. But when this occurs there is certainly a demand upon the com- 's servants to do all they can to provide against evil consequences resulting it. If the ground in the neighbourhood of the station is of such a charac- at it would not be very safe for passengers to get out except upon the plat- that would probably impose upon the company's servants an obligation to y the mistake in the most obvious way,—that is to say, to put the train in n again and bring it to the platform. That would be the most obvious ly. But if it is thought not worth while to take that trouble, or to en- er the delay which perhaps might arise thereby, then it seems to me that ompany's servants ought to see that the passengers who have occasion to at at a place where there is no platform ought to be warned in some way e care of themselves, or helped in some way, if necessary, in descending the carriages. Now, the place where this pursuer had to get out was cer- a place of some danger, and it must be observed also that he had no ative but to get out there. It was plain, and he took it for granted,—and ight in taking it for granted,—that the persons conducting the train in- d the Heriot passengers to get out where the train stopped. There was no tion of altering the position of the train before they got out, and therefore lternative presented to him was either to get out or to allow himself to be d on. As to the doctrine propounded to us, that a passenger in such a ion should not get out unless he is perfectly satisfied that he can do so with y, and that his proper remedy is to allow himself to be carried on and then an action of damages for the inconvenience occasioned to him, that is a ine which I cannot adopt. I think that the pursuer had no alternative but t out where he did. The place, as I said before, was a place of some er. This is quite plain. It is proved, I think, by the circumstance that a n getting out of a carriage there had to make a very considerable descent, even if he had been quite aware of what he had to do, the night being dark, s not a very safe thing to get out, at least without some assistance. The r at the station very plainly confirms this impression, because he said that he went back, upon the train stopping, to the van to get his parcels he nobody coming out of the carriages which were not opposite the platform, if he had he would have stopped and assisted them, or warned them that had to descend to the level of the rails. It is quite plain, therefore, that orter thought that anybody getting out there ought to have been either l or warned. And there is other evidence bearing upon this. The place e the pursuer got out is even a longer step down than it is to get out oppo- he level crossing; and at the level crossing both the station-master and the r agree that it is the practice to give the passengers special help in getting f a carriage that is opposite the level crossing, so that I think we may take it that the place where the pursuer had to get out was a place of danger, where it was reasonable to expect that the railway servants should some help, or at least some warning, to the passengers that were to get out. nothing of this kind was done; and there was certainly no very good to aid the pursuer in getting out. There were lights in various places, but were not generally very available for this purpose. The light in the n shed was of no use. That seems to be quite clear, because the end wall e shed prevented the light shining upon the place where the pursuer was.

No. 114.

June 7, 1873.
Potter v. North British Railway Co.

There was a light in the carriage in which the pursuer travelled, but that also afforded very little aid. It is said further that the porter's light was placed upon the footboard of the van when he went back to the van to get his parcels; but that was a light of a very peculiar kind, and it is not by any means clear whether it would have helped the pursuer to see his way out of the carriage or the reverse. The light attached to the van itself, I think, was of no use. It was a bull's-eye light, and was at a level of eight feet above the ground, so that its rays at the short distance which it was from the place would not shine upon the ground at all, or upon any level so low as the place where the pursuer was getting out. Upon the whole matter, therefore, I think that the place where the pursuer was intended to get out, and was, I think, morally obliged to get out, was a place of danger, and that it was the duty of the railway servants either to provide a different place for him to get out, by bringing the train opposite the platform, or to give him some warning or assistance in leaving the carriage; and their failure to do so appears to me to constitute negligence upon their part, which is the negligence of the company.

But then the question is, whether the pursuer did not himself contribute by his own negligence to bring about the accident of which he complains, and this part of the case is attended with more difficulty. He got out in a way that seems rather rash and imprudent, that is to say, he did not look before him, as to speak. He took for granted that everything was right, and that the train was opposite the platform, and that his carriage in particular was opposite the platform. Now, his own experience of this station,—for he was a very constant traveller by this line, and this station was the station at which he always stopped,—his own experience of this station taught him that it was not an uncommon thing for the carriage in which he travelled not to be opposite the platform. The mistake generally committed, no doubt, was the carriage overshooting the platform; but it was just as possible that it might fall short of the platform, and therefore it is rather doubtful whether he was entitled to assume that the carriage was opposite the platform. He did not apparently look out to see whether it was so or not; whether he would have seen if he had looked out is another question. That is very doubtful, but at all events he certainly got out, and he got out with his back foremost, so that in descending he could not very well see what he was putting his foot upon; when he made the step from the iron step on the level of the carriage floor he could not very well see what he was going to step upon. I cannot say that I think that was very prudent, but at the same time it seems to me that that was a question very peculiarly suited for the jury to consider, and I am not able to say that the evidence of negligence upon his part is so clear and strong that the jury were certainly not justified in giving him a verdict. I do not say how my own verdict would have been; I do not think it necessary to consider that. But I cannot say that the verdict is so plainly wrong in this respect that we are entitled to set it aside, and therefore I am not for sustaining that ground for a new trial either.

The only remaining point is the alleged excess of damages. Now, we have had occasion in some recent cases to consider this matter, particularly in the case of Houlden v. Couper, in which, I think, we all concurred in saying that we would never interfere with the verdict of a jury on the ground of excessive damages unless the excess was something very plainly extravagant. That the jury have given more damages than the Court would have given in the circumstances, if they had been sitting as a jury themselves, is no reason at all for setting aside the verdict. The excess must be extravagant, and the only question comes to be whether this verdict is extravagant and excessive in that sense. There is no doubt that the injury sustained by the pursuer was a serious injury. There is no doubt that he sustained pecuniary loss in his business, not certainly to the full extent of the £600 which the jury awarded, but I am not prepared to say that there was not a very considerable amount of pecuniary loss proved to the jury. And then the result of the medical evidence appears to me to be that there was concussion of the spine. I think that is the fair result of the evidence, taken altogether, and that is a very serious injury, the ultimate consequences of which it is often very difficult to foresee; and although the medigentlemen generally take a favourable view of the prospects of the pursuer's overy, still they all admit that it is one of those cases which may in its ulti- be consequences be much more serious than they are at present inclined to ect. The injury being of that kind, and its possible effects hereafter being y difficult to ascertain, the jury, I think, were entitled to some considerable gin in assessing the damages on this account; and although £600 does seem the circumstances rather large, still I cannot pronounce it, taking all these cir- stances into consideration, to be an excessive award of damages. I am efore for discharging the rule.

No. 114.

June 7, 1873.
Potter v. North British Railway Co.

LORD DEAS.—The first question is, whether there was negligence on the part the railway company; and I concur with your Lordship that it is sufficiently blished that there was such negligence. I agree with your Lordship that it did necessarily infer negligence that the train stopped short of the platform. I k that the negligence consisted in this, that, having stopped short of the form, it was the duty of the company to give some notice or warning to the engers that it had so stopped short, whereas no such warning was given. train had come to the end of the journey, so far as passengers to that ion were concerned, and it was intended that the passengers should then and e get out. Now, the arrival was at night, and it was dark, except in so far here might be artificial light; and that being so, I think there is ground for ing that there was negligence on the part of the company in giving no ce, warning, or assistance to the passengers. The company's servants could tell what the condition of the passengers might have been. Some of them ht have been lame; some of them very old; some of them sick; some of m might have been children; and to stop short of the platform in these cir- stances, without any notice at all, constitutes, in my opinion, negligence.

The second question is a much more difficult and a very narrow one, viz., ther there was also contributory negligence on the part of the pursuer. , I agree in thinking that that was a question peculiarly for the jury. It d have been difficult even for the jury to get all the little circumstances, all precise information necessary for judging in regard to that question; but it uch more difficult for anybody else. The jury had the opportunity of satis- g themselves by putting questions to enable them to judge of that; and on sideration of all the circumstances they came to the conclusion that there not contributory negligence, and I am not prepared to say that that was a ng conclusion. Except for the artificial light, it is plain enough there was proper provision made for the passengers getting safely out, and it is very lt to say whether the artificial light, such as it was, might not tend to con- the pursuer rather than assist him in getting out. I think that is, to say least of it, exceedingly doubtful. Now, once we have got the length of ing that there was negligence on the part of the company, it becomes incum- on the company to make it reasonably clear that there was sufficient to enable the pursuer to see what he was about in coming out of the car- , and in my opinion that is not satisfactorily proved. No doubt he came with his face to the carriage, but it is matter of difference of opinion and ice what is the best way of coming out of a railway carriage. I think I have authority near me for the opinion that the best way is to come out backwards. not say that I am clear about that. But it is the practice of some who are y well able to judge always to come out that way; and supposing the pur- to have been aware of the distance he had to come down, I do not know that uld have come out in any better way than backwards. There is certainly ficulty here, and if I had been upon the jury I should have felt it a very w question. I do not exactly know at what conclusion I might have ved upon it, but I am clearly of opinion, with your Lordship, that the evi- e upon that is not such as would entitle us to interfere with the verdict of jury. I have only further to say that the recent English cases,—which very properly referred to,—in so far as they have a bearing upon this case, r tend to confirm the result I have arrived at on both of these points. only one that goes the other way is the case of Bridges, 11th May 1871.

No. 114.

June 7, 1873.
Potter v. North British Railway Co.

The only remark I shall make on that case is, that the judgment of the Court of Queen's Bench was confirmed by the Court of Exchequer by a majority of only one—four being one way and three the other. On reading that case very attentively I think I would have been of opinion with the three, and not with the four. The other cases, so far as applicable, all go in the other direction.

Upon the question of damages I quite agree with your Lordship. I think there is no doubt that the pursuer suffered very severe injury, and likewise loss of business; and I am of opinion that there is no such excess of damages as entitles us to interfere with the verdict on that ground.

LORD ARDMILLAN.—I so entirely agree with your Lordship on both questions in regard to the fault or negligence of the defenders that I shall add nothing to what has been said. I think there was a sufficient degree of fault and negligence proved to make the defenders liable, if there was not contributory negligence. I am of opinion that, where fault is proved on the part of the defenders, they must prove the contributory negligence as clearly as the pursuer must prove the fault in the first instance. That, I observe, is stated by Lord Neaves in the case of M'Martin,[1] and I concur in the observation. I think that in this case the fault is sufficiently proved to support the verdict, and to prevent the Court interfering with the verdict of the jury. It was a fair case for the jury. In the next place, I think that the jury were quite entitled to hold that the proof of contributory negligence was not sufficient, and I am inclined to think that they were, on the whole, right,—at least, not so far wrong as to call for the interference of the Court. Upon the question of damages I agree with your Lordship that there is no room for interfering. With regard to the English authorities I have only to say that I am entirely satisfied with the exposition of the law as laid down by Chief-Justice Cockburn in the case that was referred to, and I see no reason to suppose that our law differs from the law of England as so stated.

LORD JERVISWOODE concurred.

LORD MURE.—On the question of negligence on the part of the company I have nothing to add to what your Lordship has said. I felt at the trial, and felt again on reconsidering the case, that the difficulty lay in the question of contributory negligence. Because at the time of the accident there appears to have been even to the last some doubt in the mind of the pursuer whether he was at the platform or not; for he said in his evidence in cross that before the accident happened he was getting down from the iron step and feeling with his other foot for the platform, and must therefore have been in a state of uncertainty as to whether the train was at the platform when he got down. I read that part of the evidence to the jury, in order that they might have it clearly before them when they were considering the question; and I put it to them, having regard to the circumstances of the case, and particularly to the want of light—if they were satisfied that want of light was proved,—I put it to them to consider whether or not there was, in their opinion, such negligence on the part of the pursuer in getting out of the carriage as to lead them to think that the accident arose from his fault. And the jury, having that put distinctly to them, after deliberating for more than an hour and a quarter on that and the other evidence in the case, gave a unanimous verdict for the pursuer. In these circumstances, the question of contributory negligence being peculiarly suited for the jury's consideration, there was, I think, evidence sufficient to warrant them in holding that contributory negligence was not established by the company, on whom the onus lay of establishing it. On the question of damages I concur as to the grounds on which the verdict should be allowed to stand.

THE following interlocutor was pronounced:—"On the motion of both parties, apply the verdict found by the jury in this case and in respect thereof decern against the defenders for payment to the pursuer of the sum of £600 in name of damages: Find the defenders liable to the pursuer in the expenses incurred by him; allow an account," &c. No. 114. June 7, 1873. Potter v. North British Railway Co.

[1] M'Martin v. Hannay, Jan. 24, 1872, ante, vol. x. 411.

W. OFFICER, S.S.C.—DALMAHOY & COWAN, W.S.—Agents.

JOHN D. RODGER, Appellant.—Strachan.
JOSEPH RUSSELL (Wilson's Trustee), Respondent.—Pattison.

No. 115. June 10, 1873. Rodger v. Russell.

...-Contract—Real Burden—Mutual Gable—Sequestration—Preference.— ...d B feued two adjoining stances, both feu-contracts declaring that the ...s should be mutual, and should be built to the extent of one-half on the ...ning feus. This provision was declared to be a real burden on the feu. ...that A, having built a mutual gable which was made use of by B, was ...led to be ranked preferably on B's sequestrated estate for one-half of its ...

2D DIVISION. Ld. Shand. I.

...r a feu-contract of date 9th and 12th February, and recorded in the ...ster of Sasines 20th March 1872, John D. Rodger, builder in Edin... h, feued from James Steel, builder there, a building stance at Dalry. ...contract contained this stipulation—"The gables of the said tene... shall be mutual gables, and shall be built to the extent of one-half ...e thickness thereof on the ground hereby feued, and to the extent of ...ther half on the ground adjoining the same on the north and south ...ctively, and the cost of erecting the said gables shall be borne equally ...e feuars to whom they shall belong in common, but no part of such ...shall be borne by the said James Steel or his foresaids,"—which ...nade a real burden on the feu. Rodger built on the stance, the south ... of his building being erected to the extent of one-half on his own ...d and to the extent of the other half on the ground adjoining.

...exander Wilson, builder Edinburgh, feued from Steel the stance ...diately to the south of Rodger's feu. His feu-contract contained ...isions as to the gables similar to those in Rodger's contract, and ...ired them to be real burdens on the feu. Wilson proceeded to build ...is stance, and his building was roofed in before 8th October 1872, on ...h date he became bankrupt. Russell, the respondent, was appointed ...ee on his sequestrated estate, and entered into possession, and pro... ...ed with the internal finishing of Wilson's tenement. Rodger had ...r demanded from Wilson the value of the one-half of the gable, and ...d not been paid, On 5th February 1873 Rodger lodged a claim in ...sequestration to be ranked preferably for £84, 7s. 5½d. as the one-half ...e value of the gable. The claim was disallowed by the trustee, under ...vation of Rodger's right to lodge an ordinary claim.

...odger appealed to the Lord Ordinary on the Bills (Shand), who pro... ...ced this interlocutor:—"Sustains the appeal: Recalls the deliver... of the respondent, as trustee on the sequestrated estate of Alexander ...on, complained of, and remits to him to sustain the claim of the ...llant to be ranked preferably on the sequestrated estate for the sum ...84, 7s. 5½d. claimed, and decerns: Finds the appellant entitled to ...nses," &c.*

---

*NOTE.—In the ordinary case the person who builds a mutual gable, in ...liance with the usual stipulations in his feu-contract, does not thereby add ...s neighbour's property to the extent of the building erected on the ground ...ning his own, for the maxim inædificatum cedit solo does not apply. He ...ight to the whole wall or gable, subject to an obligation to give to the

No. 115. The trustee reclaimed.[1]

June 10, 1873. At advising,—

Rodger v. Russell.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—I concur with the Lord Ordinary's judgment, and substantially on the same grounds. But as we were told that the question was adjoining proprietor, in return for payment of one-half of the total expense, a right, not to the part of the wall built on his ground, but a common or pro indiviso right to the whole wall. The adjoining feuar is entitled, when he requires it, to make use of the common gable for the purposes of his building, but it is a condition of this right that he shall pay the one-half of the expense when required to do so. The right of the proprietor who erects the gable is real. It is transmitted by a simple conveyance of the property, and does not require a special assignation or conveyance. Again, any assignation or conveyance in favour of the adjoining proprietor is unnecessary in order to give him right to use the gable. The payment of one-half of the expense, or a discharge of his liability therefor, granted by the proprietor of the adjoining property, by whom the gable has been built, or by his successor in the property, gives a title to the gable as common property, and to the use of it accordingly. The law, as thus stated, is settled by the cases cited by the parties in the course of the argument in the present appeal, viz., Wallace v. Brown, 1808, Mor. Personal and Real, Appendix, No. 4; Hunter v. Luke and Others, 2d June 1846, 8 D. 787; and Law v. Monteath's Trustees, 30th November 1855, 18 D. 125.

---

"It seems to follow from what has been now stated, that while, on the one hand, a party about to make use of a gable built by the adjoining feuar can acquire right to do so by payment of half of the total expense, on the other hand, the proprietor who built the gable is not divested of that real right until payment be made to him of the half of the expense, or until in some way he has discharged the adjoining feuar of his liability to make such payment, and consented to the appropriation of the gable, and to the adjoining feuar acquiring a pro indiviso right of property in it.

"Applying these principles to the present case, the Lord Ordinary is of opinion that the decision is not attended with difficulty. The appellant, who built the gable as a mutual gable, in terms of the obligations imposed on him in his feu-contract, has not received payment of any portion of the expense; and in the opinion of the Lord Ordinary he remains the proprietor of the whole gable until that expense is paid to him. It was maintained for the trustee on the bankrupt's estate that the claim is one of recompense, and that the appellant having allowed the gable to be made use of can only rank as an ordinary creditor on the bankrupt's estate for the half of the expense claimed. The Lord Ordinary cannot adopt this view. Payment has not been made, and it is not said that liability for the amount has been expressly discharged. In a question with the bankrupt the appellant is not bound to part with the property for a composition on his claim, or for anything short of full payment of the half of the expense of the building. The trustee is in no better position. He enters to possession of a building which has, no doubt, been roofed in, but which was yet in an unfinished condition,—for it appears from the joint minute of admissions, No. 12 of process, that the respondent 'has since proceeded with the internal finishing thereof.' The Lord Ordinary cannot see that in this state of matters the appellant, either by his actings or acquiescence, has done anything which has transferred a pro indiviso right to the gable to the bankrupt, and consequently to his trustee, or which has limited the appellant's right to full payment of a half of the expense of building, as a condition of the trustee taking the benefit of the gable. It may be that if a party having such a claim allows the gable to be made use of, and adjoining buildings are erected, con-

---

[1] Wallace v. Brown, June 21, 1808, M. Per. and Real, App., No. 4; Hunter v. Luke and Others, June 2, 1846, 8 D. 787; Law v. Monteath, Nov. 30, 1855, 18 D. 125; Earl of Moray v. Aytoun, Nov. 30, 1858, 21 D. 33.

No. 115.

June 10, 1873.

Rodger v. Russell.

f some general importance I shall shortly state the impression which the argu- ent has made on my mind.

It seems to be conceded on both sides, and indeed after the case of Wallace could not be disputed, that when one of the conterminous proprietors of urban ing ground builds, the adjacent stance remaining unbuilt, the gable, although tly built on the solum of the adjacent ground, remains or becomes the sole perty of the man who built, with a power to the adjacent proprietor to acquire pro indiviso right in it when he comes to build, on paying half the expense of and an obligation on him when he builds to pay. Assuming this to be so it llows, first, that the builder of the gable is the feudal proprietor of it, without y specific title to part of the solum on which it rests; secondly, that the pro diviso right to it may be acquired by the adjacent feuar, without any written le excepting that to the one-half of the solum; and third, that the right is at e transferred by the use taken of the gable, along with payment of half the pense of erecting it.

If this be so it is plain that the right is a very anomalous one, its nature ing, as was explained in Wallace's case, from the necessity of the position of parties. But the Court have held very clearly that the right to demand half price transmits to a singular successor in the property, as in the case of Luke Hunter; and that the obligation to pay the price transmits against a singular cessor, which was directly decided, and indeed conceded, in the case of Law Monteath. The nature of the right, therefore, is one of real property, which essarily remains with the builder until the property is transferred. Probably right may be correctly defined as a right of property, qualified by an implied st for the adjacent feuar, with an obligation to denude on payment of the ce.

t was suggested that the mere fact of building, and thereby appropriating the le to the common use, ipso facto transferred the property and left the claim half the price a mere personal debt. But I find neither principle nor autho- for that view; and it seems altogether inconsistent with the result of Luke Hunter, in which the right to demand payment went to an adjudging creditor in ue of his title to the house. I think it is not properly a real burden, but ed, and occupied, and thereafter transferred to a singular successor, that a n against such successor might be excluded, upon the ground referred to by d Deas in the case of Law v. Monteath's Trustees, that in the whole circum- nces the successor was entitled to assume that the half of the gable had been dy paid for, and that the creditor must look to the person who used and pied the buildings for reimbursement of his claim. The question which ld arise in such a case would be attended with considerable difficulty, for e is much to be said in favour of the view that nothing short of payment or charge of the claim for one-half of the expense will transfer the real right. ny view the question would turn on the special circumstances, which must ount to a bar of the creditor's claim, in respect of his own actings or acquies- ce. In the present case there are no circumstances which can create such a . It cannot, in the opinion of the Lord Ordinary, be said that there was ue delay to make the claim, or acquiescence in the use of the gable with- payment so that the real right in it was transferred because the creditor not enforce his claim before the building was roofed in. If he had dered the account while the building was going up this would appear be all that could be expected of even a party very careful of his rights. was surely not bound to interdict the building in order to preserve his ht; and the Lord Ordinary cannot think that, in the circumstances, his ht to full payment was forfeited by delay to make his claim to the effect enabling the trustee to acquire a real right in property for which no pay- nt was ever made. Indeed, the principle of the case of Wallace v. Brown, ich is the foundation of all the decisions since its date, seems to ex- le the argument maintained by the respondent, that the appellant must be sed to rank as a personal creditor, and to accept a composition on his claim. objection was stated to the amount claimed, assuming liability to exist."

---

No. 115.

June 10, 1873.
Rodger v. Russell.

a right of property, and therefore subsists against all who make use of until the price is paid.

But if I were of opinion that the right of the builder of the gable be carried so far, there are separate elements in the present case which me sufficient for the decision of this case. In the first place, this is n burden in the contract of feu; and although that is a stipulation with rior, I am inclined to think it is binding on the vassal, whoever he m question with the feuar who is creditor in the price. It is difficult t any other force to such a provision, which seems clearly for the ben conterminous feuar. It is at all events complete notice to a purchase second place, the trustee found the house unfinished, although the completed. He could only realise its value, and create out of it a n commodity, by taking advantage of the mutual gable; and whatever the case with an ordinary purchaser, after the house was complete the trustee who took possession of and finished the house could o under the liabilty for one-half the price of the gable. And lastly, doubt if a trustee in a sequestration stands, in such a question, in th of a singular successor. He is an adjudger, and takes the property of rupt tantum et tale as the bankrupt held it.

Lord Cowan.—The feu-contracts of the parties respectively contai stipulations that the gable between the building stances shall be a mut and the cost of erecting it be borne equally by the feuars, to whom the g belong in common. There are other obligations and stipulations connected premises, and the contracts contain an express declaration that the obligat visions, and others contained in them shall be real liens and burdens the several pieces of ground and buildings erected and to be erected ther this state of the titles there is really no difficulty in the case, having the relative position of the two parties. The right of the respondent house was first erected, to enforce against Wilson, by whom the adjoi was feued, the half expense of erecting the mutual gable so soon as t made use of the gable in the erection of a house on his feu, is beyond As Lord Ivory expresses it in Law v. Monteath, "all the authorities that there is a real right, inherent in the subject itself, to have the val gable when the other party comes to use it, and therefore, that right inherent, it passes with the property as an necessary adjunct of it." principle it was that in the subsequent case of the Earl of Moray, which t disposed of on the title, I rested my opinion in favour of the defender, Aytoun, to whom the half cost of the gable had been paid by the fi built on the adjoining feu. Now, that being the character of the rig the party has to demand payment, it seems clear to me, apart from stipulation, that the owner of the unbuilt on stance, when he does bu adopts the mutual gable as part of his building, does so subject to the b making payment of one-half of the expense of the gable, as a real c affecting his right and the building erected on the ground. The solu gable appears to me to become, from the time of its appropriation, indiviso property of the two parties under their several titles, subject real condition of paying for the gable. I think there is difficulty, in of the Lord Ordinary, that it is only on payment that the pro indiv passes. No written evidence of payment is required to form part of to the property, and to be recorded as such. The more just view is feuar, who has first built on his ground, can demand, from the second his using the wall, payment of the sum, as being a real condition o affecting the subjects; and his right, as inherently a preferable real c be made effectual as such. And certainly whatever may be said a liability of singular successors, where the feu-contract is silent, and wh is room from lapse of time or intermediate transmissions, for presuming by his authors, the circumstances of this case present no such difficu (1) the house erected by Wilson had not been completed when his b took place and the appellant took possession of the premises under the

; it was only after the mere external shell of the building came into his ession that the house was completed; so that it could not but be that he the property subject to the conditions on which it stood in the bankrupt's on; the subject necessarily vested in him tantum et tale. And (2) the ex- stipulations in the feu-contracts declared this obligation amongst others a burden affecting the ground and the buildings erected thereon; and it is for the appellant to resist implement of this obligation contained in the act, which is the foundation of his feudal title, and by which the cost of ting the mutual gable is ordained "to be borne equally by the feuars, to m they shall belong in common."

No. 115.

June 10, 1873.

Rodger v. Russell.

am of opinion that the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary should be adhered

ORD BENHOLME.—There may be some difficulty in point of principle involved ses of this kind. I am inclined to think that in their decisions the Court gone the length of holding that the proprietors of conterminous tenements, whatever hands they fall, are liable to implement the mutual obligations in rd to the gable. But the circumstances of the present case enable us to d all difficulties. The trustee enters into possession of an unfinished e, and clearly stands in the same situation with the original holder of the ce. I am for adhering to the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor.

ORD NEAVES.—I concur in the result proposed, that the Lord Ordinary's locutor should be adhered to. The house was not entirely finished, and fore the trustee could not consider himself as an independent singular sor buying at a full price. That circumstance makes it unnecessary to go the subtleties which have been suggested in the course of the debate. I not prepared to adopt all the Lord Ordinary's views. It is plain that the servi- s which exist in urban tenements are anomalous, and the mutual obligations d and interlaced. The strict rights of property must yield to public con- ience in a burgh. Subjects in a town are not divided, either laterally or rwise, in the same way as lands. Lord Stair well puts the law in his second ; tit. 7, sec. 6; though he says that such things consist not in faciendo but atiendo. The obligation is of that peculiar kind, which while personal in nse, nevertheless, from the necessity of the case, and for the safety of the , passes to singular successors both of the original debtor and creditor. mutual gable is not exactly in the same position as the roof of one tene- and the floor of another, but I think that the ground occupied or destined occupied by it is common property. A man builds the gable twice the lth of his own part of the solum, and gives his neighbour a joint interest in gable. The double halves are both necessary for each party; it is pro iso property. But the person benefited is under obligation to contribute. ther in all circumstances the person who has built the gable retains a pre- le right to be reimbursed to the extent of one-half it is not necessary to le. I am inclined to think that the obligation will continue against ular successors until at least from mora or other reason the singular successor ntitled to believe that the gable was paid for. The trustee could not think ere. Though nice questions may arise in future cases this case is quite against the trustee.

THE COURT adhered.

WILLIAM MANUEL, S.S.C.—JAMES SOMERVILLE, S.S.C.—Agents.

LTER FRANCIS DUKE OF BUCCLEUCH AND QUEENSBERRY, AND OTHERS, Pursuers.—Watson—Johnstone.
LEXANDER COWAN AND OTHERS, Defenders.—Sol.-Gen. Clark—Asher.

No. 116.

June 10, 1873.

Duke of Buccleuch, &c. v. Cowan, &c.

wer—Pollution—Verdict—Declaratory conclusions—Motion for Decree.—rian proprietors on a private stream brought an action of declarator and in- ct against the owners and tenants of paper-mills on the stream to prevent pollution, and upon issues whether the defenders did by discharging refu the stream pollute the same to the nuisance of the pursuers obtained a ve a jury in 1866. The defenders thereafter, under an agreement with the p conducted experiments with a view to abate the nuisance. In 1873 the p moved for decree. Held (1) that they were entitled to declarator; and (a statement by the defenders that they had no proposals to make, that t suers were entitled to interdict.

No. 116.

June 10, 1873. Duke of Buccleuch, &c. v. Cowan, &c.

2D DIVISION. R.

Ante, vol. ii. p. 653; vol. iv. p. 475; vol. v. pp. 214 and 1054.

This was an action of declarator and interdict by the Duke of Buc and others, riparian proprietors on the river Esk, against Messrs Ale Cowan and Sons, and others, paper-makers, to have it declared "t pursuers have good and undoubted right to have the water of the Nor so far as it flows through or by their properties, transmitted in a stat the use and enjoyment of man and beast, and that the said defenders h right to pollute or adulterate the said water, nor to use it or the c of the stream in any way or for any purpose such as to render th water noxious or unwholesome, or unfit for all its natural prima poses to the pursuers, or in any way to destroy the amenity of th stream: And the defenders ought and should be prohibited and dicted from discharging into the said water of Esk, from their res paper-works, any impure stuff or matter of any kind, whereby th water, in its progress through or along the property of the pursuers, of them, may be polluted or rendered unfit for domestic use, or for of cattle, or its amenity in any way diminished, or the rights of th suers therein in any way injured or affected: Or otherwise, it oug should be found and declared that in the event of the said defen any of them, being found entitled to continue the use of the said wa any portion thereof, for all or any of the works above-mentioned, the are bound and obliged to make use of the said water in the manne injurious to the pursuers, and to use all necessary and proper preca by filtration and otherwise, to restore the said water to the stream having been used at the said works respectively, in as pure a stat condition as possible; and to that effect they ought and should be dec and ordained to erect all suitable and necessary filtering ponds and apparatus for rendering the water as pure as possible before being ret back to the stream, and for the removal of all noxious or polluted qua in the refuse or matters necessarily discharged into the said stream in carrying on of their said works; and to this effect, if necessary, a sys of regulations ought to be established at the said respective works on report of men of skill to be named at the sight of the said Lords, in s form and manner as may be deemed reasonable and proper."

The original action was brought in 1841, but the original defen having died or ceased to own the mills two new summonses were brou in 1864 against the existing owners. The three actions were conjoi After various proceedings, including a remit to men of skill, and reg tions framed by them and sanctioned by the Court, the case was trie a jury in July 1866 on the following issues:—"1. Whether, between January 1835 and 1st October 1853, the defenders, the first-mentioned of Alexander Cowan and Sons, did, by discharging refuse or impure m at or near their mills of Bank Mill, Valleyfield Mill, and Low Mill, o of them, pollute the water of the stream or river called the North E the nuisance of the pursuers or their authors as proprietors of their r tive lands aforesaid, or of one or more of them? 2. Whether be 1st October 1853 and 20th May 1864 the defenders, Alexander C and Sons, the present occupiers of said mills, did, by discharging re impure matter at or near their said mills, or any of them, pollu

No. 116.

June 10, 1873. Duke of Buccleuch, &c. v. Cowan, &c.

er of the said stream or river, to the nuisance of the pursuers or their hors as proprietors of their respective lands aforesaid, or of one or more hem?" Similar issues went to trial against the proprietors and tenants other mills, the only difference between these and the issues above ted being that they applied to different periods.

he jury returned the following verdict:—"Find by a majority of 9 to r the pursuers, the Duke of Buccleuch and Lord Melville, on all the es, and for the pursuers, Dame Mary Eleanor Williams or Drummond others, tutors-nominate of Sir James Hamlyn Williams Drummond of rthornden, on the issues Nos. 1, 2, 3, 4, and 7."

he defenders excepted to certain portions of the charge, but the exions were disallowed.

n 7th March 1867 the Court pronounced this interlocutor:—"Apply verdict of the jury in this case, and in respect thereof find the purs entitled to the expenses of the trial, and remit the same to the itor to tax and to report, and quoad ultra supersede in the meantime ter consideration of the cause."

n agreement was thereafter entered into between the pursuers and nders by which a remit was made to Professor Penny, Glasgow, to ect and make such regulations as he should think advisable. On Dr ıy's death the agreement was renewed at various times, and subsisted l 1st March 1873, Mr William Arnot, St Ann's, Lasswade, being subted for Dr Penny.

he pursuers now moved for decree in terms of the conclusions of the mons.

hey argued;—No objection to the motion could be taken on the ground alay. That was granted solely for the benefit of the defenders and r agreement with them. The defenders' experiments had failed, their works were now a greater nuisance than ever. The only remedy decree of declarator and interdict following up the verdict of the . In Rigby v. Beardmore[1] decree was given in nearly the precise s sought here. The pursuers were entitled to decree in general . They were not bound to specify any particular form of pollution. defenders might discover some new process not struck at by a special dict which would be a greater nuisance even than the present. The decided that the river must be left fit for primary uses, and the pur- were entitled to interdict against any and all pollution which un- it for these uses. In England the Courts did not indulge the parties a series of experiments, far less aid them to make such experiments.[2] rty created a nuisance at his own risk, and was bound to discover the of curing it.

e defenders argued;—They had done their best hitherto to mitigate uisance and had greatly abated it. They were still going on experiing, and hoped to be able to cure it altogether. They were willing craved the Court to appoint men of skill to endeavour to do so. If was not done, and if interdict was granted as craved by the pur-, the works must be stopped. It was more reasonable to allow the ance to proceed for a time until the experiments for its removal were usted than to put an end to such important industries. The defenders willing to make every experiment and to carry out every suggestion, if interdict was granted such experiments would be carried on at the of a breach of interdict. It had not been the practice to grant inter-

---

[1] March 8, 1872, ante, vol. x. 568.

[2] Att.-Gen. v. Colney Hatch Asylum, 1868, 4 Chan. App. p. 153—Lord Cancellor Hatherley.

No. 116.

June 10, 1873. Duke of Buccleuch, &c. v. Cowan, &c.

dict in such circumstances, and the Lord Justice-Clerk (Inglis) at the trial specially retained power to consider the result which would follow the verdict. The effect of the verdict was only to let in the equitable interference of the Court, and by no means bound them to grant decree in terms of the conclusions of the summons.

At advising,—

LORD COWAN.—I think it is a necessary consequence of the procedure that has hitherto taken place in this case that the pursuers should have decree of declarator in terms of the conclusions of the summons. It seems to me an extraordinary thing to say that, after a verdict upon issues that were so carefully adjusted to try the merits of the whole of this cause, the pursuers are not entitled to such decree.

One of the defenders' pleas was, that the river had been polluted from time immemorial, and had been in fact a ditch or drain receiving all sorts of pollution from its source to its mouth, and that to complain of the defenders' operations having created the nuisance alleged was contrary to clear reason and legal principle. I need not refer to the allegations on record to that effect, because this is not disputed; and there were pleas to the effect that such being the condition of the river in point of fact there was no room for the complaint of nuisance at all. Of course these allegations were denied, and therefore were matters of fact to be tried before the jury. When the issues came to be adjusted it was the subject of discussion whether it was necessary, having regard to the general terms of the issue granted to the pursuers, there should be any separate issue in reference to the defences pleaded. There was a distinct judgment as to that question; and I was therefore surprised to hear it contended that it had not been considered by the Court.

By interlocutor of 10th February 1866 the Court repelled the plea of "acquiescence stated for all the defenders in the three conjoined actions, being the second plea for the defenders Annandale in the first action, and the third plea in law for all the other defenders in all the three conjoined actions, in respect there are no relevant averments on record to support the said plea: Find that it is not necessary to propose or send to the jury any further issues for the purpose of trying any question of fact raised by the defenders." Now, although I cannot find in the report of the case the ground upon which the Court decided that matter when they adjusted the issue I have not the slightest doubt, from looking at the papers now before me, and from my recollection of the anxious discussion which took place, that it was discussed before us whether there should be counter issues or not. Counter issues were proposed, but the Court said that having given a general issue it was unnecessary to have a special issue applicable to the defences stated, because there could not be a verdict of nuisance without taking into view that which was inherently an essential answer to the question of nuisance. That being so, and the case having now come back to us, why is it that we are not to give some effect to the verdict which has been returned on issues adjusted to try the cause? The Solicitor-General stated that the Court were not in the habit of giving an abstract declarator or recognition of a legal right. That is quite true; but when the legal right is de facto disputed, and attempted to be destroyed, the Court invariably grant declarator. In this particular case I can well understand that declaratory decree is the more necessary, because of the nature of the defences which went to negative that right, and to set up the right of the defenders to innovate upon it. Therefore it seems to me consistent with principle and with procedure in this Court, as well as the pleadings in this cause, that we should now at this stage find and declare in terms of the declaratory conclusions of the summons.

As regards the conclusion for interdict, I have some difficulty in granting interdict in the general terms in which it is expressed in the summons. It is not exactly in terms of the declaratory conclusion. There is a difference which may or may not be material, and there is a question whether, if granted at all, it should be granted in the terms here asked. But apart from the precise terms in which it should be granted, the question is whether we are now to grant or whether, in respect of the statement of the defenders' counsel, we t at least delay pronouncing it. In general, when a right is declared e been innovated upon, that is followed up with interdict; but it is e to overlook the condition of this river as having been used for so long f time by the paper-makers, and the fact of valuable property having ed on the banks of it, which has been a source of industry and profit for riod. A general interdict seems in such circumstances to be a remedy the pursuers are entitled only if the defenders are unable to escape y shewing that they can do something in the way of abating the

No. 116.

June 10, 1878
Duke of Buccleuch, &c. v. Cowan, &c.

That I understand to be the principle of the English cases, and if I d the proposal made by the defenders aright it comes to this, that they o lodge a minute stating that all of them, either conjunctly or severally. g to do certain things which will have the effect of abating the nuisance. hat, before answer, we should have that minute put in. We shall see ated and proposed. Certainly if the proposal merely be that the Court e on themselves the responsibility of remitting to some man of skill to get ; as to what is to be done I do not think the minute would be of much n the way of preventing our granting interdict. But I have to suggest hould allow the defenders to put in a minute stating what they propose abate the nuisance, and what they undertake to do so as to escape from lict which must inevitably follow, unless this minute be sufficient.

BENHOLME.—My opinion is very decided in this case. I think it is a nclusion from the verdict and the procedure that has gone before that ers should get decree in terms of their declarator and their interdict. ted in an English case, and stated I think rightly, that it did not signify y people were interested in maintaining an illegal act, but that if there 00 it was the same thing as if there was one. Now, varying the n, to my mind it is of no consequence whether these defenders have a rest in continuing the nuisance or not. I would grant the interdict reference at all to the amount of interest involved. If it is found that illegal thing for them to pollute this stream I would grant interdict eir doing it.

NEAVES.—I confess I feel a little difficulty about this. So far as regards of it I do not think we can hesitate to give decree in terms of the deconclusion. That is not an abstract decree at all. It was necessary to clarator, because the operations that were struck at were not a very novation, but had been going on for some time, and therefore the right required to be made clear. That has now been done by the ver- I have no hesitation about granting the decree of declarator. I am hat even there the question of amenity should be introduced. In re- e question of interdict, I do not say that Lord Benholme's view is not t one in substance; but the course which I should prefer, particularly o what has been done in other cases, is that we should decern in terms clarator conclusion, whether with or without the reference to the as your Lordships may think right, and that before going further we point or allow the defenders, if so advised, to make such a statement ise that important question. We shall then see what they offer, because their tone has been that this cannot be done. I think that before e should allow them, if so advised, to state what they propose, as a our refusing or modifying the interdict. I confess I think that the t of the pursuers is to have the interdict; but I would not grant interrms of the last line and a-half of what is asked, because it is too vague. lict a party against violating the rights of the pursuer without naming established in the declarator would be irregular and unsatisfactory. be to suspend over a party's head a sword which may fall on him is knowing it.

JUSTICE-CLERK.—I do not object to the suggestion which has been Lord Cowan, and mainly on this ground, that the matter of interdict is a question of possession. Possession has lain over a very long time si verdict, and I do not see that any substantial injury will accrue to eith by our having a specific statement made on the part of the defenders, of them, as to what they have done, or what they are ready to oblige the to do, in the way of abating this nuisance. I am entirely of opinion t amount of interest involved should not affect the question, and I hav been able to understand how, upon a question of this kind, it can possibl the legal right that by doing an illegal act other parties have acquired large and substantial interest in doing it. That all goes to the relevanc action; but that has been conclusively fixed, and it has also been fixed opinion, that the issue is an issue to try the questions raised in controv the conclusions of the summons—to try the whole of these questions an nothing else. A good deal has been founded on what is said to have bee to the jury. These statements are not before us judicially, and I do not express any opinion on that matter; but it does not appear to me that e the views stated was matter for the jury's consideration at all. They w ing a question of fact, and the legal result of that fact when found was for the Court. Nor could it affect the jury's decision what the legal resul be after the fact was found; and therefore, although this may be called plication to the equitable jurisdiction of the Court, it is only so in thi that every application for interdict is an application to the equitable juris of the Court. If we declare the right and find that the right has been v the conclusion for interdict follows as a matter of course, unless there l clear mode of vindicating the right which has been already declared. whole matter, I am for giving decree in terms of the declaratory conc and as regards the interdict, which is a mere question of possession, I see that we are at all fettered, or that we have our hands tied by allow parties to make a statement which may, even if interposed between th the verdict, be of material importance, if any question of breach of i should afterwards have to be considered.

No. 116.

June 10, 1873. Duke of Buccleuch, &c. v. Cowan, &c.

On 3d June the Court pronounced this interlocutor:—"Having, motion of the pursuers, heard counsel in the conjoined actions of dec find and declare, in terms of the leading declaratory conclusions in the three summonses at the instance of the respective pursuers agai respective defenders thereof, 'that the pursuers have good and und right to have the water of the North Esk, so far as it flows thr by their properties, transmitted in a state fit for the use and enjoyr man and beast, and that the said defenders have no right to po adulterate the said water, nor to use it or the channel of the st any way, or for any purpose, such as to render the said water no unwholesome, or unfit for all its natural primary purposes to the p or in any way to destroy the amenity of the said stream:' Quoa continue the cause, and decern."

The defenders having thereafter stated that they had no pro make,—

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—I am not sure that the interdict should not fo issues. It would then be substantially against discharging refuse mat near the mills, and thereby polluting the water of the said stream, to the or injury of the pursuers. No doubt that is a general interdict, but I d that we can very well prevent that.

LORD BENHOLME.—I quite agree.

LORD NEAVES.—I do not think it can be said to be improperly general, the issue is in these terms. But the difficulty is, they are not in t clusions.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—It is deduced from the conclusions as being t

No. 116.

June 10, 1873.
Duke of Buccleuch, &c. v. Cowan, &c.

s of them. I think the interdict should simply follow the terms affirmed e jury. It does not follow that the Court meant to grant an issue up to e conclusions of the summons. I will frame an interlocutor granting the lict as near as may be in the terms found by the jury.

THE COURT pronounced this interlocutor:—"The Lords, having resumed consideration of the cause, allow the pursuers to amend the conclusions of the respective summonses in the conjoined actions by striking out the words 'or the rights of the pursuers therein in any way injured or affected,' and the defenders having stated that they had no proposal to make for abating the nuisance complained of, and did not move for any further inquiry, prohibit and interdict the defenders from discharging into the water of the stream or river of North Esk, from their respective paper-works, any impure stuff or matter of any kind whereby the said water in its progress through or along the properties of the pursuers or any of them may be polluted or rendered unfit for domestic use, or for the use of cattle, and decern: Find the defenders liable in expenses since the 14th March 1867."

SON & STRATHERN, W.S.—WHITE-MILLAR, ALLARDICE, & ROBSON, W.S.—Agents.

No. 117.

June 12, 1873.
Mackenzie v. Mackenzie's Trustees.

NNETH MACKENZIE AND OTHERS, Pursuers.—Millar—W. F. Hunter.
ONALD BEITH AND OTHERS (the Trustees and Executors of Hugh Mackenzie), Defenders.—Fraser—Duncan.

ra—Taciturnity—Acquiescence—Jus relictæ.—A widow was maintained g the eleven years of her viduity by her eldest son, who was her husband's tor, during which time she made no claim for jus relictæ. In an action ht by her representatives fifteen years after her death against the represen- s of her son, held (1) that the claim was not barred by mora and acqui- ce; but (2) that sums expended by the son in the widow's maintenance o be set off against the claim for jus relictæ.

1ST DIVISION. Ld. Mackenzie. B.

URDO MACKENZIE of Dundonnell died on 9th May 1845, survived by wife, Mrs Christian Ross or Mackenzie, and seven children of the iage between them.

e widow died in June 1856, two of the seven children having pre- ased.

a 14th July 1838 the said Murdo Mackenzie executed an entail is estate of Dundonnell in favour of his eldest son, Hugh Mackenzie, ving the whole effect of any trust-deed which might be executed by for the puspose of making provision for his younger children, or for r purposes.

e afterwards executed a trust-disposition dated 5th March 1844, and cil dated 1st April 1845, whereby he disponed to certain parties, of m his eldest son Hugh was one, "all and whatsoever bonds, personal heritable, bills, mortgages," &c. "which I shall have right to at the e of my decease," "and also the rents of my whole lands and estates ch shall fall due and be payable at the first term of Martinmas after death," in trust for certain purposes.

he trustees were directed to pay certain legacies, amounting in all to ut £8300, including legacies of considerable amount to the three dren who were pursuers of the present action.

he said deed contained the following clause,—"And should the funds sby conveyed as aforesaid to my trustees be found, contrary to my ectation, insufficient for the above payments, considering that in the entail which I have made of my lands and estate I have reserved p to burden the same to such extent as I shall deem necessary, with r ence to provisions for my younger children, I hereby farther assign convey to my said trustees the yearly rents of the whole lands salmon-fishings which I have purchased lately belonging to the fami Cromertie, until all the aforesaid payments shall have been made satisfied. Moreover, I hereby farther assign, dispone, and convey t said trustees in trust certain lands called Ardross." At his death in Murdo Mackenzie was possessed of free personal estate amountin £7745, 14s. 11d.

No. 117.

June 12, 1873. Mackenzie v. Mackenzie's Trustees.

Mr Mackenzie had made no provision for his widow, and at his d she became entitled to jus relictæ. No payment of any kind was ma her on her husband's death, and she was supported by her eldest Hugh until her death in 1856.

Hugh Mackenzie, after payment of the legacies mentioned in his fat deed of settlement, and also certain of his father's debts, retained po sion of the residue, both heritable and moveable. He died in 1 having executed a trust-disposition and settlement whereby he disp his whole property, heritable and moveable, to trustees for behoof c daughter.

In these circumstances, on 18th January 1872, three of the you children of Murdo Mackenzie, and his wife Mrs Christian Ross or M kenzie, and as such heirs in mobilibus of their mother, raised this a against the sole surviving trustee of Hugh Mackenzie, and also ag his representatives, concluding for payment to them of their propo of the jus relictæ due to their deceased mother at the date of the dis tion of her marriage.

The defender pleaded;—(3) The settlement of Murdo Mackenzie b one by which he gave to the pursuers legacies in full of all they c claim from his estate they are barred from now insisting, as in rig their mother, to a claim for jus relictæ, which she never made, and w if allowed, would upset the testamentary arrangements as to his e made by Murdo Mackenzie. (4) The direction to appropriate any of the rents of the heritable estate itself to the payment of legacies ing been made by Murdo Mackenzie on the footing that no part o personal estate was to satisfy a claim for jus relictæ, any sums taken these rents or from heritable bonds, wherewith to pay these legacies, be repaid to the defenders as the representatives of Hugh Mackenzi heir in heritage, and the balance only of the personal estate, after s fying the jus relictæ, be appropriated to the payment of legacies; an defenders are entitled to an accounting on this footing with the pur in this action. (5) The present action is excluded by lapse of tim by mora or taciturnity on the part of the pursuers.

The Lord Ordinary pronounced this interlocutor:—"Finds tha late Murdo Mackenzie of Dundonnell died on 9th May 1845, sur by his wife, Mrs Christy or Christian Ross or Mackenzie, and by children of the marriage between them: Finds that upon the dissol of the said marriage one-third part of the goods then in comm between the said spouses vested in the said Mrs Christy or Chr Ross or Mackenzie as jus relictæ: Finds that Mrs Christy or Chr Ross or Mackenzie died in June 1856, survived by five of her children, and that two of the said children predeceased her without Finds that the claim now made for payment of the sum which ves and belonged to the said Mrs Christy or Christian Ross or Macken jus relictæ, and of the interest thereof since her husband's death, excluded or discharged by the trust-disposition and settlement of th

Mackenzie, dated 5th March 1844, or by payment to or acceptance children of the sums or legacies provided to them in said deed." *

NOTE.—The Lord Ordinary considers the points which he has now de- be free from difficulty. Upon the death of Murdo Mackenzie of Dun-, survived by his wife and the children of their marriage, his wife became l to one-third of the goods then in communion between them, as there renunciation of her jus relictæ by marriage-contract or otherwise, and the ested in her ipso jure upon her survivance of her husband. If that claim relictæ has not been paid or discharged, or otherwise satisfied or departed r if it is not barred by mora and taciturnity, it transmitted on her death ive children who survived her.

e defenders plead in answer to the claim now made in the action at the e of three of Mrs Mackenzie's children for their shares of the goods in nion falling under her jus relictæ, that the same is excluded by the trust- tion and settlement of Mr Murdo Mackenzie, and by payment to these n of the legacies thereby left to them.

ere are no provisions whatever in that trust-disposition and settlement in of Mrs Mackenzie. There is not one word in it with reference to her jus , or from which that claim can be held as discharged or excluded. No n is made therein either of her or of her legal rights. The sole trust-pur- f that deed—in addition to those for payment of debts and of some small s to his niece, to a person brought up by him, and to his trustees, and for ance of the testator's lands in Canada to two of his sons—are for payment ain specified sums or legacies to each of his children. It is no doubt d by the trust-settlement that these payments to his children 'shall be d by them as in full satisfaction to them of all bairns' part of gear, legitim, erything else that they could ask or claim by and through my decease.' e only claim competent to the children by and through their father's de- -their mother being alive—was that for legitim. The acceptance of these ons excluded therefore all claim for legitim. But it it did not affect in y their mother's claim for jus relictæ, on which the testator could not h, and did not even attempt by his trust-settlement to encroach. Im- ely upon her husband's death that claim for jus relictæ emerged, and ipso jure in her, and, if not discharged or otherwise satisfied, it, upon her in June 1856, transmitted to her children then surviving.

e legacies left by the trust-settlement to the children and paid to them d to have exhausted the whole moveable estate. If this had been the nd or estate from which these legacies to children were directed to be hen, if the whole moveable estate, including the jus relictæ, had been the children, the claim now made by three of these children for their of their mother's jus relictæ might be excluded. But the trust-settlement ed other funds for payment of the children's provisions, in the event of veable estate and heritable bonds and rents falling due at the first term rtinmas after the testator's death, which were thereby conveyed, being insufficient for that purpose.

he testator had executed in 1838 a deed of entail in favour of Hugh Mac- , his eldest son, and the other heirs of tailzie therein mentioned, which corded in the Register of Tailzies in 1838, and in the Books of Council ession in 1839. But no infeftment was taken upon that deed until after anter's death. By that tailzie Mr Murdo Mackenzie reserved full power, hough it should be recorded, to alter, innovate, or revoke the same, or to e a new deed of tailzie and settlement; and he further reserved 'the effect of any trust-deed which may be executed by me for the purpose of g provisions for my younger children, or for other purposes.' In his trust- ition and settlement, which was executed in 1844, several years after the ailzie, there is contained the following clause, which is inserted immediately he directions to pay the legacies to the children and others:—"And should nds hereby conveyed as aforesaid to my trustees be found, contrary to my

No. 117.

June 12, 1873. Mackenzie v. Mackenzie's Trustees.

The defenders obtained leave to reclaim, and argued;—Eve claim of the present pursuers were not barred by the terms o Mackenzie's settlement, and the acceptance by them of the legacie bequeathed to them, it would be barred by the mere lapse of ti which it must be presumed that the widow's claim of jus relictæ settled to her satisfaction.

Supposing the widow had never been aware of and had n charged this claim during her lifetime, it was not an estate whi transmit to her heirs as if it had been a vested right. Further, t of the free executry left by Murdo Mackenzie had been exha payment of his debts and the legacies left by him in his trust-d there were therefore no funds out of which the claim for jus reli be paid. In any view the sums paid for the widow's maintenanc expectation, insufficient for the above payments, considering that in which I have made of my lands and estates I have reserved power t the same to such extent as I shall deem necessary with reference to for my younger children, I hereby farther assign and convey to my sai the yearly rents of the whole lands and salmon-fishings which I have lately, belonging to the family of Cromertie, until all the aforesaid shall have been made and satisfied.' It is not disputed that the said re have been received by Hugh Mackenzie, one of and the survivor of trustees, who was also the institute under the tailzie, are more than su pay the portion of the legacies left to his children by Murdo Mackenz the free moveable estate, available for that purpose after deduction of ju was insufficient to satisfy.

---

"It was maintained by the defenders, first, that after recording the t Murdo Mackenzie could not exercise the reserved power of making prov favour of his younger children; and second, that the said power was no exercised by him. The Lord Ordinary is of opinion that these objec untenable. The tailzie was granted, not only under that express reserve but also under reservation of the power to alter or revoke the same; a although it had been feudalised in the granter's lifetime, he was en exercise these powers to as great an extent as he thought proper. Wha in the trust-settlement bears expressly to be in exercise of the reserved make provisions for younger children. The rents of a specified part of conveyed in the tailzie are thereby validly assigned to his trustees unt children's provisions should be paid and satisfied. Although that as would not be effectual in competition with a singular successor of th it is good against Hugh Mackenzie, to whom, as institute, these lands veyed by the tailzie under the burden of that reserved power.

"The setting apart or payment of the jus relictæ, to which Mrs M had right, which was the duty of Mr Murdo Mackenzie's trustees and e would have the effect of throwing the burden of payment of the child visions to a considerable extent upon the rents of the Cromertie lands ings assigned. But that cannot affect either the widow's claim to jus the rights of the children to demand full payment of their provisions or because the widow's jus relictæ is not in any way encroached upon by settlement, and the children's legacies are not thereby made contingen discharge of the jus relictæ. The former fell to be set apart or paid o first of the moveable estate, and the latter to be paid out of the rem that estate, in so far as it was sufficient to satisfy them, and as regards paid balance, out of the assigned rents as these accrued in the hand trustees, and of Hugh Mackenzie, the survivor of them. The childre sions, which have been paid to them, must, the Lord Ordinary conc held to have been satisfied out of the proper funds provided by the te that purpose, altogether irrespective of the jus relictæ which it was the Murdo Mackenzie's trustees and executors to retain in their hands for b or to pay to his widow."

ars of viduity must be deducted from the amount ascertained to be jus relictæ.[1] No. 117.

June 12, 1873.
Mackenzie v. Mackenzie's Trustees.

e pursuers argued;—The widow was in ignorance of her rights, and discharged her claim to jus relictæ, which was transmitted to her The executor was locupletior by reason of his failure to pay it.[2]

advising,—

D PRESIDENT.—My Lords, now that we have come to the bottom of this is not attended with difficulty. Murdo Mackenzie of Dundonnell died in leaving a widow, and five sons, and two daughters. The eldest son, Hugh nzie, entered into possession of the estate of Dundonnell under an entail Murdo Mackenzie had himself executed. He had also made provision s younger children by the settlement before us, by which he bequeathed s to the extent of £8305. In order to provide for these legacies and any which might remain unpaid he conveyed to trustees not only his personal but all bonds, heritable or personal, &c., with power to uplift the same, lso the rents of his whole lands and estates which should fall due and be le at the first term of Martinmas after his death.

r, if the funds thus conveyed to the trustees and executors were sufficient debts and discharge the legacies, and also to satisfy the claim of the widow r jus relictæ, there is no longer any difficulty in the case. But further ion was made in the anticipation that the funds might not be sufficient s purposes of the trust. This provision is that in the event of the funds y conveyed proving insufficient he assigned and conveyed to the trustees arly rents of the whole lands and salmon-fishings of a portion of the estate ndonnell, until these payments had been made and satisfied. It is very le, and indeed very probable from what we see on the face of the deed, om the circumstances generally, that Murdo Mackenzie had not in view gal provision for his wife. But the fact that he does not make any pro- for her under the deed cannot affect her legal right, and therefore, when Mackenzie died his trustees and executors were under a legal obligation to her one-third of the sum of £7745, 14s. 11d. It is alleged that, in as affects the widow, they failed to make this payment, or to make any pt to satisfy her claim.

widow survived for eleven years, and died in 1856 without, as it seems, g made the claim for jus relictæ. Being a person who was originally umble station in life, she seems to have lived with her eldest son Hugh at onnell, and afterwards elsewhere, maintained by him, quite contentedly, eemingly not in the knowledge of her legal rights. That fact, however, t affect the legality of her claim.

en she died she was survived by four children, three of whom claim three- of the sum to which their mother was entitled as jus relictæ.

s claim is met with the objection that there were no funds to satisfy d that it would be hard on the representatives of Hugh Mackenzie to his claim brought up at this period of time. No doubt it appears hard, ither hardship nor lapse of time can prevail as an answer to this legal nnot see in this case anything to justify us in holding that the widow has nything to forfeit or discharge her claim.

hardship becomes less when we look at the state of the trust-funds brought r the accountant, which, it is true, is not accurate, but as nearly correct as aterials would permit. There we find that the amount of the free executry 7745, 14s. 11d.

---

efenders' Authorities.—Hume v. Huntly, Dec. 13, 1628, M. 2764; Robson water, March 16, 1870, ante, vol. viii. 757; Pringle v. Pringle's Executors, 2, 1870, ante, vol. viii. 722.

ursuers' Authorities.—Hope v. Dickson, Dec. 17, 1833, 12 Sh. 222; 's Trustees v. Keith, July 17, 1857, 19 D. 1040.

No. 117.

June 12, 1873. Mackenzie v. Mackenzie's Trustees.

If Hugh Mackenzie, the acting trustee, had set aside one-third of that, or £2580 odds, he would still have had left £5165 odds to meet the legacies. Besides that, the trustees had extra funds conveyed to them. There was £2000 in the Millbank bond, and they were entitled to the half year's rents of the estate which were provided to meet these legacies, and not to go to the heir. Say that these amounted, as contended for the claimants, to £1500—even if they were not enough he could go against the rents of the portions of the estate which were specially assigned until he had got enough realised to meet all claims. But it appears that the funds actually in the hands of Hugh Mackenzie and his co-trustee, after the death of Murdo Mackenzie, were more than sufficient to meet all charges on the estate, even on the assumption that enough had been set aside to meet the jus relictæ. That being so, what is the result? The sum that would have met this claim remained in the hands of Hugh Mackenzie, and may have been spent, but an account of it is now called for. Where, then, is the hardship here? In so far as any claim was not satisfied, such as this for jus relictæ, he was locupletior. If he had been the residuary legatee he might have said that it was a great hardship that having taken this as the free balance of the trust-estate and spent it he had now to refund. But he could not say that here, because any surplus belonged to the younger brothers and sisters along with himself. This is not a case of hardship at all, and the mere lapse of time is quite immaterial from a legal point of view. It is alleged that Hugh Mackenzie spent the sum the widow could claim in maintaining her, and if that be so he is entitled to set whatever was so expended off against this claim for jus relictæ; and therefore, though I am prepared to adhere to the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor, I think the trustee should be allowed to establish what moneys were so spent, and to get credit for them.

Lord Deas.—The first thing here is to see how matters stood at the death of Murdo Mackenzie in 1845. Had his widow at that time a good claim to jus relictæ? If she had, the only other question will be whether her representatives have now lost that claim.

Mr Mackenzie's settlements consisted of two deeds—one a deed of entail in favour of his eldest son Hugh and certain other parties of the lands therein described. That deed is dated in 1838, and in it he reserves full power to alter or innovate it at pleasure, and he specially reserves power to grant deeds providing for his younger children. It is plain that this deed was merely testamentary. It was made on a footing which left him entitled to dispose of his heritable estate by any subsequent deed.

By his deed of 1844 he conveyed his whole estate, heritable and moveable, to his eldest son Hugh and others, as trustees, for the purpose of paying his debts, real and personal, and certain special provisions to each of his younger children in full of legitim, and of everything else which they could claim from or through him. It appears that the truster left a widow, of whom he makes no mention, and for whom he makes no provision in this or any other deed. It is plain, therefore, that in 1845, on the death of her husband, the widow was entitled to her jus relictæ, and that, if nothing to the contrary intervened, the right to it passed, upon her dying intestate, to her surviving children.

It is said on plausible grounds that, apart from his heritable estate, Murdo Mackenzie left sufficient personal estate to pay all the legacies, and also to satisfy the widow's claim for jus relictæ. But whether that was so or not does not appear to me to be material, because the effect of Mr Murdo Mackenzie's two deeds taken together was to make the rents of his heritable property equally liable with his personal means and estate for payment of his debts and onerous obligations.

The widow died in 1856, and three out of her four surviving children, as her representatives, claim her jus relictæ in this action. The only answer which is made is that the truster, Murdo Mackenzie, had not in view the legal claim competent to his widow, and probably was ignorant of its competency and existence. But it does not make the claim the less an onerous obligation against him that he was ignorant of it. The obligation therefore existed at Murdo Mackenzie's

No. 117.

June 12, 1873.
Mackenzie v. Mackenzie's Trustees.

h, and the only other question is, has anything occurred since then to make obligation no longer exigible.
r eleven years the widow survived and made no claim, and for a further d of fifteen years her representatives also remained silent. But the right to relictæ cannot be lost by mere lapse of time, if the period of prescription inable has not run. Except the lapse of time—which is short of forty years e only other thing said against the claim is that during the widow's sur- nce she was maintained by her son Hugh. But unless this amounts to an rtion of an implied contract, that she was so maintained on the condition her claim to jus relictæ was abandoned, it is not a good answer.
a the case of Robson v. Bywater it required all the circumstances taken ther to make out the abandonment of the claim. But the circumstances of case were very different from those here. I therefore think that the inter- tor of the Lord Ordinary is well founded. At same time I see no objection serting the reservation proposed by your Lordship. If it does appear that h maintained his mother it is quite possible that he may be entitled to credit the expense of that maintenance, although it does not amount to an implied donment of the claim for jus relictæ.

ORD ARDMILLAN.—This claim is now made after the lapse of a long period ime. But it is well settled, and settled before the case of Robson v. By- r, that mere taciturnity, the mere lapse of a long period of time without the m being made, will not be held of itself to imply dereliction, or abandonment, discharge. In the case of Bywater lapse of time was not held sufficient of lf, but taken in connection with the real evidence afforded by the conduct actings of the parties abandonment or discharge of claim was held to be lied. In the case of Pringle the Court again decided that the mere silence the widow was not enough. But silence in the circumstances which that disclosed amounted to an election by her to take the annuity which was n to her by her husband's settlement in place of her legal right of terce. In case there has no doubt been silence for a very long period; but I see no cient augmentation furnished by the actings of the parties here to the pre- ption suggested by this lapse of time. I see no real evidence coming in aid aciturnity which will imply discharge. I have only to add that I agree in propriety of the reservation which is proposed; because if Hugh supported mother, and supplied her with funds during the period after her husband's h, then, in a question of accounting, he is fairly entitled to credit for these nces. But that remains to be considered, and in any view it is not a trans- n from which discharge or abandonment can be implied.

ORD JERVISWOODE concurred.

THIS interlocutor was pronounced:—"Adhere to the said interlocutor, but under reservation of the claim of Hugh Mackenzie's trustee to set off against the amount of the jus relictæ any sums which he can shew that Hugh Mackenzie expended on the maintenance of the widow during her viduity: Find the respondents, the pursuers of the second action, entitled to expenses since the date of the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor, and remit to the Auditor to tax the amount of said expenses, and report to the Lord Ordinary, and remit," &c.

KENE, WEBSTER, & PEACOCK, W.S.—MURRAY, BEITH, & MURRAY, W.S.—Agents.

No. 118.
June 13, 1873.
Lord Advocate v. M'Douall.

THE RIGHT HON. THE LORD ADVOCATE (on behalf of the Commissioners of Woods and Forests), Pursuers.—Sol.-Gen. Clark—Ivory.
JAMES M'DOUALL, Defender.—Millar—Blair.

Salmon-fishing—Prescription—Possession.—Circumstances in which held that a proprietor of a barony and of lands held under a Crown grant cum piscationibus, had not had such prescriptive possession of salmon-fishings in the sea as to instruct a right of salmon-fishing.

1ST DIVISION. Ld. Ormidale. B.

THIS action was raised at the instance of the Lord Advocate against James M'Douall, the proprietor of the estate of Logan in Wigtownshire, concluding for declarator that the salmon-fishings in the sea ex adverso of the lands of the defender, in the parishes of Kirkmaiden and Stoneykirk, specified in the summons, belonged to the Crown, and that the defender had no right to fish for salmon, grilse, or salmon trout in the sea ex adverso of his said lands by stake or bag-nets, or by net or coble, or in any other way, or to grant leases of such salmon-fishings.

The lands in question were held partly under a barony title, without any mention of salmon or other fishings, and partly under crown charters cum piscationibus.

The pursuers averred that the defender and his predecessors had not under their titles fished for salmon, grilse, or salmon-trout ex adverso of the said lands for such a time or in such a way as to give them a prescriptive right to the salmon-fishings in the sea.

The defender averred that he had exercised such an exclusive right of salmon-fishing for time immemorial.

The pursuer pleaded;—(1) The right of salmon-fishing in Scotland or in the sea round its coasts, and in the navigable estuaries, bays, and rivers thereof, so far as the same has not been granted out by the Crown by charter or otherwise, belongs exclusively to the Crown, and forms part of its hereditary revenue. (2) The Crown having never granted to the defender or his predecessors any such right, the said defender has no right by virtue of his titles to fish for salmon, grilse, or salmon trout in the sea ex adverso of the said lands or any part of the same, nor to grant leases of the whole of said salmon-fishings or any part thereof. (3) The titles to the lands secondly, thirdly, and fourthly described in the summons conclusions containing no grant of 'fishings,' and the lands themselves forming no part of a barony, the defender has no right under his titles and has no basis for acquiring a right by prescription, to the salmon-fishings in the sea ex adverso of these lands. (4) The titles of the said defender to the lands forming the barony of Logan, and to the five-merk lands of Crichen and of Carrachtree, containing no express grant of salmon-fishings, and the salmon-fishings ex adverso of these lands not having been possessed by the said defender or his predecessors for the prescriptive period under and by virtue of said titles, the said defender has no right thereto.

The defender pleaded;—(1) The defender, in virtue of his writs and title-deeds, and the possession following thereon, is in right of the salmon-fishing in the sea ex adverso of the barony of Logan, including therein the lands of Crichen and Carrachtree. (2) The defender and his predecessors, having for upwards of forty years, or from time immemorial, possessed, enjoyed, and exercised the exclusive right of salmon-fishing in the sea ex adverso of the lands of the barony of Logan, and of the said lands of Crichen and Carrachtree, the defender has a valid and indefeasible right to the said fishings. (3) The defender having a good title to the salmon-fishings above mentioned, the claim now made on behalf of the Crown

No. 118.

June 13, 1873.
Lord Advocate v. M'Douall.

thereto is excluded; and the other fishings referred to in the summons not being claimed by the defender he is entitled to absolvitor, with expenses.

A proof was taken, the import of which is given in the opinion of Lord Ardmillan.

The Lord Ordinary pronounced the following interlocutor:—"The Lord Ordinary having heard counsel for the parties, and considered the argument and proceedings, including the proof, finds it has been sufficiently proved that the defender and his predecessors have for more than forty years, or for time immemorial prior to the institution of this action, enjoyed and exercised, under and in virtue of good and habile titles, the exclusive right of fishing for salmon, grilse, and salmon trout in the sea ex adverso of the following lands belonging to them mentioned in the conclusions of the summons, viz.,—All and Whole the lands forming or embraced in the barony of Logan, situated in the parish of Kirkmaiden and county of Wigtown, bounded by the sea, extending, the coast of the said barony, on the Irish Channel or western side, from Drumbreddan Bay on the north to Crummag Head on the south, and on the Bay of Luce or eastern side from Chapel Rossan on the north to Kilstay or Palnimrick Burn on the south, and the five merk lands of Crichen, and the ten merk lands of Carrachtree, also lying within the said parish of Kirkmaiden and county of Wigtown: Therefore, quoad the right of fishing for salmon, grilse, and salmon trout in the sea ex adverso of said lands, assoilzies the defender from the conclusions of the summons, and decerns; and in respect the defender does not claim and has not attempted to prove a right to fish for salmon, grilse, or salmon trout in the sea ex adverso of the following lands mentioned in the conclusions of the summons, viz.,—the five merk lands of old extent of Mool, the croft of land commonly called Croft Gregnan, the croft of land called Cove Croft in Mool, the ten merk lands of old extent of Altown, now commonly called Maryport, the five merk lands of Corgie, all lying in the parish of Kirkmaiden and county of Wigtown; the twenty shillings land of Genoch, five merk lands of Nether Torrys, forty-six shillings and eight-penny lands of Over Torrys, and twenty shilling lands of Whytercrook and Croftling, lying within the parish of Old Luce and sheriffdom of Wigtown: Therefore, quoad these last-mentioned lands, finds, decerns, and declares in terms of the conclusions of the summons: Finds that the other lands mentioned in the conclusions of the summons are not to any extent bounded by the sea: Therefore, quoad these other lands assoilzies the defender from the conclusions of the action, and decerns: Finds the defender entitled to expenses, allows an account thereof," &c. *

---

* "NOTE.—The Lord Ordinary does not think that to the extent to which absolvitor has now been pronounced any serious difficulty can be entertained on the proof; and in regard to that part of the conclusions of the summons for which decree has been pronounced in favour of the pursuer there could of course be no difficulty, as no dispute was raised in relation to it.

"All the lands, ex adverso of which the defender has now been found to have proved a prescriptive right to the salmon-fishing, are admittedly component parts of the barony of Logan, with the exception of the lands of Crichen and Carrachtree, about which it is said to be not quite clear whether they form parts of the barony or not. This matter, however, is of no practical importance, because, whether they are to be held as forming part of the barony or not, they are held under crown charters cum piscationibus, which is sufficient to found a title by possession for the prescriptive period to salmon-fishings; and as a barony title is sufficient for the same purpose there can be no question, and

No. 118.

June 13, 1873.
Lord Advocate
v. M'Douall.

The pursuer reclaimed, and argued that the possession founded on by the defender was not of such a character as had ever, in a question none was raised, as to the defender's titles, quoad the whole lands in regard to which he has been found successful, being good and habile, if fortified by possession for the prescriptive period, to give him a right to salmon-fishings—Nicol and Others (Milne's Trustees) v. Lord Advocate, July 1, 1868, 6 Macph., p. 972.

"Accordingly, the only disputed question between the parties in this case related to the import and effect of the proof;—the defender, who had undertaken the onus probandi, contending that it was ample and sufficient to support the right of salmon-fishing claimed by him; while on the part of the pursuer it was argued that it was not so, but, on the contrary, that it merely shewed that, although a few fish of the salmon kind were occasionally caught by or for the defender and his predecessors, that occurred accidentally in the course of prosecution of white or other fishing, in such a way as to be incapable of establishing a right of salmon-fishing. The Lord Ordinary has been unable to give effect to this argument for the Crown. He has, indeed, had very little if any difficulty in giving effect to the contention of the defender.

"The proof will require to be read and considered as a whole in order to form a just and sound appreciation of it. The Lord Ordinary has, after a careful consideration of it, to observe that it appears to him to contain all the elements necessary to support the defender's case. (1) Whether the salmon-fishing exercised by the defender and his predecessors was of a character and description sufficient in itself is a matter which will be immediately noticed; but that, such as it was, it extended over the requisite period is so entirely beyond all question on the proof that it is quite unnecessary to dwell upon the point. (2) Nor does the Lord Ordinary think that the catching of salmon was merely a casual and accidental thing, occurring in the course of the prosecution of white or other fishing. On the contrary, it appears to him to be sufficiently proved that catching fish of the salmon kind has always been considered, if not the chief, at least an important object of the fishermen as well as of all the other parties concerned. There is abundant evidence to this effect. (3) The mode of fishing which seems to have been adopted was also suitable and appropriate for the catching of fish of the salmon kind. Net and coble were substantially the means employed. And at any rate, having regard to the means employed as described by the witnesses, and among others by M'Craken (proof, p. 21, F G), M'Creadie (p. 30, E F G, and p. 31, F G), and James Goudie (p. 33, B C), there can be no doubt the mode or means resorted to were efficient for the purpose. (4) Not only was leave to fish almost always asked and considered to be necessary from the defender and his predecessors, but all persons not having such leave were prevented from fishing. The proof is clearly to this effect as applicable to the whole prescriptive period. And (5) it has also been well established that for leave to fish a consideration was always exacted by the defender and his predecessors, consisting, for the greater part of the prescriptive period, of the best salmon or other fish caught, and latterly of a money rent.

"If the Lord Ordinary be right in holding these to be clearly established points by the proof it is difficult to understand how the defender's contention could well be resisted. But it seemed to be maintained on the part of the pursuer that in no correct view could the defender's claim be sustained, except as regards some limited places ex adverso of his lands; but these places were not, so far as the Lord Ordinary noticed, exactly condescended on by the pursuer. He at any rate thinks that the proof is applicable alike to at least all the places ex adverso of which the defender's claim to the salmon-fishing has now been sustained. The more important of the witnesses state very distinctly that the fishing was exercised all along both sides of the Mull of Galloway opposite the defender's lands, the Luce Bay side, and also the Irish Channel side, just as it was found suitable and convenient; and, in particular, reference on this point may be made to the testimony of the witnesses Murray (p. 11, E to G), M'Cra-

No. 118.
June 13, 1873.
Lord Advocate v. M'Douall.

h the Crown, been held sufficient to establish a right of salmon-ning. The greater part of the defender's proof only went to shew t a few fish of the salmon kind had occasionally been caught by or the proprietors of Logan in the prosecution of the white fishing by ught nets, and that they had endeavoured to arrogate to themselves altogether illegal and unfounded right to the possession or control not rely of the salmon-fishing, but of all the sea-fishing along the coast their estate.[1]

The defender argued that the possession, clearly proved by fishing with draught net for salmon for the table at Logan House, and supplying fish-pond, was ample and sufficient to support the right claimed under titles; and that the proprietors of Logan had also possessed through ir tenants and others, who had invariably obtained their leave to fish ng the coast.[2]

At advising,—

LORD ARDMILLAN.—I do not think that this case is attended with any peculiar ficulty, either in point of law or point of fact. We are in a question between Lord Advocate, as representing Her Majesty, and Mr M'Douall of Logan, claims a right of salmon-fishing ex adverso of his lands of Logan and others Wigtonshire. The lands of Logan are held under a barony title; and certain er lands mentioned in the record are held under a crown grant cum piscationibus, but without mention of salmon.

Salmon-fishings are inter regalia, and no one can have a valid right to salmon-hing who cannot instruct a grant from the Crown. A barony title, where there no grant of salmon-fishing, does not, without prescriptive possession, support claim to a right of salmon-fishing. But a barony title, or a title to lands cum cationibus (though not piscationibus salmonum), is a sufficient foundation on hich a claim to salmon-fishing may be built, and a right may be acquired by scriptive possession. In such a case possession is not a mode of indicating title, but is a mode of acquiring it. In the present case it is not alleged that r M'Douall has an express title from the Crown to salmon-fishing. He has a le to the barony of Logan, and he has, in regard to two separate portions of nd, a title cum piscationibus, but without mention of salmon. These titles, ntaining no royal grant of salmon-fishing, do not of themselves instruct a right salmon-fishing, or support the claim to salmon-fishing in a question with the own. But a satisfactory proof of prescriptive possession of salmon-fishing by e proprietor of Logan,—a possession clear, continued, unequivocal, and exclu-ve,—may have the effect of extending the scope and meaning of the charter, d thus of sustaining the claim.

In a question with the Crown the burden of proof lies entirely upon the de-nder; and if the proof fails in regard to any of those necessary qualities of pos-sion to which I have adverted the effect of such failure must be the loss of e case.

It is necessary to bear in mind the distinction between that possession which urged merely in order to instruct the exercise of a right constituted by charter, d the possession which is urged for the purpose of extending the construction the title, and including within it a right which has not been specially con-

---

16, D to G, and p. 19, E to G), John Robb (p. 23, F G, and p. 24, F G), and mes Robb (p. 28, F).

"These are the grounds upon which the Lord Ordinary has proceeded in ing judgment in this case."

[1] Stuart v. M'Barnet, July 21, 1868, ante, vol. vi., H. L. 123; Lord-Adv. v. nclair, June 14, 1865, ante, vol. iii. 981, aff. June 7, 1867, ante, vol. v. H. L. 97.

[2] Lord-Adv. v. Cathcart, May 19, 1871, ante, vol. ix. p. 744; D. of Sutherland Ross, June 11, 1836, 14 S. 960, and Smollett v. Colquhoun, 1779, ibi. cit.; rd-Adv. v. Hall, Nov. 9, 1869, 7 S. L. R. 62; Lord-Adv. v. Milne's Trs., ly 1, 1868, ante, vol. vi. p. 972.

No. 118.

June 13, 1873. Lord Advocate v. M'Douall.

ferred. In regard to this last kind of possession the law demands that it be of the strongest and most unequivocal character; and such a possession Mr M'Douall must instruct in the present case. This is quite settled by authority. I need only mention the case of the Duke of Sutherland v. Ross, 11th June 1836, and the case of the Lord Advocate v. Sinclair, decided in this Court on 14th June 1865, and affirmed in the House of Lords on 7th June 1867. That case of Sinclair was decided on the proof in favour of the proprietor; but the law was laid down, both here and in the House of Lords, in accordance with what I have now stated. The same statement of the law in regard to possession on a barony title was given in the case of the Duke of Richmond v. Lord Seafield, 16th Feb. 1870, 8 Macph. 530, where complete proof of possession of the character which I have described was required, though the proprietor had a barony title with a grant cum piscationibus. The recent case of the Lord Advocate v. Hall on 9th November 1869, where the nature of the required possession was carefully considered, is a further authority; and, for my own part, I adhere to the views of the law which I expressed in that case.

The proof of possession in the present case is, in my opinion, altogether inadequate to support the claim of Mr M'Douall to a right of salmon-fishing.

The ordinary and well understood mode of fishing salmon in the sea ex adverso of the Logan estate was certainly introduced for the first time in 1856, about seventeen years ago. We know that such fishing was first introduced on the coast of Ayrshire a good many years before that date, I think about 1838, but not so long ago as to amount to prescriptive possession. This was ascertained in the case of Carlton. Therefore, unless Mr M'Douall has been able to instruct some kind of possession different from the usual and appropriate and recognised mode of fishing by net and coble, he cannot carry back his possession to a period earlier than 1856. We have here no case of salmon-fishing till within twenty years, and no salmon-fishing distinct from other fishing. We have, indeed, had a great deal of evidence about fishing in the sea with common draught nets, and for a long period. But that was not primarily or properly salmon-fishing. I am quite satisfied that, apart from the question of leave, to which I shall afterwards advert, this fishing with a common draught net in the sea, the fisher occasionally catching a salmon, was not a sufficient act of possession in exercise and assertion of a right of salmon-fishing. Fishing in the sea with a draught net, in the manner described by these witnesses, is not primarily and principally salmon-fishing, and does not become salmon-fishing because a salmon is occasionally caught.

I need not enlarge on this point. I think it free from doubt; and I concur in the remarks which have been made in the case of the Duke of Sutherland v. Ross and other cases as to requiring proof of possession by the recognised and appropriate mode of fishing.

But it is said (first) that the proprietor of Logan has instructed sufficient possession by proving that he and his servants fished for salmon with a draught net for his table and for his pond; and (secondly), that he possessed through his tenants, to whom he gave leave to fish salmon and other fish along the coast. The proof of personal possession by the proprietor and his servants, taken by itself, is so inadequate and so limited, both as regards the locality of the fishing, the time of the fishing, and the manner and purpose of the fishing, that really little weight can be given to it, apart from the proof of fishing by tenants on leave granted by the proprietor.

The question raised in regard to fishing with this leave is important; and the defender's claim has been strongly maintained on that ground. I have given my best attention to the argument on this point, and I have again and again perused the proof, and I have arrived at the conclusion that there is no satisfactory evidence of leave being granted to fish salmon as distinguished from leave to fish generally. It seems that the proprietor of Logan fancied that he had a right to prohibit all fishing in the sea opposite his estate. That this notion existed on the part of the proprietor is admitted by several of the witnesses for Mr M'Douall, and at least one of them expressly says that "nobody was entitled to fish without leave from the laird, either for white fish or anything else." This was the pre-

No. 118.

June 13, 1873.
Lord Advocate
v. M'Douall.

etor's view. On this view he possessed. He prohibited generally, and he re leave occasionally and exceptionally. Now, either that prohibition of all ught net fishing in the sea opposite his lands was legal or illegal;—it was her a lawful exercise of right, or it was a usurpation of right.

The counsel for Mr M'Douall seemed to maintain that the general prohibition draught fishing in the sea was lawful; and that the laird had the right to ohibit the whole fishing on his coast. I am clearly of opinion that it was not wful. The fishing of white fish in the sea with a draught net could not, my opinion, be lawfully prohibited by the proprietor, even on the plea that a lmon might occasionally be caught in the net. The great authority of Lord air is conclusive on this point, and the authority of more recent writers might quoted if necessary—(Stair, i. 1, 5; Bankton, ii. 1, 1; Bell's Prin., par. 646; amsay v. Kellies, 22d November 1776, 5 Brown's Sup., 445.)

If the prohibition was unlawful, and a usurpation of right, as I hold it to be, en the leave given to a few, being an exception from that prohibition, can have effect as an act of possession in this case. The leave was general—applicable all fish—just as the prohibition was general. The party to whom the leave as granted had no better right than the whole fishermen would have had but r the prohibition,—no better right than the whole fishermen were entitled to ve. The making the man who had the leave an exception from a prohibition forced against others was a wrong to the remainder; and the doing of a wrong nnot be recognised as the lawful assertion of a right.

In any view the fishing with draught net under such a leave cannot be conidered as exclusive. It was not exclusive in point of fact, for it is proved that ny fished who had no leave; and it could not be exclusive in point of law, ecause being simply an exception from an illegal prohibition its exclusiveness pended on the lawfulness of the prohibition, and cannot be recognised.

But further, it is proved that the fishing with draught net, such as has been scribed, being white-fishing with the chance of taking an occasional salmon, s been continued since the lease of the salmon-fishing to M'Creadie, and afterrds to Glendinning. Now, both of these men were in succession tenants of e whole salmon-fishing. M'Creadie states that he had the exclusive right to h salmon; and the lease to Glendinning, who succeeded him, is to the same fect. But Mr M'Douall's witnesses—M'Cracken and Robb—state that they ntinued, after and in knowledge of the lease to M'Creadie, their fishing with e draught net under what they called their leave from the proprietor. There as in this lease no reservation of any such privilege. If their fishing was inconistent with the fishing by M'Creadie, the tenant to whom the right of salmonshing had been let, then it was just a trespass and a wrong; and if it was conistent with M'Creadie's fishing, then it was not proper salmon-fishing, for all roper salmon-fishing in that locality, and ex adverso of the Logan estate, had en let to M'Creadie. But on their own admission the character or quality of eir mode of fishing, and consequently of any possession instructed by such ode of fishing, was the same after 1856 as it had previously been, and therefore never was an exercise of a proper right of salmon-fishing.

On considering the whole proof of possession on the part of the proprietor of Logan, with reference to the time, the manner, the instrument, and the character f the only fishing which has been proved down to 1856, I am of opinion that uch possession of the right of salmon-fishing as law requires has not been nstructed prior to 1856, and that is conclusive. I therefore suggest to your Lordships that we recall the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary, and decern in rms of the conclusions of this action.

Lord Deas.—I am of the opinion expressed by Lord Ardmillan, and I do not hink it necessary to go into detail. I think that up to the time that these shings were let in 1856 the consideration was much more for the use of the , and for what was supposed to be a concession for the use of the shore, than r the salmon-fishings.

Lord Jerviswoode concurred.

No. 118.
June 13, 1873.
Lord Advocate v. M'Douall.

LORD PRESIDENT.—I am of the same opinion, upon this simple ground, that the possession which has been proved for the last forty years in this case is not of such a kind as is in law sufficient, in combination with a barony title, or a grant cum piscationibus, to instruct a right of salmon-fishings.

THE following interlocutor was pronounced:—"Recall the interlocutor: Find that the defender's two merk and one-half merk land of old extent of Balziellan otherwise Logan; two merk and one-half merk lands of old extent of Balziellan-M'Kellie; two merk and one-half merk lands of Cairn, and five merk lands of Carachtree, all lying within the parish of Kirkmaiden and sheriffdom of Wigtown; as also the following lands belonging to the defender in the united parishes of Clashant and Stoneykirk and sheriffdom aforesaid, viz., the five merk lands of Culgroat and Alteteog, and the five merk lands of old extent of Culgrotte, with the croft of land called St John's Croft alias Altichoge or Alteteog adjacent thereto, the town and lands of Elrig or Eldrick, commonly called the ten shilling land of Elrig, with the mill and mill lands of Kirkmagill and pertinents thereof, and All and Whole the three merk land and merk land of Meikle and Little Glentriploch or Glentribloch, with the pertinents thereof, are inland lands, and have no sea boundary; and therefore, quoad the right of fishing for salmon, grilse, or salmon-trout, concluded for as ex adverso of the said lands, dismiss the action, and decern: Quoad ultra repel the defences: Find, declare, and decern in terms of the conclusions of the summons: Find the defender liable in expenses, and remit," &c.

DONALD BEITH, W.S.—HUNTER, BLAIR, & COWAN, W.S.—Agents.

No. 119.
June 13, 1873.
Hay's Trustees v. Hay Miln.

ROBERT HENDERSON ARKLEY AND OTHERS (Hay's Trustees), Petitioners—Sol.-Gen. Clark—Mackay.
ALEXANDER HAY MILN, Respondent.—Watson.

Trust—Sale of Trust-estate—Trusts (Scotland) Act, 1867 (30 and 31 Vict. cap. 97, sec. 3).—The Trusts Act, 1867, sec. 3, empowers the Court of Session to grant authority to trustees to sell the trust-estate, or part thereof, "on being satisfied that the same is expedient for the execution of the trust, and not inconsistent with the intention thereof." A truster directed his trustees to hold certain estates for payment of his debts, and in any event for twenty-one years, and for payment of an annuity, also secured by a separate bond, to his nephew, upon whom, and a series of heirs, they were directed to entail the estates when the debt should all be paid off. The trustees were expressly forbidden to sell any part of the landed estates in question. At the truster's death the annual burdens and interest of debts exceeded the rental by £106. Held (rev. judgment of Lord Gifford) that the Act did not authorise the Court to grant authority to sell any part of the estate.

1ST DIVISION.
Lord Gifford.
M.

JOHN HAY, Esq. of Letham, died on 23d May 1869, possessed of considerable fee-simple estates in the counties of Forfar and Perth, but burdened with a large amount of debt. He left a trust-disposition and settlement, dated 12th April 1867, by which he conveyed his whole property, real and personal, to trustees. The trustees were directed (1) to realise his estate, other than the landed estates before mentioned, and to apply the proceeds thus obtained, and the rents of the landed estates, in payment of the truster's debts, including an annuity after mentioned. (2) They were expressly forbidden to sell any part of his landed estates in the counties of Forfar and Perth, therein enumerated, but were directed

No. 119.

June 13, 1873.

Hay's Trustees v. Hay Miln.

ıold the same until his debts were all paid, and, in any event, for nty-one years at least; provision being made for the application of the plus in the purchase of additional lands, if the debts should have been d off before the expiry of the twenty-one years. (3) During the exist- e of the trust his nephew, Alexander Hay Miln, and, failing him, a es of heirs enumerated, were to receive an annuity of £750 under the d of annuity after expressed, but so that this annuity should never eed one-third of the free rental of the estates held by the trustees at time, after deducting burdens and the interest of the debt. (4) The d, in the first instance, fixed the duration of the trust as above men- ed, but afterwards, by a codicil, Mr Hay directed that the trustees uld extinguish the debts by an annuity arrangement with an insurance pany, to expire in not more than fifty years, or less than forty years. When the debt should all be paid off, the trustees were directed, if xander Hay Miln should be then alive, to hold the trust for his behoof, f he should be dead, or otherwise upon his death, to execute an entail the lands in favour of the son of the said Alexander Hay Miln, and a es of heirs.

3y separate bond of annuity, of even date with the trust-deed, Mr Hay nd himself, and his heirs and successors, for an annuity of £750 to be d to his nephew, the said Alexander Hay Miln, whom failing, to Mr ln's son and the same series of heirs as were called as heirs of entail under deed of entail directed to be executed by the trust-deed. This annuity s granted under the special declaration before mentioned. Clauses were roduced in the trust-deed and the bond of annuity to the effect that if Hay Miln or any of the heirs of entail should attempt to challenge or aside the settlements, or even avail themselves of the powers of the tail Amendment Act, they should forfeit all right under the deeds.

Having realised the estate so far as they were permitted by the trust- d to do so the trustees found themselves in possession of estates lding a gross rental of £5035, while the burdens, interest of debt, and er charges payable by them, amounted to £5141, leaving an annual iciency of £106.

As there was thus no prospect of the trustees being able, without addi- nal powers, to pay off the debts, or pay any part of the annuity to Mr y Miln, they presented this petition, under sec. 3 of the Trusts Scotland t, 1867 (30 and 31 Vict. cap. 97), praying the Court to "authorise them sell by public roup such part or parts of the estate as they shall consider st expedient, but not exceeding in amount the sum of £2500 of rental, free proceeds to be applied by them in extinction pro tanto of the ritable debt presently affecting the lands, and to authorise them to pay expense of the application out of the trust-estate under their charge." swers were lodged for Mr Miln, in which he concurred in the statements fact given in the petition, but stated, "if lands were sold to the extent a rental of £2000, being the smallest alternative amount suggested in e petition, the proceeds, say about £60,000, would enable the trustees reduce the debt to about £37,500, and would leave a surplus rental, suming the present rental to be maintained, of about £880. This surplus ital would, were the trustees to transact with an insurance company, directed by the truster, for paying off the debt by way of annuity, do le more than accomplish that object in forty years, that period being minimum time provided by the truster for paying off his debts by way annuity. Thus the respondent, who is the beneficiary first in order ended to be benefited by the trust, and who has been constituted a ditor on the estate by the truster, would never derive any advantage m the trust whatever. A considerably larger sale of lands therefore than that contemplated by the petition must be effected to meet the respondent's just claim. He therefore, while concurring in the necessity for a sale, does so on the footing that his annuity will be provided for out of the proceeds of such sale."

No. 119.

June 13, 1873. Hay's Trustees v. Hay Miln.

The third section of the Trusts Act authorises the Court on the petition of the trustees under any trust-deed to grant them authority, "on being satisfied that the same is expedient for the execution of the trust, and not inconsistent with the intention thereof," inter alia, "to sell the trust-estate or any part thereof."

The first purpose of the trust-deed provided that the trustees should, "with all convenient speed apply the trust property, excepting my landed estates particularly above named, no part whereof they shall have liberty to sell, and also excepting the furniture," &c. . . . "but including the rents and yearly produce of my said landed estates, in payment of all my debts, including the sums falling due under the bond of annuity granted by me of even date with these presents in favour of my nephew, Alexander Hay Miln of Woodhill and others, my deathbed and funeral expenses, and the expenses of executing this trust; and in carrying out this direction they shall have power to realise my estate as far as permitted to be sold in such manner, at such times, and in such order as they may consider most expedient, the fullest powers of administration and management being hereby given to them for this purpose."

A codicil dated 15th May 1867, and consisting chiefly of special legacies, contained this declaration:—"I declare my sole wish is to pay off my debts, and entail the lands mentioned in my trust-deed, and revoke all former codicils."

The Lord Ordinary remitted to Mr T. G. Murray, W.S., to inquire into the facts and circumstances set forth in the petition, and to report, and afterwards, upon consideration of the report, pronounced this interlocutor:—"Grants to the petitioners the powers craved by them in terms of the whole prayer of the petition; and authorises the petitioners to pay the expense of the present application, and of the whole procedure thereon incurred by them, and as the same may be taxed by the Auditor of Court, out of the trust-estate under their management, and decerns."*

---

* "NOTE.—This case is attended with some nicety, both as to the question whether the provisions of the Trusts (Scotland) Act, 1867, really apply or are available to the petitioners, and as to the extent to which, supposing the Act to apply, powers should be granted to the petitioners.

"The Lord Ordinary has had the advantage of a very full and careful report by Mr T. G. Murray, W.S., to whom the parties and the Court are much indebted for the attention which he has bestowed on the case. On this report, and on the whole details, the Lord Ordinary has also had full explanations from counsel.

"On the whole, the Lord Ordinary has come to be of opinion that the provisions of the Trusts (Scotland) Act, 1867, apply, and that it is competent under that statute to grant to the trustees the powers which they crave in the present petition.

"There is no doubt very great weight due to the considerations which Mr Murray states in his report, and it is not without some hesitation that the Lord Ordinary has come to the conclusion that powers may be granted under the Act, and that a private Act of Parliament is not necessary. The powers sought in the present case are required truly and fairly to carry out the intentions of the truster; and if these powers were not granted, the result would be that, apart from the extraordinary remedy of a private Act of Parliament, the whole estate

No. 119.

June 13, 1873.
Hay's Trustees
v. Hay Miln.

' Alexander Hay Miln reclaimed, and argued that a larger proporf the lands ought to be sold than the petitioners proposed.
e petitioners argued in support of the interlocutor of the Lord ıary.[1]
advising,—

ıD PRESIDENT.—This is an application by the trustees of the late Mr Hay ham Grange for authority to sell a part of the heritable estate held by testator would be adjudged for the debts, and the purposes of the trust y defeated.

---

he sale of a portion of the estates, if absolutely necessary, as it really apto be, is not inconsistent with the intention of the testator.
o doubt his wish was, if possible, to preserve the whole for the purpose of entailed; but if this cannot be done he certainly did not intend that should be no entail at all, but that the whole lands should be sacrificed.
he 19th section of the statute, which raises the chief difficulty, may, it is ht, be construed in accordance with the view now taken. The powers by the Act itself to trustees—that is, given by the Act eo ipso, and withıy application to the Court—shall not take effect in opposition to a declaraf the deed; but there seems nothing to prevent the Court from giving a to sell, where it can be shewn that without such power the whole trust ıe defeated.
he Act is a remedial one, and must receive a liberal or at least a favourable retation; and the Lord Ordinary thinks that in granting the powers as he ow done he is acting in conformity with the spirit and meaning of the e.
he next question is whether the Lord Ordinary or the Court should nine the precise portions or parts of the lands which are to be sold, or l attempt to fix the precise extent or conditions of the sale.
he Lord Ordinary is of opinion that these details may safely be left to the tion of the trustees, a limit being prescribed beyond which the sale shall ttend. Any other course would involve the Court taking upon itself the ons and duties of the trustees. The Court could not do so without a very ınd careful inquiry, and without the assistance probably of land valuators n of skill. The trustees nominated by the testator are gentlemen in whom stator himself had the fullest confidence, and the Lord Ordinary does not that they will proceed in the most prudent manner, and with a careful l to the joint interests of all the beneficiaries.
he Lord Ordinary has therefore ventured to dispense with further reports, ıg it to the trustees to make what investigations or inquiries they may deem ary to enable them fairly and equitably, and to the utmost possible extent, ry out the intentions of the testator.
he respondent, Mr Alexander Hay Miln, does not object to the proposed but he thinks that the trustees are not going far enough, and are asking ımited powers. He urges that a larger portion of land should be sold than proposed in the petition.
he Lord Ordinary does not think that he can, under the present petition, any larger power than that asked by the trustees, nor is such a petition as esent the proper form in which to determine the respective rights of Mr ınd the remoter beneficiaries. In so far as these rights depend, or may be d by the exercise of discretionary powers conferred by the truster upon ıstees, the Court probably would not interfere at all. If Mr Miln, howas any absolute rights under the trust which he thinks are injured by the of the trustees, he would require to make them good by a declarator, with riate conclusions; but on all these points the Lord Ordinary gives no ı whatever. He can only deal with the present petition as simply a petir powers."

[1] ınderson v. Somerville, June 22, 1841, 3 D. 1049; Preston v. Melville, 1838, 16 S. 456—2 Rob. 45, and 8 Cl. and Fin. 16.

No. 119.

June 13, 1873. Hay's Trustees v. Hay Miln.

that gentleman to the extent of about one-half; and the petition is h the 3d section of the Trusts (Scotland) Act of 1867. The circum somewhat peculiar. Mr Hay left a trust-disposition and two codicils, effect of which was that he directed his trustees to pay all his debts estate left by him other than his landed estate in Forfar and Perth; pressly prohibited them from selling any part of that landed estate. an express prohibition, although it occurs as it were in a dependent a sentence in the trust-deed, for it is thus expressed—"My trustees all convenient speed apply the trust property, excepting my landed ticularly above-named, no part whereof they shall have liberty to sel excepting furniture, &c., in payment of all my debts," and so forth. provided that his nephew, Mr Alexander Hay Miln, the respondent appears to have been his nearest relative, should during the subsist trust receive an annuity of £750, which was also secured by a separ the form of a bond of annuity. The trust is fixed to endure for at le one years, and the granter obviously hoped and believed that in the that time the property, other than his landed estate, and the rents of estate, would be sufficient to clear off all his debts. But in this exp was too sanguine, because it turns out that the income of the lande not sufficient to pay the burdens upon it, and to keep down the inte debt. Even after applying all the rest of the property in payment o there is a deficiency, according to the reporter, to the extent of £1 The expediency, and indeed the necessity of selling a portion of th therefore clear enough; indeed, the trust is quite unworkable unless t obtain such a power.

But the first question for us to consider, and one of considerabl is whether this object can be attained under the authority of the of the Trusts Act, or whether it will be necessary for the trustees t Parliament for a private Act to enable them to do so. Now, th doubt that the Act which was passed in the year 1867 to facilitate th tration of trusts in Scotland was intended, particularly in this 3d save the necessity of going to Parliament for powers not given by deed; and I should be prepared, generally speaking, to give as ex interpretation as possible to an Act passed for so beneficial a purpose. words of the 3d clause appear to me to create some difficulty, and it i 3d clause alone that, in my opinion, the difficulty arises. I do not, Lord Ordinary, think that any difficulty arises from the 19th section c because I think it applies entirely to the powers conferred on trust statute itself in the 2d section, and not to the powers which the authorised to give under the 3d section. But the 3d section itself the Court to grant certain powers, and particularly the power here selling the estate, or a portion of it, upon a certain condition,—"on b fied that the same is expedient for the execution of the trust, and sistent with the intention thereof." That it would be expedient in t tion of this trust that the trustees should have a power of sale, for th already stated, I do not doubt. But the question is, whether the gr this power is not "inconsistent with the intention thereof," that is, a stand, the intention of the trust, or in other words, the intention of th Now, the intention of the truster is very clearly expressed. The estate be sold, but is to be freed from its debt by the operation of the tru very reason of making the trust and giving the estate to these truste they may redeem the estate of the debt, and it is inconsistent with that that the estate, or any considerable part of it, should be sold. But still the words which I have quoted from the trust-deed appear to me to b press and distinct prohibition against the trustees selling any part of th And therefore the inconsistency of selling this estate with the intention truster is abundantly evident. The Lord Ordinary suggests that the tru two purposes. One was to pay his debts, and the other to entail the and he himself says in his codicil, in so many words, that that was h object. The Lord Ordinary suggests that, as that object cannot be car

No. 119.

June 13, 1873.
Hay's Trustees v. Hay Miln.

ly as he wished, and so as to keep the whole estate, the next best thing, e most consistent with the probable intention of the truster, is that half estate should be retained. But it appears to me that that is a mere guess hat would have been the intention of the truster if he had known what e condition of his affairs was, and I do not think we are entitled to sub- a conjecture of what the truster would have done as things have now out in place of that clear and distinct expression of his purpose which he t in his trust-deed in the form of a prohibition against selling any part of tate. And therefore I am of opinion that this petition must be refused.

D DEAS.—In order to bring this application within the Act of Parliament st be satisfied of two things,—in the first place, that the power which is is expedient for the execution of the trust, and, in the second place, that ot inconsistent with the intention of the trust-deed. I am not satisfied e plan proposed here is expedient for the execution of the trust. It would rty years, according to the shewing of the trustees, to effect that object. agree in opinion with your Lordship that it would be inconsistent with tention of the trust-deed, and therefore I entirely agree in the result at your Lordship has arrived.

D ARDMILLAN.—I have nothing to add. It is obviously for the interest trustees to get this carried through if possible, but I agree in opinion with ordship.

D JERVISWOODE concurred.

THIS interlocutor was pronounced:—"Recall the interlocutor, and refuse the petition, and decern, and authorise the petitioners to pay out of the trust-funds the expenses of both parties, as the same may be taxed; appoint accounts of said expenses to be given in, and remit," &c.

ALEX. HOWE, W.S.—DUNDAS & WILSON, C.S.—Agents.

No. 120.

June 13, 1873.
Johnston v. Wallace.

N JOHNSTON (Inspector of Poor of the Parish of Campsie), Pursuer and Respondent.—Fraser—Burnet.

EW WALLACE (Inspector of Poor of the Parish of Govan), Defender and Appellant.—Sol.-Gen. Clark—W. A. Brown.

r—Settlement—Husband and Wife.—An Irishman residing in Scotland, he had no settlement, deserted his wife, who was a Scotchwoman, and to reside in another part of Scotland, concealing his place of residence, ontributing nothing to the support of his wife and family. The wife e insane, and she and the family were supported by the parish in which were found. Held that the wife's birth parish was bound to relieve that of the sums expended, although the husband was able-bodied and resident otland.

1ST DIVISION.
Sheriff of Lanarkshire.
M.

IS action of relief was brought in the Sheriff-court of Lanarkshire by ew Wallace, inspector of poor of the parish of Govan, against John ston, inspector of poor of the parish of Campsie. The pursuer con- d for repetition of certain sums of money expended by him in main- g Elizabeth Murphy or Carson, wife of Andrew Carson, an Irishman, ane and Elizabeth, their pupil children.

proof was taken in the Sheriff-court from which it appeared that ew Carson came from Ireland in 1847. He worked as a miner in rkshire for nearly ten years. In 1847 he married Elizabeth Murphy, ive of Govan. If he ever acquired a residential settlement he lost it oving about to different parishes. Mrs Carson became insane, and

No. 120.

June 13, 1873.
Johnston v. Wallace.

in 1865 her husband left her and her children, who were taken poorhouse in 1866. The husband returned during the winter of and lived one month with his wife. He then left his wife, and w reside in several different places, where he maintained himself work, but never sent any money to his wife and children, and co be found by the authorities till the end of 1869, when he took his c away from the Campsie Poorhouse.

In August 1868 Mrs Carson was found in Campsie, and was r by that parish, and sent to a lunatic asylum about a month after statutory notice of chargeability was duly given to the inspector of on 31st August 1868.

The pursuer pleaded;—(1) Having been, on said 29th Augus deserted by Andrew Carson, their husband and father, and in dest the said Elizabeth Murphy and her said children were proper ob parochial relief. (2) The parochial settlement of the said Elizabeth M or Carson and her said children during the period of their charge to Campsie parish was in the parish of Govan, in respect that El Murphy was born in Govan, and her husband, Andrew Carso foreigner, who had no parochial settlement in Scotland, and had d them.

The defender pleaded;—(1) The averments in the summons a relevant or sufficient to support its conclusions, in respect that matrimonio, a married woman, even although deserted, cannot have a ment in her own right. (2) Carson's wife and children not havin deserted by him, at least not having been in a state of desertion time of chargeability libelled, the parish of Govan is not bound to the parish of Campsie of their support. (3) On the assumptio Andrew Carson had no settlement in Scotland he was liable in t cumstances stated on record to be removed with his wife and chil Ireland, and the pursuer having failed to take the necessary st effecting such removal is not entitled to the recourse which h against the defender.

The Sheriff-substitute (Lawrie), after findings in fact, found "i of law that Carson's neglect of his wife and family had not the e reviving her settlement of birth, and of making her birth parish li the support of her and her family: Therefore assoilzies the defend the whole conclusions of the summons, and decerns: Finds the p liable to the defender in expenses; allows an account," &c.

The Sheriff (Bell) after findings in fact, "finds, in point of law is settled by the cases of Hay, June 13, 1850, and Carmichael, Fe 28, 1863, that a wife and children left destitute by the desertion husband and father, who is a foreigner, and has no settlement in Sc fall to be supported by the parish of the mother's birth, that be maiden settlement: Therefore, and under reference to the annexe recalls the interlocutor appealed against: Finds that the paupers have been deserted by Andrew Carson, who is an Irishman without a settl in this country, the parish of Campsie, as the parish in which the pened to be residing when they became destitute, is entitled to be re of its disbursements on their account by the parish of Govan, as the parish of Elizabeth Murphy or Carson: Finds . . . . . decerns a the defender for the sum of £126, 5s. 2d. sterling, and otherwise, in of the first conclusion of the summons."

The defender appealed. He argued;—The husband in this case very good reason for withdrawing from his wife's society, as she was i and his life was in danger. There was a proper motive for his l and he could not be said to desert his wife. Besides, a wife is not d

No. 120.

June 13, 1873.
Johnston v. Wallace.

en her husband remains in the country. The parish which gave relief the wife was bound to inquire and find out where her husband was. long as the husband was in the country the law would compel him to port his wife.[1]
t advising,—

ORD PRESIDENT.—It has been settled in the case of Carmichael v. Adamson where a wife has been deserted by her husband, and has become an object rochial relief, that the parish which is liable to support her is the parish of own birth settlement. I cannot say that that decision obtained any support me, but it is now a settled rule, and all we have to do in this case is to y it.

rs Carson and her two children became objects of parochial relief in August . They were then relieved by the parish of Campsie. After some time, one month after she first became chargeable, she turned quite insane, and sent to an asylum, and ever since has remained in confinement there.

he question, and the only question in this case is, whether at the date of her ming chargeable she was deserted by her husband, and whether, from that till she was lodged in the asylum she continued to be so deserted. Both are of importance. If she were deserted when first relieved, but ceased to serted when sent to the asylum then the relieving parish could not recover the parish of her birth settlement. I think, however, that if she was in a of desertion in August she was equally in a state of desertion in September, she was sent to the asylum.

he question as to desertion is a somewhat knotty one, because undoubtedly is absent from this case what was in all the previous cases, viz., the hus- did not here leave the country. The appellant contends that that is essential al desertion. He further maintains that even if running away could con- te desertion the husband in this case was justified in running away, because s in fear of his life.

he question comes to be, if that is a relevant defence. If a man leaves his for his own safety he may be justified in running away, but not without ing provision for her maintenance. This justification is not complete here. uly 1866 he ran away, it may be for fear of his wife, but he did nothing to tain his wife and children. He came back in the end of 1866 and stayed nth, after which he went away again in exactly the same way as before, out making any provision for his wife and family. He never returned till had become subjects of parochial relief in Campsie. The history of the cir- tances is necessary to shew whether desertion took place or not. The hus- , while said to be in desertion, was working and earning wages, and it turns he was accessible and might have been found, but he was very difficult to . It was not known to the parties anxious to find him that he was a private e of the Lanarkshire Militia regiments. Had that been known he could have been traced. He took every precaution he could to prevent the dis- y of where he was. His wife became chargeable very soon after he left her e parish of Kilsyth, and remained chargeable there until August 1867.

en in February 1868 she was relieved by the parish of Rutherglen, though r very long. After that by the parish of Kirkintilloch at a date which has en exactly fixed. The inspector of Kirkintilloch made vigorous attempts cover the husband. He took out a warrant for his apprehension, but did ucceed in getting him, though he made two attempts, once at Annbank yrshire, and again in Rutherglen, in both of which places he had been ing.

is quite, clear, therefore, on the one hand, that the husband went away deay v. Skene, June 13, 1850, 12 D. p. 1019; Carmichael v. Adamson, Feb. 863, ante, vol. i. p. 452; M'Rorie v. Cowan, March 7, 1862, 24 D. p. 723; ee v. Turnbull, ante, vol. x. p. 675; Palmer v. Russel, Dec. 1, 1871, ante, l. p. 185.

---

the parish liable for her maintenance. I have no doubt that a husl held to have deserted his wife although he has not left the kingdc were not so, the punishment which the statute provides for husband their wives would be of no use, because it could not be enforced.

This man left his wife for upwards of two years with the excep month. During the whole of that absence, although he was making he never sent his wife any money for her support. He did not inqu welfare or that of her family. He may possibly have had a reaso for leaving his wife, but he could have no excuse for not contrib support and that of his children. It is not necessary to consider wl might be held, in the sense of the Poor-Law Act, to have deserted l when living with her. But the failure to contribute to her maint tainly of more importance than his leaving her. When the woman a lunatic she fell to be maintained by the parish, whether she was t able-bodied man or not; but the time at which she must be held to entitled to relief as a pauper lunatic is the time when she was sent t She may have been previously in a state of lunacy, but we cannot t account. There may be either husbands or wives in a state of luna law must still regard as sane persons. But at the time this wom proper subject of relief she was deserted by her husband, and I an opinion that her maiden settlement is liable.

Lord Ardmillan.—On the question of the effect produced on a ment by the desertion of her husband I was very much impr opinion of Lord Moncreiff in the case of Hay v. Skene, and I c opinion as long as I could, having been, along with your Lordship, in in the case of Carmichael. But in that case of Carmichael it was a settled that the maiden parish was liable for the maintenance of a and if desertion is here proved that fact must, on the authority of be conclusive of this question.

The real question is, whether what is known as desertion took pl on that point I have had some difficulty. But taking in combinati quitting of the wife by the husband, the concealment of his resi whole time, and the failure to supply her with the means of obtaini saries of life, I am disposed to concur in holding that desertion has till the 24th of September 1868, when she was sent by the parish of Govan to a lunatic asylum as a pauper lunatic: Find that on and after the said 29th of August, and on the said 24th of September, the said pauper and her children were deserted by her husband and their father: Therefore refuse the appeal, and decern," &c.

No. 120.
June 13, 1873.
Johnston v. Wallace.

MITCHELL & BAXTER, W.S.—J. & R. D. ROSS, W.S.—Agents.

XANDER JAMESON, Pursuer and Appellant.—Campbell Smith—Rhind. ALEXANDER BONTHRONE, Defender and Respondent.—Watson—Balfour.

No. 121.
June 13, 1873.
Jameson v. Bonthrone.

eparation—Slander.—In an action of damages for slander held that the ds "damned puppy" were not actionable.

HIS was an action of damages for slander brought in the Sheriff-court ifeshire by Alexander Jameson, procurator-fiscal of the burgh of Auchnuchty, against Alexander Bonthrone, distiller and maltster, who was vost of the burgh. The pursuer's allegation was that at an adjourned ting of the magistrates, called for the purpose of granting licenses, the nder had said that the pursuer was a "damned puppy" and a "low kguard." "Whereby the defender represented him as a degraded, ertinent, base, vile, querulous, vicious, ill-conducted fellow, and utterly vorthy and incapable of holding the honourable and exalted office of curator-fiscal of the burgh of Auchtermuchty."

1ST DIVISION. Sheriff of Fifeshire. M.

he defender admitted having used the words "damned puppy" and ressed his regret for having done so. He denied having used the ds "low blackguard."

proof was taken in the Sheriff-court, the import of which is given in following interlocutor pronounced by the Sheriff-substitute (Beatson l):—"(1) That the defender is provost of the burgh of Auchtermuchty, the pursuer held the office of fiscal of the Burgh Court for the year end- in November 1872; (2) That on 23d April 1872 an adjourned licensing rt was held by the magistrates of the burgh, which was presided over the two bailies, the defender being disqualified as a maltster from ing in such a Court; (3) That at the Court, of which that of 23d April s an adjournment, the magistrates had expressed an opinion that doors ommunication between licensed premises and dwelling-houses ought be shut up, and had instructed the burgh-officer and constable to report ether this had been done; (4) That at said adjourned Court the de- der was present as a proprietor of premises affected by this resolution, , on the constable reporting, was proceeding to make some observations he bench, when the pursuer said to him, 'Sit down, sir, you have no t to speak here;' to which the defender replied, 'I have as much right peak here as you, you damned puppy;' (5) That it is not proved that defender used to the pursuer the words 'low blackguard,' as averred the pursuer: Finds in point of law that the words used by the de- der in the circumstances above set forth are not actionable; and, ratim, that the pursuer having failed to prove the utterance by the de- der of an essential part of the expressions complained of by him as a ole is not entitled to recover damages: Therefore, assoilzies the defender n the conclusions of the action, and decerns," &c.

n appeal the Sheriff (Crichton) pronounced an interlocutor with lings in fact similar to those of the Sheriff-substitute's interlocutor, and her "finds in point of law that the words used by the defender in the circumstances above set forth are not in themselves actionable: Finds that the pursuer has failed to prove the innuendo set forth in the summons and that therefore he is not entitled to recover damages: Dismisses the appeal taken on the part of the pursuer."

No. 121.

June 13, 1873.
Jameson v. Bonthrone.

The pursuer appealed, and argued;—The word "puppy" was an expression of contempt, and was intensified by the word "damned." Any word which was calculated to wound the feelings and render a man contemptible in the eyes of his fellowmen was actionable. The word "blackguard"[1] had already been held actionable, although it did not necessarily imply moral depravity. It was further contended that the proof shewed that the defender had made use of the expression "low blackguard."[2]

The defender's counsel were not called on for a reply.

At advising,—

LORD PRESIDENT.—In this case there are two expressions said to have been used, "low blackguard" and "damned puppy." There is no doubt that the first of these expressions is actionable. This was decided by the case of Brownlie v. Thomson, 21 D. 480, 11th February 1859. I do not think that it has ever been proposed to recover damages for calling a man a puppy. The addition of the other word merely expresses the intensity of the speaker's feelings. The question therefore is, whether the word "puppy" is actionable. It merely expresses contempt. But it is not every expression of contempt which is actionable. In the circumstances of the present case an action of damages is out of the question.

The only other question is whether the words "low blackguard" have been proved to be used, and on that point I agree with the Sheriff and his Substitute that the pursuer has failed to prove that these words were used.

LORD DEAS.—It is not proved that the defender here called the pursuer a blackguard or a "low blackguard." No one says so except the pursuer himself, and it is quite possible that he, in his excitement, imagined that he heard some such words applied to him although they were not so. The only thing like corroboration (but which is not sufficient corroboration) is, that the witness Melville says he heard the defender use the words "low blackguard," but he cannot say to whom they were applied. All the other witnesses say they did not hear the words used at all. It is, however, clear,—indeed it is admitted,—that the defender called the pursuer a "puppy," with a profane word prefixed, to which last no one assigns any meaning at all, and to which we cannot therefore attach any slanderous meaning.

I am not disposed to say that "puppy" can never be an actionable epithet. But to make it so there must not only be an innuendo, but the innuendo must be proved. We have an innuendo here, and a long one too, but we have no proof whatever that any one, unless it may have been the pursuer himself, understood the word to have been used in all or any of the senses attributed to it in that innuendo.

A "pup" or "puppy" is not always an offensive animal, and, on the contrary, it is sometimes an object of affection. The word becomes offensive only in consequence of certain conventional but varying meanings attached to it when applied to a man. Sometimes it means "a fop;" sometimes an attention to dress short of a fop; very often it simply means that the person is presumptuous. In short, it is not a word which is necessarily slanderous. Everything depends upon circumstances; the position of the person to whom it is applied and the sense in which it is proved to have been understood and consequently to have a intended by the utterer; but of which we have no proof here, and consently the action must fail. No. 121.

[1] Denham v. Ogilvy, March 19, 1827, 4 Murray's Jury Rep. 195.

[2] Graham v. Roy, Feb. 11, 1851, 13 D. 634; Brownlie v. Thomson, Feb. 11, 1859, 21 D. 480; Sheriff v. Wilson, March 1, 1855, 17 D. 528.

June 13, 1873.
Jameson v. Bonthrone.

ORD ARDMILLAN and LORD JERVISWOODE concurred.

THE COURT pronounced the following interlocutor:—"Find in fact that at an adjourned licensing Court held by the magistrates of Auchtermuchty on the 23d April 1872 the defender (respondent) said in the presence and hearing of the said magistrates and others that the pursuer (appellant) was a damned puppy: Find it not proved that he did then and there say that the pursuer was a low blackguard: Find in law that the words damned puppy are not actionable: Therefore refuse the appeal, and decern: Find the appellant liable in expenses," &c.

P. H. CAMERON, S.S.C.—ADAMSON & GULLAND, W.S.—Agents.

ALEXANDER GIBB, Pursuer.—H. J. Moncreiff. No. 122.
THE CITY OF EDINBURGH BREWERY COMPANY, Defenders.—Rhind.

June 19, 1873.
Gibb v. Edinburgh Brewery Co.

sparation—Wrongous Use of Diligence—Malice—Bill—Issues.—In an a of damages for injury alleged to have been caused by the defenders re- ing a protest for non-payment of a bill, and charging thereon, although the had been previously paid, eight days after it had become due, held that a ge was a diligence and not a judicial act, and that therefore it was not sary to put malice in the issue (Lord Benholme diss., on the ground that circumstances shewed fault on the part of the pursuer, and that therefore it not sufficient for him to prove merely a legal wrong).
rm of issue adjusted.

HIS was an action at the instance of Alexander Gibb, wine and spirit chant in Edinburgh, against the City of Edinburgh Brewery Com- y, Limited, concluding for £500 damages in the following circumces:— 2D DIVISION. Lord Shand. M.

he pursuer in the course of his business bought ale from the ders, and on 6th February 1872 he accepted a bill for £23, 10s. payable e months after date drawn upon him by the defenders.

l regard to this bill the pursuer averred that when it "became due th May 1872 it was presented in the afternoon of that day to him he bank with which it was discounted for payment. It being then bank hours, and the pursuer not having enough money in his shop, ill was not paid on that day. The defenders having thereafter retired ill, Mr Wright, their cashier, by arrangement with the pursuer, called e pursuer's house in John's Place on the 17th of May 1872, and the ier there and then made payment to him on behalf of the defenders e sum due under the bill, viz. £23, 10s. Mr Wright had not ght the bill with him, but promised to send it to the pursuer he following day, and in the meantime granted a receipt for the unt. Instead, however, of sending the bill to the pursuer as promised eir cashier, the defenders, on 20th May 1872, caused the same to be sted and recorded, and on the same day caused the pursuer to be d at their instance with a charge for payment of the said bill. Upon 22d May an announcement of the recorded protest of the said bill st the pursuer appeared in the 'Legal Circular' and also in 'Stubbs' ly Gazette.'" consequence of these proceedings the pursuer brought this action mages for the injury he had received to his reputation and credit.

e defenders admitted that the pursuer paid £23, 10s. to Mr Wright

No. 122.
June 19, 1873.
Gibb v. Edinburgh Brewery Co.

on the 17th May 1872, but averred that this payment was not m account of any particular debt, but a general payment, the pursuer at that time admittedly due to the defenders a considerable sum in tion to the amount contained in the bill, and having accepted not charge of the bill but an ordinary receipt. The defenders further a that the publications referred to by the pursuer were not inserted a instance.

The pursuer pleaded;—(2) The defenders having wrongfully re the protest of the said bill, and charged the pursuer as condescend they are liable to the pursuer in the amount of damages conclud with expenses. (3) The defenders having recorded the said prote given the said charge wrongfully, maliciously, and without probable are liable to the pursuer in damages as concluded for, with expense

The defenders pleaded;—(3) The bill in question not having beer the defenders were entitled to do diligence thereon. (4) The proce complained of not having been malicious, the defenders should be asso (5) The defenders are not responsible for any statements which may appeared in the "Legal Circular" or "Stubbs' Weekly Gazette."

The following issues were adjusted and approved of by the Lord nary, who added the subjoined note:*—"It being admitted that about 6th February 1872 the pursuer accepted a bill for £23, 10s. p three months after date drawn on behalf of the defenders by Nisbet, then their interim managing director, Whether, on or about May 1872, the defenders wrongfully caused the said bill to be pro against the pursuer and the pursuer to be charged thereon, notwithsta that payment of the contents of the said bill had been made by the suer on or about the 17th day of May 1872, to the loss, injury damage of the pursuer? Damages laid at £500."

The defenders moved the Court to vary the issue by substitutin following:—"Whether the said bill was paid on or about 17th May and whether, on or about 20th May 1872, the defenders wrong maliciously, and without probable cause, caused the said bill to be tested against the pursuer, and the pursuer to be charged thereon, t loss, injury, and damage of the pursuer?"

Argued for the defenders;—Unless malice were proved the pursuer no ground of action. He had begun by being in the wrong, by not ing the bill when it was due, and then when payment was made he a receipt which did not bear to be a discharge of the bill, and in such cumstances it was necessary that an issue of malice should be laid be the jury. It had been decided that the mere recording of a pro was not actionable unless done maliciously,[1] and again, that illegal prisonment gave ground of action without malicious intention.[2] T case was something between these two, for there had been a cha given. Now, a charge was not itself diligence, but an intimation t diligence would be done if it was not obeyed, and it had been h that a charge wrongfully given was not in itself a good ground

* "NOTE.—The Lord Ordinary being of opinion that the facts, as stated record by the pursuer, do not disclose a case of privilege on the part of the fenders, in obtaining and executing the diligence complained of, has approve the issue in the terms adjusted in No. 14 of process. Should the case, on facts as disclosed at the trial, appear to the Lord Ordinary to be one of privil the Lord Ordinary will then direct the jury that malice and want of prob cause must be proved in order to entitle the pursuer to a verdict in his favo

[1] Gardner v. Martin, June 10, 1864, ante, vol. ii. 1183.

[2] Doyle v. Steven, Nov. 14, 1860, 23 D. 13.

No. 122.

June 19, 1873.

Gibb v. Edinburgh Brewery Co.

As to the publication in the "Black Lists," the defenders had to do with that, and therefore no action lay against them in that ed for the pursuer;—A charge was the commencement of dili- nd the rule of law was well settled that it was not necessary to alice in a case of wrongous use of diligence.
lvising,—

Cowan.—In this case the Lord Ordinary considers an issue simply pon the fact of the wrongful act of the defenders to be sufficient, whereas nders' counsel desires that the question of malice should be inserted. re exists in this matter an essential distinction between judicial proceed- diligence cannot be doubted. I entirely, on this point, agree with the licated by Lord Neaves during the progress of the discussion. That a n a decree is not diligence but a judicial act I have never heard main- ntil now. A charge is the commencement of diligence. It is the first rein, and the rest of the diligence follows, which may end in the incar- of the debtor. In the Personal Diligence Act, 1838, we find the follow- on,—"Provided always, and be it enacted, that diligence executed under isions of this Act shall have the same effect as if such diligence had been by virtue of letters of horning or letters of caption, or if arrestments dings had been executed under the forms heretofore in use." Formerly, proceeded by charge on letters of horning, and if not complied with caption were expede, also under the Signet, for the apprehension and tion of the debtor. The registration of a decree of a competent Court is sub- for the old form of diligence, but a charge is still the first step. Does there exist this essential difference between judicial procedure and diligence? n be no question of this, and if we look at the consequences following giving of a charge it is clear that by its mere execution a man's credit lestroyed, or at least may be seriously affected. I think, therefore, that rcumstances the simple issue of wrongful is enough. There is no privi- What was done was not judicial procedure, but alleged wrongful diligence. l Ordinary has taken the right course.

Benholme.—I am of a different opinion. This pursuer certainly begins ng in fault. He did not pay his bill when it became due. Then he general payment, the receipt not bearing that it was in extinction of the d he did not get up the bill. In this indefinite state of matters he, doubtedly the party in default in the first instance, asks damages upon le issue that a legal wrong was committed. In these circumstances, going into the refinements which have been suggested between judicial ngs on the one hand and legal diligence on the other, I am decidedly of that the pursuer should be required to prove somewhat more than that s a legal wrong.

Neaves.—I agree with the opinion expressed by Lord Cowan. In the avies the question was whether it was necessary to aver malice, and it down that it was necessary to do so when the ground of action was a proceeding. Lord Curriehill, in dissenting in the case of Davies, only from the other Judges as to whether the proceedings were actually judicial ngs. He says,—"My difficulty is in holding that the decree has the of a judicial proceeding. I think it was an incompetent proceeding. ground, therefore, that that was not a proper judicial proceeding, I hold pursuer is not bound to qualify his issue as proposed by your Lordship." n this point that the other Judges took a different view. Lord Deas iston v. Redpath, Brown, and Company, Feb. 24, 1866, ante, vol. iv.

---

ies and Company v. Brown and Lyell, June 8, 1867, ante, vol. v. 842.

No. 122.

June 19, 1873.
Gibb v. Edinburgh Brewery Co.

says,—"The action which was raised against the pursuers was undoubt judicial proceeding, and remained so to the end, with this variation only, first it was a well founded action, while at last it was not." But all the were agreed upon this, that if it was a judicial proceeding it was priv None of them, however, hint that in the case of diligence there is any su vilege, or any necessity for averring malice.

I think there can be no doubt that a charge is a diligence, looking to t sequences which follow a charge. I think that it has been held that un Act 1621 a charge is begun diligence. It is not a completed diligen arrestment may follow upon it, and no one will deny that arrestment gence.

I agree with Lord Benholme that the pursuer in this action began th but still this is no case of compensatio injuriarum, but an injury cause positive act, and if the defenders have any excuse from the pursuer's c the jury will take that into consideration.

I therefore do not think it necessary that an averment of malice should serted in the issue.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—The only question here is whether the proceedi the defenders, on account of which damages are sought, are privileged, s it is necessary to aver malice in order to make the action competent. I think this question depends upon whether the pursuer did or did not p bill when it was due. That does not affect the question at all, but the qu depends upon this further question, whether the proceedings were judici ceedings or diligence. Now, this latter question is attended with some diff but the distinction between judicial proceedings and diligence in refere such questions as that now before us has been broadly laid down. Alt the recording of a protest might be held to be a judicial proceeding there no doubt that a charge is a diligence. So, as far as regards technical form, I the Lord Ordinary is right, but I am anxious that the vital point in thi should be clearly kept open for the trial. The true point of the case is, wh Wright accepted the pursuer's payment as merely a payment to account, o payment of the debt due under the bill, and of that alone. If the defende prove that Wright received the money as a general payment that is a defence to this action. Even if they could prove something short of that shew that he had reasonable ground to believe that the payment was a g payment to account, I think that might be a good defence. So I should b posed to put into the issue words to the effect that the defenders knew tha bill had been paid, and notwithstanding recorded a protest and executed a c against the pursuer.

THE COURT approved of the following issue:—"Whether the said was paid on or about 17th May 1872, and whether, on or a 20th May 1872, the defenders wrongfully, and in the know that the same had been paid, caused a protest on the said bill recorded against the pursuer, and the pursuer to be charged the to the loss, injury, and damage of the pursuer? Damages la £500 sterling."

A. D. MURPHY, S.S.C.—FERGUSON & JUNNER, W.S.—Agents.

No. 123.

June 20, 1873.
Ashley v. Magistrates of Rothesay.

HENRY ASHLEY AND OTHERS, Pursuers.—Watson—R. V. Campb
THE MAGISTRATES OF ROTHESAY, Defenders.—Sol.-Gen. Clark—Orr Paterson.

Public-House—Certificate—Hours of Opening and Closing—Statu Geo. IV. c. 58 (Home Drummond Act); 16 and 17 Vict. c. 67 (M Mackenzie Act, 1853), secs. 11, 12; 25 and 26 Vict. c. 35 (Public-H Amendment Act, 1862), secs. 4, 2.—The Magistrates of a burgh, at a ing for renewing certificates for the sale of exciseable liquors within

No. 123.

June 20, 1873.

Ashley v. Magistrates of Rothesay.

came to a resolution that, within a particular district, which included he whole burgh and all the inns and public-houses in the burgh, the closing inns and public-houses should be 10 instead of 11 as required bove Acts, and they granted certificates accordingly. By sec. 2 of 25 Vict., the Magistrates are allowed to insert in the certificates a different closing and opening "in any particular locality within any county or equiring other hours for opening and closing." Held that the Magisere not entitled to change the hours of closing throughout the whole nd remit made to the clerk to alter the certificates.

liction—25 and 26 Vict. c. 35.—When an inferior Court exceeds its ie Court of Session may reduce the decree, although bearing to be under hich excludes reduction.

e—25 and 26 Vict. c. 35, sec. 35—Computation of Time.—Under a equiring all actions arising from procedure under it to be commenced wo months after the cause of action shall have arisen, held that Magisio were sued for damages on account of a decision pronounced on 15th re timeously cited by a summons executed on 15th June following.

1st Division. Lord Gifford. M.

action was brought by Henry Ashley, hotel-keeper, Rothesay, and ree hotel-keepers there, against Daniel Macbeth and others, the ates of Rothesay, and John Wilson, their clerk.

Magistrates met on 15th April 1872 for the purpose of granting ewing certificates for the sale of exciseable liquors within the n accordance with section 1 of the Act 16 and 17 Vict. c. 78. They the following resolution,—"The Magistrates, considering that in icular locality within the burgh, situated within the following viz., Mackinlay Street, ... other hours are required for closing l hotels and public-houses than those specified in the forms of es in schedule A annexed to the Act 25 and 26 Vict. cap. 35, le thereto,—resolve to insert eight of the clock in the morning as for opening, and ten of the clock at night as the hour for closing , in such certificates." The area included the whole of the burgh, ome outlying portions, and included all the hotels, inns, and ouses. On appeal, the Quarter Sessions affirmed the decision of istrates.

ursuers averred;—"It was not the fact that other hours are reor closing in Rothesay within the limits of the said resolution hour of eleven o'clock specified by the Legislature. So far eculiarities exist in Rothesay to distinguish it from other burghs ding steamboat station and a place of summer resort they as to render the usual statutory hour the most convenient. suers' certificates for previous years all contained the usual hours of eight o'clock in the morning for opening, and eleven t night for closing, and they came before the Magistrates of the gh as applicants for renewals of their certificates in April last. resolution complained of was adopted and made before the applications for renewals were taken up and disposed of by the istrates. No difficulty or question was raised as to the propriety ng the pursuers' applications for renewals; but the said Magisgranting the same, intimated their said previous resolution, and the same to be final and binding on themselves in all cases. By ic-House Acts, and specially by section 7 of the 9 Geo. IV., c. 58, ers, who were in attendance, were each entitled to be heard in f their applications for renewals of their certificates in the terms in previous years, and it was illegal and incompetent to fix d, as was done by the said resolution, that in no case would the r for closing be inserted as in previous years. The defenders, istrates present on the said 15th April last, illegally and un-

No. 123.
June 20, 1873.
Ashley v. Magistrates of Rothesay.

warrantably refused to hear and consider the cases of the pursuers individually and separately, with reference to any peculiarities of locality management, or otherwise, bearing on the proper hour for closing; and they illegally and unwarrantably insisted on following the said resolution as a general rule applicable to all cases, without respect or regard to, and without allowing the pursuers individually to be heard upon, the special requirements of their several hotels. Accordingly, the said Magistrates, in terms of their said resolution, illegally inserted in the certificates granted to the pursuers for the current year a condition, whereby the pursuers are required not to keep open house after ten of the clock at night of any day, all as the said certificates made out by the defender, John Wilson, the clerk of the said Magistrates, in themselves more fully bear."

The conclusions of the action were for reduction of the resolution of the Magistrates, and the certificates issued by the clerk in terms of the resolution, for declarator that the certificates should be as valid as if the condition had not been inserted, for an order on the clerk to delete the hour of ten as the hour for closing, and insert the hour eleven instead, and for £200 of damages.

By the Act 9 Geo. IV., c. 58 (the Home Drummond Act), the only restriction as to the time during which public-houses and inns are to be kept open is contained in the form of certificate appended to the Act, which provides that the person to whom a certificate is granted shall not keep his house open at "unseasonable hours." The 11th section of the Forbes Mackenzie Act, 1853, 16 and 17 Vict. c. 69, provides the form in which certificates are to be granted by the Magistrates, and enacts that it shall not be lawful for the Magistrates to grant certificates in any other form than that in a schedule annexed to the Act in which the hour of opening is eight in the morning, and closing eleven at night. The section concludes—"That in any particular locality within any county or district of burgh requiring other hours for opening and closing inns and hotels and public-houses than those specified in the forms of certificates in said schedule applicable thereto, it shall be lawful for such Justices or Magistrates respectively to insert in such certificates such other hours, not being earlier than six of the clock or later than eight of the clock in the morning for opening, or earlier than nine of the clock or later than eleven of the clock in the evening, for closing the same, as they shall think fit."

The 12th section provides,—"If any certificate shall be granted contrary to the provisions of this Act the same shall be null and void to all intents and purposes."

By the 2d section of 25 and 26 Vict. c. 35, new forms of certificates are introduced, which contain the same hours for opening and closing public-houses, and the provision quoted above is repeated as to the Magistrates varying the hours in a particular locality. By the 4th section it is provided that any certificate granted "contrary to the terms and provisions of this Act shall be null and void to all intents and purposes."

The defenders founded on the 34th section of 25 and 26 Vict. c. 35, as excluding review. Sec. 34 is in the following terms:—"No warrant, sentence, order, decree, judgment, or decision made or given by any Quarter Sessions, Sheriff, Justice or Justices of the Peace, or Magistrate, in any cause, prosecution, or complaint, or in any other matter under the authority of the said recited Act or of this Act, shall be subject to reduction, advocation, suspension, or appeal, or any other form of review or stay of execution, on any ground or for any reason whatever other than by this Act provided."

The defenders maintained further that the decision of the Magistrates

No. 123.

June 20, 1873.
Ashley v. Magistrates of Rothesay.

ing been given on 15th April, and the summons in this action having a executed on 15th June, the action was excluded by the 35th section, ch bears:—"Every action or prosecution against any Sheriff, Justice or tices of the Peace, Magistrate, or Judge acting under any general or l Police Act, or against any Sheriff-clerk, Clerk of the Peace, or Town-k, or any Procurator-fiscal, or any other officer of police, or constable, other person, on account of anything done in the execution of the ted Acts and this Act, or any of them, shall be commenced within two nths after the cause of the action or prosecution shall have arisen, and afterwards."

The pursuers pleaded;—(1) The intention and effect of the resolution plained of being entirely to depart from the statutory rules as to the r for closing all the inns, hotels, and public-houses within the burgh, same should be reduced. (2) The area affected by the said resolu-n being the whole burgh for licensing purposes, the same should be uced. (3) The resolution complained of not being in any case a coment means of exercising the Magistrates' power of alteration, the same uld be reduced. (4) The Magistrates' power of alteration only exists ere other hours are required for opening as well as closing, and no eration being required or made on the hour for opening, the defenders' ings are illegal, and should be reduced. (5) The Magistrates having any event acted irregularly and incompetently in proceeding upon the olution complained of, without considering and hearing each of the suers upon the circumstances of his individual case as affecting the r for closing, the pursuers are entitled to decrees as craved. (6) The triction of the pursuers to fourteen business hours, and the condition quiring them to close at ten o'clock at night being illegal and unrranted by the statute, the pursuers are entitled to decrees as craved.
The proceedings complained of having caused, and still causing, loss, ury, and damage to the pursuers, they are each entitled to recover nages from the defenders, the said Daniel Macbeth, Robert Sharp, and omas M'Kinlay, as the individual wrongdoers. (8) The proceedings plained of having been ultra vires and not in bona fide execution of Acts, but adopted maliciously and without reasonable or probable se, the pursuers are entitled to redress thereagainst as craved, and y are entitled to expenses.

The defenders pleaded;—(1) The present action is incompetent, re-w being excluded by the 34th section of 25 and 26 Vict. c. 35. (2) is action, not having been commenced within two months after the se of action had arisen, is barred by the clause of limitation in the Act 25 and 26 Vict. c. 35 (sec. 35). (3) This action is incompetent, and uld be dismissed, in respect that the actings of the Magistrates sought be reduced were appealed by the pursuers to the Quarter Sessions of Peace for the county, and judgment given by the Quarter Sessions reon; and also in respect that no reduction has been brought of the lgment of the Quarter Sessions. (4) The pursuers, by acceptance of certificates granted to them, and keeping their inns or hotels, and ing in virtue of and under the authority of these certificates, are barred m raising the present action. (5) The conclusions for declarator that pursuers' certificates shall be valid to the pursuers for the current ar, as if there had been therein inserted only the condition as to the ur of closing set forth in the form of certificate in schedule A, and the clusion against the defender, John Wilson, to correct the certificates, incompetent, (6) The damages claimed being prospective, the con-sion therefor is incompetent. (7) The summons containing no avernts of malice and want of probable cause on the part of the defenders

No. 123.

June 20, 1873.
Ashley v. Magistrates of Rothesay.

the conclusion for damages is incompetent. (8) The action i petent, in respect of illegal cumulatio actionum. (9) The incompetent, and should be dismissed with expenses, in respect Magistrates and Quarter Sessions on appeal are, in the matt plained of, vested with exclusive jurisdiction, and their proce not subject to the review or interference of the Court of Session, there is no sufficient or relevant averment that they exceed statutory powers.

The Lord Ordinary pronounced this interlocutor:—"Repels th of reduction, and the whole pleas stated for the pursuers: Asso defenders from the whole conclusions of the libel, and decerns: defenders entitled to expenses, and remits," &c.*

---

* "NOTE.—A good deal was said by the counsel for the pursuers as to and arbitrary nature of the resolution passed by the Magistrates of on 15th April 1872, and as to the injustice and inexpediency of cl whole hotels and public-houses in the burgh of Rothesay at so earl as ten o'clock at night. It was urged that in summer the traffic was at that hour, and that great inconvenience was caused by the arrangem

"With these, and with all similar considerations, the Lord Ordinary th he has no concern. He is not aware of the circumstances which in Magistrates of Rothesay to pass the resolution complained of, and inquire into its expediency or propriety.

"By the statutes in question relative to inns, hotels, and public-hous very large and important discretionary powers are vested in the Magi reference not only to the granting or withholding of licenses, but also ence to the hours at which hotels and public-houses within the territor opened and closed, and in reference to certain other conditions up licenses may be granted. On all these questions the Magistrates are judges. In some cases their judgment is subject to the review of th Sessions, but in no case is their judgment liable to be reviewed by the Courts of the country, and in particular the Court of Session has no p cannot be called upon to review the decisions of the Magistrates, or to regulate in any way the exercise of the discretion which the statutes h mitted to the Magistrates alone.

"In the view of the Lord Ordinary, therefore, the sole question in th case is, whether the Magistrates of Rothesay have or have not acted w powers committed to them by the statutes. If they have, then this C not and will not interfere. If, on the other hand, the Magistrates have their statutory powers, if they have gone out of their statutes, and eit something which the statutes expressly prohibit, or something which th do not permit, then undoubtedly there is jurisdiction in the Court of S correct the excess of power, and to set aside the illegal act.

"Now, after full consideration, the Lord Ordinary is of opinion resolution of the Magistrates of Rothesay of 15th April 1872 was wit competency, was authorised by the provisions of the statute 25 and 26 35, sec. 2, and that the condition inserted in the certificates of the purs closing at ten o'clock was a lawful condition, which the Magistrates were to insert, and against which, except perhaps by appeal to the Quarter (and even this is doubtful), the pursuers have no remedy.

"The second section of the Public-Houses Amendment Act provides in any particular locality within any county, or district, or burgh, requirin hours for opening and closing inns and hotels and public-houses tha specified in the forms of certificates in said schedule applicable thereto, be lawful for such Justices or Magistrates respectively to insert in such cates such other hours, not being earlier than six of the clock or later tha of the clock in the morning for opening, or earlier than nine of the c later than eleven of the clock in the evening for closing the same, as the think fit.'

No. 123.
June 20, 1873.
Ashley v. Magistrates of Rothesay.

The pursuer reclaimed, and argued;—The Magistrates have only power change the hours in a particular locality, and are not entitled to change hours throughout the whole burgh. They have no right to make a eral rule for all the hotels and public-houses. Their duty is to hear h case and decide upon it separately. No power was given to diminish time during which public-houses were to remain open. Review is excluded, because the Magistrates were not acting under the statute coming to the resolution complained of. They acted ultra vires.[1]

The defenders argued;—The Magistrates did not meet as a Court, but a body of public representatives. They were charged with a discrenary power, and could include any part of the burgh in a district for purpose of limiting the hours during which public-houses were to be n. The only appeal was to the Quarter Sessions.[2]

LORD PRESIDENT.—The pursuers of this action state that they are the four ncipal hotel-keepers in the town of Rothesay, and as such they hold certifies for the sale of exciseable liquors, and have done so for a considerable number years. They complain of the Magistrates of the burgh that they have recently hat is to say, last year—for the first time made a change in the conditions of

"It is not disputed that the locality marked out in the resolution is a part ly of the royal burgh of Rothesay. It is therefore, in the sense of the statute, particular locality' to which the proviso applies. It seems to be of no conseence whether it includes de facto all the public-houses of the burgh or not. it does, it is only the more equitable and impartial. It is sufficient that it is thin the words and intendment of the statute.

"If the resolution is legal it seems to follow that the insertion in the certifies of the condition in terms of the resolution is also legal, and the Lord Ordiry cannot assent to the argument of the pursuers, that in respect their licenses certificates were 'renewed' certificates, the old hour of closing, eleven o'clock, ould have been continued as to them, though ten o'clock might have been ntly inserted in all others. The Lord Ordinary thinks that this could not ve been done consistently with the statute. When once a locality is fixed, e uniform rule must be applied under the proviso to all public-houses within e bounds. It would certainly be improper, and, prima facie, it would seem be illegal, to permit one hotel or public-house to remain open till eleven clock, and to compel another in the same locality and in the same circumstances close at ten o'clock.

"The Lord Ordinary is also of opinion that there was nothing illegal or imper in the mode in which the Magistrates proceeded in carrying out the viso of the statute. Plainly it was necessary and proper to fix the locality thin which the earlier hour of closing should be enforced before considering y special application for certificates, and this was done. But it was done in en Court, and if the pursuers, or any one else interested, had wished to be rd on the subject hearing would have been granted.

"It is vain to say the Magistrates had made up their minds beforehand. The me might be said of any judge whose opinions on any particular question ppened to be known. The Lord Ordinary thinks that the allegations of lice and of illegal purpose to defeat the statute, and injure the pursuers, are olly irrelevant.

"The view now taken is conclusive of the case against the pursuers, and it is necessary to consider any of the other questions raised, or any of the special as stated in defence. Even if the pursuers could shew that the resolution of th April 1872 was ultra vires and illegal, it is more than doubtful whether e remedies which the pursuers seek are competent or admissible."

[1] Silvester, 31 L. J. Magistrates Cases, p. 93, Feb. 17, 1862; 2 Bell's Com. th ed.) p. 1779; R. v. Justices of Walsall, Nov. 23, 1854, 24 Law Times, ; Crosbie v. M'Minn, June 8, 1866, ante, vol. iv. p. 803.

[2] Manson v. Smith, Feb. 8, 1871, ante, vol. ix. p. 492; Miller v. Henderson, 0, 12 D. 656.

No. 123.

June 20, 1873. Ashley v. Magistrates of Rothesay.

these certificates, by providing that, instead of their houses being opened at eig o'clock in the morning and shut at eleven at night, they are to be opened eight in the morning and shut at ten at night. And they complain, furth that this has been done in pursuance of a general resolution adopted by t Magistrates, which they have carried out to the effect of making it apply to t whole burgh,—that is to say, to every hotel and inn and public-house within t burgh. It is maintained that this proceeding of the Magistrates is beyond th powers under the Public-House Act.

The question is one of considerable general importance, and it requires a care examination of the provisions of the different statutes, for there are three statu in existence regulating this matter,—the Act of the 9th Geo. IV., commo called the Home Drummond Act, the Act of the 16th and 17th Victoria, kno as the Forbes Mackenzie Act, and the recent statute of the 25th and 26th of t Queen, c. 35, which made some important alterations upon the previous statut but did not repeal those Acts, except in so far as was necessary to give effect the new provisions. Under the first of these statutes the form of certificate p vided only, with regard to this matter, that no hotel, or inn, or public-hou should be kept open at unseasonable hours. But in the second statute of th 16th and 17th of Victoria the hours are introduced in the certificates in thi manner, that the person holding the certificate shall not sell or give out there from any liquor before eight of the clock in the morning, or after eleven of th clock at night, of any day. And the 11th section of that Act provides that th form of certificate contained in the schedule to this Act annexed shall come in place of the form of certificate provided by the said recited Act of the 9th of th reign of King George IV., and it shall not be lawful to the Justices of the Peac for any county or district, or the Magistrates of any burgh in Scotland, whether acting under the said recited Act or this Act, from and after the passing of thi Act, to grant any certificates in other forms than those contained in the sai schedule. And the 12th section provides that if any certificate shall be granted contrary to the provisions of this Act the same shall be null and void to al intents and purposes. The last statute substitutes certain new forms of certifi cates for those provided by the Act of the 16th and 17th of Victoria. But i so far as regards this matter of the time of opening and shutting they are iden tical with the previous statute. And the 2d section of this last Act provide that "the forms of certificate contained in schedule A to this Act annexed shal come in place of the forms of certificate provided by the recited Acts, or either of them, and it shall be lawful for the Justices of Peace for any county or dis trict, or the Magistrates of any burgh, where they shall deem it inexpedient t grant to any person a certificate in the form applied for, to grant him a certificat in any other of the forms contained in the said schedule." But again, as in the previous statute, the 4th section of this Act provides "that if any certificate shall be granted contrary to the terms and provisions of this Act the same shall be null and void to all intents and purposes."

Now, the result of these enactments appears to me to be that the Legislature has determined that, as a general rule at least, the time that hotels and public-houses are to be kept open is from eight o'clock in the morning till eleven o'clock at night,—that is to say, a period of fifteen hours each day. There is an excep tion to this general rule which I shall immediately notice, but it seems to me that as a general rule this is made imperative, because, except by means of the proviso which introduces a certain exception, no certificate which does not con tain these hours would be a lawful certificate under the Act of Parliament, but it would necessarily be under the fourth section null and void to all intents and purposes.

The exception is introduced in the last statute by a proviso in the second sec tion. But in order to understand precisely the meaning and object of the Legis lature in that proviso it is necessary to go back to a corresponding proviso in the Act of the 16th and 17th of Victoria. After providing that all certificates must be granted in the form of the schedule, the 11th section goes on "provided always that in localities requiring other hours for opening and closing public houses, inns, and hotels than those contained in the said schedule, it shall be

No. 123.

June 20, 187

Ashley v. Magistrates Rothesay.

ful for such Justices or Magistrates to insert in the said schedule such other n, not being earlier than six o'clock or later than eight o'clock in the morn-for opening, or earlier than nine o'clock or later than eleven o'clock in the ing for closing the same, as they shall think fit." Now, there are two ex-sions in this proviso which give rise to a good deal of doubt. In the first e, what is meant by "requiring other hours for opening and closing?" Does mean that the exigencies of the locality are such that it is desirable that er hours shall be introduced in one place than in another, or does it mean the inhabitants of the locality require or ask for such a variation? Perhaps not of very much importance to the present inquiry which of these is the ning. But there is another expression in this proviso which also must have a rise, I think, to a good deal of difficulty in construction. This proviso ies to localities requiring other hours, and that may be construed to mean r a portion of a burgh or a portion of a county, or it may be construed to a whole burgh or a whole county. The word "locality" would be equally cable to both. Now, it is for the purpose, as I think, of removing this r difficulty of construction that the new clause and the new proviso were inuced into the last statute, because the proviso runs thus:—"Provided ys that in any particular locality within any county or district or burgh iring other hours for opening and closing," and then follows the power of Magistrates, just in the same words as in the previous statute. This mode pression renders it quite clear that it was not the intention of the Legislature ve power to the Justices or the Magistrates to alter the hours of an entire ty, or an entire burgh, but only to exercise that power in any particular ity within a county, or within a burgh, the peculiarities of which might er it desirable that the hours should be earlier, because, it will be observed, Magistrates have no power to make the hours later. They cannot make the ing later than eight or the shutting later than eleven, which are the two s prescribed in their schedule as a general rule. Their only power is to make hours earlier. Now, construing this last proviso, I am of opinion, in the place, that it certainly is unlawful for the Justices or the Magistrates to make alteration applicable to the entire county or the entire burgh. I think also the object for which this power was given is not far to seek. There are localities, particularly within counties, where earlier hours are desirable in other localities. One case easily understood, for example, that in a ng district, where the workmen come up from their work in the mines gene-at six o'clock in the morning, it is very desirable that they should have an tunity of obtaining refreshment before they go to bed. But this is only f a great many instances that could be suggested, where the particular kind lustry or occupation existing in a particular locality might make it desirable ve earlier hours than prevail in the county or burgh generally.
ow, keeping these observations in view, let us see what the Magistrates of esay have done. They seem to have been aware that they would have a ulty in dealing with the words "any particular locality within any county rgh," and accordingly, in carrying out their resolution to shut up all the s and public-houses in Rothesay at ten o'clock at night they defined a certain of the burgh, and made their new hours applicable to that part of the burgh excluding another but smaller part of the burgh. But then the line is so iously drawn that, in that part of the burgh to which the change of hours ade applicable, every hotel and public-house in the burgh is situated. So in practical effect it is just the same thing as if they had come to a resolu-that nobody in Rothesay, whether hotel-keeper, innkeeper, or public-house er, should be allowed to keep his house open after ten o'clock. That is the ical effect of it, and the attempt to make this take the appearance of a pron for a particular locality is simply a fraud on the statute. I do not use term in any offensive sense, but in its purely legal signification. It is a of defeating the words of the Act of Parliament by an ingenious con-nce. It appears to me that that is undoubtedly beyond the power e Magistrates. There is no such power given to them by this Act of Par-nt.

No. 123.

June 20, 1873. Ashley v. Magistrates of Rothesay.

There are other objections which might be stated to what they have dc It may well be doubted, I think, whether the Magistrates have any power, un the proviso in the 2d section, to diminish the number of hours for which pul houses and hotels are to be kept open, and there is a great deal of suppor that view from the particular words of the proviso itself, because it speak particular localities requiring other hours for opening and closing, and not opening or closing. It is undoubtedly the general rule introduced by schedule that every hotel, inn, and public-house shall be kept open for fif hours,—that is to say, shall be entitled to be open for fifteen hours; and I th it would require a proviso of a somewhat different kind from this, and differe expressed, to allow the Magistrates or the Justices to interfere with the num of hours which is thus assigned to public-house keepers and hotel keepers remaining open. But I do not desire to put my judgment on that ground, wh may admit of more hesitation than the other. I think the plain ground of judgment here is, that the Magistrates of Rothesay have endeavoured, under cover of this power which is given them in the proviso of the 2d section, to a thing which the Act never contemplated or intended they should have power to do.

I have thought it best to deal with this question upon its merits in the f place, before saying anything on certain preliminary pleas which are stated the defenders, because those preliminary pleas can be best judged of when c understands exactly what the question upon the merits is. The defenders ple that the present action is incompetent, review being excluded by the 34th secti of the statute 25 and 26 Vict. c. 35. Now, that 34th section enacts that " warrant, sentence, order, decree, judgment, or decision made or given by a Quarter Sessions, Sheriff, Justice or Justices of the Peace, or Magistrate, in a cause, prosecution, or complaint, or in any other matter under the authority the said recited Act or of this Act, shall be subject to reduction, advocatio suspension, or appeal, or any other form of review or stay of execution, on a ground or for any reason whatever other than by this Act provided." Now, t plain answer to the objection founded upon this section is, that the present not a process of review, nor is it in any proper sense a stay of execution. It a proceeding brought in the Court for the purpose of setting aside as incom petent and illegal the proceedings of an inferior Court, and the jurisdiction this Court to entertain such an action cannot be doubted, notwithstanding t entire prohibition of review of any kind. This is not review, as I said befo but it is the interference of the Supreme Court for the purpose of keeping infer Courts within the bounds of their jurisdiction. The Magistrates having exceed their powers under the statute their order, whatever it may be—or decision- liable to be set aside.

But, in the second place, the defenders maintain that the action, not havi been commenced within two months after the cause of action had arisen, barred by the clause of limitation in the 25th and 26th Vict. c. 35, sec. 3 That section provides that "every action or prosecution against any Sheri Justice or Justices of the Peace, Magistrate, or Judge acting under any gene or local Police Act, or against any Sheriff-clerk, Clerk of the Peace, or Tow clerk, or any Procurator-fiscal, or any other officer of police, or constable, other person, on account of anything done in the execution of the recited Ac and this Act, or any of them, shall be commenced within two months after t cause of the action or prosecution shall have arisen, and not afterwards." No I think, so far as the reductive conclusions of this summons are concerned, th this section has no application. It is not an action or prosecution within t meaning of the 35th section at all. It is a proceeding for the purpose of settin aside an incompetent and illegal proceeding of the Magistrates. But no dou this summons also contains conclusions for damages, and the 35th section do apply to a case of that kind; indeed, it is the very case contemplated l the 35th section. The only question therefore is, whether the facts foun the plea upon the 35th section. Is this action brought within two month after the cause of action arose, or is it beyond the two months? Now, th decision of the Magistrates on this matter was upon the 15th April, and th summons was executed upon the 15th June. We had some ingenious observations made upon the computation of time, and some English authorities were quoted to us, which, if I understand them aright, established a different rule in the computation of time from that which prevails in Scotland. But I have no hesitation in saying that, according to the well-established rule for the computation of time in our law, an action brought upon the 15th of June is brought within two months of the 15th of April; and I think it quite unnecessary to say more about it, because the thing is settled over and over again with reference to a great variety of cases.

No. 123.

June 20, 1873.

Ashley v. Magistrates of Rothesay.

I therefore think that the preliminary pleas of the defenders are not well founded, and that the pursuers are entitled to a remedy such as they seek under this summons. But it remains for consideration in what precise form that remedy should be given. They conclude for reduction of the resolution of the Magistrates,—that is, the general resolution to which they came about closing hotels and public-houses at ten o'clock,—and they also conclude for reduction of the condition as to the hour of closing inserted in the said certificate as aforesaid; and I am of opinion that the pursuers are entitled to prevail in that conclusion for reduction. But there remains a little difficulty, because if the condition as to the hour of closing inserted in the certificates is set aside, there would remain in the certificates no condition as to the hour of closing at all; and therefore it is necessary to obtain some practical remedy to obviate that result, and I think the pursuers have suggested a very good form in which to do it. It will be observed that the certificate in this Act, as in all the previous statutes, is made out by the clerk of the Magistrates. I presume it is the town-clerk who acts in that matter; but whoever it is, it is of very little consequence —it is the clerk who acts in that Licensing Court. The Magistrates decide upon who is to have the certificate, and having decided that, the making of the certificate is entirely the work of the clerk. He writes it, and he appends this docquet or note to it,—"The above certificate is made out according to the deliverance in the book or register appointed to be kept in terms of the Act of Parliament," and then he signs that as clerk. Now, I think it is quite competent for us, in rectifying any illegality which has been committed by the Magistrates, and by the clerk under their order, to order that clerk to undo that illegality; and therefore I would suggest that, under one of the conclusions of this summons which is specially directed to that subject, the clerk should be ordered to delete the word "ten" and substitute the word "eleven" in each of these certificates, which will have the complete effect of restoring the pursuers to the condition in which they were entitled to be when they got their certificates.

LORD DEAS.—I agree with your Lordship that the question whether we have jurisdiction to interfere in this matter depends entirely upon whether the Magistrates have or have not kept within their powers under the statute. If they have exceeded their powers there can be no question of the jurisdiction of this Court to rectify what they have done. I do not think that that question is affected by the fact which was pointed out in the discussion, that the judgment of the Quarter Sessions is not substantively complained of in this action; because what the Quarter Sessions did was simply to dismiss the appeals which were taken to them, leaving the original deliverance, or whatever it may be called, to stand. I may state, also, that I agree with your Lordship as to how the two months are to be reckoned with reference to the conclusion for damages. I think that the action was brought within the two months,—reckoned according to the rule fixed in our practice,—and that therefore there is no incompetency in that conclusion, any more than in the other.

With reference to the question itself, whether the Magistrates, in what they did, went out of or beyond the statute, that depends upon whether, under colour of altering the hours during which the hotels and public-houses were to be kept open within a particular locality in the burgh, they did or did not in substance alter the hours as to the whole hotels and inns, &c., within the burgh. I think it is clear enough that the effect of the words which were introduced into the last statute (25 and 26 Vict.), and which were not in the previous stat the words "in any particular locality," &c., necessarily is, and prob intended to be, to prevent the very thing which has been done here, changing of the hours with reference substantially to a whole county, or burgh. I agree with your Lordship that what was done here was sub to change the hours in the whole burgh of Rothesay. If that could b the whole burgh of Rothesay in this way it might of course equally b the whole burgh or city of Glasgow or of Edinburgh, and the consequen would be, that in one or both of these large cities it might be made i to close the whole inns, hotels, and public-houses within the bound o'clock in place of what is the general statutory regulation, viz., eleve at night. It would be very difficult to suppose that it was intended power of that kind. There was, as your Lordship has pointed out, so for alleging a power of that kind (although not so intended) under t of 16 and 17 Vict., but I cannot see any ground for holding that the a power as that under this statute, which expressly provides that the —for it is an exception—which enables the Magistrates to change t shall only apply to a "particular locality" within any county or burgh. Now, a particular locality within a county or district or burg possibly be read as the whole county, district, or burgh. The line in th case has obviously been drawn on purpose, so as to leave out a little burgh of Rothesay in which there are no public-houses, inns, or hotel take in the whole of the burgh in which the hotels, inns, and public-h situated. Now, that is doing, under colour of this proviso, a thing wh not be done directly, and which was never meant to be comprehended What the statute does enables the Magistrates of a burgh or the Justices in a county or district to do is a matter of very considerable difficulty. this statute, as happens too often, is not expressed in the clear and manner in which it ought to have been expressed. Words are not unfr put into such statutes which the parties who get them put in have sidered or fixed in their own minds the precise meaning of, and they Court to find out their meaning. That is imposing on us a hard task, observation may not be altogether inapplicable here; for what con locality "requiring" other hours than the general hours is not very easy stand. The locality does not "require" anything about it in any corr Whether it means required by the inhabitants, or whether it means, a probable, some such exceptional circumstances, or objects, as your Lord suggested, it is very difficult to say, and I do not wish to anticipate a tions that may arise, by going into that further than is necessary. T that I think pretty clear, and the only thing that I at present wish to d that, whatever the Magistrates could do in the burgh of Rothesay u proviso, they could not competently do the thing they have done. I agree with your Lordship as to the terms of the interlocutor we ough nounce, and the mode in which this error ought to be corrected.

No. 123.

June 20, 1873.
Ashley v. Magistrates of Rothesay.

Lord Ardmillan.—I concur in repelling the pleas urged by the defe exclude this action. I think that this action, which is not an appeal or a is competent, and not barred by the clauses of limitation (secs. 34 an the Act 25 and 26 Victoria, cap 35. On these points I add nothing has been already stated.

On the merits—that is, on the construction of the statute—and on jections to the competency of the resolution by the Magistrates, I h some difficulty; and though I feel greatly impressed by the remarks whi Lordships have made I cannot say that my difficulty is entirely removed.

But for the great respect with which I regard the opinion of your Lo and the great reluctance which I feel to differ on a question of construct statute of this kind, which is of extensive application and of practical ance, I should have been rather disposed to take a different view of the tion of this Act; and I should have hesitated in coming to the conclus the Magistrates of Rothesay, dealing with premises within the burgh, an

No. 123.

June 20, 1873.
Ashley v. Magistrates of Rothesay.

he wide discretion committed to them, have here exceeded their statutory
ers. I should have been inclined to think that the Magistrates had power sert in the certificates a condition that inns, hotels, and public-houses shall losed at ten o'clock at night instead of eleven o'clock, and had the power to t the insertion of such condition within the area of the "particular locality" estion, the same being literally within the burgh of Rothesay. If the strates could have issued that order, and inserted that condition, in regard e street or one district in the burgh, or several streets or districts in the h, which is scarcely disputed, then I have great difficulty in holding that could not do the same thing in a larger area still within the burgh, but in-ng all the public-houses. It rather seems to me that if the limitation of urs was to be enforced at all,—a matter on which there may be difference of on, but on which the Magistrates must judge,—then equality, impartiality, justice would be better promoted by the course which they took than by ning the resolution to a few streets. To limit the hours all over the town, in all the public-houses, may be an extreme or an unwise measure. Some st may think so. But to limit the hours in one-half of the town seems to o be less just.

he law trusts the Magistrates. The law has committed to them a wide dis-on in this matter. I have no doubt that they acted from the best motives, according to their deliberate judgment. It is not for us to say whether acted wisely or not. We are not called on to judge—we are not entitled dge—on this matter. The duty and responsibility rested with them; and e discharge of that duty, under that responsibility they have issued the re-ion and order now complained of. These are my difficulties.

he judgment of your Lordships settles the question of construction of the te and the question of the lawfulness or competency of the resolution; and ng regard to the provisions in the series of statutes to which your Lordship dverted in a most instructive commentary, I have not formed an opinion iently clear and decided to justify my dissent from the judgment; accord-r I do not dissent. But I think it right, at the same time, to express ly and with much diffidence the doubts which I entertain. Nor can I rethe result at which your Lordships have arrived, for I am one of those who hat not so much by restraint of law as by moral influences and Christian ple can the social reformation which these Magistrates desire be effectually oted.

ORD JERVISWOODE concurred.

THE following interlocutor was pronounced:—"Recall the said interlocutor, repel the defences, reduce, decern, and declare in terms of the reductive conclusions of the summons; and decern and ordain the defender, John Wilson, as town-clerk of the Magistrates of Rothesay, to delete the word 'ten,' standing at present in each of the certificates granted to the pursuers by the defenders, the Magistrates of Rothesay, to denote the hour of closing the pursuers' hotels for the sale of exciseable liquors, and to substitute therefor in each of the said certificates the word 'eleven,' to denote such hour of closing: Quoad ultra, of consent of the pursuers, assoilzie the defenders, and decern: Find the pursuers entitled to expenses; allow an account," &c.

A. KIRK MACKIE, S.S.C.—J. & A. PEDDIE, W.S.—Agents.

No. 124.

June 20, 1873.

Fullerton v. Fullerton.

CHARLES FULLERTON, Pursuer.—M'Kechnie.
ANN SMART or FULLERTON, Defender.

Husband and Wife—Divorce—Proof—Extrajudicial Confession—Adultery—Circumstances which, coupled with evidence of extrajudicial acknowledgment of the illegitimacy of a child, held (rev. judgment of Lord Shand) sufficient to infer adultery on the part of a wife, and to entitle the husband to decree of divorce.

2D DIVISION. Lord Shand. R.

THIS was an action of divorce for adultery brought by Charles Fullerton, North Leith, against his wife, Ann Smart or Fullerton. The wife did not defend the action, and the averments of the pursuer on record were to the following effect:—

The pursuer and defender were, after proclamation of banns, regularly married to each other at Kirriemuir on 20th June 1856 by the Rev. David G. D. Ramsay, minister of the parish of Kirriemuir. They lived and cohabited together as husband and wife at Kirriemuir for about six years, and thereafter for several years at Newhaven. About two and a half years before the date of this action the pursuer was obliged to find fault with the defender on account of her drunken habits and general ill behaviour, and about that time she separated herself from his fellowship and society. Afterwards he was chiefly at sea, but when ashore he always lived in lodgings apart from the defender, and had no carnal intercourse with her. In particular, the pursuer was engaged as fireman or stoker on board the steamer "Stirling," trading between the ports of Leith and Cronstadt, during the months of June, July, August, September, October, and November 1871, and during the whole of that period had no carnal intercourse with the defender. Since the pursuer so separated from the defender the defender frequented houses of bad fame, and other places of bad resort, and kept the society of dissolute women and sailors in various places in Leith. During the latter half of the year 1871 the defender lodged in Henry Hay's Close, Giles Street, Leith. In the month of January 1872 the defender acted as nurse to a Mrs Lennie at 23 Queen Street, Leith, where she resided for about a month, and while acting as Mrs Lennie's nurse the defender was seen repeatedly frequenting public houses in the neighbourhood, and often the worse of drink. Her habits during that time were very loose and improper. She regularly of an evening left Mrs Lennie's house between eight and ten o'clock p.m., and did not return till two and three o'clock of the following morning. When she did return she was almost always the worse of liquor, and violent and excited. After the defender left Mrs Lennie's she resided for some time in Henry Hay's Close, Leith, and there kept the society of and consorted with women of loose and immoral character. The defender became a woman of immoral character, and was guilty of adultery with some man to the pursuer unknown, during the period the pursuer was on board the said steamer "Stirling," and prior and subsequently thereto; but the pursuer did not know more particularly the times, places, or circumstances when the defender so committed adultery. During the period since the defender left the fellowship and society of the pursuer, or a great part thereof, she was held and reputed by those who knew her as a woman of bad character. On the 22d April 1872 the defender gave birth to an illegitimate female child in a house in Henry Hay's Close, Giles Street, Leith, and the birth of which the defender registered as that of an illegitimate child. The pursuer averred that he was not the father of said child, but that it was the fruit of adulterous intercourse had by the defender on one or more occasions during the months of June, July,

August, and September 1871, in Henry Hay's Close, Giles Street, Leith, or elsewhere in Leith, the time or times and place or places being more particularly unknown to the pursuer, with some man to the pursuer unknown.

Upon a proof being taken the statements on record as to the defender's drunken habits, as to the birth of her child, and as to her registering it as illegitimate, were fully corroborated. It was also proved that the defender and pursuer had not lived together since April or May 1871. But it was not proved that the defender had not had opportunities of meeting the pursuer, nor, except general allegations that she had been seen with men and women of bad character, was there any evidence to shew that she had committed adultery. There was, however, the evidence of the registrar who, although he did not recollect if he asked the defender whether she was married or unmarried, believed that she volunteered the statement that the child was illegitimate. The person in whose house the child was born deponed also that she understood that the father of the child was somebody else than the husband, and that the defender "did not say very much about it" when charged with the child being illegitimate.

The Lord Ordinary pronounced this interlocutor:—"Finds that the pursuer has failed to prove that the defender has been guilty of adultery: therefore dismisses the action, and decerns." *

The pursuer reclaimed, and argued that the evidence of the defender's general bad character, coupled with her own admission that the child was illegitimate, was sufficient to warrant the Court giving decree in terms of the conclusions of the summons.[1]

At advising,—

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—I am of opinion that the pursuer has sufficiently proved his case, and is entitled to his remedy. It is no doubt true that the main evidence here rests on the confession and admission of the wife, and the moral evidence of her own deliberate and personal acts. But the only ground on which the confession of the defender can be excluded in such a case is the danger or element of collusion. But where there is no room for that element, and in this case there can be none, no evidence can be stronger, and in England it has been repeatedly admitted in circumstances much less strong. It must also be kept in mind that all the circumstances, the separation of the parties, the wife's habits and mode of life, all tend strongly to corroborate her own conduct, deliberately registering her child as illegitimate. This is not a question as to the legitimacy of her child; and I say nothing as to the effect of the facts if such a question were raised. That would be a question involving other elements. But as evidence of the wife's guilt I think they are conclusive.

---

* "NOTE.—It is, no doubt, proved that the defender has been living apart from her husband, and that in registering the birth of her child, in May 1872, she gave the information to the registrar that the child was illegitimate. This latter circumstance would have been of the utmost materiality had the proof otherwise shewn that the defender had not opportunity of meeting her husband, and was not associating, as alleged in the condescendence, in a suspicious way with other men. The evidence is, however, altogether wanting in precision and even clearness on the first of these points, and is loose and unsatisfactory on the second; and on the whole, the Lord Ordinary is unable to reach the conclusion that the pursuer has proved the facts necessary to lead to the inference that his wife has been guilty of adultery, and so to entitle him to decree of divorce. As the proof has been led in absence the action has been dismissed."

[1] Campbell v. Campbell, December 7, 1860, 23 D. 99; Burgess v. Burgess, 3 Haggart, p. 231; Mortimer v. Mortimer, 2 Haggart, 310.

No. 124. LORD COWAN concurred.

June 20, 1873. Fullerton v. Fullerton. LORD BENHOLME.—The weight to be given to the confession of a party, in the position in which the defender in this case is placed, depends very much upon the circumstances of the case. Such a confession must sometimes be entirely disregarded in cases in which there is a motive for making such a confession although it is not true. In this case there can be no such motive, and I can hardly conceive it possible that the confession of the defender should be untrue. Then the evidence of the witnesses tends to corroborate the defender's confession. I therefore concur with your Lordship.

LORD NEAVES concurred.

THE COURT pronounced this interlocutor:—"Recall the interlocutor: Find facts, circumstances, and qualifications proved relevant to infer that the defender committed adultery: Find her guilty of adultery accordingly: Therefore divorce and separate the said defender from the pursuer," &c.

ROBERT A. VEITCH, S.S.C.—Agent.

No. 125.

June 21, 1873. Malcolm v. Kirk, &c.

SIR JAMES MALCOLM, Pursuer.—Sol.-Gen. Clark—Duncan.
MICHAEL KIRK AND OTHERS, Defenders.
MRS JEAN MALCOLM OR LYDE AND OTHERS, Defenders.—Watson—Muirhead.

Entail—Prohibitory and Resolutive Clauses—Reservation—Act 1685, c. 22—11 and 12 Vict. c. 56, sec. 43.—A deed of entail containing prohibitions against alienation and contraction of debt, duly fenced by irritant and resolutive clause, contained also a reservation of power to the heirs of entail to grant provisions to younger children to the extent of two years' rent, with power to sell portions of the estate sufficient to pay the debts thereby contracted. Held (rev. judgment of Lord Mackenzie) (1) that the entail was valid and effectual under the Act 1685, cap. 22; and (2) that being valid, it was not within the provisions of the 43d section of the Act 11 and 12 Vict. c. 36.

Entail—Prohibition—Irritancy.—A deed of entail contained prohibitions against alienation, contraction of debt, and altering the order of succession, and declared "all such deeds" null and void, and the person contravening to have lost all right to the estate. Held that the word "deeds" was sufficiently comprehensive to embrace all that was contained in the prohibitory clause, and that the entail was valid.

2D DIVISION, and three consulted Judges. Ld. Mackenzie. R.

BY disposition and deed of taillie, dated 9th October 1725, Michael Malcolm of Balbedie, with consent of Jean Blair, his spouse, disponed to his daughter, Margaret Malcolm, and a certain line of heirs, the lands and baronies of Nuthill and Balbedie. The deed contained the following prohibitory and resolutive clauses and reservations:—"And, further, it is hereby expressly provided and declared, that it shall not be in the power of the said Margaret Malcolm, nor any of the heirs of tailzie above named, to sell, annalzie, wadset, dilapidate, nor put away any of the lands above mentioned, nor contract debt, nor grant heritable bonds, or other rights and securities therefor, whereby the said lands or any part thereof may be evicted or adjudged from them in defraud of the other heirs of tailzie above specified, nor yet to alter this present tailzie and order of succession above mentioned, declaring all such deeds not only void and null, but the person so contravening to have amitted and lost all right and title to the foresaid lands and estate, and the same to fall and devolve upon the next member of tailzie hereby appointed to succeed, as if the contravener were naturally dead; and he or she is hereby obliged, upon the said contravention, to denude themselves of the right of the said lands in favours of the said next member of tailzie, wherein, if they fail, the same is to be prosecuted by declarator, adjudication, or other action competent of the law; reserving always, notwithstanding of the prohibitory clauses above written, power and liberty to the said Margaret Malcolm and the other heirs of tailzie above specified to provide their husbands and wives in suitable liferents, by way of locality, not exceeding the half of the present rent of the estate for the time, and to provide their younger children, beside the heir, with competent provisions not exceeding two years' rent of the said estate; declaring always, that neither the said Margaret Malcolm nor any of the other heirs of tailzie shall suffer adjudications nor other real diligence to be led and done against the said lands, or any part thereof, for debts warrantably contracted, at least they shall be holden and obliged to purge and redeem the same two full years before expiring of the legal reversion, wherein, if they failzie, they shall lose their right of the said lands in manner foresaid, and it shall be leisome and lawful to the next member of tailzie to purge and redeem the same, and declare their right to the said estate in manner before prescribed: Providing, nevertheless, that it shall be free and lawful to the said heirs of tailzie or their foresaids to sell, annalzie, wadset, burden, wadset, or otherwise dispone as much of the said lands and baronies as may, by the price thereof, sufficiently satisfy and pay the debts warrantably contracted in manner foresaid, which shall be resting for the time, with annualrent, until the said heirs of tailzie can validly and legally dispose thereof for that effect; which disposition or other right shall be no ground for incurring the foresaid irritancies any manner of way."

No. 125.

June 21, 1873. Malcolm v. Kirk, &c.

This action was raised by Sir James Malcolm, heir of entail in possession of the lands, against Michael Kirk, the heir presumptive to him under the entail, and others, to have it declared that the deed of entail was "invalid and ineffectual in regard to all the prohibitions therein contained against sales and alienation, the contraction of debt, and alteration of the order of succession, in terms of the provisions in the 43d section of the Act 11 and 12 Victoria, cap. 36, and that the pursuer was entitled to hold and held the foresaid lands and others above described, or such part thereof as belonged to him as heir of entail, free from the prohibitions, conditions, and provisions contained in the said deed of taillie, with full power to sell and alienate the said lands and others as aforesaid, or to contract debt thereon, or to alter the succession thereto at pleasure, and generally to deal with the same as unlimited fee thereof, and that no action of forfeiture should be competent at the instance of any heir-substitute under the destination contained in the deed of taillie against the pursuer, by reason of the contravention of all or any of the prohibitions therein contained."

Michael Kirk and several others who were called as defenders did not appear, but defences were lodged for Mrs Jean Malcolm or Lyde (eldest daughter of the deceased Sir Michael Malcolm of Balbedie, the pursuer's uncle) and her children.

The 43d section of the Act 11 and 12 Vict. cap. 36, founded on by the pursuer, enacts that "where any taillie shall not be valid and effectual in terms of the said recited Act of the Scottish Parliament passed in the year 1685, in regard to the prohibitions against alienation and contraction of debt, and alteration of the order of succession, in consequence of defects either of the original deed of entail or of the investiture following thereon, but shall be invalid and ineffectual as regards any one of such prohibitions, then and in that case such tailzie shall be deemed and taken, from and after the passing of this Act, to be invalid and in-the three cardinal prohibitions required by the Act 1685, cap. 2. these prohibitions is, or at least one or other of them is not valid with irritant and resolutive clauses. (3) The entail does not e exclude or annul diligence against the estate at the instance of for or in respect of debts contracted by the heirs of entail. (4 tail being an incomplete and imperfect entail in terms of the cap. 22, is, in virtue of the provisions contained in the Act 1 Vict. cap. 36, invalid and defective in toto, and the pursuer is e decree as concluded for.

The defenders pleaded;—(1) The entail being complete and able in all its fettering clauses, the pleas stated by the pursuer be repelled.

The Lord Ordinary pronounced this interlocutor:—"Finds, and decerns in terms of the conclusions of the libel, and finds no due to either party."*

---

* "NOTE.—1. The pursuer maintained that the prohibitions against contraction of debt, and alteration of the order of succession were with valid irritant and resolutive clauses. His contention was that 'deeds' in the irritant clause referred only to the granting of heritabl other rights and securities for debt whereby the estate may be evic judged—a prohibition which, he says, is separately mentioned in the p clause. The Lord Ordinary cannot so read the clause. The rule of co is, that while the prohibitory and irritant clauses of an entail are to be strictly, they are at the same time to be construed fairly, giving the ployed, when general, their natural import, especially where that is th the context confers upon them.

"After specifying the prohibitions, which are ample and complete proceeds as follows:—'Declaring all such deeds not only void and nu person so contravening to have amitted and lost all right and title to th lands and estate, and the same to fall and devolve upon the next i tailzie.' The word 'deeds' here used is, it is thought, applicable to an sales and alienations of the estate, the contracting of debt, the grantin able bonds, and other rights or securities therefor, whereby the estat evicted or adjudged, and the alteration of the order of succession, wh

No. 125.

June 21, 1873.

Malcolm v. Kirk, &c.

The defenders reclaimed, and the case was argued on the first branch dealt with in the Lord Ordinary's note, viz. as to the validity of the clauses, prohibitory, irritant, and resolutive.[1]

---

o him to be unreasonable and ungrammatical. The resolutive clause, which is closely united to the irritant clause, also confirms this view, inasmuch as it declares the person 'so contravening to have amitted and lost all right,'—that s, the person contravening by doing, making, or granting what is prohibited in he prohibitory clause.

"2. The pursuer further pleads, that as the entail is not valid and effectual in erms of the Act 1685, c. 22, in regard to the prohibitions against sales, alienaion, and contraction of debt, in consequence of defects in the deed of entail, it s invalid and ineffectual as regards all the prohibitions, and subject to his debts nd deeds, in respect of the enactment to that effect contained in the 43d section f the Rutherfurd Act.

"In disposing of this plea it is necessary to keep in view the provisions of he Act 1685, c. 22, concerning tailzies. By that Act it is made lawful to the ages 'to tailzie their lands and estates, and to substitut aires in their tailzies ith such provisions and conditions as they shall think fitt, and to affect the id tailzies with irritant and resolutive clauses, whereby it shall not be lawful o the aires of tailzie to sell, annalzie, or dispone the said lands, or any part hereof, or contract debt, or doe any other deed whereby the samen may be apised, adjudged, or evicted from the others substitute in the tailzie, or the succession frustrat or interrupted, declaring all such deeds to be in themselves null nd void.'

"But although under this Act it is necessary to a valid entail that the entail hall contain prohibitory, irritant, and resolutive clauses, under which sales and lienations of the estate and the contraction of debt thereupon is unlawful, the ntail in the present case, after reserving power, notwithstanding the prohibitory lauses, to the heirs of tailzie, to provide their husbands and wives in suitable liferents by way of locality, not exceeding the half of the present rent of the state for the time, and to provide their younger children beside the heir with mpetent provisions, not exceeding two years' rent of the estate, expressly proides that it shall be free and lawful to the said heirs of tailzie or their foresaids o sell, annalzie, wadset, burden, wadset, or otherwise dispone as much of the said nds and baronies as may, by the price thereof, sufficiently satisfy and pay the bts warrantably contracted in manner foresaid, which shall be resting for the me, with annualrent, until the said heirs of tailzie can validly and legally dise thereof for that effect, which disposition or other right shall be no ground incurring the foresaid irritancies any manner of way.'

"Under this deed the heir in possession may sell, alienate, or burden as much the estate as may by the price pay the debts contracted under the power to ant provisions to widows and children to the extent authorised by the entail, hich shall be due at the time, with the annualrent or interest thereof, until heirs of tailzie can dispose of as much of the estate as may be necessary for t effect. In short, the fetters of the entail are not complete against sales, enation, or contraction of debt, but are invalid and ineffectual, and the heirs, fee-simple proprietors, to that extent can, for debts due in respect of provins granted to widows and children to the amount authorised by the deed, and annualrent thereof, sell, alienate, and burden the estate, the rule of law ing that heirs of entail are fee-simple proprietors, and have full power over the tailed estate, except in so far as they are fettered. In the exercise of this ht the heirs of entail can sell any part of the estate, even the mansion-house, lees, and policies, and in course of time, as they may sell not only for the prosions, but for the annualrent thereof, the whole estate may be sold and alienated.

---

[1] Lang v. Lang, Nov. 23, 1838, 1 D. 98—rev. Aug. 16, 1839, M'L. and Rob. 1; Graham v. Murray, Jan. 21, 1848, 10 D. 380—aff. May 3, 1849, 6 Bell's pp. 441; Hay v. Hay, March 4, 1851, 13 D. 945; Udny v. Udny, March 16, 58, 20 D 796; Drummond v Hay, Feb. 3, 1872, ante, vol. x. 451.

No. 125. At advising,—

June 21, 1873. Malcolm v. Kirk, &c.

LORD COWAN.—The word "deeds" is a perfectly comprehensive term, and is recognised as such throughout the entail before us. No doubt the expression is capable of being construed; but where there is no limiting word, and nothing in the context to limit the generality of its meaning, the term when used in the irritant clause is sufficiently comprehensive to embrace the contraction of debt, the alienation of the property, and the alteration of the order of succession referred to in the prohibitory clause. Reference was made on the part of the pursuer to cases where a limiting meaning has been attached to the term "deeds." But in all these cases there were expressions in the prohibitory clause which limited the term "deeds" to something specially mentioned in that clause. There is nothing of that kind here. The term "deeds" does not occur at all in the prohibitory clause. The expression "facts and deeds" occurs in an earlier part of the deed of entail; but no attempt has been made to connect the expression "such deeds" with these "facts and deeds" mentioned in the earlier part of the entail. The previous cases referred to are of no application in the present case, because there is nothing here to connect the expression "deeds" with any special part of the prohibitory clause previously mentioned, and by such reference to limit the generality of its import. The case of the Roxburgh entail is a very strong illustration of what I have stated; for the irritant clause in it, which has always been considered beyond challenge, employs the same expression as is employed in this deed. It says "all whilk deeds," and so forth.

The other Judges concurred.

In regard to the second point, viz. the effect of the relaxation of the prohibitory clauses on the validity of the entail, the Court appointed the case to be heard before seven Judges.

Argued for the defenders;—There is not such defect in any of the fettering clauses as is contemplated by the 43d section of the Rutherfurd Act. The object of that Act was to deal with cases where the prohibitory

---

There are no clauses in the entail restricting the granting of provisions by subsequent heirs until those granted by previous heirs had been paid, or declaring that the provisions shall only affect the rents, and not the fee, and the only provision besides those already noticed is, that the heirs of entail shall not suffer adjudication or other real diligence to be led against the estate for these debts, at least they shall purge and redeem the same two years before the expiry of the legal reversion. This they may do by selling or disponing as much of the estate as will pay the provision, debts, and annualrents.

"The question is new, and attended with difficulty. The Lord Ordinary has carefully considered the able and full argument of counsel, and the numerous cases cited at the debate, and he is humbly of opinion, that as the entail in the present case is not complete, and valid and effectual in terms of the Act 1685, c. 22, in regard to prohibitions against alienation and the contraction of debt, it is, in respect of the provisions of the 43d section of the Rutherfurd Act, invalid and effectual as regards all the prohibitions.

"The defenders maintain that as by the 21st section of the Rutherfurd Act the heir in possession liable to pay or provide for provisions to younger children granted by former heirs is empowered to charge them upon the fee and rents of the estate, other than the mansion-house, offices, and policies, by granting bond and disposition in security for the same, with all the usual clauses of such a deed, the provisions in the present entail to a similar effect cannot be held as invalidating it. But there is a great difference between powers conferred upon heirs of entail by statute, and rights excepted or reserved in a deed of entail. The former do not invalidate the entail; but under the latter the fetters of the entail are not applied by the entailer, and the entail is consequently not valid or effectual in terms of the Act 1685, c. 22."

No. 125.

June 21, 1873.
Malcolm v. Kirk, &c.

clause was omitted or was defective. In such a case the Act gives the heir power to shake himself free from the fetters. But in this entail there are all the prohibitions requisite to make a good entail under the Act of 1685. It is true that for provisions to children the entailer has exempted certain portions of the entailed estate from the fetters. There is a complete and valid prohibition against alienation, but that prohibition does not apply to the whole estate under certain circumstances. This exception is one which the entailer is quite entitled to make,[1] and is in the same position as entailer's debts.[2] It is res judicata that the entailer has power to allow the heirs to burden the estate with debt to a certain extent,[3] and the question is, has the entailer in this case gone beyond his powers. He has done it, for there is no such relaxation of the prohibition as practically to annul it, and the Court have authorised similar relaxations of prohibitions.[4] It would be a curious anomaly if it were held that the Rutherfurd Act, while by section 21 it gives power to affect the fee for children's provisions, by section 43 reduced any entail which did the same thing.

Argued for the pursuer;—In this entail power is given to the heir to sell any part of the estate, for any amount of debt, and without any restriction on the heir, except such as might arise from the Court interfering to prevent dilapidation. The Act of 1685 makes it lawful for the lieges to tailzie their lands, "and to affect the said tailzies with irritant and resolutive clauses, whereby it shall not be lawful to the heirs of tailzie to sell, annalzie, or dispone the said lands or any parts thereof," &c. Then the Rutherfurd Act says that if an entail is invalid or ineffectual as regards any one prohibition it shall be invalid and ineffectual as regards all the prohibitions. Now, this entail allows the heir to sell without limitation, and how can it be said that the prohibition to alienate is valid and effectual under the Act 1685, or that the entail does not come within the provisions of the 45th section of the Rutherfurd Act? If a specific portion of the estate was excepted from the prohibition that would not invalidate the entail, for that portion would be in fee-simple, and the other parts of the estate under the entail. But here there is no portion specified, and the prohibition against alienation is so defective as not to guard the corpus of the estate; and wherever the corpus of the estate is not secured against alienation the entail is bad under the Rutherfurd Act.

At advising,—

LORD PRESIDENT.—The question which has been argued before us relates to the validity of the entail of Balbedie. The pursuer of the action is the heir in possession, and he concludes for declarator that that entail is and shall be deemed and taken to be invalid and ineffectual in regard to all the prohibitions therein contained against sales and alienation, the contraction of debt, and alteration of the order of succession, in terms of the provisions in the 43d section of the Act 10 and 12 Vict. c. 36, and that the pursuer is entitled to hold, and holds, the said lands and others above described, or such part thereof as belongs to him as heir of entail foresaid, free from the prohibitions, conditions, and provisions contained in the said deed of tailzie, with full power to sell and alienate, &c.

The grounds upon which this action is based are distinctly enough stated in the pursuer's pleas, but these pleas have not all been dealt with in the argument before us. On the contrary, the sole ground upon which the pursuer has maintained in the course of that argument that the entail is invalid is that which is contained in the first plea taken in connection with the fourth. There are, there-

[1] Ker v. Innes Ker, July 6, 1812, 5 Paton's App. 609.
[2] Howden v. Porterfield, June 17, 1834, 12 S. and D. 734.
[3] Catton v. Mackenzie, March 1, 1872, ante, vol. x. (H. L.), 12.
[4] Rogerson v. Rogerson et al., May 17, 1872, ante, vol. x. 698.

No. 125.

June 21, 1873. Malcolm v Kirk, &c.

fore, obviously questions in this case which cannot be at present disposed of. Whether the pursuer intends to insist upon the second and third pleas as separate grounds of action we have not been made aware, but it is necessary that I should state very distinctly that we have no intention at present to dispose of these pleas, having heard no argument upon the subject. The first plea in law is, "In respect of the reservations contained in the deed of tailzie from the prohibitions thereby imposed, the same does not contain valid or effectual prohibitions against either the contraction of debt, or against sales or alienations, or one or other of them, in terms of the Act 1685, c. 52." And the fourth plea, following out that objection, maintains that the entail, being incomplete and imperfect in terms of the Act 1685, is invalid and defective in toto, in virtue of the provisions contained in the Act 11 and 12 Vict. The objection to the validity of the entail is thus made to depend entirely upon the reservations from the prohibitions. It is to be assumed, of course, that all the cardinal prohibitions are well and effectually inserted in this deed, and that these have been fully fenced with irritant and resolutive clauses. But, that being done, the entailer proceeds thus—[His Lordship quoted the reservation clause of the deed of entail as above narrated]. The Lord Ordinary is of opinion that the effect of these reservations is to destroy or neutralise the prohibitions against sales and alienations, and the prohibition against the contraction of debt. But I cannot help thinking that his Lordship is under some misapprehension as to the precise effect of these reservations, for he says in his note,—"Under this deed the heir in possession may sell, alienate, or burden as much of the estate as may by the price pay the debts contracted under the power to grant provisions to widows and children to the extent authorised by the entail, which shall be due at the time, with the annualrent or interest thereof, until the heirs of tailzie can dispose of as much of the estate as may be necessary for that effect." Now, here his Lordship is obviously under the impression that the power of sale may be exercised to a larger extent than is, in reality, permitted by the deed. The provisions to widows can never be the cause of a sale of a part of the estate at all, because that provision is to be made by way of locality only. A locality is not a debt, and there is no provision made for converting it into a debt. It is an appropriation of a particular part of the lands to the widow in liferent. That does not permanently alienate any part of the estate, nor is it in any proper sense a contraction of debt. But, at all events, it is impossible, under this clause of reservation, that an heir of entail could be permitted to alienate any part of the estate for the purpose of satisfying the claim of the widow under a locality deed. The power of sale is confined entirely to debts which are contracted for the purpose of making provisions to younger children to the extent—to each family of younger children—of two years' rents of the estate. That is the full extent of it. The Lord Ordinary says further,—"In the exercise of this right the heir of entail can sell any part of the estate, even the mansion-house, offices, and policies, and in course of time, as they may sell not only for the provisions, but for the annualrent thereof, the whole estate may be sold and alienated." Now, his Lordship is here again under a mistake, because, in the exercise of such a power as this, the heir in possession would never be permitted to sell the mansion-house, offices, or policies. The practice in this respect is quite accurately stated by Mr Sandford in his book upon Entails, at p. 385, where he says,—"When the deed of entail contains a power of sale for the purpose of paying off the provisions to younger children, burdening the entailed estate, the heir in possession must execute it under the authority of the Court of Session. Upon a petition presented to them for that purpose, the Court will authorise a sale of certain parts of the entailed lands, and appoint a trustee in order to carry the same into effect, who is responsible, as under the statutes, for redeeming the land-tax, &c., that the purchase money be properly applied." It is quite plain, therefore, that the heir of entail proposing to exercise this power must come to the Court to have the portion of the estate that is to be sold selected and appointed by judicial authority. Neither am I very much moved by the suggestion of his Lordship that, in the exercise of this power, the whole estate may be sold and alienated within any short period of time. This entail was made in

No. 125.

June 21, 1873.
Malcolm v. Kirk, &c.

r 1725, and we are not informed that the estate has yet disappeared, notnding the lapse of a century and a-half. And, therefore, the effect of the ion, practically, is certainly not what the Lord Ordinary attributes to it.
hough his Lordship has certainly ascribed far greater effect to this clause really due to it, the question is still an important one, and very well of consideration, whether this reservation does not so neutralise or dero-m the cardinal prohibitions of the statute as to invalidate the entail. I le understand that there might be such reservations as would make the ions of the entail practically of no avail at all, and enable one heir of r it may be two or three heirs of entail in succession, entirely to dilapie whole estate; and a very serious question would then arise, whether s an entail under the Act 1685 at all, or whether it was not a deed by of the name of an entail, although taking in some respects the form of utory provision. Is this a case of that kind? Does the reservation from risions go that length?

, in determining whether this is a valid entail under the Act 1685 I can-go back, in recollection, to a great many deeds of entail which we have d a great many cases which have been decided prior to the passing of ail Amendment Act, in which there is permission to contract debt and to tions of the estate for the purpose of paying off the debt thus permitted ontracted; and I am not aware that prior to the passing of the Entail ment Act in 1848 it ever was doubted that these were valid and effectual nder the Act 1685. It is quite unnecessary to particularise cases, but a case that was quoted in the course of the argument—Howden v. Por-—which is a very good example in point, where not only was there a o contract debt for the purpose of paying younger children's provisions, a power to contract debt to the extent of 6000 merks beyond, provided t was never allowed to exceed that. Now, that certainly, although the a was not directly raised, was held to be a perfectly valid and effectual nder the statute 1685. And the question decided there was that the ed debt, or the debt which the entail allowed the heirs to contract during sistence and currency of the destination, was exactly in the same position ler's debt; and if it be dealt with exactly in the same way as entailer's at only goes to shew more clearly that the permission to contract that uld constitute no objection to the validity of the entail under the statute ecause a man may make a good entail under the statute 1685 though he deeply in debt. It is not a very prudent thing to do, but if he has the can convey it to a certain series of heirs, and he can subject it to fetters; be very much in vain, because his creditors may afterwards carry it off e heirs of entail, but that would not prevent the entail from being other-ectual under the Act 1685. Indeed, my Lords, it appears to me quite expatiate upon this further, because a partial relaxation of any of the l prohibitions under the Act 1685 has never been held to invalidate an then, we come to the question, what is the effect of the 43d section of ail Amendment Act? And we approach the construction of that section is, I think, quite settled, that, independent of the Entail Amendment is is a valid entail under the Act 1685. Now, what does that section It provides "that where any tailzie shall not be valid and effectual in f the said recited Act of the Scottish Parliament, passed in the year a regard to the prohibitions against alienation and contraction of debt, ration of the order of succession, in consequence of defects either of the deed of entail or of the investiture following thereon, but shall be and ineffectual as regards any one of such prohibitions, then and in that h tailzie shall be deemed and taken, from and after the passing of this be invalid and ineffectual as regards all the prohibitions; and the estate subject to the deeds and debts of the heir then in possession," &c. Now, the kind of invalidity that is here contemplated and expressed? It is ty in consequence of defects either of the original deed of entail or of the ure following thereon. The natural construction of these words appear

No. 125.

June 21, 1873. Malcolm v. Kirk, &c.

to me to be that it includes, and includes only, objections either to co prohibitions, that it is imperfectly expressed, or omitted, or in some w dered, or that it is not duly fenced with irritant and resolutive clauses. that be the meaning of the first part of this section, which regards the tions taken cumulatively, what shall we say is the meaning of the wor follow, "but shall be invalid and ineffectual as regards any one of such tions?" Plainly the true construction must be "shall be, as regards a such prohibitions, invalid and ineffectual, in consequence of defects eit original deed of entail, or of the investiture following thereon." Nov such an entail? Is this entail invalid under the Act 1685, in conseq defects in any one of the prohibitions? My answer to that question is in the negative. There is no defect at all. The prohibitions are perfec and are well fenced; and it is a good entail, therefore, under the Act 1 it were to be said that a defect, "as regards any one of such prohibitio mean a relaxation of any one of the prohibitions, I answer at once th not the true construction of the words. I think it is a total invalidity the prohibitions that is to lead to the result here contemplated. And struction is confirmed and fortified when we consider what was the we mischief intended to be remedied by this enactment. When there wa in one of the prohibitions of a deed of entail,—say, for example, in the tion against the contraction of debt,—the heir of entail was entitled to debt, and could do it effectually, but he could not sell the estate. And undoubtedly a very unfavourable position in which to place both the the estate. Again, take the case (which occurred in the case of v. Bogle[1]) that there is a defect in the prohibition against sale, but in the prohibition against the contraction of debt, the heir of entail is f so far that he can sell the estate whenever he likes, but his creditor touch it. And that, certainly, is a very anomalous position also, and on contemplated, one would say, by the Act 1685, the policy of which exclude both creditors and purchasers, and not one without the other. as the law stood before the passing of the Entail Amendment Act, tha effect of a defect in one of the prohibitions. Now, it was to remed apprehend, that the 43d section was enacted, and it can, in that point apply only to a case in which the heir in possession is absolutely free a one of the prohibitions. But what I have said on the construction of section must not be understood as weakening what I said before as to bility of an entail being so destroyed by exceptions and reservations as tially to leave no valid or effectual prohibitions, although they may be point of form; because, although that might not fall under the very the 43d section, I apprehend that such an entail as that would be inva the Act 1685. Therefore, upon the whole matter, I have come to th sion, and I must say without any difficulty, that the Lord Ordinary's int is wrong, and that the defenders are entitled to absolvitor in so far a that portion of the case which has been argued before us.

The other Judges concurred.

THE COURT pronounced this interlocutor:—"Recall the inte of the Lord Ordinary submitted to review, assoilzie the d from the whole conclusions of the summons, and decern."

TAIT & CRICHTON, W.S.—A. STEVENSON, W.S.—Agents.

---

[1] Cochrane v. Bogle and Co., March 2, 1849, 11 D. 908.

HENRY SCOTT AND OTHERS (Spears' Trustees), of the First Part.—Balfour.
MRS ELIZA ISABELLA BAXTER OR SPEARS, of the Second Part.—Omond.
WILLIAM FRASER AND OTHERS, of the Third Part.—Watson—Mackintosh.

No. 126.
June 21, 1873.
Spears' Trustees v. Spears, &c.

Succession—Fee and Liferent—Residue—Advances to Children.—A testator directed his trustees to hold the residue of his estate for his son in liferent and his children in fee, the children's shares to be paid to them, if under age at their father's death, on attaining majority, and, in the case of daughters, on attaining majority or marriage. It was further provided in the trust-deed "that until the respective terms of payment of the said shares, the said trustees, after the death of both parents," should have full power to pay the interest of the trust-estate to the children, or to make advances to them out of the capital for furthering their prospects in life. The son, on his death, left a widow and two pupil children. Held (1) that the son's widow was not entitled to a liferent of the residue of the testator's estate; and (2) that the trustees were entitled, but not bound, to make advances from the annual proceeds of the trust-estate for the maintenance and support of the children while their mother survived.

2D DIVISION. I.

JAMES SPEARS died on 1st June 1853, leaving a trust-disposition and settlement dated 9th March 1853, whereby he conveyed his whole estate, heritable and moveable, to Henry Scott and others, as trustees for the purposes therein mentioned. The purposes of the trust were,—1st, payment of debts and funeral expenses; 2d, the liferent of his whole means and estate to his wife; 3d, on the death of his widow payment of the dividends of certain stock to a niece, and the residue of his estate to be held in trust for his son George Spears in liferent. After providing that in certain events the trustees might make advances to George Spears the deed goes on—"And after the death of the said George Spears I appoint my said trustees to hold the whole of the remaining residue of the said lands and effects for behoof of any children to be procreated of the said George Spears by his present or any subsequent marriage, share and share alike, in fee, but always subject to the general provisions and powers after-mentioned; and failing the whole of said children by death," that, before the testator, "then, and in that case, the said trustees shall divide the residue, and convey the same as follows." The deed then set forth the following clauses:—"Declaring that the shares of any of the foresaid parties who may be under age, or of their children, in the event of their having sons, shall not be paid over or conveyed to them respectively till they each attain the age of twenty-one years complete, and the shares of such of them as are daughters until they each respectively attain the said age of twenty-one, or marriage, whichever event shall first happen." And declaring that, until the respective terms of payment of said shares, the said trustees, after the death of both parents, shall have full power to pay the interest or free produce of the respective shares of the said trust-estate, or such part thereof as they in their discretion shall think proper, to the children who may ultimately be respectively entitled to the said shares, and likewise to advance such sums as the said trustees shall think reasonable to any of the said children out of their share of the capital stock for the purpose of putting them to any profession or business, or otherwise furthering their prospects in life."

James Spears was survived by his wife, Isabel Burns or Spears, his son George Spears, and the niece mentioned in the trust-deed.

Mrs Spears died on 2d December 1866, and after her death the trustees paid the dividends of the stock to the niece as directed in the trust-deed, and the annual proceeds of the trust-estate to George Spears, till his death, which occurred on 11th August 1871. Prior to the death of the said James Spears, the said George Spears was married to Miss Jane Smith, who died on 28th October 1864, without leaving issue. She was the wife of George Spears in 1853 when James Spears executed his trust-disposition and settlement. After Jane Smith's death George Spears was married to Mrs Eliza Isabella Baxter or Spears, the party of the second part, by whom he had two children, viz., Elizabeth Thomson Spears and Isabella Burns Spears, born respectively on 6th April 1867 and 8th October 1868, whose tutors are the parties of the third part.

No. 126.

June 21, 1873. Spears' Trustees v. Spears, &c.

George Spears left a trust-deed and settlement in which he left his whole estate to trustees, of which his wife was one. In this deed it was provided that his wife, Isabella Baxter or Spears, should have the annual produce of his estate during all the days of her life, for behoof of herself and children, and on her death the fee of the estate was to be divided among the children. He also appointed his trustees tutors and curators to his children.

In a special case, the widow of George Spears called upon the trustees of James Spears, the parties of the first part, to pay to her, for her own behoof during her life, the income of the residue of the trust-estate of the said James Spears; and the tutors of George Spears' children called upon the said parties of the first part to pay to them, for behoof of the said children, the said free annual income, or so much thereof as shall be necessary for their maintenance and education, but the parties of the first part considered "that, upon a sound construction of the trust-deed of the said James Spears, the widow of the said George Spears had no right to any part of the income of his estate, and that they were not entitled to make an allowance to his children until both the parents of said children are dead."

The following questions were therefore submitted for the opinion and judgment of the Court:—"(1) Is Mrs Eliza Isabella Baxter or Spears entitled to the liferent of the free residue of the estate of the said deceased James Spears? (2) Are the parties of the first part bound to pay over the annual proceeds of the trust-estate of the said James Spears in their hands to the tutors of George Spears' children, for behoof of their wards, or are they bound or entitled to make an allowance therefrom for the maintenance and support of the said children, while their mother, Mrs Eliza Isabella Baxter or Spears, survives?"

Argued for the first parties;—The provisions of the trust-deed were quite inconsistent with the claim made by the second party, the direction to the trustees being to hold the estate for behoof of George Spears' children, and no mention being made of his widow. The meaning of the words "after the death of both parents" was not quite clear, but they could not be construed so as to alter the plain meaning of the purposes of the deed.

Argued for the second party;—Under the trust-settlement two powers were contemplated (1) a power to pay interest, and (2) a power to advance money; and it was expressly declared that these powers were not to be exercised till "after the death of both parents." The presumption of law was against accumulation, and until the son attained majority, and the daughters attained majority or married, the widow was entitled to the annual income of the estate.[1]

Argued for the third parties;—The claim of the widow is excluded by the fact that a specific term of payment is fixed, namely, majority or [1] Humphreys v. Humphreys, 4 L. R., Jan. 12, 1867 (Eq. Ca.), 475; 1 Jarman on Wills, 497; Cockshot v. Cockshot, 2 Coll. 432.

No. 126.

June 21, 1873.
Spears' Trustees v. Spears, &c.

marriage. The trustees, nevertheless, are entitled to make payment of interest during the lifetime of the widow.[1]

At advising,—

LORD BENHOLME.—This special case has been laid before your Lordships to obtain the opinion of the Court on certain questions which have arisen in the administration of the trust-estate of the late James Spears, who died in 1853, having a trust-disposition and settlement of his whole estate. This gentleman was survived by his wife, and only son George Spears, and also by another testatee, Margaret Fraser. His wife died in 1866, and thereby freed the estate of the liferent to which she was entitled; and George Spears, who was entitled to a postponed liferent, also died in 1871.

I would now call your Lordships' attention to the leading provisions of the testator's settlement, and particularly to the important clause by which, after the death of his son George Spears, he appoints his trustees to hold the whole of the remaining residue of his estate "for behoof of any children to be procreated of the said George Spears by his present or any subsequent marriage." I look on this as the decisive and most important clause in the settlement as bearing on the question now before us. The deed then goes on, "and failing the whole of said children by death, then and in that case the said trustees shall divide the residue and convey the same as follows," &c. I say no more as to the parties who are named, as it appears to be of no consequence in the case whether you consider the parties thus called in as conditional institutes, or as substitutes to George Spears' children, for it is certain that the trustees must hold the fund in the first instance for the children. Now, there are two children, both of them under age, in whose favour this residuary clause operates. And the questions we have to decide are first, as to the claim of their mother to a liferent, and second, as to the power of the trustees to make certain advances for behoof of the children, for whose benefit the residue was intended. I may here mention that the mother is not the person who was at the time the settlement was made or even when it came into operation the wife of George Spears. She has died, and this lady, George Spears' second wife, was an entire stranger to the testator. In support of the widow's claim to a liferent a very ingenious argument has been addressed to us, founded mainly, I apprehend, on an English decision in the case of Humphreys, 4 Law Reports, Eq. Ca. 475. Now, that case was one which in some respects resembled the present, but in others was strongly contrasted with it. In the case of Humphreys, the testator, after providing for various legacies, says,—"After my dear wife's death, Mary Humphreys, I leave the remainder of my property to be equally divided among" certain persons. It will be therefore observed that there was here no disposition of the residue during the life of this lady, and the inference therefore was that the testator intended her to have a liferent interest in the residue, which otherwise must have been retained and held for behoof of no person in particular during her survivance. In the present case, on the death of George Spears and the consequent expiry of his liferent, by the express terms of the trust-settlement the trustees are directed to hold the residue for the children, and the terms of payment of their respective shares is on attaining twenty-one years of age in the case of sons, and twenty-one years or marriage in the case of daughters. Now, it would be a very violent stretch, and one for which I can find no shadow of support, to hold that the widow is to have any concern in the annual proceeds of the residue, merely because this provision is added, that until the terms of payment shall arrive "the trustees, after the death of both parents, shall have full power to pay the interest or free produce of the respective shares, &c., to the children who may ultimately be respectively entitled to the said shares." Nothing is thereby given even by implication to the parents—there is merely a further discretionary power conferred on the trustees. These two things, that the residue was completely disposed of even during her life, and that this lady,

[1] Ogilvie v. Cuming and Boswell, Jan. 27, 1852, 14 D. 363; Campbell v. Reid, June 12, 1840, 2 D. 1084.

No. 126.

June 21, 1873. Spears' Trustees v. Spears, &c.

the children's mother, was an entire stranger to the testator, appear to me sufficiently to distinguish this case from that of Humphreys.

The second question, as to whether the trustees are entitled to make advances for behoof of the children during their mother's lifetime, has no connection with that other one concerning her alleged liferent. I need not detain your Lordships long on this subject. The difficulty arises entirely out of the clause I have just read, specially empowering the trustees to make advances after the death of both parents, and the question is this, are the trustees thereby prevented from making advances or even paying the interest in whole or in part during the mother's lifetime? I am humbly of opinion that they are not. One main ground of my opinion is, that the trustees are throughout the whole deed vested with discretionary power, shewing an exuberance of confidence in them such as I have seldom seen in any deed. Now, are they to be debarred from the exercise of that discretion during the survivance of the mother, who herself is far from being amply provided for, merely because of the existence of the clause above referred to. Are the trustees not to be entitled to pay the interest or part of the interest for the benefit of the children for whose behoof the capital is being held? My idea is, that the testator may have thought that if the surviving parent were in good circumstances there would be no occasion for making advances. But if not, that he did not intend to prevent, and that there is nothing in this qualified power bestowed on the trustees which ought to prevent them, in the exercise of their discretion, making such advances as they deem to be necessary for the welfare of the children. Therefore, with regard to the second question, I am of opinion that though we cannot say they are "bound," we can distinguish between "bound" and "entitled," and can find that the trustees are entitled to make such advances.

I observe too that this lady, though not entitled to the liferent claimed, seems to have possessed the perfect confidence of her own husband, as he appoints her one of his trustees, and also a tutor and curator to the children; and though she cannot claim a liferent, the trustees may see their way to make such advances to her for behoof of the children as will be practically almost equivalent to what she claims on her own account.

I therefore propose that your Lordships should answer the first question in the negative, and the second in the affirmative, only substituting the word "entitled" for "bound."

Lord Cowan.—I concur in the opinion expressed by your Lordship, and particularly in the last observation, that though the trustees are entitled to make these advances, they must, as to the exercise of that power, be left to their own discretion. I would only add that we are now construing a deed of a special and very remarkable kind, and we must not be taken as intending to interpret the words which have here given rise to the difficulty, except as regards the deed immediately before us for construction.

Lord Neaves.—I concur in the opinion expressed by Lord Benholme, and I have only to add the suggestion that we should find that the trustees are entitled to make advances for the maintenance and education of the children. The trustees will make these advances, not under the strict letter of the deed, but under the authority of the Court, and I apprehend that the reason why the Court gives that authority is this, that the children, for whose benefit the trustees hold the estate, must be kept, and that means that they must be maintained and educated.

The Lord Justice-Clerk concurred.

The Court pronounced the following interlocutor:—"Find, in answer to the first query, that Mrs Spears is not entitled to the liferent of the free residue of the estate of her deceased husband: And in answer to the second query, that the parties of the first part are entitled, but not bound, to make an allowance from the annual proceeds of the trust-estate for the maintenance and support of the children while their mother, Mrs Spears, survives, and decern: Allow the expenses in connection with the special case to be paid to the parties out of the trust-estate, and remit to the Auditor to tax the same, and report."

No. 126.
June 21, 1873.
Spears' Trustees v. Spears, &c.

JOHN ROBERTSON, S.S.C.—JARDINE, STODART, & FRASERS, W.S.—Agents.

No. 127.
June 21, 1873.
Elliot v. Bowhill, &c.

HENRY ELLIOT AND OTHERS, Pursuers.—Watson—Balfour.
s DOROTHY ELLIOT OR BOWHILL AND OTHERS, Defenders.—Millar—Burnet—Harry Smith—Mackintosh.

ccession—Vesting a morte testatoris—Alimentary Provision.—By trust-sition and settlement a father conveyed his whole property to trustees, and rticular he assigned to them the leases of four farms, which leases had dif-t periods of endurance. He directed them to carry on the management of farms, and, after payment of his debts, to divide yearly the annual profits e farms among his children, and on the expiry of the respective leases to e and divide the crop and stocking in the same way; declaring also that nnual profits should not be assignable or attachable for the debts of the ren, and that the issue of children predeceasing should succeed to their eed parents' shares. Held (1) that the provisions in favour of the children d a morte testatoris both as regarded the crop and stocking of the farms he annual profits; and (2) that the children's shares in the annual profits, gh inalienable and unassignable during their lives, might be assigned by n to take effect after death.

ccession—Legacy—Cumulative Provisions.—A father in his daughter's ante-al marriage-contract bound himself to pay at his death a sum of £1000 to arriage-contract trustees. He afterwards executed a trust-disposition and ment, by which he directed his trustees to pay his debts, and divide the ue of his estate equally among his children. Held that the provision in the age-contract was a debt due by the deceased, and was not to be deducted the daughter's share of residue.

2D DIVISION.
Lord Gifford.
I.

HE late James Elliot, tenant of the farm of Lamberton and other s in Berwickshire, by trust-disposition and settlement, dated 18th ust 1865, conveyed his whole property to certain trustees, and in cular he assigned to them the leases of (1) Lamberton and Lamberton lls, and (2) of Bastleridge, of which farms he was tenant, and which s had different periods of endurance.

he second and third purposes were as follows:—"Secondly, that said trustees shall, during the currency of the leases of Lamber-Lamberton Shiells, and Bastleridge, yearly divide the profits and uments arising therefrom among the various members of my family, n and share alike, the child or children of any predeceasing succeeding he portion that would have belonged to his, her, or their deceased nt, declaring that the sums so payable to each of my family are in-ed to be strictly alimentary, and shall not be assignable, nor liable to tached in any way by their creditors, or by the creditors of the hus-of any of my daughters; thirdly, upon the expiry of the tacks of berton, Lamberton Shiells, and Bastleridge, my said trustees are by authorised to realise the whole stock, crop, and others thereon, and vide the same equally among my sons and daughters; declaring that hild or children of any predeceasing shall succeed to the portion that d otherwise have belonged to his, her, or their deceased parent."

he truster died on 29th September 1866, survived by seven children, Henry, James, Mary (Mrs Railton), Dorothy (Mrs Bowhill), Robina

No. 127.
June 21, 1873.
Elliot v. Bowhill, &c.

(Mrs Turnbull), Elizabeth, and William. Elizabeth and William died on 24th April 1871 and 26th January 1872 respectively, both leaving settlements by which they each left their brother James to be their sole executor. Mrs Robina Elliot or Turnbull was married during her father's life, and by antenuptial contract of marriage, dated 13th November 1861, she conveyed to trustees all the property which she had or might become possessed of, and by said deed her father, James Elliot, bound "himself and his heirs, executors, and successors, within six months after his death, to pay to the said trustees" the sum of £1000, with interest until payment.

Upon Mr Elliot's death in 1866 his trustees took possession of his estate. The lease of the farm of Dalgleish, in Selkirkshire, which the truster occupied as joint tenant along with his brother Henry, expired at Whitsunday 1867, that of Bastleridge in 1873, and that of Lamberton and Lamberton Shiells in 1876.

The trustees continued to manage the estate until 30th November 1867, when, upon the application of the sole surviving trustee, a judicial factor was appointed by the Court.

The trustees, on 12th June 1867, paid over to the marriage-contract trustees of Mr and Mrs Turnbull the sum of £1000 already mentioned.

In these circumstances the present action of declarator was raised by Henry Elliot, James Elliot (as for himself, and as executor of his sister Elizabeth and his brother William, and as one of the assignees of his sister, Mrs Dorothy Elliot or Bowhill), and the marriage-contract trustees of Mrs Mary Elliot or Railton (as for her own right and as one of the assignees of Mrs Dorothy Elliot or Bowhill), against Mrs Dorothy Elliot or Bowhill, Mrs Robina Elliot or Turnbull and her marriage-contract trustees, and the judicial factor who had been appointed on the trust-estate.

The action concluded for declarator, inter alia, (1) that the whole rights and interests of the children of James Elliot under his settlement vested in them a morte testatoris, and that they had the power to grant valid conveyances of their interests in the leases of the several farms from the same date; (2) that the sum of £1000, paid to Mrs Robina Elliot or Turnbull under the terms of her antenuptial marriage-contract, should be imputed as a payment to account in settling or ascertaining the amount of her share of her father's residue.

Mrs Bowhill pleaded;—(1) On a sound construction of the trust-disposition and settlement of the deceased James Elliot the provisions therein in favour of his sons and daughters did not vest a morte testatoris, and that being so, the pursuers are not entitled to decree as concluded for.

Mrs Turnbull pleaded;—(1) On a sound construction of the late James Elliot's trust-disposition and settlement no interest in the fee of the provisions referred to in the second and third purposes of the trust vested in the children on the death of their father, or will vest until the termination of the leases. (2) No valid conveyance or assignation could be granted by any of the children either of the share of the fee which had not vested or of the share of the liferent which was declared to be not assignable. (3) Under the provisions of her contract of marriage Mrs Robina Elliot or Turnbull's marriage-contract trustees were creditors of James Elliot's trust-estate for £1000, and Mrs Robina Elliot or Turnbull is entitled to her share of the residue of the trust-estate under her father's trust-disposition and settlement without deduction of the said sum of £1000, or any part thereof.

The Lord Ordinary pronounced the following interlocutor:—"Finds that, according to the sound construction of the trust-disposition and

No. 127.

June 21, 1873.
Elliot v. Bowhill, &c.

tlement of the said James Elliot, dated 18th August 1865, each of his ren children who survived him took a vested right and interest in one- renth part of the whole free residue of his means and estate, and that a rte testatoris,—that is, on the death of the said James Elliot, which ık place on or about 29th September 1866: Finds that each of the said ren children of the said James Elliot took a vested right and interest one-seventh part of the yearly interests, profits, and emoluments arising ter the death of the said James Elliot, and payable in terms of his said ed yearly until the final division of his said estate, and that the said ght and interest vested a morte testatoris,—that is, on the death of the id James Elliot: Finds that the said annual profits and emoluments ayable yearly to each of the testator's children in terms of his deed, up the term or terms fixed for the final division of his estate, are strictly imentary, and are not assignable by any of the said children, nor liable be attached in any way by their creditors, or by the creditors of the sbands of any of the testator's daughters; and finds that the provision this effect contained in the said trust-deed and settlement is valid and ffectual in law: Finds that the trustees and representatives and estate f the said deceased James Elliot are liable and bound to pay the sum of 1000, with interest, contained in and provided by the antenuptial con- act of marriage, dated 13th November 1861, between Henry Turnbull nd Mrs Robina Elliot or Turnbull, the truster's daughter, and that in ms of the said antenuptial contract; and finds that said sum of £1000 nd interest does not fall to be imputed towards or deducted from the rovisions and interest to which the said Mrs Robina Elliot or Turnbull entitled under her father's said trust-disposition and settlement: And ith these findings appoints the cause to be enrolled, that the same may applied to the conclusions of the action, and for farther procedure erein; and meantime reserves all questions of expenses, and grants ve to reclaim against this interlocutor." *

---

* "NOTE.—Instead of dealing directly and in the first instance with the ious declaratory and other conclusions of the summons the Lord Ordinary nks it more expedient to pronounce definite findings on the various questions law raised on the record. If these findings are affirmed or acquiesced in, or ied on a reclaiming note, there will be no difficulty in thereafter exhausting formal conclusions of the action. In accordance with what he understood be the wish of the parties the Lord Ordinary has given leave to reclaim.

"The trust-disposition and settlement of the late Mr James Elliot, tenant at nberton, is a very short and simple deed, and yet the questions arising under re attended with considerable nicety.

"The deed is dated 18th August 1865, and is in the form of a universal st-deed. It conveys to the trustees therein named the truster's whole estate, itable and moveable, of every description; and in particular it assigns two ses, the first of Lamberton and Lamberton Shiells, and the other of Bastle- ge, of which farms the truster was tenant, and which leases had different iods of endurance. The purposes of the trust are, first, payment of debts and neral charges. The second and third purposes, upon which the whole present estions turn, are thus expressed,—'Secondly, That my said trustees shall, ring the currency of the leases of Lamberton, Lamberton Shiells, and Bastle- ge, yearly divide the profits and emoluments arising therefrom among the ious members of my family, share and share alike, the child or children of predeceasing succeeding to the portion that would have belonged to his, her, their deceased parent; declaring that the sums so payable to each of my ily are intended to be strictly alimentary, and shall not be assignable, nor ble to be attached in any way by their creditors, or the creditors of the hus- nd of any of my daughters. Thirdly, Upon the expiry of the tacks of Lam- rton, Lamberton Shiells, and Bastleridge, my said trustees are hereby autho-

No. 127.

June 21, 1873. Elliot v. Bowhill, &c.

Mrs Bowhill reclaimed, and argued;—(1) That it was the plain intention of the truster that none of the provisions in favour of his children rised to realise the whole stock, crop, and others thereon, and to divide the same equally among my sons and daughters; declaring that the child or children of any predeceasing shall succeed to the portion that would otherwise have belonged to his, her, or their deceased parent.'

"The truster died on 29th September 1866, survived by seven children, viz., Henry, James, Mary (Mrs Railton), Dorothy (Mrs Bowhill), Robina (Mrs Turnbull), Elizabeth, and William. Elizabeth and William Elliot have since died, both leaving settlements appointing their brother James to be their sole executor. Mrs Turnbull was married during her father's life, and before the date of his trust-deed, and in her marriage-contract her father bound himself to pay £1000 to the marriage-contract trustees. Mrs Bowhill in 1870 conveyed her share of the succession to James and Mary Elliot, and in 1871 Mary Elliot (Mrs Railton) conveyed her share of the succession, including her half of Mrs Bowhill's share, to trustees, for certain purposes. Certain assignations in security have also been granted by James Elliot, William Elliot, Mary Elliot, and Henry Elliot, upon which claims arise.

"The estate is now under the management of a judicial factor, and the present action has been brought to determine the rights of the various parties under the trust-deed, and under the various assignations and conveyances which have been granted.

"I. The first and most important question is, when did the shares of the residue of the testator's estate vest in his children respectively? Did the right vest a morte testatoris, or was vesting suspended till the period of division fixed by the deed, being the expiry of the leases of Lamberton, Lamberton Shiels, and Bastleridge? The Lord Ordinary is of opinion that, according to a sound construction of the trust-deed, the whole residue of the estate vested in the testator's children a morte testatoris, one-seventh share in each child, and that vesting of the residue was not suspended till the period or periods of ultimate division.

"In cases like the present the presumption always is for instant vesting. In a universal settlement the equal share of each child is necessarily in full of legitim; and as legitim would have vested a morte, it is reasonable to hold that its substitute also so vested, unless there be some provision, expressed or implied, to the contrary.

"The bequest of the residue to the testator's children is in no sense made conditional. It does not depend on any uncertain or contingent event, but the direction is absolute that on the expiry of the leases the whole proceeds of stock, crop, and others are to be divided 'equally among my sons and daughters.'

"The postponement of the division till the expiry of the tacks is a mere postponement in point of time, and not in any view a postponement depending upon contingency. The tacks are certain to expire at fixed and known dates, and the direction must be read just as if the testator had fixed these dates as the dates of division. Dies cedit sed non venit.

"It is to be noticed also that the postponement of division was merely for the necessary purpose of administration and realisation. The farms were to be carried on till the expiry of the leases; and it was only then that the crops, stocking, &c., could be realised and divided. It was the mere accident of the condition or investment of the testator's means which caused the postponement, and not anything connected with the position of the beneficiaries. It is as if the estate had been locked up in bonds, payable at a distant date. They could not be divided until the day of payment arrived. A postponement like this never suspends the vesting, any more than a direction, for the sake of convenience, to pay six months or twelve months after a testator's death.

"Still farther, if the period of vesting is to be postponed till the period of division, it would lead to the awkward and anomalous result that there would be four separate periods of vesting. It is only the 'whole stock, crop, and

No. 127.

June 21, 1873.

Elliot v. Bowhill, &c.

d vest at his death. This was evidenced by his direction that the should be managed by his trustees until the expiration of the re-

' on the farms that are to be realised and divided at the expiry of the . Now, although a large portion of the testator's means were invested on rms, there was considerable separate estate,—inter alia, a policy of ine and considerable debts. The provision about realising and dividing the nd stocking would not affect the general estate, which would be held to morte testatoris. Then the crop and stocking on Lamberton and Lam-Shiells would be divisible in 1876, that on Bastleridge in 1873, and that lgleish—which is a joint tenancy, not specially mentioned in the deed—be divisible in 1867. It is thought that the idea of these separate periods ting as to different portions of the estate—which, however, are all dealt s a general residue,—is quite inadmissible.

or is there any real difficulty occasioned by the provision that the issue of easing children shall succeed to their parent's share. The Lord Ordinary the word 'predeceasing,' both in the third purpose and in the second, as ng predeceasing the testator. There is no ulterior destination,—no desti-over to survivors, and no reference to the children of the testator surviving h of the leases or the final periods of division.

n the whole, the Lord Ordinary has not much difficulty in fixing on the of the testator as the period of vesting of the whole residue of his estate.

It is thought that no distinction can be taken, as to the period of vestetween the residue or shares of residue of the testator's estate and the inter-te annual proceeds which are to be paid to the children until the final s of division arrive. The Lord Ordinary thinks that both provisions vested tly a morte testatoris. As the testator was survived by all his seven childach child instantly took, as a vested right and interest, not only a seventh of the capital which might be ultimately divided, but also a seventh share proceeds which might accrue and become divisible between the date of stator's death and the date of the ultimate destination.

is true the children might have been made conjunct liferenters, so to
, so that the annual proceeds would divide among the surviving children, exclusion of the representatives of deceasers, and this although the ultihares of residue had vested in and were transmitted by the children de-

But no such conjunct liferent or conjunct annuity-right has been ally constituted in the present case. Each child seems to be entitled to or himself and his representatives not only one-seventh of the residue, but venth of the interim proceeds.

There is, however, a difference between the accruing proceeds which are paid annually and the share of residue ultimately divisible. The first—
, the annual payments of accruing profits—are declared to be 'strictly ali-ry, not assignable,' nor liable to be attached by creditors in any way, or by sbands of daughters. No such condition or provision is attached to the te share of the residue.

otwithstanding the ingenious argument urged by the assignees and credi-gainst the validity of the clause declaring the proceeds alimentary, and iting assignation or diligence, the Lord Ordinary is of opinion that the is a legal and competent one, and must receive effect. It is, no doubt, hat such clauses are sometimes ineffectual, however strongly expressed,— example, when the beneficiary has a right to demand instant payment of ital sum, a provision that the interest shall be alimentary will go for
g. In the present case, however, while there is no doubt as to the mean-d intention of the testator, there is really no difficulty in carrying out ntention. The whole estate is vested in trustees, and not in the benes themselves. The trustees are under an imperative direction during the cy of the lease to divide yearly only the profits arising therefrom; and seems nothing incompetent, nothing even unreasonable, in the provision uring the limited period prescribed by the deed the shares of the annual shall be strictly alimentary for the children; and though the children

No. 127.

June 21, 1873. Elliot v. Bowhill, &c.

spective leases, and that these trustees should annually pay to the beneficiaries the accruing profits, with the further declaration that the sums so payable should be strictly alimentary, and should not be assignable nor liable to be attached by creditors. There was also a clause of survivorship and a destination over, as the word "predeceasing" in the second and third provisions of the deed did not mean "predeceasing the truster," but "predeceasing the period of division and of vesting." (2) If the vesting was held to be a morte testatoris this anomaly would be created, viz. that may alienate or assign their shares of the capital, yet, while the leases subsist, they are secured in a yearly alimentary provision, which cannot be defeated.

---

"It was not disputed that the testator might have given an alimentary liferent to one or more of his children, which would not be arrestable or assignable; and if so, it is difficult to see why such a provision may not be made terminable at the end of a fixed number of years.

"Of course, the only effect of the provision is that the yearly payments while the tacks last will be made to the children themselves, or on their own receipts. There is nothing to prevent each child, on getting payment, handing over the money to his or her assignee, or otherwise disposing of it at pleasure. Farther, as the declaration is limited to the children themselves, the executors or successors of deceased children are no way affected thereby.

"IV. The only other question which it is necessary to decide at present is the effect of the provision made or obligation undertaken by the testator in Mrs Turnbull's antenuptial contract of marriage. Is that provision to be imputed as part of, or to be deducted from, the equal seventh share which Mrs Turnbull takes under her father's settlement, or are the two provisions to be held concurrent and cumulative?

"The Lord Ordinary, though not without some hesitation, is of opinion that Mrs Turnbull's marriage-contract trustees are entitled as creditors to demand payment of the £1000, in terms of the antenuptial contract of marriage, and that the sum does not fall to be deducted from the equal seventh share to which Mrs Turnbull is entitled under her father's trust-deed. All such questions are ultimately quæstiones voluntatis, but the presumption is in dubio that the provisions are cumulative.

"In the present case the presumption that the antenuptial provision was a præcipuum arises very strongly. The antenuptial contract is an onerous deed, and is the first in date. Mr Elliot became by that deed absolute debtor to his daughter's trustees in £1000. He could not revoke or alter the obligation, and although he might satisfy it with a legacy, it must be shewn that the legacy was intended to be and actually was in satisfaction of the debt. The testator, when he made his trust-deed, must be held to have had his obligations fully in view, and in particular the obligation to his daughter's trustees, which he had come under less than four years previously. The first purpose of the trust is to pay his debts, and this £1000 is really one of these debts. It is only after this first purpose is fulfilled and all debts are paid that the residue falls to be managed and distributed under the second and third purposes of the trust.

"Then, there is no identity, nor even much similarity, between the two provisions. The £1000 is a direct debt due to the marriage-contract trustees, bearing interest from a fixed date. The other is a share of residue, uncertain in amount, and payable not to the trustees but to Mrs Turnbull herself or her assignees. It is a mere accident that the trustees happen to be her assignees. The ultimate application of the £1000 and interest thereon, and of the testamentary provision and interest, are also different, and the interim alimentary liferent which the trust-deed creates in favour of Mrs Turnbull individually and untransferably can hardly be compensated by a debt payable to her marriage-contract trustees. In short, as the testator has not himself chosen in his trust-deed to make any allowance for or reference to the £1000 the Court cannot make a will for him, even though it were much more clearly shewn than it is that he had overlooked or forgotten his daughter's marriage-contract."

No. 127.
June 21, 1873
Elliot v. Bowhill, &c.

while the fund could be assigned or alienated the income which resulted from it was unassignable and inalienable. (3) This was not a case of liferent and fee, and consequently the cases quoted on the other side did not apply. (4) Generally, from a sound construction of the deed, the vesting was postponed, in the case of the annual accruing profits, till the annual period of payment, and in the case of the stock and crop until the expiration of each lease.[1]

The assignees of the beneficiaries argued;—That on a sound construction of the deed all the provisions vested a morte testatoris. The authorities quoted conclusively settled that where there was no contingency nor clause of survivance or destination over, but merely a postponement of payment of provisions, then the vesting must be held to take place a morte testatoris. There was no contingency here, nor clause of survivance, nor destination over, inasmuch as the word "predecease" in the second and third purposes of the deed meant "predecease the testator." The opposite argument led to the anomaly of four different periods of vesting under the same deed, which could never be assumed to have been the intention of the truster.[2]

The assignees of the beneficiaries farther argued, with reference to the sum of £1000 paid by the trustees to Mrs Turnbull under her antenuptial contract of marriage;—That this sum must be deducted from her seventh share under her father's deed. The principle which ruled the question was, that where the first payment is voluntarily undertaken there is no presumption that the second provision is not cumulative or duplicative, but where the first payment is made under an obligative deed, then the presumption "debitor non præsumitur donare" applies, and the second provision will be presumed in satisfaction of and not in addition to the first.[3]

Answered for Mrs Turnbull;—It was the plain intention of the truster that his children should share his estate equally after payment of his debts. This sum of £1000 was a debt due by the deceased, and he never intended that it should be deducted in computing Mrs Turnbull's share.[4]

At advising,—

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—(After stating the facts)—The first question which we have to decide, arising on the construction of this settlement, is at what period the interests created by the second and third purposes of this trust vested in the persons designated as entitled to take under them, and that again was presented in the argument in a double light,—(1) As regarded the annual profits of the farms in question, and (2) As regarded the ultimate division of the value of the stock and crop on these farms at the termination of the respective leases.

It has been contended, on the one hand, that the interests under both purposes vested a morte testatoris, while, on the other hand, the defenders have maintained that the intermediate profits of the farms only vested at each annual period of division, and that the price or value of the stock and crop only vested at the expiration of each of the leases.

In the view which I take of this case it is not necessary to enter in any detail

---

[1] Provan v. Provan, Jan. 14, 1840, 2 D. 298; Johnstone v. Johnstone, June 1840, 2 D. 1038; Laing v. Barclay, July 20, 1865, ante, vol. iii. 1143.

[2] Forbes v. Luckie, Jan. 26, 1838, 16 S. 374; Matthew v. Scott, Feb. 21, 1844, 6 D. 718; Pretty v. Newbigging, March 2, 1854, 16 D. 667; Hunter's Trustees v. Carlton, Feb. 11, 1855, ante, vol. iii. 514; ante, vol. v. (H. L.) 151; Hendry's Trustees v. Hendry, Jan. 31, 1872, ante, vol. x. 432; Allan's Trustees v. Allan, Dec. 12, 1872, ante, 216.

[3] Kippen's Trustees v. Kippen, July 3, 1856, 18 D. 1137, and 3 M'Queen, 303, and Lord Chelmsford's Opinion, p. 232.

[4] Chichester v. Coventry, L. R. English and Irish Appeals, vol. ii. 71.

No. 127.

une 21, 1873. Elliot v. Bowhill, &c.

into the authorities which were quoted to us on each side in regard to the principles of construction applicable to the vesting of interests, the payment or enjoyment of which are postponed beyond the period of the testator's death. Some general rules, indeed, so far as such can be applicable to that which is necessarily in each case a question of intention, are pretty firmly fixed. In the first place, the general presumption is that testamentary bequests vest a morte testatoris. In the second place, this result is not necessarily excluded because payment or enjoyment of the bequest is postponed until the termination of some interposed temporary interest, such as a liferent. And thirdly, if there be ulterior resulting interests created, failing the donee first designated, it will be more easy to presume that the testator intended that vesting should be suspended until the postponed term arrived.

In regard to the last of these rules, it can have no application to the present case, seeing that there are no ulterior or resulting interests created by the settlement, unless indeed the institution of children in place of their deceasing parents could be held to bear that character. But I am very clear, and as far as I know it has been uniformly held, that the expression of the condition si sine liberis cannot be regarded in that light. The subject was fully treated of by Lord Moncreiff in the case of Provan, and although his judgment in that case was altered by the Court on a general view of the testator's intention in the particular deed I know of no authority adverse to the general views which he expressed on this subject.

In regard to the second of those rules, viz., the effect of the interposition of a liferent right between the legatee and the death of the testator, so as to postpone the period of payment, I cannot state the law better than in the words of Lord Corehouse in the case of Forbes v. Luckie, 16 Shaw, 374, which I do with the more confidence that it was referred to as being still acknowledged law in the opinion of Lord Colonsay, in the House of Lords, in the case of Carlton in 1867 (ante, vol. v. H. L. 151). He says,—"I do not think that the fee of the residue was prevented from vesting in these children, either by the circumstance that the term of paying to each child its respective share was postponed until after the death of the liferentrix who survived the testator, or by the circumstance that a trust by executors was interposed for carrying into effect the intentions of the testator, or finally, by the circumstance that the bequest of the residue was conceived in favour of a class of persons and not in favour of certain individuals nominatim." These rules, of course, are subject to be controlled in each individual case by the general complexion of the settlement and the intention to be gathered from its provisions, and especially by the reason or object which it may appear that the testator had in view in postponing the payment of the interests conveyed by him.

The present case, however, appears to me to stand entirely clear of that category of the law, and a just apprehension of its real nature and import removes all difficulty in regard to its construction. In the first place, there is properly here no interposed interest at all. There is no interjected second party to take prior to the division of residue. That is not in any degree the nature of those provisions. The second purpose of the trust relates to the mode in which the annual profits of certain farms belonging to the testator are to be divided. The third purpose relates to the mode in which the value of the stock and crop on each of these farms, at the expiration of the respective leases, is to be divided. The subjects of the two purposes are entirely different, although arising out of the same occupation or speculation, viz., the leases of the farms. Farther, the persons who were favoured in each purpose are not different but the same, at least as far as the descriptive words are concerned. They are in both instances the truster's family, that is, his children, and the children of those who predecease. And, lastly, the postponement of the several periods of division in regard to the profits under the second purpose, and of the realised value of the crop and stocking under the third, arises not in respect of any interposed interest in favour of another, but solely and entirely from the nature of the particular property to which the interest bequeathed attaches, and which is the subject of it. Of course the profits of the farm could only be divided as they were realised year nd in that respect the testator only gave, under the same conditions, imself had. In like manner the testator could only have realised his crop at the termination of the lease, as he was not entitled to dis- s farm during its currency. In both instances the subject conveyed by nent was a deferred interest, but one which was deferred in the person tator, and which he conveyed precisely as he held it himself. In such ppears to me entirely vain to contend that where the condition in point not attached to the interest of the beneficiary, but is an interest and of the thing which is bequeathed, it can possibly be held to qualify or ing a morte testatoris.

view, the words in regard to predecease present no difficulty at all. ostponed period does not depend on the life or death of any one it altogether a forced construction to refer the word "predecease" to it, natural and satisfactory relative is found in the death of the testator The term is precisely the same under both purposes, and in both has to the death of the testator. Indeed I do not see, especially under the rpose, how the construction of the defenders could be practically applied, n is fixed for the payment of the annual profits, which is left entirely cretion of the trustees.

sight some difficulty is created by the peculiar terms of the qualifica- hed to the bequest under the second purpose, but I have come to concur w which the Lord Ordinary takes of that matter. I think that the n that these yearly profits shall be alimentary and not assignable or limits the right of the beneficiary during his life, and is effectual to no farther. Whether it would attach also to his children is open to but I am satisfied that it does not interfere with the power of mortis osition, and therefore, on the whole matter, I am of opinion, on this the case, that these provisions vested a morte testatoris, and that the f the Lord Ordinary are sound.

ond question which was argued to us is also one of considerable inte- seems that the late Mr Elliot, in the marriage-contract of his daughter . 1861, undertook to pay to her marriage trustees the sum of £1000, ontended on the part of the trustees that that amount, which has been aid, must be imputed pro tanto to her share of the succession, on the of debitor non præsumitur donare.

se of Kippen, where this question was very fully discussed, truly the authorities, and I think it unnecessary to go over them. It really is matter to a question of intention. The maxim debitor non præsumitur such a case is easily overcome by an opposite presumption, and covers ground in a mortis causa settlement. Provisions to children in such in their own nature donations, and in regard to them the presumption granter intended them as a gift. In the case of Elliot, 1 Shaw, p. 218, ident Hope laid down the principle that double legacies were presumed ulative. In the cases which were quoted to us of Grant v. Anderson , and of Nimmo (3 D. 1109), the question arose, in the first place, not to residue, but in regard to specific legacies, and secondly, where there onable coincidence in amount between the obligation and the provision. se of Grant the obligatory writing was posterior to the gift. In the se it would be hard to hold that an uncertain share of residue was in- satisfaction of a specific debt. The trustees under the settlement were o pay the debt in the first instance, and then, at a postponed term, to residue which remained. They have paid the debt, and they are now carry out the second and third purposes of the trust according to the which their instructions are expressed. Although debitor non præsumitur et if the words of the gift be clear, as they seem to be in this deed, the ion must yield to the fact.

OWAN and LORD BENHOLME concurred.

EATES.—I concur in the opinion which has been expressed by your

No. 127. June 21, 1873. Elliot v. Bowhill, &c.

Lordship, and I have little to add. I confess that at one time I entertained considerable doubts as to the period of vesting of the intermediate profits. But I have got over any difficulty that I had, and I have been chiefly moved by this consideration, viz., that when once it has been fixed that the corpus or universitas of a succession has vested a morte testatoris it is very difficult to imagine that the fruits of that corpus or universitas should vest at a different period of time. I have only to say further that I conceive the Lord Ordinary's meaning upon the question of the assignability of the children's shares of the annual profits to be this, that while the children are barred from assigning their shares by deeds inter vivos, they are not barred from making settlements mortis causa, or from leaving their shares to executors. The intention of the truster was that none of his children should remain unprovided for during the currency of the leases by any act of their own in assigning their property to creditors, but he did not desire to limit their power of disposing of it at their respective deaths.

THE COURT adhered to the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor.

DALMAHOY & COWAN, W.S.—ADAM & SANG, W.S.—H. & H. TOD, W.S.—JARDINE, STODART, & FRASERS, W.S.—Agents.

No. 128. June 21, 1873. Low's Executors and Others.

JOHN GRANT AND OTHERS (Low's Executors), First Parties.—Sol.-Gen. Clark—Jameson.

JOHN MACDONALD AND OTHERS, Second Parties.—Cleghorn—Innes.

Succession—Testament—Revocation.—A testator left a holograph testament containing a nomination of executors and a disposal of his whole means among certain legatees, along with another signed holograph writing of subsequent date, commencing "I desire to bequeath as follows," and containing bequests and annuities to nearly the same parties as were mentioned in the first writing. It concluded, "balance left for further disposal;" but no other deed was discovered. Both writings were found in the testator's travelling bag. Held (1) that the second writing was a testamentary writing; and (2) that it did not revoke the first writing, but that both must be read as one writing.

Succession—Legacy—Uncertainty.—Bequests to "charities in Glasgow, £1000. Do. Abdn., £1000"—held void from uncertainty.

2D DIVISION. R.

MR JOHN LOW, for some time secretary of the City of Glasgow Bank, Glasgow, died on 26th July 1872, while on a visit to his sister-in-law in Aberdeen. He left two testamentary writings, both holograph and signed, and dated respectively 22d May 1869 and 22d April 1872. They were found in his travelling bag after his death. The first in date was found in a leather case in the bag, and the second in a pocket-book in the bag, along with a memorandum regarding the amount of his means and estate.

By the first of these writings Mr Low left his whole property to John Grant and others, as executors for the purpose of carrying out the following directions:—

"First.—As to the disposal of my effects, I desire that all my household furniture, bed and table linen, silver-plate, books, pictures, &c., be sold, and out of which funeral expenses to be paid.

"Second.—All investments to be realised, and the money lent on heritable property or first-class railway debenture bonds.

"I desire the following legacies to be paid free of duty, viz.:—To John Low Brebner one hundred pounds, John Low Pithie one hundred pounds, John Low Dickie one hundred pounds, John Low Clark one hundred pounds, being all my nephews, and to Free St John's Sabbath-schools twenty pounds, Free St John's Bible-women fifty pounds, Free St John's Local Mission thirty pounds, to be distributed in the local district under

No. 128.

June 21, 1873.

Low's Executors and Others.

y charge, and visited by Mr Crombie and others, in annual sums of five unds for six years.

" To each of my executors ten pounds.

" I desire the interest on the residue of my estate to be divided into ree equal parts (after deducting an allowance to the party who may be ppointed as factor for the trust), and given to my two sisters, Margaret wrie and Mary Brebner, and my sister-in-law, Mrs Low, in half-yearly yments.

" The families of the annuitants to get the interest of their mother ntil the death of the last annuitant, when at the ensuing money term he residue of my estate is to be divided into two parts—the one-half for he families of my two sisters (excluding the jus mariti of their husbands), nd the other half to the treasurer of the Free Church for the Sustentation nd College Funds equally. The interest accruing to be applied as a contribution annually from Free St John's Church, Glasgow, for the Sustenation and College, and I desire the portion of interest to this last fund be applied in forming two or more bursaries as the professors may uggest, but their recommendation subject to the approval of Free St ohn's Session, Glasgow.

. . . . . .

" All former wills cancelled.

" Witness my hand this twenty-second day of May 1869.

" JOHN LOW."

The second writing was in these terms :—

" 14 Windsor Terrace, St George's Road,
" Glasgow, 22d April 1872.

" I desire to bequeath as follows :—

" Annuities

my sister Margaret		£200 p. annum
Mary		200 p. annum
Mrs Low		100 p. annum
		£500
	free of legacy duty to my Nieces
ina Lawrie or Brown for family equally			£1000
phia Lawrie or Clark			1000
ary Lawrie or Pithie			2000
a Agnes Low or Dickie			1000
Namesons Brown
Clark	£100 each		500
Pithie,
Dickie
Brebner
harities in Glasgow			1000
Do. Abdn.			1000
			£7500

n second page)

Suppose my estate to realise £20000

take off 7500

£12500

affirmative, 2. Was the writing second in date to be held as and revoking the writing first in date, as regarded the disposal o tor's whole estate in money, investments, &c.? and 3. Was the £11,500 or thereby brought out as residue in the second wr dealt with as residue is directed to be dealt with by the first does it fall to be dealt with as intestate estate subject to th mentioned in the second writing?"

The executors maintained (1) That both writings mentioned l valid and operative testamentary writings. (2) That the writin date superseded the first to the extent of the sum of £20,000 and (3) that the sum of £11,500 was intestate succession ceased, and fell to be paid to the next of kin, subject to the bu annuities.[1]

John Macdonald, general treasurer of the Free Church, maintained (1) That the writing first in date alone was a valid tive testamentary writing, and that the writing second in date a memorandum or jotting, and did not contain the concluded directions of the deceased regarding the disposal of his estate thereof, nor any revocation of the first. (2) That in the event held that both writings were valid, the second in date shou under and along with the first, and should only be held to b quoad the bequests to individuals specified in itself; and (3) T quests to congregational charities in the first writing, and the regarding the disposal of the capital of the residue therein mad given effect to.[2]

At advising,—

Lord Cowan.—The testator left two writings purporting to regu cession, the validity and effect of which form the subject of the que to this special case. These writings are respectively dated 22d M 22d April 1872. Both are holograph and subscribed by the dec first writing in 1869 is in every respect a regular and testamentar taining the appointment of executors, with directions as to the reali means and effects, and disposal of his estate when realised in special residuary bequests; and it contains a declaration "all former will

No. 128.
June 21, 1873.
Low's Executors and Others.

e informal. It states the writer's desire to bequeath the special legacies ı mentioned, but contains no disposal of the residue, and concluding with rds "balance left for further disposal."
testator's death occurred in Aberdeen on 24th July 1872, whither he had m a visit to his sister-in-law, Mrs Low. The writings referred to were in his travelling-bag after his death; the first in date was found in a r case in the said travelling-bag, along with a dedication of himself to God, ıe one second in date was found in a pocket-book in the said travelling-long with a memorandum regarding the amount of his means and estate.
admitted facts shew the care with which the deceased preserved both ents in his personal custody. And it is not immaterial to observe that the memorandum as to his means it appears that his fortune between the of the two writings had very considerably increased.
ı first question for consideration is, whether the imperfect writing second e is to be regarded as a testamentary writing, and entitled to effect as such.
e not unattended with difficulty. The writing no doubt is holograph and l, and is thus probative; but the question still is, what is the character of riting? Is it a will or not? There are expressions in the writing which ise to grave doubts whether it was not written as a mere jotting, to be after-completed and put into the form of a proper deed, either by himself or by ı of business. On the other hand, there are words expressive of testa-ry intention and of direct bequest to individuals named; and the writing is not in the form of instructions to a law-agent with the view of its con-being embodied in a formal deed; nor is there any extrinsic evidence of ing intended to be used for that purpose and no other. That was the arity which led the House of Lords in the leading case of Monro v. Coutts, 7, 1813, 1 Dow, 437, to reverse the judgment of this Court, and to hold a g subscribed by the party, and purporting to be "codicil to my will," not ıentary. And, on the same principle it was that the decision in Lowson rd, March 20, 1866, proceeded, in rejecting three of the four writings in question, and in holding only one of them testamentary. The three re-
. papers were regarded as mere directions to be acted on by the gentlemen ıom they were addressed, making an addition to the previous will, while ırth writing would have suffered the same fate had it not contained a clear ssion of intention—that whether added to the will or not it was to have
. In this case the writing of April 1872 does not partake of that character
. It contains a clear expression of the testator's will as to the matters with ı it deals affecting his succession. Then it is found in the same place of it with the complete writing of the prior date, although not put up with it e same cover—the two writings, however, being carried with him in his lling-bag, evidently not less for safety than to have them under his im-ate control. It would be inconsistent, in my opinion, with the principle hich the Court in such questions has invariably acted to refuse effect to writing as testamentary. I am therefore of opinion that the first question ld be answered in the affirmative.
ıe second inquiry relates to the effect of this second deed upon the first ng, dated in May 1869—whether it excludes and revokes its contents as ds the disposal of the testator's whole estate, or merely alters and modifies its nts, leaving the nomination of executors untouched. It is contended by irst parties that the second deed is a total revocation of the disposal of the tor's means and estate contained in the first deed, at least to the extent of
,000; while the second parties contend that the second deed is effectual ly to alter the first deed in the matter with which it specially deals. Were ormer view to prevail the result must be that the testator's estate, except in r as specially bequeathed by the second deed, must be held intestate sucon. But the contents of the second deed are not, as I think, such as to fy that view of the testator's intention.
y the first dated deed the testator had in due form effectually disposed of whole estate. That deed was found carefully preserved by him in his personal ody at his death. It was found in a perfect state, without mutilation in any respect. Had there been any intention of revoking the deed, or of recalling any of its provisions, there was nothing to have prevented him cancelling or destroying the writing if he was so inclined. No doubt it was open to the testator to have expressly recalled this deed in whole or in part, by a separate writing, but such writing must in express terms recall the previous will, and mere doubtful expressions will not operate that effect. In the present case there are no words of revocation at all. There are certain bequests provided for holding the deed to be testamentary—and the only words alleged by implication to indicate an intention in the testator's mind to change the destination of the residue of his estate are "balance left for further disposal." The previous will had disposed of his whole residue. The words may possibly be viewed as indicating some intention at a future time to consider whether he should adhere to that disposition of it, or to make an alteration on it in whole or in part. They truly indicate no more—if they can be held to be applicable to the whole residue disposed of by his will of May 1869 at all. The view I take of the import of the words is, that he might possibly at some after time make a further disposal by legacies to individuals, or otherwise, similar to what he had done in this very writing; and although such bequests when made would diminish the amount of the estate there is no indication of a desire—far less an intention—to disturb the destination of residue generally contained in his prior testamentary deed. When a testamentary writing is left by a testator unexceptionable in itself, doubtful or equivocal expressions in a subsequent testamentary writing will not infer the revocation of the previous will. The whole of this doctrine underwent consideration in the case of Horsburgh (May 4, 1845, 9 D. 324), and more recently in the case of Stoddart v. Grant (June 1852, 1 Macq. 153), in which case it was held by the House of Lords, reversing the judgment of this Court, to be a fixed principle that the mere fact of making a subsequent will does not work a total revocation of a prior one, unless the latter expressly revokes the former, or the two be incapable of standing together. The rule in such cases was held by the House of Lords to have been well stated in the opinion of Lord Moncreiff, who was in the minority in this Court, that "where a person deceased has left various writings, probative in themselves, for disposing of his or her property, they are to be understood as constituting one testamentary settlement, in so far as they have not been revoked, and are not inconsistent with each other." The same principle is stated even more strongly in the opinion of Lord Fullerton, who also was in the minority. I consider this authority directly applicable to this case. The two writings were found together in the testator's repositories, and were to be held and given effect to as one testament. There is no inconsistency or difficulty in giving to both of them their just effect and meaning as regulating the testator's succession, as will be immediately shewn. And, in my apprehension, to hold the doubtful or equivocal words in the last deed, on which reliance is placed, as amounting to a revocation of the first deed, would be to disregard the established principles to which I have adverted. For these reasons, I am of opinion that the second and third questions must be answered—the second in the negative, and the third in the affirmative as to its first branch and in the negative as to its second branch.

No. 128.

June 21, 1873. Low's Executors and Others.

As regards the effect of the second writing and its several provisions, its true construction, I think, must lead to these results:—

1. That the annuities provided to his two sisters and to Mrs Low supersede the bequest in the first writing to them of the interest on the residue, to be taken in three equal parts in half-yearly payments.

2. That the families of the annuitants take the interest of their mothers until the death of the last annuitant.

3. That the two bequests, to charities in Glasgow and charities in Aberdeen, are void from vagueness and uncertainty.

And 4. That the residue, as appointed by the first deed, will fall on the death of the last annuitant to be divided between the parties, and for the purposes and in the manner prescribed by the testator in that deed.

The other Judges concurred.

No. 128.

June 21, 1873.

Low's Executors and Others.

THIS interlocutor was pronounced :—" The Lords, having heard counsel on the special case, are of opinion, and find, in answer to the first query, that the writing second in date is a valid testamentary writing: In answer to the second query, that the writing second in date does not exclude and revoke the writing first in date as regards the disposal of the testator's whole estate in money, investments, &c.; and in answer to the third query, that the balance of £11,500 or thereby brought out as residue in the second writing is not to be dealt with as intestate estate, but as disposed of by the first writing," &c.

JOHN AULD, W.S.—DALMAHOY & COWAN, W.S.—Agents.

No. 129.

June 24, 1873.

Dobie v. Lauder's Trustees.

JEAN DOBIE, Pursuer.—Pattison.
SCOTT BOWER AND OTHERS (Lauder's Trustees), Defenders.—Campbell Smith—M'Kechnie.

oof—Agreement—Parole Evidence—Competency—Damage—Reparation.— action of damages the pursuer averred that the defenders had arranged to certain children with her, and that as both parties had contemplated that rangement should endure for a term of years she had incurred certain expene which she lost by the guardians suddenly bringing the arrangement to a . Held (1) that parole evidence of such an arrangement was competent,
2) that the pursuer was entitled to be reimbursed for actual loss.
served (per Lord Neaves), that when parties are engaged mutually in prong an object of common interest, and the expenses entailed in furthering bject are thrown on one of the parties, then, when that expenditure fails of ning the end aimed at, the party-disburser must be recompensed, as being isburser for a common object.

2D DIVISION. Lord Shand. I.

IIS action was brought by Miss Jean Dobie, Edinburgh, against the ees of the late James Lauder, Lutton Place, Edinburgh, and the mons concluded for payment—" (First) Of the sum of £45 sterling, the legal interest thereof at the rate of five per centum per annum and since the 25th day of July 1871 and until payment. (Second) he sum of £3, 2s. 11d. sterling, and the legal interest thereof at the rate from and since the said 25th day of July 1871 and until pay-
t. (Third) Of the sum of £100 sterling in name of damages and ium." The pursuer averred that in March 1870 the defenders nged with her that the children of the late James Lauder, some of m were in pupillarity and some in minority, should reside in family the pursuer, and be boarded by her at the rate of £60 per annum ectively, until in the case of sons they should attain twenty-one years ge, and in the case of a daughter, Agnes Lauder, until she should in that age or be married. In reliance on this arrangement, the pur-
, with the knowledge and approval of the defenders, took a lease house in Frederick Street for seven years, and expended consider-sums of money in furnishing and otherwise implementing her part he contract. The defenders paid the stipulated board until October 1, when they intimated to the pursuer that they wished to reduce sum payable for each child from £60 a-year to £45 a-year, and on pursuer refusing to agree to this they removed the children from her ge.
n account of loss and injury sustained in consequence of the defenders refusing to implement their part of the agreement the pursuer ght this action.

No. 129.

June 24, 1873. Dobie v. Lauder's Trustees.

The defenders in answer stated (Ans. 9),—"Explained that Mi minor children were to be boarded with the pursuer at the ra per annum each, payable quarterly in advance, and that she v allowed the use of the furniture in the Lutton Place house children were so boarded with her. The defenders entered int agreement with the pursuer as to the length of time the said were to reside with her as is set forth in the article under answ pursuer was aware of the ages of Mr Lauder's children, and defenders had no power to bind any of them to reside with h William, who is still in pupillarity."

The defenders also admitted that they had taken away the and averred that the reason of the removal was the insufficien board the children received from the pursuer, and her unkind of them.

After the action was brought the pursuer's claim for two £45 and £3, 2s. 11d., first concluded for in the summons, were puted.

The pursuer pleaded;—(2) The defenders having by their ac conduct in relation to the pursuer as above set forth caused injury, and damage, they are liable to her in reparation therefo

The defenders pleaded;—(2) The pursuer's statements are i non-specific, and insufficient to support the conclusion for dama separatim, the defenders having had no power to enter into th averred, the action falls to be dismissed. (3) The action is inc in respect it is directed against the defenders in their individual (4) The pursuer's whole statements and pleas, except as to the board, and the other small accounts due to her, being false i untenable in law, and the damages claimed being in any view o tial and excessive, the defenders are entitled to absolvitor, with (5) The defenders having consigned the sum due to the pu entitled to absolvitor, with expenses.

The Lord Ordinary allowed a proof, the result of which, as w farther facts of the case, are fully set forth in his Lordship's in and subjoined note.

The Lord Ordinary pronounced this interlocutor:—"Finds pursuer's claims of £45 and £3, 2s. 11d. are not disputed, and finds the defenders liable to the pursuer in these sums, and grant to the pursuer to uplift the sum of £48, 2s. 11d., consigne defenders in the City of Glasgow Bank on 23d October 1872 bank interest which has accrued thereon, but finds no farthe due; ordains the said City of Glasgow Bank to make payme pursuer of the said sum and interest; and grants warrant t countant of Court to deliver up the deposit-receipt to the pursue that such payment may be made to her, and decerns: Farther, in or about the month of March 1870 the defenders arranged a with the pursuer that the children of the late James Laude minority or in pupillarity respectively, other than his eldest should, at or before Whitsunday 1870, reside in family with the and be boarded by her at the rate of £60 per annum respectiv in the case of sons, they should attain to twenty-one years of a the case of a daughter, Agnes Lauder, until she should attain t be married; and that to enable the pursuer to receive the childr this arrangement, it was stipulated by the defenders, and agree the pursuer should take a suitable house for their accommodatio was farther agreed that to enable her to furnish the house sh have the use of the late Mr Lauder's furniture, situated in the

No. 129.

June 24, 1873.
Dobie v. Lauder's Trustees.

Place, formerly occupied by him, and after his death by his : Finds that, in reliance on this arrangement, and in order to her to perform her part thereof, the pursuer, with the knowledge proval of the defenders, took a lease, for a period of seven years, of 3 in Frederick Street, having the requisite accommodation, and that niture above mentioned was removed to it about the end of April it which date the children of the late Mr Lauder, under the said ment, went to reside there with the pursuer, and the pursuer d considerable expense in supplying a variety of articles of furni-quired for the said house, beyond the furniture taken from Lutton Finds that the stipulated board of £60 was paid for said children, number, till 25th April 1871, when Alexander Lauder, the eldest th the pursuer's consent, ceased to reside with her, and that the ing three children's board (including the sum of £45, above found is been paid down to 25th October 1871: Finds that the defenders, called on to do so, have declined to pay board for the children ter, or to proceed farther in carrying out or implementing the said ment: Finds that this declinature on their part has been caused, any failure on the pursuer's part to fulfil her part of the said ment, or by any conduct on her part to justify it, but because of usal to continue to board the children on different and more favourrms for the defenders than those agreed to between her and the rs as aforesaid: Finds that, in consequence of the defenders' ture to carry out the said arrangement the pursuer has sustained the extent of £50, in respect of outlays made by her on account of xes, and rates for said house down to April or May 1872, when s relieved of her liability therefor, and on account of furniture pro-y her for said house to enable her to fulfil her part of said arrange-nd which she was obliged to sell at a sacrifice: Finds in law that enders are liable to reimburse the pursuer in said loss so sustained
: Therefore decerns against the defenders for said sum of £50:
he pursuer entitled to expenses, of which allows an account to be n, and remits the same, when lodged, to the Auditor to tax and and decerns." *

OTE.—The present action concludes, (1) For payment of a sum of £45, unt of board of certain of the children of the late James Lauder, and 11d. for outlays made by the pursuer on account of the children; and a sum of £100 in name of damages. From the correspondence which ace between the agents of the parties before the action was raised it that the claim for board was for a time disputed, but in December ie defenders' agent intimated that his clients would pay the sum claimed account, and the small accounts for outlay, if correct; and in the 13th th answers to the condescendence the sums sued for on this account lmitted and consigned. This unfortunate litigation has thus arisen with reference to the pursuer's claim of damages.

at claim is not maintained upon the ordinary footing of damages for of contract, where the pursuer claims not only indemnification against it payment for loss of profit or advantage, caused by the defenders' to implement a contract, or for breach of it. The claim, as insisted in, ed to reimbursement of actual loss alleged to have been sustained by the in consequence of outlays made and responsibility undertaken by her, ie knowledge and approval of the defenders, to enable her to carry out t of an undertaking and agreement entered into with the defenders, but he defenders have failed or refused to carry out on their part, to the loss ursuer.

e arrangement alleged to have been entered into between the pursuer

No. 129.

June 24, 1873. Dobie v. Lauder's Trustees.

The defenders reclaimed.

Argued for them;—(1) This being an action of damages for non-i ment of a contract to extend over a period of years parole evidenc

---

and defenders was somewhat peculiar, but not an unnatural one, in the c stances in which the parties were placed. The pursuer was a cousin of t Mr Lauder, who died in 1866, leaving several children, some of th minority and some in pupillarity. His trust-deed, under which the de act, and by which they are appointed tutors and curators to the childre tains provisions for keeping the family together, and with that view he d the house in Lutton Place, in which he lived, to be kept as a home children, and his household furniture to be preserved for their use un youngest child should attain the age of twenty-one years as regards majority or marriage as regards daughters. In the end of 1869, in conse of the marriage of the eldest daughter, who had previously managed the hold, it became necessary that the trustees should make new arrangeme the maintenance and care of the children, of whom there were four, t other daughter, Agnes, being then about fifteen years old, and having tw brothers and one younger, about eight or nine years old. The pursuer that Mr Bower, one of Mr Lauder's trustees, who seems to have been an i friend of all the parties, and Mr John Lauder, the other trustee, afte negotiation, arranged with her that the house in Lutton Place should b up, and that the children should be placed under her care, in a hous taken by her, on the agreement that a sum of £60 a-year should be paid board of each of them, and that they should remain with her so long should respectively be under the guardianship of the trustees. It is st have been part of this arrangement that the furniture in the Lutton Plac should be given over to the pursuer, who had not then a house of her enable her to furnish the larger and more important rooms of the hous taken by her, and to be kept by her for the use of the children, and t house was to come substantially in place of the Lutton Place house un settlement of the late Mr Lauder. The pursuer, who at the time refe was a boarder with a friend, farther alleges, that on this arrangement made, and in reliance on the defenders' fulfilment of their part of it, sh the knowledge and approval of the defenders, took a house, of a size and ch suitable for carrying it out, for seven years; and it is proved that she into a lease for that period of a house in Frederick Street of ten roo kitchen, at a rent of £68, and that as soon as certain repairs required wer by the landlord, viz., in April 1870, the Lutton Place furniture was mov it, and the children took up their residence there with the pursuer. February 1871, Alexander, the eldest of Mr Lauder's sons, left the hous serious differences had occurred between him and the pursuer. In Aug lowing the other children went to Dunfermline to spend some holida never returned, but were sent by the defenders to board in another h Edinburgh. The sum of £45, sued for on account of board, is for the current when the children left, viz., from 25th July to 25th October 18 the defenders dispute their liability for any farther payment. The hou left on the pursuer's hands, and, from October onwards, it appears th defenders demanded delivery of the Lutton Place furniture, in order to sold. The pursuer succeeded in getting the lease taken over by another shortly before Whitsunday 1872, and the furniture belonging to the de was then given up to them, but in the meantime the pursuer alleges sh sustained actual loss to the amount sued for, (1) in having to pay the re rates, and taxes, on the house from October 1871 to April 1872, the new having taken upon him the rent thereafter; and (2) in having been obli sell furniture at a sacrifice, part of which she had owned previously, a bought to enable her to complete the furnishing of the house.

"At the proof which took place before the Lord Ordinary the p admitted that there was no written agreement between the parties, and th

No. 129.

June 24, 1873.

Dobie v. Lauder's Trustees.

not admissible in proof of the agreement.[1] (2) The defenders could not bind those children who were in minority to any such agreement as that was unable to prove the agreement by writing, and it was thereupon maintained for the defenders that parole evidence on the subject was incompetent. The Lord Ordinary repelled this objection, and admitted the parole evidence tendered. Had the case been one of implement, or an ordinary claim of damages for non-implement or breach of contract, such evidence in proof of an agreement, to extend over a period of years, would have been inadmissible; but the Lord Ordinary was and is of opinion that the case falls within the rule to which effect was given in Bell v. Bell, 9th July 1841, 3 D. 1201, and in the previous case in regard to the Melville Monument there referred to, viz., that parole evidence of the arrangement and actings of parties is competent when the claim made is for relief or indemnity from actual loss sustained by a party acting in reliance on the fulfilment by another who has refused to carry out his part of an arrangement which had been entered into but which could only be made legally binding so as to be capable of enforcement on being committed to writing. The indemnification from loss which in such a case is claimed has been directly caused by the representations and conduct of a party who refuses to fulfil his undertaking. The claim for relief is supported by obvious considerations of equity, and it is only reasonable that the representations and conduct of the parties which give rise to it should be capable of proof in the ordinary way in which representations, actings, and conduct are generally proved, viz., by parole evidence.

"Into the details of the case or the proof the Lord Ordinary deems it unnecessary to enter very fully. He is of opinion that an arrangement of the general nature above mentioned was entered into between the parties. The parole evidence of the pursuer, Mr Ross, and Mr Bower, seems to lead to this inference. The provisions of Mr Lauder's deed make such an arrangement reasonable and probable, and the facts—(1) of the pursuer herself undertaking the responsibility of such a lease as she entered into, and (2) of the furniture supplied by the defenders having been really necessary for the continued occupation of the house, are matters of real evidence which strongly support the pursuer's case.

"The evidence, farther, in the opinion of the Lord Ordinary, shews that the pursuer undertook the responsibility of the house, and supplied a considerable amount of furniture of her own, suitable for its occupation, with the knowledge of the defenders, and in reliance on their representations and actings and on their fulfilment of the arrangement entered into.

"It remains only for consideration whether the defenders unwarrantably caused to go on with the arrangement, and in consequence the pursuer sustained loss, in the sense already explained, and the Lord Ordinary is of opinion that both of these questions must be answered in the affirmative. It cannot, perhaps, be said that if the children, from causes over which the defenders had no control, had themselves refused to continue to reside with the pursuer, and actually left her against the defenders' remonstrances and efforts, that the defenders would have been liable to such a claim as the present, for the agreement which was entered into, without its terms being very clearly defined, taken reasonably, would probably not admit of being carried the length of an absolute undertaking on the defenders that, in any circumstances, the children should reside for the full term with the pursuer, but amounted to this only, that the defenders, who had the control of the trust-funds, would use all means in their power for this purpose. But it is unnecessary to consider this view, for it is clear to the Lord Ordinary that three of the children would have been quite ready to remain with the pursuer had the defenders desired it, and that the true cause of their being

[1] Walker v. Flint, Feb. 20, 1863, ante, vol. i., 417; Fowlie v. M'Lean, Jan. 31, 1868, ante, vol. vi., 254; Stewart v. Clark, March 4, 1871, ante, vol. ix., 636; Edmonston v. Bruce or Edmonston, June 7, 1861, 23 D. 995.

No. 129.

June 24, 1873.
Dobie v. Lauder's Trustees.

averred by the pursuer. (3) An agreement in the terms stated pursuer was not proved, and even if there had been such an ag the pursuer's treatment of the children justified the defenders' therefrom.

Argued for the pursuer;—The action is not for damages for b contract, nor for non-implement of contract, but for indemnific money expended on the faith of the trustees' promises. To en pursuer to recover it is not necessary to go the length of a co contract.[1]

At advising,—

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—The view which the Lord Ordinary has take case assumes, and I think justly assumes, that the claim which he has is neither for implement of the contract alleged, nor for loss of expect tage from it. I am inclined to go further. I think the claim can onl ported on the footing that there was no concluded or binding con therefore could be no breach of it. Had it been necessary for the p prove a contract for a term of years of the nature alleged there would h in my opinion, great difficulty—I go no further—in the mode of pr such is the nature of the claim, at least to the extent to which I am d sustain it. The footing on which the parties acted was not and could been that of a binding contract. It was a family arrangement, the su which was that the children should live with the pursuer, and beyon was contemplated that this arrangement should be of some endurance. the essence of any mutual understanding between the parties; all the mere incidents. The house they were to occupy, the board they we were merely the details under which the undertaking was to receive a is plain that under such an arrangement neither party was or could be continue to observe it; and ceasing to observe it was no breach of But it does not follow that if the arrangement be terminated by the a party the other has not a claim to be kept free of loss; and that is footing on which the pursuer's claim can rest.

The first question is, whether parole proof of the footing on which t

---

taken away, or rather of their not having returned as they intended t their holidays, was the pursuer's refusal to reduce the agreed-on rat from £60 to £45. The defenders founded on the pursuer's letter of 2 1871, as shewing that she was quite willing that the whole family sh her, but the explanation of that letter is evidently the same as tha similar expressions used by the pursuer, and spoken to by some of the viz., temporary annoyance and impatience at the conduct of one or m members of the family. The alleged excess in expenditure, taking and outlays together, of the children's income, is not very clearly pr even if it were so, would not justify the defenders in withdrawing th as they did, without indemnifying the pursuer. The defenders had power to restrict the outlays beyond the board to such sum as they de

"The Lord Ordinary is of opinion that the loss proved may fairly at £50. The rent of the house, with rates and taxes, is stated at £ pursuer had about six months' rent and charges, or £44, to pay, w return, but she and Mrs Stevenson had the use of the house for them the loss on this head ought not to be estimated beyond £25 or £30. in furniture is not very clearly proved, but the Lord Ordinary is satisf must have been from £20 to £25, and on the whole, therefore, he has total loss at £50, for which decree has been given.

"It does not appear that the defenders required the pursuer to ab claim of damages as a condition of paying the other sums for which been given, and the Lord Ordinary has therefore allowed bank intere the sums consigned."

[1] Walker v. Milne and Others, June 10, 1825, 2 S. 379.

No. 129

June 24, 1873.

Dobie v. Lauder's Trustees.

acted is competent. I have no doubt about that; indeed the statements on record are almost of themselves sufficient to establish the ground of action. But I have no doubt it was competent to prove the res gestæ by parole. It was a terminable arrangement, which might be ended at pleasure, and the lease of the house was no more of the essence of the bargain than if the pursuer had engaged a governess, or a tutor, or a carriage and horses, with the knowledge and approval of the trustees. To apply the restriction of proof to writ or oath to this case would be extravagant. The proof has been taken, and leaves no doubt at all on the fact of the arrangement having been made, and the house having been taken and furnished with the knowledge and approval of the trustees.

This being so, is there a claim for indemnity? I entertain no doubt, both on principle and on authority, that there is—that the arrangement necessarily included the condition that if the arrangement was terminated it should not be to the loss of one party. I agree with the Lord Ordinary as to the amount. This was an arrangement which, before it could be acted on in any way, implied considerable outlay on the part of Miss Dobie. She took a large house, and purchased furniture in order to carry out the arrangement to which she had agreed, and with the knowledge and approbation of the trustees. She lost by the abrupt termination of it, and I think is entitled to what the Lord Ordinary has awarded.

LORD COWAN and LORD BENHOLME concurred.

LORD NEAVES.—I concur with your Lordship, and would only remark on two points. First, I do not think that the summons can be said to be well laid, though it does in a way cover the claim now insisted in. Second, I think that the legal principle applicable to the case is this: that when parties are engaged mutually in promoting an object of common interest, and the expenses entailed in furthering that object are thrown on one of the parties, then when that expenditure fails of obtaining the end aimed at the party-disburser must be recompensed, as being the disburser for a common object. This is not the case of a contract of which specific implement can be enforced, but the circumstances are such as to bring it fully within the rule I have stated.

THE COURT adhered.

R. P. STEVENSON, S.S.C.—THOMAS M'LAREN, S.S.C.—Agents.

No. 130.

June 24, 1873.

Bruce v. Bruce and Another.

JOHN BRUCE AND OTHERS, First Parties.—Moncreiff.
ROBERT BRUCE AND THE EARL OF ZETLAND, Second Parties.—Adam.

Church—Assessment—Statutes 17 and 18 Vict. c. 91 (Valuation of Lands, Scotland) Act, 1854), sec. 33, and 31 and 32 Vict. c. 96 (Ecclesiastical Buildings Scotland) Act, 1868), sec. 23—Real and Valued Rent—Merksland.—Held (dub. Lord Justice-Clerk) that in a landward parish, in Shetland, the assessment for alterations and repairs on a manse fell to be assessed upon the heritors liable, according to the number of merksland held by them respectively, that having been the rule of assessment from time immemorial, and there being no special circumstances in the case to render that rule inequitable.

2D DIVISION. I.

THE parties to this special case were John Bruce of Sumburgh and another, trustees under the marriage-contract of Robert Bell, Esquire, advocate, Sheriff-substitute at Falkirk, and the now deceased Mrs Robina Hunter or Bell of Lunna, his spouse, and as such proprietors of the estate of Lunna, in Shetland, and Major Thomas Cameron Mouat, of Annsbrae and Garth, heritors of the united parishes of Nesting, Lunnasting, Whalsay, and Skerries, of the first part; and Robert Bruce, of Symbister, in Shetland, and the Right Honourable Thomas Earl of Zetland, also heritors of the said united parishes, of the second part. The following were the facts set forth in the special case:—

No. 130.

June 24, 1873. Bruce v. Bruce and Another.

"The manse of the said united parishes is situated at Nesting. I built in 1778, and the expense of building it was assessed and im by the presbytery of Lerwick upon the heritors according to their nu of merksland.

"From time immemorial the expense of necessary repairs upon th manse has been assessed upon the heritors according to the numl merksland.

"In the beginning of the year 1870 the heritors of the said united pa were required by the presbytery of Olnafirth, in terms of a remit the Court of Session, to execute certain additions, repairs, and alter on the said manse, and proceeded to do so.

"A statement was laid before a meeting of the heritors by their shewing that the sum required for executing the said additions, re and alterations on the manse was estimated to amount to £1007, 9s The meeting unanimously agreed to impose an assessment for this am but the heritors present at the meeting being divided in opinion o question whether the assessment should be levied according to th rent of the respective heritors, or per merkland, according to pre practice, the meeting resolved to present a special case for the opini the Court.

"As appearing from the valuation-roll for 1871-1872 the total am of assessable rental in the united parishes is £2267, 7s. 2d.

"The following is a note of the valuation of each heritor in the u parishes, and of the proportion of the said sum of £1007, 9s. 9½d. pay by him if the assessment be imposed according to the real rent:—

"Mr Bruce, . .	£1327 0 2	£589 13 0
"The Lunna Trustees, .	919 4 6	408 9 1
"Earl of Zetland, . .	17 10 0	7 15 6
"Major Cameron Mouat, .	3 5 0	1 8 10
"Robert Gaudie, . .	0 7 6	0 3 4
	£2267 7 2	£1007 9 9

"The following is a note of the number of merksland possessed by of the heritors, and the proportion of the said sum of £1007, 9s. 9 payable by him if the assessment be imposed according to the numb merks:—

"Mr Bruce, . . .	565	£683 15 4
"The Lunna Trustees, . .	253⅜	306 15 9
"Earl of Zetland, . .	11⅛	13 18 4
"Major Cameron Mouat, . .	2	2 8 4
"Robert Gaudie, . .	⅜	0 12 0
Total, . .	832⅜	£1007 9 9

"Robert Gaudie is a pauper lunatic.

"The parties hereto are agreed that the said united parishes are enti landward.*

* By the 33d section of the Valuation of Lands (Scotland) Act, 185 and 18 Victoria, cap. 91, it is, inter alia, provided,—"Where in any cou burgh, or town, any county, municipal, parochial or other public assessm or any assessment, rate, or tax under any Act of Parliament, is authorised t imposed or made upon or according to the real rent of lands and herit the yearly rent or value of such lands or heritages, as appearing from valuation-roll in force for the time under this Act, in such county, bu or town, shall, from and after the establishment of such valuation the be always deemed and taken to be the just amount of real rent for the purp of such county, municipal, parochial or other assessment, rate, or tax, and the s

No. 130.

June 24, 1873.
Bruce v. Bruce and Another.

ce 1855 a valuation-roll has, in terms of the Valuation Act, 1854, ade up annually in Shetland, in which the yearly rent or value of ls and heritages belonging to the heritors in the said united parishes n regularly entered." *

following questions of law were submitted for the opinion and nt of the Court:—"Whether the assessment for the additions to and and alterations on the manse of Nesting falls to be imposed upon itors liable therefor according to the number of merksland held by spectively? Or, whether the said assessment falls to be imposed ng to the real rent of the lands and heritages, belonging to the ritors as appearing from the valuation-roll in force for the time, he Valuation of Lands (Scotland) Act, 1854?"

ed for the first parties;—In a purely landward parish the valued always taken, unless there is something to take the parish out of eral rule, such as a village possessed by feuars, a railway company there is no such disturbing element here. Then the assessment parish has always been according to the valued rent, and to change l assess according to real rent would be very hard upon some of itors. The Ecclesiastical Buildings and Valuation Acts do not ny alteration in regard to assessments of this nature, and do not assessment by real rent where it was not so before.[1]

ed for the third and fourth parties;—The assessment should be ccording to real rent because (1) if taken according to merksland lts are unjust to the heritors, for Mr Bruce would have to pay of his rent, whereas the Lunna trustees would only have to pay d; and (2) the nature of the assessment is an assessment on real d the only reason why it was ever put on the valued rent was assessed and levied according to such yearly rent or value accordingly, or usage to the contrary notwithstanding, provided always, that when of any parish church heretofore erected has been allocated among the according to their respective valued rents, as appearing upon the present -roll, all assessments for the repair thereof shall be imposed according to ued rents."

---

ection 23 of the Ecclesiastical Buildings (Scotland) Act, 1868, 31 and ria, cap. 96, it is enacted,—"All assessments for the purpose of defraying connected with the building, rebuilding, or repairing of churches or or the designing or excambing of sites therefor, or the designing or ex- of glebes, or additions to glebes, or the designing or excambing of sites ions to churchyards, and the suitable maintenance thereof (including ing, rebuilding or repairing of churchyard walls) in any parish, shall be in manner after mentioned, upon all lands and heritages within such cording to the yearly value thereof, as the same shall appear in the -roll or rolls in force in such parish at the time when such assessments , or according to the valued rent of such lands and heritages as the be; and such assessment shall be imposed and recovered according to nt law and practice, provided always that when the area of any parish eretofore erected has been allocated among the heritors, according to ective valued rents, all assessments for the repair thereof shall be im- such heritors according to such valued rent."

ors of Campbelton v. Rowat, 1775, M. 7921; Feuars of Crieff v. 1781, M. 7924; Ure and Carnegy (Forfar case), 1793, M. 7929; nd Others v. Heritors of Peterhead, 4 Paton's App. 356; Boswell v. (Mauchline case), June 15, 1837, 15 S. 1148; Marwell v. Endon, 1816, App. 279; Bell v. Earl of Wemyss, 1805, M. App. voce Kirk, No. 3; lis Parishioners, 1712, M. 5131; M'Farlane v. Monkland's Railway Co. 864, ante, vol. ii. 519; Highland Railway Co. v. Heritors of Kinne 15, 1870, ante, vol. viii. 858.

No. 130.

June 24, 1873.
Bruce v.
Bruce and Another.

because at the time when that was done the valued rent was the re rent.

At advising,—

LORD COWAN.—The established rule is that the valued rent must be taken the basis of assessment in landward parishes, except where special circumstan can be stated which would render that rule altogether inequitable. If assessm according to the valued rent would leave a considerable part of the property of parish unaffected by the assessment, then the real rent must be taken. This is rule which has hitherto been acted on, and the cases referred to all support both general rule and the alteration in modern times which has been introduced fr the special position or circumstances of this parish. For example, in the Pe head case there was a populous village united with a landward parish.
decision of the House of Lords in that case has always been regarded as fix the rule in all cases of a similar kind. So in the case of Mauchline it was l that where there is no way of getting at the parties who really hold property the parish except by the real rent, that must be taken as the basis. Without g into the other cases, I shall only refer your Lordships to the case of the H land Railway Company, 15th June 1870, in which all the former cases were c fully considered. In the opinions there delivered in pronouncing judgmen was stated—"The import of the decisions referred to by the parties appear be that where equity as regards the incidence of the tax on the assessable subj within the parish cannot be secured by taking the valued rent, and can be reac only by taking the real rent as the basis of apportionment, this last must be adopte
In that case the Highland Railway Company were large proprietors who wo have almost entirely escaped if the valued rent had been taken, and it clear that the principle of the Peterhead case applied. In the present case th is no large village possessed by feuars whose property would be unaffec if valued rent were taken. There is no railway in the parish, and in short peculiarity whatever in the circumstances. All that is said is that if we t the valued as compared with the real rent a greater assessment will be l on some heritors in the one case than in the other. But the mode of assessm by merksland has existed for time immemorial in this parish, and I see no g reason stated why it should be interfered with. It is said that the real rent a more equitable basis, but it is not explained that any change has taken place in circumstances of the parish, except it may be that some lands have been m improved than others; but I do not think that because a property happens have been improved, it may be at great expense, a larger burden should be laid u it than has been by use and wont. Again the relative value of lands is to so extent affected by the mode of assessment. The burdens affecting an estate always taken into view, and accurately estimated in sale and purchase; basis on which assessments are imposed should not be changed unless good ca is shewn. In this case I think it would be an unjust interference with a known principle of rating for us to substitute another.

LORD BENHOLME and LORD NEAVES concurred.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—Looking to the nature of this case I have g doubt as to some of the topics adverted to by your Lordship, although at same time I am not inclined formally to dissent from the judgment. In first place, I think that the clause in the Valuation Act which is referred makes it imperative to adopt the value from the valuation-roll only whe statute excludes the valued rent, and that this is not an assessment within clause. I think, however, that it is in its own nature an assessment laid on real rent or value of the lands, and in laying the assessment the nearer we c to the real value the nearer we come to the true principle. I do not give weight to the Peterhead case and other cases previous to the Valuation Act, cept in so far as they lay down the rule that the basis of assessment should proportional to the real value of the lands. The reason why in these cases valued rent was taken as the basis of assessment was, that it was then im sible, without great expense, to ascertain the true value of the lands. N

No. 130.

June 24, 1873.

Bruce v. Bruce and Another.

rever, we consider this question with the valuation-roll from year to year ly to our hand, and the question is whether or not we should apply it. It is l that it would be unjust to act upon the value in the valuation-roll. But I ld ask, which is more likely to be just, the valuation of the time of Charles or the present valuation-roll? Before the time of Charles II. there was the extent—a valuation so old that its origin is lost in antiquity. It might have n unreasonable in these days for any one to have said "we will not take the extent, but we will have a correct valuation," but when a correct valuation made in the reign of Charles II. it would have been in the highest degree asonable had the Courts said that they would only adopt the new valuation n some ratepayer would otherwise escape, and that special cause must be m for adopting it. Why, in the present question, we should refuse to take true value, and go back to the old, I cannot see.

is said that assessment by the valued rent leads to no inequality. The is that it makes the difference of £100 to one man, and certainly that is an ality.

ut an argument of great weight is that the valued rent has become a well n element in the calculation of burdens and the transfer of land. In so l an interest as this I am unwilling to press my views, but I want to guard lf in case the question should arise on a larger scale.

THE following interlocutor was pronounced:—"The Lords, having heard counsel on the special case, are of opinion and find that the assessment for the additions to and repairs and alterations on the manse of Nesting falls to be imposed upon the heritors liable therefor, according to the number of merksland held by them respectively, and not according to the real rent as appearing from the valuation-roll in force for the time under the Valuation of Lands (Scotland) Act, 1854, and decern: Find the parties of the first part entitled to expenses, and remit," &c.

NEILSON & BELL, W.S—JOHN PHIN, S.S.C—W. N. FRASER, S.S.C.—H. G. & S. DICKSON, S.S.C.—Agents.

No. 131.

June 26, 1873.

Dean v. Walker.

DAVID DEAN, Pursuer.—Fraser—Robertson.
WILLIAM WALKER, Defender.—Trayner—J. A. Reid.

xpenses—Jury Trial.—Circumstances in which the Court found a pursuer jury trial, who had failed in four out of five issues, neither entitled to nor e in expenses.

bserved (per Lord President), that where in a jury trial expenses are to be led according to the success of parties, the mode of effecting that division is merely haphazard division, giving a certain proportion to one party and so h to the other, but it must be ascertained through the Auditor what portion ie expenses is applicable to each point.

1ST DIVISION. Ld. Ormidale. B.

this action of damages, raised by David Dean against William ker, for defamation, the case was tried before Lord Ormidale and a upon issues and counter issues. The 1st, 2d, 3d, and 4th issues rred to letters sent by the defender to pursuer, charging him with ury and subornation of perjury; and the fourth to a letter represent- the pursuer to be a frequenter of brothels. The counter issues raised question whether the pursuer had committed perjury and suborna- of perjury.

he jury by a majority returned a verdict for the pursuer on the 4th e, assessing the damages at £300, and upon the other issues and all counter issues for the defender.

he Lord Ordinary afterwards (22d February 1873) decerned against the defender for £300, and found neither party entitled to expenses, the one against the other.*

No. 131. June 26, 1873. Dean v. Walker.

The defender reclaimed, and argued;—The expenses ought to be apportioned according to the success of the parties in their various issues. This was peculiarly a case for doing so, the defender having been successful in all his counter-issues, and on all the pursuer's issues as well, except on a single point.[1]

The pursuer argued that the Lord Ordinary had followed the only reasonable and practicable course in the circumstances.

At advising,—

LORD PRESIDENT.—I do not think that there is any rule that affords a safe guide in determining a question of this kind.

The so called rule said to be laid down in the cases of Stoppel and Johnston goes no further than this, that where the Court are of opinion that the expenses should be divided according to the success of the parties, the mode of effecting that division is not merely a haphazard division, giving a certain proportion to one party and so much to the other; but the mode is to ascertain through the Auditor's department what portion of the expense is applicable to each point,

* "NOTE.—The parties having acquiesced in the verdict of the jury in this case there was no difficulty in applying it.

"But as regards the question of expenses the parties were anything but agreed. While the pursuer insisted that he ought to be found entitled to expenses generally, subject to some modification, the defender maintained that expenses ought either to be divided between him and the pursuer according to the number of issues on which they were respectively successful, or at any rate that each should be found entitled to the expenses which might be ascertained to have been incurred by him in reference to those parts of the litigation in which he was successful.

"After full consideration the Lord Ordinary has come to the conclusion that the best, if not the only practicable, solution of the question of expenses, was to find, as he has done, neither party entitled to expenses, the one against the other. Having presided at the trial, he is satisfied not only that it would be difficult, if not impossible, consistently with justice, to divide or apportion the expenses as suggested by the defender, but that it would not be right to do so, even if practicable, keeping in view the large sum of damages to which the jury has found the pursuer entitled. It is, besides, impossible for the Lord Ordinary to overlook the circumstances in the conduct of both parties, and especially in that of the defender, which led to the litigation, and having regard to these circumstances, as well as the nature of the verdict, he believes the result he has arrived at is the correct one.

"That the Lord Ordinary is not bound by any fixed rule in regard to the matter of expenses, but is entitled to take into consideration the whole circumstances, a knowledge of which he has acquired from the case having depended before him all along, is clear from the precedents. Thus, in Rae v. M'Lay, 29th November 1852, 15 D. 30, it was observed by the Court that in the matter of expenses they would be guided mainly by the Judge who presided at the trial; in Roger v. Dick, 4th February 1864, 2 Macph. 591, the pursuer was found entitled to expenses subject to modification, although he had got only a verdict for 1s. of damages on one of four issues, the verdict on the other three issues being for the defender; and in Duncan v. Balbirnie, 3d March 1860, 22 D. 934, although the pursuer had got a verdict for 1s. of damages for defamation, no expenses were given either to him or the defender."

[1] Stoppel v. M'Laren's Trustees, Dec. 18, 1850, 13 D. 345; Johnston v. Smellie's Trustees, July 15, 1856, 18 D. 1234, and the cases referred to in the Lord Ordinary's note.

d if we are to disturb the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor we must do something [this sort. No. 131.

I think we must not do so unless we are quite prepared to carry out the ision of the expenses on this principle to its legitimate issue. I am not pre- ed to say that we should do this, because it is quite possible that on the ditor's report a very small portion of the expenses will appear to be applicable the fourth issue, on which the pursuer succeeded. June 26, 1873. Dean v. Walker.

The case is a very peculiar one, and it is difficult to understand on what inciple the jury came to a conclusion in favour of the pursuer. The charge de by him against the defender, and in regard to which they found in his vour, is not much more than the defender admitted on his oath, and at the me time that the jury holds this charge to be unfounded they brand him as perjurer by affirming the veritas of the charges set forth in the other issues. I not prepared to say, on the whole matter, that the Lord Ordinary's conclu- n is anything but reasonable, and in such a case I am disposed to give much ight to the opinion of the presiding Judge.

LORD DEAS.—I agree with your Lordship. The case is so peculiar that if we re to apply to it any general rule it would be apt to lead us astray. The pur- r has got very full damages on one issue out of five; but he not merely failed the other four issues, but he failed because the veritas of the charges against s had been established. On the other hand, it is impossible to dispute the ervation of the Lord Ordinary that the defender was very reckless in his ac- ations. Upon the whole, I think his Lordship's interlocutor with reference expenses is right.

LORD ARDMILLAN and LORD JERVISWOODE concurred.

THE COURT adhered to the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary.

PHILIP, LAING, & MONRO, W.S.—W. G. ROY, S.S.C.—Agents.

GEORGE WEIR COSENS, First Party.—Marshall. No. 132.
RS CAROLINE LOUISA ANTOINETTE COSENS OR STEVENSON AND OTHERS, Second Parties.—Lee.

June 26, 1873. Cosens v. Stevenson, &c.

Husband and Wife—Annuity—Alimentary—Discharge.—A husband burdened ain lands with an annuity to his widow, declaring that it should be ali- tary and not assignable, and should be exclusive of the jus mariti of any band she might marry. He directed his trustees upon the death of his ow to convey the lands to A. The free rents of the lands were insufficient ay the annuity, and the trustees required to borrow money to pay it on the rity of the lands.

he widow and A agreed that she should disburden the lands for a cer- . sum, and that the trustees should on such payment convey the lands at to A.

n a special case by A and the trustees, held that the widow could not dis- ge the annuity, and that the trustees were not authorised to convey the ls to A.

HIS was a special case presented by George Weir Cosens of Kames . the trustees of the late Robert Cosens Weir of Bogangreen. 2D DIVISION. R.

he facts were thus stated in the special case:—By antenuptial con- t of marriage, dated 16th June 1865, the late Robert Cosens Weir of angreen bound himself, his heirs, executors, and representatives whom- er, to make payment to Caroline Louisa Antoinette Irwin, his then mised spouse, in case she should survive him, yearly, and each year ing all the days of her life after his decease, of a free liferent annuity 300; further, he bound and obliged himself and his foresaids to make

No. 132.

June 26, 1873.
Cosens v.
Stevenson, &c.

payment to her, in case she should survive him, and there should be no living child of the intended marriage, and no issue of such child, of an additional free liferent annuity of £100, payable in the same manner and subject to the like condition as the annuity of £300; and it was declared that the said annuities should be paid to her exclusive of the jus mariti of her husband, in case she should enter into a second marriage, and the receipts for the same to be granted by her alone should be valid and sufficient. The contract contained a declaration in the following terms, viz.:—"And said annuities are hereby declared alimentary, and it shall not be competent for the said Caroline Louisa Antoinetta Irwin to sell, assign, or burden the same, and they shall not be affectable by the deeds or attachable for the debts of any husband to whom she may be married." In security of the annuities George Cosens Weir disponed to his intended wife his lands and estate of Bogangreen, in the parish of Coldingham and county of Berwick. By trust-disposition and settlement dated 12th May 1866, the said Robert Cosens Weir conveyed the said lands and estate of Bogangreen and the lands of Alemill, as also his whole other estate, heritable and moveable, to trustees for the purposes following, viz.:—First, to pay debts, &c.; second, to make payment to his said wife, in case she should survive him, in any event, of both the annuities of £300 and £100 settled upon her by their contract of marriage. The trust-deed contained a declaration in the following terms, viz.:—"And said annuity is hereby declared alimentary, and it shall not be competent for my said wife to sell, assign, or burden the same, and it shall not be affectable by the deeds or attachable for the debts of any husband she whom she may be married." . . . . Eighth, The trustees were directed, in case all the testator's children should predecease him, or after surviving him should predecease his said wife without leaving lawful issue, to pay the then free remainder of the moveable estate to her and her heirs, executors, and successors whomsoever, for their own absolute use and uncontrolled disposal, and to give to her during her life the free rents of the heritable estate; and lastly, the testator directed his trustees, on the death of his wife and all his children, without leaving lawful issue, to pay, assign, and dispone the then free remainder of the trust-estate, heritable and moveable, to his only brother, George Weir Cosens, and his heirs, executors, and successors whomsoever, for their own absolute use and uncontrolled disposal, and failing him, then to his, the testator's nearest heir absolutely. The marriage-contract and the trust-settlement were recorded in the Register of Sasines. Robert Cosens Weir died on 3d September 1867. There was no issue born of the marriage. His widow entered into a second marriage with Montagu Stevenson, late captain in her Majesty's 30th Regiment of Foot, residing at Fairfield, Bradford-on-Avon. The moveable estate was exhausted in paying the debts of the truster, and there was thus no free moveable estate available for payment to Mrs Stevenson under the last purpose of the trust-deed. Since the death of Robert Cosens Weir his widow had regularly received payment of the foresaid annuities, amounting together to £400, but the yearly income of the trust-estate was not sufficient to pay the same. [The deficiency was stated at the bar to be about £180 a-year.] The trustees were thus under the necessity of borrowing money from time to time, on the security of the trust-estate, in order to enable them to pay the annuities. The income and fee of the estate were thus being rapidly diminished, and the result would be that in the course of a few years the estate would be exhausted, and the annuities would cease. In this state of matters Mrs Stevenson, and George Weir Cosens, the first party, had informed the trustees that they had entered into an arrangement for the discharge

Mrs Stevenson of her right to the annuities in future, in consideration of receiving from the said George Weir Cosens the sum of £4500. The first purpose of the trust created by the said Robert Cosens Weir had been long ago implemented, and the trust had since existed only for the purpose of securing to the widow the said annuities. George Weir Cosens had required the trustees, upon production and delivery of such discharge by Mrs Stevenson, to convey to him the remainder of the trust-estate still in their hands, but they declined to do so, not being satisfied that under the terms of the foresaid trust-deed and contract of marriage they were entitled or bound so to convey. They did not admit the power of Mrs Stevenson and her said husband to discharge her claims under the foresaid contract of marriage and trust-disposition and settlement.[1]

A special case was accordingly presented to the Court by (1) George Weir Cosens, and (2) the trustees of the late Robert Cosens Weir and Montagu Stevenson.

The question of law was as follows:—"Whether the said Mrs C. L. A. Irwin or Stevenson, with concurrence of her present husband, has power to discharge provisions secured to her by the marriage-contract and trust-disposition and settlement above recited, and to disburden the lands of Bogangreen, &c., thereof; and whether, upon production and delivery of a discharge by her, with concurrence aforesaid, in favour of the trustees, the said trustees are entitled and bound to convey the remainder of the trust-estate to the said George Weir Cosens?"

At advising,—

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—I think the contention on the part of the residuary legatee is untenable. The cases of Tod's Trustees and Kippen have no application. What was decided in those cases was that, where the interest under a trust has come to be vested in one beneficiary, the conditions of the trust may be dispensed with, especially when no machinery has been provided to enforce them. In both cases the trust was to come to an end on the purchase of an annuity, and the condition of not being assignable flew off. This case is quite opposite. The condition in the marriage-contract is perfectly legal and effectual. Not only is the annuity declared alimentary, but machinery is provided to prevent its losing that character. I think it would be very dangerous to allow the annuitant to discharge her annuity in the manner proposed. It is said that there is considerable risk of the annuity failing. The interposition of the Court may hereafter be required in another form, but on this I say nothing.

LORD COWAN.—The cases of Tod's Trustees and Kippen proceeded on grounds which are detailed in the opinions of the Judges then delivered, and which your Lordship has now stated. Here we have to deal with entirely different circumstances. The expressions both of the marriage-contract and of the trust-settlement are most explicit in the limitations of the gift conferred by them. The annuity is declared alimentary, and is not assignable by the widow or any future husband she might marry. Now, I do not think that a husband, in thus providing for the aliment of his widow, is in any different position from that of a father conferring an alimentary provision upon his daughter, so as to provide for her comfortable and respectable maintenance for her whole lifetime, and to guard

---

[1] Cases cited:—Tod v. Tod's Trustees, March 18, 1871, ante, vol. ix. 728; Kippen v. Kippen's Trustees, Nov. 24, 1871, ante, vol. x. 134; Lady Massy v. Scott's Trustees, Dec. 5, 1872, ante, 173; Torry Anderson v. Buchanan, June 2, 1837, 15 S. 1073; Pringle v. Anderson, July 3, 1868, ante, vol. vi. 982; Gordon v. Gordon's Trustees, March 2, 1866, ante, vol. iv. 501; Smith's Trustees, May 29, 1873, ante, p. 630; Rennie v. Ritchie, April 25, 1845, 4 Bell's App. 221.

No. 132.
June 26, 1873.
Cosens v. Stevenson, &c.

it against her own improvidence or that of her husband. This may be effectually done by a father, and I think it may be by a husband. The question then is, whether an annuity thus protected is to be deprived of its alimentary character, and to be sold for £4500, without any condition that what is substituted shall be alimentary and protected to the same effect as the annuity. On principle I am clear that any discharge by Mrs Stevenson of her annuity would not have the effect of disburdening the lands and discharging her late husband's trustees. We are told that the annual proceeds of the estate are not enough to provide for the annuity, and that the fee is being gradually eaten away. We should have had the facts stated more fully. But there are ways in which the ultimate destruction of the annuity may be prevented; if not by means of a private sale of the lands, with consent of all the parties interested, at any rate by a judicial sale in a ranking and sale. Then the true value of the estate would be ascertained and realised, and the proceeds would be available to purchase an annuity, it may be of smaller amount, but which, at sight of the Court, would be made subject to the same conditions as the annuity payable by the deed.

LORD BENHOLME and LORD NEAVES concurred.

THIS interlocutor was pronounced:—"The Lords are of opinion, and find that Mrs Stevenson has no power, with concurrence of her present husband, to discharge the provisions secured to her by the marriage-contract and trust-disposition and settlement referred to in the special case, nor to disburden the lands of Bogangreen, &c., thereof; and further, that the trustees are not bound nor entitled, upon production and delivery of a discharge by Mrs Stevenson, with concurrence foresaid, in their favour, to convey the remainder of the trust-estate to George Weir Cosens, and decern."

J. & J. TURNBULL, W.S.—TODS, MURRAY, & JAMIESON, W.S.—Agents.

No. 133.
June 26, 1873.
Macvean v. Maclean.

DONALD MACVEAN, Pursuer.—Sol.-Gen. Clark—Fraser.
ALEXANDER THOMAS MACLEAN AND OTHERS, Defenders.—Millar—Adam.

Obligation—Conditional Discharge—Process—Sist.—In an action by a tenant against the representatives of his landlord for payment of certain bills of exchange granted by the latter, the defenders founded on a letter by the tenant in proof of an alleged agreement by the tenant not to ask payment of the bills in consideration of a renewed lease being granted to the tenant. The pursuer, in reply, stated that the lease was threatened to be reduced by the next heir of entail in possession of the estate as in contravention of the entail. After a proof, held (dis. Lord Benholme) that a pactum de non petendo had been proved, and that the pursuer being still in undisturbed possession of the farm was not in hoc statu entitled to decree, reserving all further questions on the merits.

2D DIVISION. R.

SEE previous report, p. 506.

A proof was led before Lord Neaves, the import of which sufficiently appears from his Lordship's opinion.

At advising,—

LORD NEAVES.—This case is attended with considerable difficulty and delicacy—difficulty as to the matters of fact to be ascertained, and delicacy as to some of the points of law involved. The pursuer's action in itself was rested upon simple and clear grounds. He sued the late Ardgour for payment of £1000, contained in two promissory-notes granted by him to the pursuer in March 1868 for £500 each. The notes were produced, and, not being prescribed, they were prima facie due. Ardgour, who was alive when the action was brought, and who survived the closing of the record, did not dispute the original constitution of the debt, and did not allege payment of it. But he defended himself on this ground—that in 1868, at the time when the bills were granted, the pursuer was his tenant in the farm of Sallachan on a lease, and that it was afterwards arranged between them that the pursuer should get a new and longer lease at the same rent in consideration of his cancelling Ardgour's debt to him upon the notes libelled. In evidence of this alleged arrangement the defender, the late Ardgour, produced a letter which he alleged the pursuer had written to him in reference to the new lease. That letter was in these terms:—"Saturday evening.—In looking through my papers to-day I find that all the documents I have of any consequence are lying in the bank safe, amongst others your promissory-notes for £1000, and if you have any doubts of my integrity you had better keep the lease until I give you a sufficient guarantee that I'll never claim the above. I called up this evening but could not find you."

No. 133.

June 26, 1873.

Macvean v. Maclean.

This letter, the defender contended, proved that an agreement had been made by the parties in connection with the new lease, that the pursuer would never make a claim upon the promissory-notes in question, and that it was understood that the notes and the lease were to be exchanged, but that if the lease was delivered without delivery of the notes, which were not at hand, the pursuer was, if required, to give a guarantee that he would never claim on them, or, if Ardgour had no doubts of the pursuer's integrity, he might trust to that without guarantee. The defender alleged that having no such doubts he had delivered the lease without requiring a guarantee, and without again demanding delivery of the notes, relying upon the letter as sufficient evidence of the agreement. In reply to this defence the pursuer made a very elaborate statement in his revised condescendence, particularly in articles 3 to 6 inclusive. The statement in article 5 deserves special attention,—(Cond. 5) "In the beginning of April 1869 the defender offered to give him a lease for nineteen years of Sallachan, from Whitsunday 1869, at a rent of £300, provided he would discharge the debt for £1000 contained in the promissory-notes. In consequence of this offer the pursuer wrote to the defender a letter in the following terms:—'Alexander Maclean, Esq. of Ardgour. Dear Sir,—According to your request I now make you an offer of three hundred pounds of yearly rent for the farm of Sallachan, as presently possessed by myself, the lease to endure for nineteen years from Whitsunday first 1869, and I am to give up the promissory-notes for the £1000 as you proposed.—I have the honour to be your obedient servant, DOND. MACVEAN.' To this letter the defender replied accepting the offer, and the letter quoted in the defences was written in answer to the defender's acceptance." But the pursuer goes on to say that this arrangement came to an end in the manner explained in the 6th article of his condescendence,—(Cond. 6) "After writing the letter quoted in the defences the pursuer went to Fort-William and consulted the late Mr M'Gregor, writer there, who was also local agent for the defender, as to whether a lease at a reduced rent, for which a grassum of £1000 had been paid, would be binding on the defender's heirs of entail, and he received an opinion to the effect that it would not. He then consulted Mr D. S. M'Laren, writer, Fort-William, on the same point, and received the same opinion. In consequence of this he, on his return to Sallachan, called on the defender, and informed him that he had been advised that the lease would not be binding on the defender's successors, and that therefore the transaction could not be gone on with. To this the defender replied that it was all right, and he could do as he pleased. He, however, declined to enter into the transaction further. Nothing further was said upon the subject of a lease until the beginning of January 1870, when, in consequence of a report that the pursuer was looking out for another farm, the subject was resumed by the defender, who wrote him a letter in the following terms:—'Private. Ardgour H., 1st Jany. /70. Dear MacVean,—I have by no means given up the intention of giving you a new lease of Sallachan. I hope it is not too late to do so. I should be sorry to lose you as a tenant and neighbour.—Yrs. truly, ALEXR. MACLEAN. Donald MacVean, Esq., Sallachan.' In consequence of this letter he called upon the defender, when the defender offered to give him a lease of the farm at the old rent of £361, 6s. 10d. for twenty-one years, as from Whitsunday 1869. . . . He agreed to the defender's offer of a twenty-one years' lease as from Whitsunday 1869, and the lease was accordingly extended and executed on 20th January 1870, and under this lease he now possessed the farm of Sallachan." The pursuer then declined to go on with the transaction, and nothing more took place till the beginning of January, in which month the new lease was entered into,—entered into no doubt for the period agreed on, but not at the reduced rent, for the rent agreed on was the then existing rent of £361. Now, this is his explanation: that the letter which has no other date than that of "Saturday evening" cannot be available to the defender in this case, because in reality it applied to a totally different transaction, which had taken place in April 1869, and had so far been completed, but was afterwards departed from, and in which it was part of the transaction that the bills were to be given up. But in that negotiation the rent mentioned was £300 instead of £361, and upon finding, quite unexpectedly, as the pursuer contends, that this was an invalid contract, he, although he had been corresponding about it for some time, retired from it, and consequently the transaction fell through, and the letter of Saturday evening, which had reference to it alone, ceased to be binding when the new lease was entered into in January 1870. Besides this letter of Saturday evening, other circumstances, to which I shall afterwards refer, were founded on by the defender in support of his statement, and in particular the fact that the pursuer, when written to by the defender's agents to furnish a statement of his claims against the defender, brought forward no other debt than one of £300, contained in another promissory-note.

No. 133.

June 26, 1873. Macvean v. Maclean.

The Lord Ordinary, when the case came to be debated after the closing of the record, and after the death of the original defender, allowed the parties before answer a proof of their respective averments, and on advising a reclaiming note the Court adhered. In doing so the Court did not overlook the delicate nature of the point of law thus raised as to the competency of parole proof. But they thought themselves, in the circumstances, bound to allow an investigation. On the one hand, no doubt, the pursuer had his documents to found on as establishing his debt; but, on the other hand, the defender had a document to rely on of a very peculiar kind—a document under the hand of the pursuer, which, if it referred to the transaction which led to the new lease, seemed clearly to infer some obligation on the part of the pursuer not to make a claim on these bills. That document referred to a lease as about to be delivered, and it indicated very plainly that although the lease might be delivered and the bills not delivered, this was not to infer a claim upon the bills as competent to the pursuer. It is certain that a lease was granted and delivered to the pursuer in January 1870, and although the letter of Saturday evening does not explicitly shew that the lease there referred to was the one of January 1870 which was executed, and although there was no such date to the letter as unequivocally connected it with that transaction, yet that uncertainty was the result of the pursuer's unbusiness-like conduct in putting an imperfect date and otherwise using ambiguous language; and, on the other hand, the fact remained that the letter of Saturday evening was left in Ardgour's hands, and that its terms called imperatively for explanation to clear them up and take off their effect.

The proof having now been taken, it is our present task to state our opinion of its import as far as we can, and to say what course shall be taken. In support of the defender's allegation that the letter of Saturday evening was written in reference to the new lease of January 1870 there is not much direct evidence, unless it be the defender's own statements during his lifetime, before the action came into Court. But it seems expedient in these circumstances to look at the pursuer's proof as to this matter, for if he has sufficiently proved that the letter had reference to another and earlier transaction, and a totally different state of things, this may put an end to the whole case. The pursuer states in his deposition these facts,—(1) That before the January lease was concluded,—in fact a considerable time before,—there was a proposal that Ardgour should give him a lease for nineteen years at the rent of £300 a-year. (2) He says that this proposal was first spoken of in the beginning of 1869. (3) That the proposal was made at Ardgour House, and that in answer to the proposal the pursuer agreed to it, and a verbal bargain was concluded. (4) That this bargain was shortly afterwards departed from, also verbally, in consequence of the pursuer having when in Fort-William consulted Mr M'Gregor, Mr Mackenzie, and Mr M'Laren,

No. 1
—
June 26.
Macvean
Maclean

dvised him that it would not be a safe bargain, or binding on the heirs of , so that, he says, "I threw up the bargain at once." It is somewhat kable that in the first part of his evidence the pursuer makes no reference l to writings as passing between him and Ardgour as to the £300 lease. ys they made the bargain for the new lease verbally, and he threw it up lly. However, though there is a good deal of going backwards and for- s in the evidence I am not inclined to give much effect to that, for so may depend on the way in which questions are asked that we must give he evidence fair play. In the latter part of his evidence, when cross- ined by his own counsel, he gave another statement, being very nearly that on record. When asked about the letter of Saturday evening he tells w he wrote it,—"I wrote that letter to Ardgour in answer to a note from saying that he had written the lease, or the letter of lease as he called it, for) of yearly rent, to endure for nineteen years. I took that note back to our when I found it was not according to law to take a lease of that sort. ; letter from Ardgour to me was written in April 1869. (Q.) Did he ask in letter that you should deliver up the bills? (A.) Yes; I think he said thing about that. (Q.) What did he say? (A.) So far as I remember he e me that it was better that we should exchange the lease and the bills, or thing to that effect; I cannot remember the words. (Q.) What did you erstand him to mean by the lease? (A.) The letter of lease that he had ten out himself. (Q.) Had he given it to you? (A.) He had not given it, he had sent me that note saying it was ready. (Q.) Where are these notes? I brought them back to Ardgour when I told him that the transaction could be gone on with. (Q.) Was it in answer to these notes that you wrote that r? (A.) Yes; it was in answer to the note agreeing to give me the lease £300 for the farm of which I was then in possession. (Q.) Had he given that letter agreeing to give the farm at the rent of £300? (A.) He had me that note saying it was ready. (Q.) Upon what condition was he to you the farm at that rent? (A.) Upon the condition that I was to give up £1000. (Q.) That letter being in your possession, what did you refer to in letter No. 11 when you said that 'if you have any doubt of my integrity, had better keep the lease until I give you a sufficient guarantee'? (A.) I wanted him to keep the lease. (Q.) But you had it? (A.) No, I did not it. (Q.) Did you not say that you had the letter in your possession at time? (A.) I did not. (Q.) Had there been a letter of lease prepared by Maclean at that time? (A.) He said so in his note. (Q.) And you took note back to him? (A.) Yes, I took it back after I returned from Fort- liam. (Q.) Why did you not get up the letter No. 11 when you took back note? (A.) I never thought anything about it." Now, it is certainly arkable that the pursuer, after an exchange of missives on the subject—(he ing, as he says, made an offer, at Ardgour's request, for a lease at £300, and ing got Ardgour's acceptance, and then, in answer to that acceptance, having ten the letter of Saturday evening containing a very remarkable statement at the bills)—when he finds that that lease is challengeable, goes to Ardgour breaks it off, and gives up, as I understand, Ardgour's note to him, and does get up that letter which he had written in these circumstances, but allows gour from that time forward to remain in possession of that letter,—a letter ing such an equivocal meaning that it was impossible to tell from the face of he year in which occurred the transaction to which it referred; that he uld moreover leave the thing to stand on that footing, and be now obliged to e this elaborate explanation. Let us see what corroboration there is of it. he letter that he sent to Ardgour making the offer is not recovered (Ardgour it not, and it is not to be found); but the pursuer says he kept a copy of it, he produces a copy of it. It bears the date of April 1869. It is a rather arkable looking document, and it is attended with this peculiarity also, that says he took a copy of this proposal at the time when he made it, and then n after time he made a copy of that copy to send to his agent, and he says copy produced is one or other of these copies—either the first copy or the ond; but which it is he cannot tell. That is rather a curious circumstance lease. Did he say what induced him to make that proposal? thought it was very hard on him to be paying me £50 a-year fo and he thought if we would come to an understanding about getti a reduced rent, and me giving up the £1000, it would accommo much." Now, there is no doubt that giving up the £1000 woul him, but the way in which Ardgour is made to put it is rather sin very probable, for what he says is, that it was hard to be paying £ he was wanting therefore to get rid of that burden. And how wa of the burden? He was to get rid of the burden of paying £50 a- or losing £60 a-year of what was got by the existing lease!—fo nature of it. The ultimate getting rid of the debt was no doubt but at present the difference was little if, instead of getting £3(£50, he lowered the rent to £300. It appears to shew a loss illogical way of putting it. But still something of that kind was in t pursuer, and let us see how he corroborates that story by evidence consulted oftener than once three men of business, Mr Mackenzie, and Mr M'Laren. The time for all this the pursuer positively sta 1869. Of that he has no doubt; the copy of one of his letters b Mr M'Gregor unfortunately is dead, and Mr M'Laren, the pursue though he speaks of a consultation, can affix no date to it, exce between the death of young M'Gregor and that of his father— occurring in February 1868, the other in the end of 1869. But is more precise, and it is very difficult to get over Mr Mackenzie "I went to Fort-William at Whitsunday 1868 to be associated in the late Mr M'Gregor. I was his partner in connection with t the bank, as well as with the writing business, from that time. Mr M'Gregor was agent for Ardgour, and also for Macvean." N are corroborated so far as this goes, because Mr Mackenzie went place of Mr M'Gregor's son, whose death took place in February says, "I remember Mr Macvean coming to the office one day in the summer of 1868, but I am not prepared to say at what time i I am quite sure it was in the summer of 1868. He saw Mr M first instance, and I was afterwards called in from a separate apa room in which they were. After being introduced to Mr Macvean, asked me if a sum of money paid by a tenant for a lease would lease in the case of an entail. I answered that it would; up M'Gregor turned round to Mr Macvean and said to him, 'Noo some similar expression." Mr Mackenzie is pressed particularly a "How do you remember that it was the summer of 1868 that the

No. 133.

June 26, 1873.

Macvean v. Maclean.

cause that involves this, that Mr Mackenzie had remained twelve months altother at Fort-William a partner in Mr M'Gregor's business and in the bank, nd had not seen Mr Macvean; whereas he says in the most clear manner that his was his first introduction—which is very probable—and that when he came this question was discussed and answered. That is no corroboration certainly the pursuer's statement as to the time; and if we believe this, how can we reconcile it with his statement, that (having got this information and learned this law of the law in 1868, if Mr Mackenzie is correct) he, in April 1869, in ignorance any such objection, entered into—first verbally and then in writing—an arrangement with Ardgour for a lease of that objectionable kind—not only extending the term, but lowering the rent by £60—and then, after that, found out (if Mr Mackenzie is right he knew it long ago) that it was an objectionable transaction, and so resiled? Now, if the pursuer is not corroborated as to that, it gives a very awkward appearance to the whole case, because it then comes to this, that there could not have been in April 1869 a proposal for a lease at £300, because he tells you he would not have entered into such a thing if he had known it was objectionable in law. If he knew it, the story is thrown into inextricable confusion; and if in 1869 there was a proposal for a lease, he having known in 1868 that the terms were objectionable, then the letter of Saturday evening, written in 1869, cannot have referred to a lease at a lower rent (for the pursuer must have given up any idea of that), but to a lease which, though not carried through in 1869, was allowed to go off and on, and was carried out in January 1870. That makes a very material difference on the pursuer's statement, for undoubtedly the pursuer's case is this—that this document of Saturday evening, which is capable of being considered as relating to the lease actually carried through, and has no date incompatible with that, can be explained away by the fact that at the time it was written there was a verbal and written agreement for the lease at £300, and that a diminution of rent was the consideration for which he agreed to abstain from claiming on the bills. If that is not true, it comes to this, that there are two competing transactions for explaining that letter, but that in so far as the rent is concerned from 1868 downwards after that interview with Mr Mackenzie there was the old rent exacted, whatever lease was executed. Then came the transaction, there being a lease for the old rent, carried through after some delays.

This letter, written and delivered to Ardgour for an important purpose, which in this transaction must be considered of special importance, was allowed to remain in Ardgour's possession, just as the bills were allowed to remain in Macvean's possession. The effect of that I shall afterwards speak to, but it appears a matter for the pursuer to clear up by proof; and if he has not made out his case then there comes to be considered how we are to dispose of it. Another thing with regard to this letter is that it speaks of a lease; but the pursuer says there was no lease, but only his own offer—his own copy of that offer—and the answer by Ardgour accepting that offer, which he says he returned. Now, if that be so, it just comes to this, that the letter was left—an important document, which it undoubtedly was—and it never occurred to the pursuer that, having written such a document, knowing the transaction had gone entirely off, he ought to have got it up, so as to prevent the possibility of its being used against him. That seems difficult to explain. There are other circumstances that we have to keep in view. The copy of this letter proposing the lease has made its appearance in a peculiar way. The pursuer had mentioned verbally to his agent, Mr M'Laren, that there had been a talk about the rent being £300, and Mr M'Laren had spoken to Ardgour about that before the action was raised. But although he had told that to Mr M'Laren, he furnished him with no evidence. Mr M'Laren tells us he had several meetings with Mr Macvean before he sent him the copy letter. "He did not at any of these meetings make any reference to such a letter being in his possession. (Q.) Can you recollect the terms of the letter in which he sent the copy to you? (A.) The substance of it was that the copy was evidently a discovery made by him after he had seen me on several occasions. (Q.) Did the thing so far come upon you as a surprise? (A.) It did. I said to him the first time he came to me afterwards that it was a very

£300 at that time, it would cut him out of the claim for the £10 chose to insist in it again. He asked Mr Mackenzie how long th stand, and was told they would stand for six years. Another thin to the bills is, that he tells us he got them up from the bank at learned the transaction was a bad one. He says the bills were back to him. That is curious, if he got them up, for this reason he had made then a binding transaction, and when he went to get was told that it was bad, so that he would have to keep the bi There is no corroboration of this by any one. All these are pe stances. Another fact is that the pursuer got no interest from th lease. The lease began at Whitsunday 1869, and he got no intere to that period on the £1000, though he got interest on other debt by Ardgour. Then there is another statement that he made to M that if the lease stood good he was not so much caring about the these are indications somewhat at least in the direction of the d that the lease of 1870 was granted in consideration of the debt u being cancelled. Now, the result appears to me upon the whole c —1st, that whilst the pursuer so early as the year 1868 was disp a new and longer lease of his farm, and to make some concession a due to him for that purpose, and whilst the late Ardgour was als come to terms on the subject, it is not proved that Ardgour ever r tained an offer for such a lease at a reduced rent of £300. 2d, Th stage of their communications on the subject the pursuer ascertai aware that a lease for a reduced rent and also for a longer period serious objection to such a transaction, and that it is not proved t was ever made the subject of mutual agreement except for payme and existing rent. 3d, That, in particular, it is not proved that th Saturday evening was written in April 1869, between the time—f pursuer's statement—when a proposal for a lease had been agree time when such a proposal was resiled from as alleged by the p That while the pursuer avers that other documents passing betwe were given up the document of Saturday evening was allowed to late Ardgour's possession, and ought to receive effect as part of t according to the true interpretation that may be due to it.

Then comes the question as to obligation under the bills. Now of the case I think it is not clear that the notes were finally di seems to me, from the bills being allowed to remain, and the letter of the opposite parties, that the transaction is more like what in

No. 133.
June 26, 1873.
Macvean v. Maclean.

g; but if the heir fails in that the lease will stand. Now, I am not pre- d to give the pursuer both his lease and the bills, nor am I prepared to say he shall have neither. I think that, in these circumstances, after findings ıe effect aforesaid, we should sist procedure in hoc statu, and in course of the case must come to a point in one way or other, and we shall see what oposed to take place between those parties who are interested and who have r own evidence and views to bring forward, which may ultimately throw ; on the matter, and enable us to do justice in the case. I propose that your lships should sist procedure in hoc statu, prefixing some findings that will r the general views we take, but without conclusively determining the ques- whether there is a complete discharge of the bills, but only such a condi- al discharge of their obligations as constitutes a bar in hoc statu to the uer.

he LORD JUSTICE-CLERK and LORD COWAN concurred.

ORD BENHOLME.—I dissent from the judgment, on the ground that there no sufficient evidence that that Saturday night's letter was written after the mencement of the final negotiation—that which terminated in the lease. own impression is that it had been written with reference to some of the ner negotiations.

THE COURT pronounced the following interlocutor :—" Find that prior to the 20th day of January 1870 the pursuer was tenant of the farm of Sallachan, belonging to the original defender Alexander Maclean of Ardgour, under a tack dated 14th February 1865, for the period of seven years from Whitsunday 1865, but terminable at the tenant's death, if that event should sooner happen, and this at the money rent of £361, 6s. 10d. yearly: Find also that prior to the year 1870 the pursuer was creditor of the said Alexander Maclean in certain sums of money, and specially in the sum of £1000 contained in the two bills for £500 each: Find that in the course of the years 1868 and 1869 communings and correspondence took place between the said parties as to the said farm and the said bills, and, in particular, as to the pursuer's obtaining a new and longer lease of the said farm and the power of the said Alexander Maclean as an heir of entail to grant such a lease: And find that ultimately, on the said 20th of January 1870, the lease, of which No. 10 is a copy, was agreed upon and was executed between the parties for the period of twenty-one years at the old rent: Find that in the course of the said communings and correspondence the letter No. 11 of process, dated Saturday evening, was written and sent by the pursuer to the said Alexander Maclean, in which he refers to the bills for £1000 libelled, and to a lease as then ready to be delivered, and proposes that if Maclean has any doubts of his integrity he should keep the lease until the pursuer gave him a sufficient guarantee that he would never claim the said bills: Find it is not proved at what precise time the said note, dated Saturday evening, was written or sent; but find that the said letter was allowed to remain in the hands of the said Alexander Maclean, who produced it in this process as having been written in reference to the said lease of 20th January 1870: Find that after the execution of the said last-mentioned lease the pursuer, though he kept possession of the said bills, neither received nor claimed payment of any interest thereon subsequent to Whitsunday 1869, the commencement of the said lease, and that in March 1872, when requested by the agents for Ardgour to state the particulars of any claim he had against the said

No. 133.

June 26, 1873.
Macvean v. Maclean.

Alexander Maclean, he mentioned a debt of £300 as due to him on another bill, but did not mention any debt as due under the bills libelled: Find that in May 1872 the agents for Mr J. D. Maclean, the said Alexander Maclean's son, intimated to the pursuer that it was intended to challenge the lease of 20th January 1870 as granted in fraudem of the entail of Ardgour, and that thereafter, in July 1872, the present action was raised: Find, on the one hand, that the said letter No. 11 of process, dated Saturday evening, does not import a final discharge of the bills libelled; but find that it imports an undertaking and obligation by the pursuer of the nature of a pactum de non petendo that he would not make a claim upon the said bills as matters stood when the lease of 1870 was executed or agreed upon, or except in the event of the said lease being set aside: Find that, as far as appears, no challenge of the said lease has been brought by the heir of entail now in possession of the estate of Ardgour, and that the pursuer is as yet in the undisturbed possession of the said farm under the said lease: Find that, in these circumstances, the pursuer is not in hoc statu entitled to decree in terms of the conclusions of the summons: Therefore supersede further consideration of this process, reserving all further questions on the merits of the case, and all questions of expenses."

MURRAY, BEITH, & MURRAY, W.S.—TODS, MURRAY, & JAMIESON, W.S.—Agents.

No. 134.

June 28, 1873.
Stevens v. Campbell.

WILLIAM STEVENS, Petitioner.— Watson—Harper.
ROBERT CAMPBELL, Respondent.—Scott—M'Kechnie.

Diligence—Inhibition—Bill of Exchange—Vergens ad inopiam.—The creditor in a bill of exchange which was dishonoured at maturity received from his debtor two renewal bills in lieu of the original bill, which, however, he retained in his own possession under an agreement whereby, as he alleged, he was to be entitled "to do such diligence on the original bill as might be necessary for his security, in the event of other creditors doing diligence against the petitioner or his estate, or of circumstances emerging which should make it proper and advisable for the respondent to take steps that the debt due to him should be paid." The creditor presented a bill in the Bill-Chamber during the currency of the renewal bills, setting forth nothing more than that he was in possession of the original bill, and that it had been dishonoured at maturity, and craving letters of inhibition, which he obtained. In a petition for recall of the letters of inhibition, held that the bill upon which they proceeded should have set forth not only the original bill but also the two renewal bills, and a statement that the debtor was vergens ad inopiam, and the letters accordingly recalled.

Titles to Land Act, 1868, 31 and 32 Vict. c. 101, sec. 156, schedule QQ thereof—A.S., 18*th Nov.* 1871.—Observed that the above statute had made no change upon the rule that a bill presented in the Bill-Chamber for the purpose of obtaining letters of inhibition must set forth fully and explicitly all the grounds of debt which justify the creditor in craving diligence.

1ST DIVISION. B.

ON 28th May Robert Campbell raised and executed letters of inhibition against William Stevens. The bill upon which the letters proceeded set forth "that the complainer is holder of a bill for the sum of £59, 10s. 9d. sterling, drawn by him upon and accepted by William Stevens, merchant, West Calder, dated," &c., "which bill when duly presented for payment was dishonoured by the said William Stevens."

Stevens thereupon presented this petition for recall of the inhibition, in which he stated "that the said inhibition is nimious, oppressive, and

No. 134.

June 28, 1878
Stevens v. Campbell.

illegal; that it proceeded upon a bill which Mr Campbell had no right to have in his possession, and under which he had no claim against the petitioner; and that the petitioner is not only not vergens ad inopiam, but that his estate, heritable and moveable, if realised, would shew a large surplus."

It appeared that Stevens had accepted a bill drawn by Campbell upon him for the amount of £59, 10s. 9d., dated 6th December 1872, and payable on 9th April 1873. The bill was not paid at maturity, and an arrangement was entered into under which Stevens granted two new bills for £25, and £35, 3s. respectively in lieu of the first bill. These renewal bills were payable on 31st May and 31st July 1873 respectively, and the difference between £59, 10s. 9d., the amount of the original bill, and £60, 3s., the amount of the two new bills, was made up of a charge of interest, and of the expense of the stamps of the two renewal bills.

The original bill was retained by the respondent, Campbell, under an arrangement between the parties.

This arrangement was thus set forth by the respondent in his answers to the present petition:—"It was part of the said agreement, and the respondent entered into it upon the distinct understanding, that the original bill was not to be delivered up to the petitioner, but was to be retained by the respondent as the foundation of the debt thereby constituted, until the new bills proposed to be granted as aforesaid should be paid. . . . . The currency of the said bills was fixed at two and four months respectively, but it was agreed between the parties that it was to be in the option of the respondent to call up the whole debt at an earlier period. In accordance with the said agreement the petitioner allowed the original bill to remain in the possession of the respondent as the real document of debt. The effect and object of this arrangement was to enable the respondent to grant to the petitioner the delay sought for by him, without prejudice to his right to do such diligence on the original bill as might be necessary for his security, in the event of other creditors doing diligence against the petitioner or his estate, or of circumstances emerging which should make it proper and advisable for the respondent to take steps to secure that the debt due to him should be paid."

The respondent pleaded;—(1) The respondent having, in conformity with the agreement, and for the purpose set forth in the answers, retained in his possession the bill for £59, 10s. 9d. sterling, as a valid and subsisting document of debt, was, in the circumstances, entitled to have recourse to the inhibition complained of, and the same cannot be recalled until payment of the respondent's debt, or security therefor.

Argued for the petitioner;—By the law both of England and Scotland the acceptance of a renewal bill operates a suspension of the debt in the original bill until the maturity of the renewal bill, and no action is competent on the original bill until such maturity.[1] The renewal bills constituted novation of the debt. Even if there was no novation the debt was still current, and not past due. In either case the bill upon which the letters proceeded must bear that the debtor was vergens ad inopiam, or must set forth full and explicit reasons for the issue of the letters of inhibition.[2] The bill upon which these letters proceeded set forth that there was a debt past due contained in a bill which had been dishonoured at maturity, which was not a correct statement of the circumstances.

The respondent argued;—The agreement between the debtor and creditor was perfectly legitimate if proved, and was only to be rebutted by creditor; and according to his allegation it did so remain under agreement as set forth in his answers to the petition as follows:— of the said agreement, and the respondent entered into it upon understanding, that the original bill was not to be delivered up to t but was to be retained by the respondent as the foundation of the constituted until the new bills proposed to be granted as aforesa paid . . . . The currency of the said bills was fixed at two and respectively, but it was agreed between the parties that it was option of the respondent to call up the whole debt at an earlier The effect and object of this arrangement was to enable the respon to the petitioner the delay sought for by him, without prejudice to do such diligence on the original bill as might be necessary for h the event of other creditors doing diligence against the petitioner or of circumstances emerging which should make it proper and adv respondent to take steps to secure that the debt due to him sho Now, no doubt that is a very peculiar arrangement, and if it w to investigate the matter some questions of considerable nicety with regard to the burden and mode of proof. But in the view of this case it is not necessary to decide any of these points, be ing the statements of the respondent to be true, the question a justified in using the diligence now sought to be recalled. It thought that some novelty was introduced by the "Titles to Land 156, and relative schedule, to which I shall afterwards refer. T which the letters of inhibition proceeded set forth that the comp spondent here, was the holder of a bill for £59, 10s. 9d. sterling, duly presented for payment, was dishonoured. That is the whol which inhibition is prayed for and obtained. The inhibition is dishonoured bill, that is to say, on a liquid document of debt past that does not truly represent the position of the parties with rega for £59 odds, even according to the statement of the respondent h answers. Even upon his own statement he was only entitled to on the old bill in the event of other creditors doing diligence, "stances emerging which should make it proper and advisable for th to take steps to secure that the debt due to him should be paid."

[1] Byles on Bills, p. 235; Chitty on Bills, p. 126.
[2] Style Book, p. 530; A.S. Nov. 18, 1871.

Putting out of view the provisions of the "Titles to Land what would have been the ordinary procedure in obtaining lett tion on this bill? When a bill for letters of inhibition was pres Bill-Chamber with a past due bill it was not necessary to state stated in the bill here. But when the debt was not yet due and n necessary for the creditor to have set forth the circumstances which ow divulged in his answers to the petition.

uestion thus arises, has the Act of 1868 made any change in the prac- uis respect. I am of opinion it has not. In section 156, no doubt, a m is introduced. The schedule referred to in that section proceeds very the same form as was followed prior to the passing of the Act, being ıewhat shorter. Still the names and designations of the parties must , and the document upon which the diligence is to proceed must be set forth. This statute, although it makes no mention of bills for f inhibition, has certainly not done away with these bills. In the Act ınt of 18th November 1871, passed in pursuance of the power given us .ct, we provide "that the mode of obtaining warrant for signeting letters ition in the form mentioned in section 156 and schedule (QQ) of the recited Act, shall be by production of a fiat ut petitur duly obtained ll-Chamber, on a bill presented along with a proper ground of debt, or h a depending summons on which the inhibition is to be raised." The ; of Sederunt provides also that this regulation is not to apply to inhibi- eeding on a warrant to inhibit contained in a summons, because such ns are sufficiently warranted by the summons having passed the Signet. ile a bill is said not to be necessary where the inhibition is to follow on ns containing warrant to inhibit, it seems clear that it is essential where ence proceeds on a document of debt. That being so, if the ground of ıot simply a mere document of debt, which is past due, then it is evi- ; the bill must bear some additional statement. If a bill accordingly be ome future date, the statement that the debtor is vergens ad inopiam inserted before the creditor is entitled to obtain his diligence. In this bill for the letters of inhibition should have contained a full and ex- tement of the facts as they stood, especially seeing that they are by no nple. I am therefore of opinion that this inhibition should be recalled.

Deas.—The creditor in this case had in his possession a past-due bill, bills granted in renewal thereof,—the original bill having been retained y of his debt. In that state of matters he was quite entitled to have letters of inhibition, but I agree with your Lordship that, in order to ought to have presented a bill setting forth not only the original bill, the two renewal bills, and that the debtor was vergens ad inopiam, he was justified in demanding security for a debt not yet due. Unfor- the agent mistook the manner in which the diligence should have been or and obtained, and the inhibition must therefore be recalled. I am ised at the mistake, much misunderstanding having prevailed as to the the statute; but we cannot help the result.

Ardmillan.—It is settled in the law both of England and of Scotland, holder of a bill cannot do diligence upon it, after it has been renewed, ıe currency of the renewal bill. It is equally settled that a creditor in n of a bill, the term of payment of which has not arrived, may do upon it in security of his debt, but only upon an allegation that the vergens ad inopiam, or of some other important emerging circumstance, him to ask security for his own protection.
s case the creditor had three bills in his possession, the two last being doubt renewals of the first. In my opinion the effect of taking these bills was to postpone the term of payment of the original bill, and con- r, when these letters of inhibition were applied for the debt contained ill was not yet due. In these circumstances it appears to me that the in making his application for inhibition, was not entitled to set forth ıal bill alone, and conceal the fact of the existence of the renewal bills. ith Lord Deas in thinking that the creditor was entitled to ask for in- in security of his debt, and that the letters of inhibition would have perly issued if they had set forth circumstances relevant and sufficient t that it was necessary for him to claim protection. If he had alleged

No. 134.
June 28, 1873.
Stevens v. Campbell.

that the debtor was vergens ad inopiam, and was proceeding to sell a table estate, and if he had inhibited on the original bill, as on a bill t payment of which had not arrived, he would have been entitled to t he craved. But as he did not take this course I agree in thinkin letters of inhibition must be recalled.

LORD JERVISWOODE concurred.

THIS interlocutor was pronounced:—"Recall the inhibit tioned in the petition raised at the instance of the re Robert Campbell, and grant warrant for marking the said as discharged in the Register of Inhibitions, and decern: petitioner entitled to expenses, and remit," &c.

HENRY BUCHAN, S.S.C.—WILLIAM BLACK, S.S.C.—Agents.

No. 135.
June 28, 1873.
Ogilvy v. Paul and Others.

THOMAS OGILVY, Pursuer.—Sol-Gen. Clark.
ARCHIBALD PAUL AND OTHERS, Defenders.—Fraser—Guthrie S Campbell Smith—Macdonald—Mackintosh.

Reparation—Slander—Counter Issue—Veritas Convicii.—Circum which held that it was necessary for a defender in an action of da slander who pleaded veritas to put in his counter issue the words u libel.

1st DIVISION.
Lord Gifford.
M.

THIS was an action of damages for slander. The pursuer O a Justice of the Peace for the county of Forfar, and on 16th Jan he was convicted in the Police Court of Brechin of an assau post-boy named Donaldson, and fined £2, 2s., with the alternati days' imprisonment. The post-boy raised an action of damag Court of Session for this alleged assault, and employed Paul, present defenders, as his local agent in said action. In April 1 wrote the following letter to Alexander Pirie, another of the p fenders, who was an hotel-keeper in Brechin, and the employer of boy Donaldson:—"Mr Pirie, Commercial Hotel. Dear Si ing it said in Brechin that you are my employer in the case of boy against Mr Thomas Ogilvy I beg to state that such a report unfounded. I was employed by the boy, and his many friends v pathised with him, for the dastardly and cowardly attack made on a Sunday in the open street of Brechin, by a Justice of Pe has punished others most severely for much lesser crimes tha committed. I remain, yours truly, ARCH. PAUL. 12th April 18

This letter was sent by Pirie to David Burns, another of the and the proprietor, printer, and publisher, of the "Brechin Advert was by him published in that newspaper on 15th April 1873 in of an advertisement.

Ogilvy accordingly raised the present action concluding for against Paul, the writer of the said letter, Pirie who had sent newspaper, and Burns the publisher.

The following issues were approved of by the Lord Ordina Issues for Pursuer)—(1) Whether the defender, Archibald Paul, caused to be written, and delivered, or caused to be delivered, fender, Alexander Pirie, the letter printed in the schedule hereto a and whether the said letter was, in whole or in part, of and conce pursuer, and falsely and calumniously represents that the pur been guilty of the crime of assaulting William Donaldson, po Brechin, in a dastardly and cowardly manner, and that the purs person unfit to hold the office of a Justice of the Peace, to the lo and damage of the pursuer? (2) Whether the defenders, or hich of them, published, or caused to be published, in the 'Brechin No. 135.

dvertiser and Angus and Mearns Intelligencer' newspaper, the letter rinted in the schedule hereto appended; and whether the said letter was, June 28, 1873.
Ogilvy v. Paul n whole or in part, of and concerning the pursuer, and falsely and and Others.
alumniously represents that the pursuer had been guilty of the crime of ssaulting William Donaldson, post-boy in Brechin, in a dastardly and owardly manner, and that the pursuer was a person unfit to hold the ffice of a Justice of the Peace, to the loss, injury, and damage of the ursuer. Damages laid at £3000. Or (2. Counter-issue for Defenders) —Whether, on or about the 12th January 1873 (on the street of Brechin), he pursuer, being then a Justice of the Peace, assaulted the said William Donaldson?"

The pursuer moved the Court to vary the counter issue for the defenders
o the effect of making it run as follows:—"Whether the said statements nd representations were true? Or, to the effect of making them run hus:—Whether the pursuer was guilty of the crime of assaulting William Donaldson, post-boy in Brechin, in a dastardly and cowardly manner, and s a person unfit to hold the office of a Justice of the Peace?"

The pursuer contended that the counter issue must justify the accusation, which was that the assault had been committed in a "dastardly and cowardly" manner, and also the innuendo, which was that the pursuer was unfit to be a magistrate of the county.[1]

The defenders answered;—(1) That they were bound to justify nothing more than the statement made, and not an innuendo which the pursuer might ingeniously extract from it. (2) That the words "cowardly and dastardly" were used rhetorically, and were not of the essence of the accusation.[2]

The Court altered the counter issue of the defenders to the following:—"Whether, on or about 12th January 1873, the pursuer, being then a Justice of the Peace, assaulted the said William Donaldson on the street, of Brechin in a dastardly and cowardly manner."

HENRY & SHIRESS, S.S.C.—THOMAS WALLACE, S.S.C.—RENTON & GRAY, S.S.C.—WEBSTER & WILL, S.S.C.—Agents.

JOHN M'IVER, Pursuer.—Lang. No. 136.
MALCOLM M'NEILL, Defender.—Fraser—Marshall.

June 28, 1873.
M'Iver v. M'Neill.

Reparation—Process—Issues—Slander—Veritas.—A visitor at a hotel made an entry in the visitors' book to the effect that he had visited most of the hotels in Scotland, but that he had nowhere "encountered so much drinking or so much squalid untidiness and dirt."

In an action of damages brought by the hotel-keeper against the writer the latter pleaded veritas. In adjusting issues, held that while the pursuer was entitled to the issue, whether the entry falsely, maliciously, and calumniously, represented that the pursuer kept his hotel in a state of squalid untidiness and dirt, and permitted persons to drink therein to excess, all to such a degree as to distinguish it in these respects from most of the hotels in Scotland, and to cause discomfort and annoyance to visitors to and residents in the hotel, the defender did not require to put in his counter issue more than whether on or about the date of the entry there was an excessive amount of drinking in the hotel, and whether the hotel on said days was in a state of much squalid untidiness and filth.

---

[1] Helsham v. Blackwood, 20 L. J. 187 (C. P.); Torrens v. Waddell, December 12, 1868, ante, vol. vii. 243.

[2] Chitty jr. on Pleading, p. 710, and case of Morrison v. Harman, 3 Bing. N.C. 759, there cited.

No. 136.

June 28, 1873. M'Iver v. M'Neill.

1st Division. Ld. Ormidale. B.

Mr M'Neill, a visiting officer of the Board of Supervision, came on 6th July 1871, along with his wife and sister-in-law, to the Dunvegan Hotel, Dunvegan, Skye, of which M'Iver was the lessee. After spending the night there they left after breakfast on the 7th July, but before departing Mr M'Neill made the following entry in the visitors' book kept in the hotel:—"July 7th, 1871.—I have been in many—indeed, in most—hotels in Scotland, but nowhere have I encountered so much drinking or so much squalid untidiness and dirt. (Signed) Malcolm M'Neill."

M'Iver raised an action of damages against Mr M'Neill, concluding for £500. He averred;—"By said entry the defender falsely, calumniously, and maliciously represented and insinuated that the pursuer, as keeper of the hotel, permitted persons to drink in his hotel to such a degree as to annoy and inconvenience the visitors and residents in the hotel; that the pursuer kept his hotel in such a state of untidiness and dirt as to distinguish it in these respects from most of the hotels in Scotland; that by keeping his hotel in this state the pursuer caused annoyance and discomfort to the visitors to the hotel, and that the degree of untidiness and dirt in the pursuer's hotel was such as to merit the epithet 'squalid.'"

The defender averred that he made the statements contained in the visiting book, which was brought into his room for his remarks, without malice, and believing them to be true, and that they were true.

The pursuer pleaded;—(1) The representations or insinuations contained in the entry regarding the pursuer being false, malicious, and calumnious, and the defender having written the entry and published it to the customers of the pursuer and the public by inserting it in the visitors' book, he was liable to the pursuer in reparation, as concluded for. (2) The pursuer having suffered in his business, reputation, and feelings in consequence of the entry, he was entitled to reparation therefor from the defender, he being the writer thereof, as concluded for.

The defender pleaded;—(1) the statement made by the defender in the pursuer's book not being libellous, but, on the contary, legitimate criticism, the defender was not liable in damages;—and, separatim, the words used were not fairly susceptible of being understood as averred. (2) The defender was privileged to express an opinion in the visiting book in regard to the matters contained in the entry which he made therein; and having made such entry, believing the statement to be true and without malice, he was not liable in damages, even although it be proved that his opinion was erroneous. (3) The statements contained in said entry being true in fact, the defender ought to be assoilzied.

The pursuer proposed the following issue:—"It being admitted that, on or about the 6th or 7th days of July 1871 an entry in the terms set out in the annexed schedule was made by the defender in the visitors' book, kept in the hotel kept by the pursuer at Dunvegan in Skye: Whether the said entry falsely, maliciously, and calumniously represents that the pursuer kept his said hotel in a state of squalid untidiness and dirt, and permitted persons to drink therein to excess, all to such a degree as to distinguish it in these respects from most of the hotels in Scotland, and to cause discomfort and annoyance to the visitors to and residents in the said hotel, to the loss, injury, and damage of the pursuer? Damages laid at £500."

The defender proposed the following counter issue:—"Whether, on or about 6th or 7th July 1871, there were persons in a state of intoxication in the hotel kept by the pursuer at Dunvegan aforesaid; and whether the said hotel itself, on said days, was in a state of squalid untidiness and dirt?"

The Lord Ordinary (June 17, 1873), "approved of the issue; and apinted it to be the issue for trial of the cause, and dissallowed the unter issue for the defender.* No. 136.

June 28, 1873.
M'Iver v. M'Neill.

The defender reclaimed, and argued;—There was nothing libellous in the ry complained of, and no issue should be allowed at all. It was fair icism; and the defender had been invited to write his opinion of the el in the book. Moreover, the book was the property of the landlord, d if anything in it offended him he could cut it out. In any view an issue were allowed the defender was entitled to a counter issue ch as he proposed.[1]

Argued for the pursuer;—The words used were truly libellous. The de- der pleaded veritas, and if he got a counter issue at all it must be a per issue of veritas. The real sting of the libel lay in the defender inguishing the hotel from most hotels in Scotland; that must be in the unter issue.

At advising,—

Lord President.—No doubt there is a certain sting in the statement made by defender that his large experience of hotels in Scotland enabled him to pare this one unfavourably with all others he had seen. But if the putting that into the issue of justification were to compel the defender to prove the te of most of the hotels in Scotland it would be putting upon him a burden ich it would be impossible to discharge. If it is not inserted for that pur- e then it is of no use at all, because it is not to be supposed that all hotels dirty, and that excessive drinking takes place in all. The obvious object of entry in the visitors' book is to denounce the hotel as one in which there is essive drinking and squalid untidiness and dirt, and if that is in the unter issue it fully meets the libel. It is quite competent for the pursuer to in issue, as he has done, that the defender's entry draws a distinction between hotel and most others in Scotland. But this is just one of those cases where is not necessary to repeat every word of the libel in a counter issue of tification.

The other Judges concurred.

This was the counter issue as adjusted by the Court:—"Whether, on about 6th or 7th July 1871, there was an excessive amount of drink- g in the hotel kept by the pursuer at Dunvegan foresaid; and whether he said hotel itself, on said days, was in a state of much squalid untidi- ss and dirt?"

The following interlocutor was pronounced:—"Recall the interlocutor: Approve of the issues as now finally adjusted, No. 10 of process, and appoint them to be the issues for the trial of the cause, and remit to the Lord Ordinary, reserving expenses."

Drummond & Mackenzie, S.S.C.—M'Neill & Sime, W.S.—Agents.

---

* "Note.—The Lord Ordinary is very clear that if the pursuer did not aver malice against the defender, and undertake to establish it, his action would not be maintainable at all. But with malice charged, and inserted in the issue as it has been, the Lord Ordinary is of opinion that the case must go to a jury. Whether, ultimately, the pursuer or the defender is to prevail is a question into which the Court cannot enter at present.

"The defender did not object to the terms of the pursuer's issue, No. 7 of process, as ultimately adjusted. His objection was to any issue being allowed at all, and the defender proposed, if the pursuer was to have his issue sustained, to take the counter issue, No. 8 of process. But the Lord Ordinary has found himself unable to sustain that issue, for the reason that it does not meet or come up to the pursuer's issue."

[1] Kennedy v. Baillie, Dec. 5, 1855, 18 D. 138; Carmichael v. Cowan, Dec. 19, 1862, ante, vol. i. 204; Broomfield v. Greig, March 10, 1868, ante, vol. vi. 663; Hamilton v. Anderson (H. of L.), June 18, 1858, 3 Macq. 363.

whole estate, and should hold one-half thereof subject to the life vivor for behoof of the relatives of the first deceaser. The spouse power to alter the deed during their joint lives, and the wife dec visions in her favour to be in full of her legal claims. Held that was not revocable by the surviving husband, and that the right of the wife vested in them at her death.

2d Division. 1. WILLIAM KERR, slater in Houston, and Janet Brown or K executed on 20th February 1845 a mutual trust-dispositio ment, whereby they disponed to trustees therein named th perty, heritable and moveable, which should belong to them them at the time of the death of the first deceaser. The which the trust-deed was granted were as follows:—"First, fo all the just and lawful debts of us, the said spouses, due at the first deceaser of us: Second, at the death of the first de our said trustees shall and are hereby required to take an our or either of our whole estates, heritable and moveable, bef which shall be divided into two equal halves or shares, one share of which shall belong to the survivor of us in fee, survivor of us shall also be entitled to the liferent of the oth or share thereof, and our said trustees shall hold the said half or share of said whole estates subject to the said liferent in favour of the survivor of us, for behoof of the relatives aftermentioned of the first deceaser of us: Third, at the survivor of us our said trustees shall convey and distribute equal one-half of said whole estates to the relatives of William Kerr, and the other just and equal half of the said heritable and moveable, shall be disponed and conveyed among the relatives of me, the said Janet Brown or Kerr." declared that the provisions contained in the trust-deed in f Kerr were in full of all claim of terce, half of moveables, other claim which she had or could pretend to through the husband. The parties reserved full power to alter the deed joint lives, but declared that so far as not altered it sho although found undelivered at the death of the first deceaser

Mrs Kerr died on 1st May 1850 without issue, and an inv whole estate of the spouses was taken by the trustees. W

No. 137.
June 28, 1873.
Kerr v. Ure, &c.

pectively it appeared that Anne Kerr, the first party, was the only son entitled to claim the provisions made in the trust-deed as to illiam Kerr's half of the estate.

The parties to whom Mrs Kerr's half of the estate was destined in the st-deed were represented by the second parties to the case if the pro-ions did not vest till the death of William Kerr, and by the second and rth parties if they vested on the death of Mrs Kerr.

The third party, Ann Kerr, claimed in virtue of a gratuitous disposi-n of a house, granted to her by William Kerr a few months before his ith.

The following questions were submitted for the opinion and judgment of e Court:—"(1) Whether the mutual trust-disposition and settlement ecuted by William Kerr and Janet Brown or Kerr was revocable by e survivor of the spouses, and if so, to what extent? (2) Whether if the id trust-deed was revocable it was revoked by the said William Kerr whole or in part, and if in part, what part? (3) In the event of its ing held that the said trust-deed was irrevocable quoad Mrs Janet own or Kerr's half are the parties to whom the said half is destined titled to the whole estate left by the said William Kerr, or if not, to hat part of it? (4) Whether the provisions in favour of the parties to hom Janet Brown or Kerr's share was destined by the said trust-deed ated in them on the death of the said Janet Brown or Kerr? or, whether ting was postponed till the death of the said William Kerr? (5) On e assumption of the said trust-deed being wholly irrevocable, does the atuitous disposition granted by the said William Kerr in favour of the ird party fall to be set aside as having been granted in prejudice of the ghts of the other parties hereto, or any of them, under the said trust-ed?"

Argued for the second and fourth parties;—The deed was not revocable, cause (1) a provision was made under it for the wife, who in considera-on thereof gave up her jus relictæ and terce;[1] (2) In the deed power of vocation was reserved only during the joint lives of the spouses, and it as there declared that so far as not altered the deed should be valid hough found undelivered at the death of the first deceaser; (3) Third arties had an interest in the deed, and their interest emerged on the eath of the predeceaser. Even if the deed were revocable, the only evocation which could be pointed to was the spending by Mr Kerr f more than half the estate. If that were revocation then it was nly as to his own half, and the relatives of Mrs Kerr were entitled to he whole of the estate which was left in payment of Mrs Kerr's share f the estate quoad which there was no revocation. In this view it as ultra vires of Mr Kerr to grant the gratuitous disposition to Ann Kerr.

Argued for the first and third parties;—The deed was a donation be-ween spouses, and was therefore revocable. The giving up by the wife f the legal claims which she might have on the death of her husband id not bar revocation, because these were rights which she might never e in a position to claim. Then Mrs Kerr having brought her husband no ocher, the deed was gratuitous, and the husband had power to revoke.[2]

[1] Hepburn v. Brown, 2 Dow's App. 342; Anderson v. Garroway, Jan. 27, 837, 15 S. 455; Rust v. Smith, Jan. 14, 1865, ante, vol. iii., 378; Jardine . Currie, June 17, 1830, 9 S. 957; Kidd v. Kidds, Dec. 10, 1863, ante, vol. ., 226.

[2] 1 Fraser (Personal and Domestic Relations), 479; 1 M'Laren (Wills and c.), 254; Steven v. Dunlop, Feb. 1, 1809, F.C.

No. 137.

June 28, 1873.
Kerr v. Ure, &c.

Again, if the deed was revocable, it was revoked (1) by the husband holding the whole estate himself after the wife's death, and (2) by his disposition to his neice, Ann Kerr, quoad the subject of that disposition.

At advising,—

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—The questions in this case arise on the terms of a trust-disposition executed by William Kerr and his wife on 20th February 1845. These questions are, first, Whether this deed was revocable by the survivor of the spouses? secondly, Whether, if the deed was revocable, it was revoked by the husband? and thirdly, Whether a certain conveyance made by the husband after the death of the wife stands good? Lastly, a question is raised as regards vesting.

I am of opinion that the trust-deed was not revocable by the survivor, and I shall shortly state the grounds on which I have arrived at this result. The deed is in some respects peculiar. It is a postnuptial settlement, there having been no antenuptial contract between the parties. We are told in the special case that part of the property belonging to the spouses was the result of the industry of the wife. The two spouses conveyed by this deed the whole property then belonging to them, or which should belong to them at the death of the first deceaser, to trustees. The purposes of the trust were—"First, for payment of all the just and lawful debts of us, the said spouses, due at the death of the first deceaser of us: Second, at the death of the first deceaser of us our said trustees shall and are hereby required to take an inventory of our or either of our whole estates, heritable and moveable, before conveyed, which shall be divided into two equal halves or shares, one equal half or share of which shall belong to the survivor of us in fee, and the said survivor of us shall also be entitled to the liferent of the other equal half or share thereof, and our said trustees shall hold the said other equal half or share of said whole estates, subject to the said liferent of the same in favour of the survivor of us, for behoof of the relatives and others artermentioned of the first deceaser of us: Third, at the death of the survivor of us our said trustees shall convey and distribute the just and equal one-half of said whole estates to the relatives of me, the said William Kerr; and the other just and equal half of the said whole estates, heritable and moveable, shall be disponed and conveyed and divided among the relatives of me, the said Janet Brown or Kerr." The deed goes on to make certain bequests to the relatives of the husband and wife. It reserves full power to alter these presents during their joint lives; the wife declares the provisions in her favour to be in full of her legal claims; lastly, there is a precept of sasine for infefting the trustees in the heritable subjects conveyed. The deed professes to be a mutual deed, and I think that this is its true character. In the first place, considering that there was no antenuptial contract, and that the wife renounced her legal rights, was it more than a reasonable provision for her? She gets a liferent of the joint property of the spouses if she survives her husband. This does not appear to me to be excessive; and the mortis causa provisions to her relatives are certainly not so excessive as to raise a presumption that this part of the deed was a donation on the husband's part. We have been referred to cases in which it was held that mere renunciation by the wife of her legal rights will not necessarily make a deed of this kind remunerative. But here there are other elements. The wife makes over her hope of any succession which might accrue to her: this was regarded by Lord Curriehill in the case of Kidd as an important element. Again, she had contributed by her industry to the property which was the subject of the mutual settlement. Looking to the current of authorities, and particularly to the case of Kidd, I should have been of opinion that even if the deed had stopped here it would have required the joint consent of both parties to revoke the deed. But, further, I hold that it must be considered to have been delivered and acted upon at the death of the first deceaser. The trustees were directed to make an inventory of the whole property of the spouses, and they did so. The effect of this was to make revocation by the husband impossible. In short, taking the inventory constituted the amount of that inventory, to the extent of one-half, a debt due by the husband to the trust-estate. There was a

No. 137.

June 28, 1878.

Kerr v. Ure, &c.

ept of sasine on which the trustees might have, and probably were bound to taken infeftment. And in this question of succession, which is not one creditors, I think we must take the case as if the trustees had taken infeft-
t. If so, the right of the husband would have resolved into a jus crediti for rovisions to which he was entitled under the mutual settlement. It may question whether it was intended that the trustees should take personal pos-n of the property. Probably they did right in allowing the husband to rein possession. But be that as it may it makes no difference in the rights rties. From the wife's death the husband became a debtor to the amount e-half of the inventory.

e next question is about the conveyance of a part of the property to Ann
, the party of the third part. The result has been that the husband has one-half of the joint estate, and the loss must therefore fall upon his share.
ubject conveyed by him must, if required, be brought back to the wife's f the estate. Whether this would be the case if the property had been a ic subject, of which the market value had depreciated in the husband's s, I give no opinion. What he has actually spent must plainly be imputed s share.

n the second question, I think it very doubtful whether, supposing a power vocation in the husband, he did anything amounting to revocation. But on it is unnecessary to express an opinion.

n the question of vesting we have as yet heard no argument.

he other Judges concurred.

ounsel was then heard on the question of vesting.
t advising,—

ORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—We must take the case as if the trustees had at the
's death divided the estate into two equal parts as directed by the deed.
one-half became the absolute property of the husband. The fee of the other was held by the trustees, subject to the husband's liferent, for the relatives e wife specifically mentioned in the deed. The first alternative of the fourth tion accordingly falls to be answered in the affirmative.

ORD COWAN and LORD NEAVES concurred.

ORD BENHOLME.—I am not inclined to dissent from your Lordships. The doubt which I had was that if we decided that the wife's half vested at her h we must then decide whether the interest which the wife's relatives took heritable or moveable, in order to determine the persons who are now end to it. I am disposed to consider that the interest in question was a jus iti in a mixed subject, and therefore moveable.

THIS interlocutor was pronounced:—"The Lords, having heard counsel on the special case, are of opinion, and find (1) that the mutual trust-disposition and settlement of Mr and Mrs Kerr was not revocable by the survivor of the spouses: (2) That the parties to whom Mrs Kerr's half of the trust-estate is destined are, to the extent of one-half the amount of the inventory, No. 8 of process, entitled to the same, but to that extent only, and that the same vested in them on the death of Mrs Kerr; and (3) That the gratuitous disposition granted by William Kerr in favour of the third party falls to be set aside so far as may be required to make up one-half of the inventory: Find the parties to the special case entitled to payment of their expenses out of the trust-funds, and remit," &c.

M'EWEN & CARMENT, W.S., Agents for all the Parties.

No. 138.

June 28, 1873.
Jex-Blake v. Senatus of University of Edinburgh.

SOPHIA LOUISA JEX-BLAKE AND OTHERS, Pursuers.—Lord-Adv. Young—Sol.-Gen. Clark—Fraser—M'Laren.

THE SENATUS ACADEMICUS OF THE UNIVERSITY OF EDINBURGH, Defenders.—Watson—Lancaster.

The Right Hon. JOHN INGLIS, Chancellor of the University of Edinburgh, Defender.

University—Right of Women to Study and Graduate—Universities (Scotland) Act, 1858 (21 and 22 Vict. c. 83), sec. 12, sub-sec. 2—Process—Reduction—Writ—Contemporaneous Exposition.—The University or College of Edinburgh was founded in the sixteenth century. From the date of its foundation till 1869 it was carried on as an institution for the education of male students only. In that year, in consequence of an application made for the first time by women for admission as students, the governing bodies, professing to exercise statutory powers which they possessed "to effect improvements in the internal arrangements of the University," made the following "regulations":—

(1) Women shall be admitted to the study of medicine in the University; (2) the instruction of women for the profession of medicine shall be conducted in separate classes, confined entirely to women; (3) the professors of the Faculty of Medicine shall for this purpose be permitted to have separate classes for women; (6) all women attending such classes shall be subject to all the regulations now or at any future time in force in the University as to the matriculation of students, their attendance on classes, examination, or otherwise.

Certain women having subsequently entered upon a course of medical studies at the University, by matriculation and attendance at certain classes, and found that, in consequence of certain professors refusing to teach separate classes, they could not complete the course prescribed by the University for medical degrees, and without which they could not practise the medical profession, raised an action against the Senatus Academicus of the University, concluding for declarator (1) that the pursuers were entitled to attend any of the classes at the University; (2) that they were entitled to receive the instruction necessary for graduation in medicine and to obtain degrees, and (3) that the Senatus should be ordained to make the regulations necessary to give effect to these rights.

Held (diss. Lord Justice-Clerk, Lords Deas, Ardmillan, Jerviswoode, and Gifford, decl. Lord President) that in respect of the language of the deeds of foundation and the contemporaneous interpretation by usage, female students were not entitled to study or to graduate in the University of Edinburgh, and that the regulations of 1869 were ultra vires of the University Court; and (2) (diss. Lord Justice-Clerk and Lord Gifford) that a reduction of the regulations was unnecessary.

Opinion (per Lords Deas, Ardmillan, Jerviswoode, and Gifford) that although through disuse ladies had lost their claim to be admitted to the University as of right, the regulations of 1869 were within the competency of the University authorities, and gave the pursuers a claim not only to instruction, but to graduation.

Opinion (per Lord Justice-Clerk), that the question being one of purely academical administration, and the action having been raised to enforce the duty of the Senatus Academicus under the existing constitution of the University, the regulations of 10th November 1869, which had been regularly passed, must, as between the parties to this action, be assumed to be part of the de facto law of the University, on which the pursuers were entitled to rely, and which the defenders were bound to obey until they were rescinded, or until the question of their legality was raised and determined with the superior University authorities who passed them, and were the proper parties to defend them; and therefore that the defence of the regulations of 1869 being ultra vires of the University Court, was irrelevant as against the present pursuers, and inconsistent with the academical position of the defenders. Further, that under the regulations of 1869 the pursuers could not insist upon University instruction, but that if they obtained University instruction, and proved themselves duly qualified, they were entitled to degrees.

No. 138.

June 28, 1873.

Jex-Blake v. Senatus of University of Edinburgh.

Opinion (per Lords Cowan, Neaves, and Ormidale), that in any view, inasmuch as the Senatus had no power to do what was craved in the petitory conclusions, it would be contrary to the practice of the Court to pronounce a declaratory decree which could have no practical effect.

Whole Court. Lord Gifford.

THIS action was raised in the following circumstances :—On 21st June 1869 Miss Jex-Blake made an application to the Senatus Academicus of the University of Edinburgh, stating that she and other ladies had a desire to enter upon medical study in the University, and requesting that they would recommend to the University Court "to sanction the matriculation of women as medical students, and their admission to the usual examinations, on the understanding that separate classes be formed for their instruction by the medical professors of the University, or by recognised extra-academical lecturers."

This application was referred to the Medical Faculty, and on 2d July the report of the Medical Faculty was presented and agreed to by the Senatus. That report recommended the admission of women to the study of medicine in the University on certain conditions, which were, to a certain extent, embodied in the regulations afterwards enacted by the University Court. The resolution of the Senatus Academicus was reported to the University Court on 5th July, and was remitted to a committee of that body for consideration. On 23d July that committee reported that the matter should be proceeded with under section XII. 2 of the Universities Act, "as an improvement in the internal arrangements of the University." In terms of that enactment the Court directed the resolutions of the Medical Faculty to be laid before the General Council of the University for their consideration at their next meeting. The General Council, at their meeting on 29th October, approved "of the resolution of the University Court respecting the admission of women to the study of medicine in the University of Edinburgh." On the 10th November 1869 the University Court resolved as follows :—"1. Women shall be admitted to the study of medicine in the University. 2. The instruction of women for the profession of medicine shall be conducted in separate classes, confined entirely to women. 3. The professors of the Faculty of Medicine shall, for this purpose, be permitted to have separate classes for women. 4. Women not intending to study medicine professionally may be admitted to such of these classes, or to such part of the courses of instruction given in such classes, as the University Court may from time to time think fit and approve. 5. The fee for the full course of instruction in such classes shall be four guineas; but in the event of the number of students proposing to attend any such class being too small to provide a reasonable remuneration at that rate, it shall be in the power of the professor to make arrangements for a higher fee, subject to the usual sanction of the University Court. 6. All women attending such classes shall be subject to all the regulations now or at any future time in force in the University as to the matriculation of students, their attendance on classes, examination, or otherwise. 7. The above regulations shall take effect as from the commencement of session 1869-70."

These regulations were approved by the Chancellor on 12th November 1869, and were thereafter published in the official calendar.

In October 1869 certain of the pursuers were admitted to the preliminary examination in Arts prescribed for medical students. Having passed and received certificates, they, after the issuing of the above quoted regulations, matriculated, and paid the usual fees. Their tickets declared them "Cives Academiæ Edinensis." The other pursuers matriculated in successive sessions. They all attended classes, either in the University or extra-mural school sanctioned by the ordinary University regulations; but about October 1871 it was ascertained that the professors whose classes it was necessary to attend to complete the curriculum were not prepared to conduct separate classes for ladies. Miss Jex-Blake thereupon applied to the Senatus; but they having declined, by a majority, to take any measures by which the pursuers might be enabled to complete their education, on 21st November 1871 she applied to the University Court. On 8th January 1872 the University Court made the following answer:—"The University Court have had under consideration the letters of Miss Jex-Blake and Miss Louisa Stevenson, of 21st November 1871, and other relative documents laid before them, on behalf of the women who have been admitted, by the regulations of the Court of November 10, 1869, to study medicine in the University. In these it is stated that certain professors of the Faculty of Medicine have declined to give separate courses of instruction to women, and the Court are asked either (1) To extend, in the case of female students, the privilege granted, by ordinance of the Universities Commissioners, to lecturers, not being professors in a University, of qualifying for graduation by their lectures, which privilege is now restricted to four of the prescribed subjects of study; or (2) To authorise the appointment of special lecturers to give, in the University, qualifying courses of instruction in place of those professors who decline to do so; or (3) To ordain that the professors referred to shall themselves give the necessary course of instruction to women. The second course suggested it is not in the power of the Court or other University authorities, singly or jointly, to adopt. The third course is equally beyond the power of the Court. The Act of 1858 vests in the Court plenary powers to deal with any professor who shall fail to discharge his duties. But no professor can be compelled to give courses of instruction other than those which, by the use and wont of the University, it has been the duty of the holders of his chair to deliver. The first of the proposed measures would imply an alteration in one of the ordinances for graduation in medicine. Such alteration can be made by the University Court only, with the consent, expressed in writing, of the Chancellor, and with the approval of Her Majesty in Council. But to alter, in favour of female students, rules laid down for the regulation of graduation in medicine would imply an assumption on the part of the Court that the University of Edinburgh has the power of granting degrees to women. It seems to the Court impossible for them to assume the existence of a power which is questioned in many quarters, and which is both affirmed and denied by eminent counsel. So long as these doubts remain, it would, in the opinion of the Court, be premature to consider the expediency of taking steps to obtain, in favour of female students, an alteration of an ordinance which may be held not to apply to women. Though the Court are unable to comply with any of the specific requests referred to they are at the same time desirous to remove, so far as possible, any present obstacle in the way of a complete medical education being given to women, provided always that medical instruction to women be imparted in strictly separate classes. The Court are of opinion that the question under reference has been complicated by the introduction of the subject of graduation, which is not essential to the completion of a medical or other education. The University of London, which has a special charter for the examination of women, does not confer degrees upon women, but only grants them 'certificates of proficiency.' If the applicants in the present case would be content to seek the examination of women by the University for certificates of proficiency in medicine, instead of for the University degrees, the Court believe that arrangements for accomplishing this object would fall within the scope of the powers given to them by section 12 of the Universities (Scotland) Act. The Court would be willing to consider any such arrangements which might be submitted to them."

No. 138.

June 28, 1873. Jex-Blake v. Senatus of University of Edinburgh.

In these circumstances Miss Jex-Blake and nine other ladies raised this action against the Senatus and Chancellor, concluding that "it ought and should be found and declared, by decree of the Lords of our Council and Session, (1) that the pursuers are entitled to attend the classes of any of the professors of the University of Edinburgh, and to receive instruction from the professors in said University, upon making due payment of all fees exigible from students at the University for said instruction; (2) that the pursuers are entitled to receive such instruction in the University as is required to qualify for graduation in medicine; (3) that, on compliance with the regulations of the University as to attendance on classes and otherwise, preliminary to examination for degrees, the pursuers are entitled to proceed to the examination for degrees in manner prescribed by the regulations of the University; (4) that the defenders, the Senatus Academicus, are bound to provide such instruction as aforesaid to the pursuers, and thereafter to admit them to examination as candidates for medical degrees, and, on their being found qualified, to recommend them to the Chancellor of the University for having such degrees conferred upon them; (5) that the defender, the said Right Honourable John Inglis, as Chancellor of the said University, is bound, upon such recommendation being made by the Senatus Academicus, to confer such a degree upon any of the pursuers found qualified and so recommended: And the defenders constituting the said Senatus Academicus ought and should be decerned and ordained to make regulations whereby the pursuers shall receive instruction in the University of Edinburgh as is required to qualify for graduation in medicine, and, in particular, to direct and appoint the various professors whose duty it is to give instruction in medicine to permit the attendance of the pursuers upon their classes along with male students; or otherwise to direct and order the various professors whose duty it is to give instruction in medicine to teach the pursuers, and any other women who may constitute themselves into a class separate and apart from male students, the pursuers always making payment of the proper fees for matriculation and to the professors for such instruction as aforesaid; and the defenders constituting the said Senatus Academicus ought to be decerned and ordained to admit the pursuers to examination as candidates for the medical degrees, and, on their being found qualified, to recommend them to the Chancellor of the University for having such degrees conferred upon them; and the defender, the said Right Honourable John Inglis, as Chancellor of the University, ought to be decerned and ordained, by decree foresaid, upon receiving such recommendation from the Senatus Academicus, to confer degrees upon the pursuers."

The pursuers stated;—(Cond. 2.) "About the year 1561 the Town Council, as representing the community, had formed the resolution to found a college within the city, and in that year they 'thocht gude' and ordained that certain rents previously paid to Popish priests and others should thereafter be applied to more profitable and godly uses, and, inter alia, 'to collegis for leirnyng and vpbringing of ye youth and sic other godlie wurkis.' In 1579 an Act of Council was passed ordaining certain parties 'to convene themselves in the ministeris luging the morn, be four houris afternone, for taking of ordour anentis the founding of ane universitie.'" (Cond. 3.) "In pursuance of this object the Town Council applied to Queen Mary and James VI., from whom they obtained grants of a variety of subjects for the support of schools. They also received various donations and legacies from private individuals for the same object." (Cond. 4.) "In 1582 King James VI. granted a charter to the provost, bailies, council, and community of Edinburgh, whereby he confirmed a previous charter in their favour, granted by Queen Mary in 1566, and made over to them of new the whole subjects thereby conveyed. In this charter of the king there is the following clause:—'Ac quia intra privilegia et libertatem dicti nostri burgi nunc diversa extant vasta et spatiosa loca quæ præposito, præbendariis, sacerdotibus et fratribus tempore præterito pertinuerunt, maxime apta et commoda pro constructione domorum et ædificiorum ubi professores bonarum scientiarum et literarum ac studentes earundem remanere et suam diuturnam exercitationem habere poterint; ultra et præter alia loca convenientia pro hospitalitate. Ideo nos enixe cupientes ut in honorem Dei et commune bonum nostri regni literatura indies augeatur; volumus et concedimus quod licebit præfatis præposito, consulibus et eorum successoribus, ædificare et reparare sufficientes domos et loca pro receptione habitatione et tractatione professorum, scholarum grammaticalium humanitatis et linguarum, philosophiæ, theologiæ, medicinæ, et jurium, aut quarumcunque aliarium liberalium scientiarum, quod declaramus nullam fore rapturam prædictæ mortificationis; ac etiam præfati præpositus, ballivi et consules ac eorum successores, cum avisamento, tamen eorum ministrorum pro perpetuo in posterum plenam habeant libertatem personas ad dictas professiones edocendas, maxime idoneas uti magis convenienter poterint eligendi cum potestate imponendi et removendi ipsos sicuti expediverit. Ac inhibendo omnibus aliis, ne dictas scientias intra dicti nostri burgi libertatem profiteantur aut doceant, nisi per præfatos præpositum, ballivos et consules, eorumque successores admissi fuerunt.'" (Cond. 5.) "The foresaid grants were confirmed by a charter of King James, commonly called the Golden Charter, passed in 1603. That was in turn confirmed by a charter in 1636 by Charles I. Both charters were afterwards ratified by Parliament." (Cond. 6.) "On 14th August 1626 there was passed a parliamentary ratification of 'diverse infeftments granted to the town of Edinburgh for sustentation of college ministeris and hospitalis.' It proceeds on a narrative of the license and liberty granted to the magistrates and council to erect a college, 'qlk colledge,' it is said, 'has continuellie sensyne flourishit now be the space of thrittie-five yeiris;' of the fact that 'the provost, baillies, counsell, and communitie of the burgh of Edinburgh had bestowit gryit charges and expenses in erectioun of the said college, building of houses, and had voted gryit soumes of money for intertenement of professores of humanitie,' and of the various grants to the magistrates and council therein mentioned. Upon that narrative his Majesty and the Estates of Parliament ratified the whole of these grants and charters, and, farther, ordained 'the said colledge in all time to cum to be callit King James' Colledge; and als, with advyse of the saidis estaitties, hes of new again gevin, grantit, and disponit to them, and their successoures, in favoures of the said burgh of Edinburgh, patrone of the said colledge, and of the said colledge, and of the rectors, regentis, bursaries, and studentis within the samin, all liberties, fredoms, immunities, and privilegis appertening to ane free colledge, and that in als ample forme and lairge manner as ane colledge hes or bruikes within this His Majestie's realme; and gif neid beis, ordaines ane new charter to be expede under His Hienes' gryit seale, for erecting of the said colledge, with all liberties, priviledges, and immunities qlk any colledge within this realme bruikes, joises, or to the samen is knawn to appertene.'"

No. 138.

June 28, 1873.
Jex-Blake v. Senatus of University of Edinburgh.

(Cond. 9.) "The University of Glasgow was founded by a Papal bull of Pope Nicholas V. in the year 1450, which was obtained at the suit of

L., King of Scots. In this bull there was conferred on the Uni-f Glasgow, its doctors, masters, and students, all privileges enjoyed ?ope's city of Bologna. After a narrative of the advantages to and to Scotland of erecting a University in that city, the bull thus :—'Erigimus ac statuimus et etiam ordinamus in ipsa civitate de udium cujus modi perpetuis futuris temporibus vigeat tam in a ac jure canonico et civili, quam in artibus et quavis alia licita quodque doctores, magistri, legentes et studentes ibidem omnibus is priviligiis, libertatibus honoribus, exemptionibus immunitatibus m apostolicam vel alias quomodolibet magistris, doctoribus et ous in studio nostre civitatis Bononiensis concessis gaudeant et ic venerabilis frater noster Willelmus Episcopus Glasguensis, ac es sui, qui pro tempore fuerint Glasguensis (Epi.) sint Rectoris, ii nuncupati, qui habeant supra doctores magistros et scolares, ac niversitate studii hujusmodi similem facultatem et potestatem, bet Rector scholarum dicti studii Bononiensis.'—(Theiner Vetera ita, p. 382.) At the University of Bologna women were allowed ite, and several women filled professorial chairs at that University.
uers mention the following among others who were admitted to on at Bologna, both before and after the Pope's bull, and many of upied professorial chairs, viz.:—Bettisia Gozzadini was made laws in 1236, and lectured on that subject at Bologna, &c. . . .
uers farther aver that women have graduated and been elected as s in the following other Italian Universities, viz.,—Pavia, Ferrara a, at which University Elena Lucrezia Piscopia Cornaro graduated June 1678. Previous to her graduation she was offered a chair niversity, which she accepted after graduation; also in the fol-panish Universities, viz., Salamanca, Alcala, and Cordova; also in wing German Universities, viz., Heidelberg, Göttingen, Giessen, g, Halle, Marburg; also in the Dutch University of Utrecht, and wiss University of Zurich; also the following women received n Paris from the University of France, Emma Chenu," &c.

ursuers further set forth the applications made by them for admisie University, and the various proceedings which followed therenarrated, with the ultimate failure of the pursuers to obtain ities necessary to enable them to complete their course of study in degrees.

ursuers pleaded;—(1) According to the law and constitution of ersity of Edinburgh women are entitled, on payment of matriand professors' fees, to attend the classes of any professor as and are entitled to demand instruction from such professor, is bound to give to them. (2) According to the law and consti-f the University of Edinburgh women are entitled to obtain n medicine, on proving that they are qualified in point of attain-d knowledge for that distinction. And the Senatus Academicus, rovince it is to regulate the teaching and discipline of the Uni-re bound to provide instruction to them, to admit them to exaas candidates for medical degrees, and, on being found qualified, mend them to the Chancellor, in order that he may confer such pon them. (3) The pursuers having paid their matriculation e for one, some for two, some for three years, on the faith of mitted to continue their course of study with a view to a prond having gone on with this course of study by attendance on es of professors, and this with the knowledge and consent of the Academicus, the latter are now barred from pleading that women entitled to receive instruction at the University, or to obtain

No. 138.

June 28, 1873. Jex-Blake v. Senatus of University of Edinburgh.

medical degrees. (4) According to the laws by which Universities are governed, and apart from any special circumstances connected with the University of Edinburgh, women were entitled to demand and receive instruction from the professors in their ordinary classes, and also were entitled to graduate; and the University of Edinburgh being modelled on the constitution of such other Universities, and being subject to the same laws, women are entitled to all such privileges from the University of Edinburgh.

The Senatus averred;—(Stat. 1.) "The University of Edinburgh acquired the status of a University for the first time in 1858. Prior to that time it was merely a College or teaching body." (Stat. 2.) "The conferring of degrees is a privilege, not of a College, but of a University alone. The conferring of degrees by the College of Edinburgh was a usurpation of a right to which it was not legally entitled. No such power was conferred on it by any of its charters, or by the Act of 1621. The practice became legalised in respect of use and wont only." [In their answers to these articles the pursuers explained as follows:—"Denied that the University of Edinburgh acquired the status of a University for the first time in 1858. It has in public documents and histories been called, sometimes a University, and sometimes a College; and at the first conference of gentlemen, who met in Edinburgh for the purpose of founding it, their resolution declared that they had met anent the founding of 'ane Universitie.' Reference is made to the second article of the condescendence. Denied that the power of conferring degrees is competent only to a body called a University; and explained that that word is and has always been held convertible with collegium. It was applied to any understood class of persons, or to a public corporation, or to the members of a municipality, or to the members of a 'general study.' It was used to denote either the whole body of teachers and learners at any place, or the whole body of learners, or the whole body of teachers and learners, divided either by faculty, or by country, or by both together. In Papal bulls, and in charters of foreign Universities, the words collegium and universitas are interchangeably used, and bodies called collegia have conferred degrees as uniformly as bodies called Universities. In Scotland the two words and the two bodies have always been regarded the same. In the calendar issued by the defenders for the year 1872-73 they state 'that the University at Edinburgh was founded in 1582 by a royal charter granted by James the VIth,' and they exercised the power of graduation at the first possible period, viz., in August 1587, when forty-seven students, of the first who attended the institution, under the first Principal, Rollock, at its opening in 1583, were duly graduated masters of arts; and from that date down to the present time the University or College of Edinburgh has continued to grant degrees."] The Senatus further stated,—"In no one of the Universities of Great Britain have women at any time been admitted as students, or allowed to graduate. Recently the University of London resolved to admit women to examination, and to grant them certificates of proficiency, but without matriculating them, or admitting them to graduation. In order legally to effect even this change it was found necessary to obtain a supplemental charter, conferring upon the University express powers in addition to those contained in the original charter. The said supplemental charter and the original charter are referred to. The uniform practice of the University of Edinburgh has been in accordance with that of the other Universities of Great Britain. At no time since the foundation of the institution have women been received as students, or admitted to graduation." (Stat. 4.) "In none of the charters or other documents connected with the University of Edinburgh is there any mention or recognition of women as students or graduates. In the earlier charters language is used which does not admit of the distinction of gender being marked; but in later documents, when language which does admit of this is employed, such as the Acts of the Commission of Parliament of visiting colleges, of date 15th May 1695, and the various reports of the Royal Commissions specified in section 23 of the Universities (Scotland) Act, 1858, students of the male sex only are alluded to or recognised." (Stat. 8.) "From an early period in the history of the University it has been the custom to admit students to matriculation. This at first consisted in the student signing a declaration to the effect that he would be diligent in his studies and loyal to the University. No fee was originally paid at matriculation, but about the end of the 18th century a fee of 2s. 6d. was required. The fee was originally devoted to the maintenance of the library, to the use of which the student, in respect of his matriculation, became entitled. In the certificate given to the student he was described as 'academiae alumnus et bibliothecae civis.' The amount of the fee was raised, and the purposes to which it was devoted were extended, so as to include the payment of certain college officers, until the whole matter was the subject of consideration by the Town Council and Senatus in 1811, when the fee was fixed at 10s. In 1833 the sum was again raised by the Town Council to £1, and it was ordered that the payment should be for the use of the library, museum, and the services of certain college officers. At this time the phraseology of the ticket was altered from 'civis bibliothecae' to 'civis academiae,' but this alteration did not impart the acquisition by the students of any additional rights or privileges." (Stat. 11.) "The defenders, the Senatus Academicus, have no power to compel professors to admit the pursuers to their classes, or to teach them in separate classes. Neither before the Universities (Scotland) Act, 1858, nor since the passing of that Act, has the Senatus Academicus of Edinburgh possessed or even attempted to exercise any power to compel the obedience of the professors on such points, or to lay down and enforce any such regulations as the pursuers seek to have enforced. Nor has the Senatus any power to alter the regulations for graduation contained in the ordinances issued by the Commissioners under the Universities (Scotland) Act, 1858."

The Senatus pleaded;—(1) All parties not called. (2) The pursuers are not entitled to decree in terms of any of the conclusions of the summons directed against the defenders, the Senatus Academicus, in respect that the said defenders have no power, either by the use and wont of the University, or according to the provisions of the Universities (Scotland) Act, 1858, to make the regulations specified in these conclusions, or to perform any other of the duties therein sought to be imposed upon them. (3) The pursuers are not entitled to decree in terms of the first three declaratory conclusions of their summons, in respect that there are no conclusions in the summons whereby the said declaratory conclusions can be given effect to. (4) From the tenor of the statutes and ordinances which have been from time to time laid down with regard to the internal regulation of the University of Edinburgh, especially in the matter of graduation, and having regard to the use and wont of Edinburgh and other Universities, the University of Edinburgh must in law be held as devoted exclusively to the education of male students, and in which males only can claim, or can be invested with the full privileges of students. (5) The Senatus have no power to admit to the said privileges of students any persons who are disqualified according to the tenor of the said statutes and ordinances, and the said use and wont. (6) The resolutions of the Medical Faculty of 1st July 1869, and the regulations published in the Calendar, and quoted in condescendence 11, were not intended to confer, une 28, 1873. ex-Blake v. enatus of niversity of dinburgh.

No. 138.

and are not in law sufficient to confer, upon the pursuers the full privileges of students, to the effect of entitling them to insist, as matter of legal right, on being taught by the University professors, or on being admitted to graduation. (7) According to the use and wont of the University of Edinburgh the fact of being matriculated as a student does not confer a title to demand, as matter of legal right, the privileges of studentship, or the right to be taught by any professor, or to be admitted to graduation. (8) Separatim, and on the assumption that, according to their true construction, the said resolutions and regulations of the University Court, published in the "University Calendar" as aforesaid, must be held as conferring, inter alia, upon women a right to demand that they shall be taught in the University, and a right to graduate, to that extent the said resolutions and regulations were illegal and ultra vires, and the matriculation which took place in terms of, and in compliance with the said regulations, was illegal and void in law, and cannot be founded on as investing the pursuers with the privileges of students, to the effect of entitling them to insist upon instruction within the University, or upon being admitted to graduation.

The Chancellor stated;—"The defender has always been, and still is, willing and ready, as Chancellor of the University of Edinburgh, to confer degrees upon the pursuers, or any women duly recommended by the Senatus Academicus, upon its being ascertained, by decree of a competent Court, that they are entitled to demand admission as students, and to become graduates of the University."

The Chancellor pleaded;—(1) The conclusions of the action, in so far as directed against the defender, were unnecessary. (2) In any view, the action as against the defender ought to be sisted, in order to await the issue of the questions arising between the pursuers and the other defenders in the cause."

Professors Bennett, Masson, Calderwood, Lorimer, Charteris, and Hodgson lodged a minute in which they stated their desire that no opposition should be offered to the conclusions of the action, and disclaimed any responsibility for the defences lodged in name of the Senatus.

On 27th July 1872 the Lord Ordinary (Gifford) pronounced this interlocutor:—"Having heard parties' procurators, and having considered the closed record, statutes, charters, and writs founded on, and whole process, recalls the sist, repels the first plea in law stated for the defenders, the Senatus Academicus of the University of Edinburgh, that all parties are not called: Finds that the resolutions or regulations passed and enacted by the University Court of the University of Edinburgh, dated 10th November 1869, and approved of by the Chancellor of the said University of date 12th November 1869, form part of the regulations now in force in the University of Edinburgh, and must receive effect as such: Finds that according to the existing constitution and regulations of the said University of Edinburgh the pursuers are entitled to be admitted to the study of medicine in the said University, and that they are entitled to all the rights and privileges of lawful students in the said University, subject only to the conditions specified and contained in the said regulations of 12th November 1869: Finds that the pursuers, on completing the prescribed studies, and on compliance with all the existing regulations of the University preliminary to degrees, are entitled to proceed to examination for degrees in manner prescribed by the regulations of the University: Finds that the defenders, the Senatus Academicus of the said University, are bound, on the pursuers completing the prescribed studies, and complying with the said regulations, to admit the pursuers to examination as candidates for medical degrees; and on the pursuers being found qualified, to recommend them to the Chancellor of the University for having such degrees conferred upon them; and finds that the defender, the Right Honourable John Inglis, as Chancellor of the said University, is bound, upon such recommendation being made by the Senatus Academicus, to confer medical degrees upon any or upon all of the pursuers who are found qualified therefor, and recommended as aforesaid: And in terms of the above findings, and to the effect thereof, finds, decerns, and declares under the declaratory conclusions of the summons: Farther decerns and ordains the defenders, the Senatus Academicus, on the pursuers respectively completing the prescribed studies, and complying with the existing regulations of the University preliminary to degrees, to admit the pursuers to examination as candidates for medical degrees; and on the pursuers being found qualified, decerns and ordains the said Senatus Academicus to recommend the pursuers to the Chancellor of the said University for having such degrees conferred upon them, and decerns and ordains the defender, the said Right Honourable John Inglis, as Chancellor of the said University, on receiving the requisite recommendation from the Senatus Academicus, to confer upon the pursuers respectively the medical degrees for which they are recommended: Quoad ultra dismisses the remaining conclusions of the action, excepting the conclusion for expenses, and decerns: Finds the defenders, the said Senatus Academicus, liable to the pursuers in expenses, subject to modification, and, in the circumstances, modifies the same by deducting one-fourth from the taxed amount: Remits the account of said expenses, when lodged, to the Auditor of Court to tax the same, and to report, and reserves all questions of relief as between the minority and majority of the Senatus Academicus: Finds no other expenses due in the cause, and decerns." *

---

* "NOTE.—It is not easy to over-estimate the importance of the questions involved in the present action. The decision may affect, in various ways, not only the interests of the pursuers, and of all who are similarly situated, but also the future welfare of the University, and indirectly the well-being of the community at large who are interested in securing the services of thoroughly educated and accomplished medical practitioners.

"The Lord Ordinary has endeavoured to approach the consideration of the questions dispassionately, and free from all prejudices or prepossessions. He has also endeavoured to keep in view that his functions are merely judicial and not legislative, and that his duty is simply to declare and apply the law as it at present stands, and in no way to endeavour to amend it, however strong his convictions of what the law ought to be.

"The object of the present action may be shortly stated to be—first, to declare the right of the ten ladies, who are the pursuers of the action, to prosecute their studies as students at the University of Edinburgh, with a view to the profession of medicine; second, to declare their right, on finishing their studies and being found duly qualified, to obtain from the University, through its Senatus and Chancellor, the usual and customary medical degrees; and, third, and with a view to enforce these rights, to compel the Senatus to make arrangements for the complete instruction of the pursuers, and to do what is necessary for the examination of the pursuers, and for their reception as medical graduates of the University.

"The importance of the question to the present pursuers, and to all ladies who, like them, may contemplate the practice of medicine as a profession, lies in this, that by the provisions of the Medical Act of 1858 no one is entitled to be registered as a medical practitioner without possessing a medical degree from one or other of the Universities of the United Kingdom, or a license equivalent thereto from certain established medical bodies mentioned in the Act. A foreign or colonial degree is not available, and does not entitle to registration, unless the holder thereof has been in practice in Great Britain previous to October 1858.

No. 138.

June 28, 1873. Jex-Blake v. Senatus of University of Edinburgh.

The Senatus reclaimed.

After hearing counsel the Second Division ordered written cases to be laid before the whole Court.

Unless the pursuers, therefore, succeed in obtaining degrees, they will be practically excluded from the profession of medicine, for they are not in a position to demand licenses from any of the authorised medical bodies, and it can scarcely be expected that they will prosecute their medical studies merely in order to be hereafter classed along with empirics, herbalists, or medical botanists, or with those who, in common language, are denominated quacks. Without legal registration under the Medical Act of 1858 the pursuers would be denied all right to recover fees, they would be incapable of holding any medical appointment, and they would be subject to very serious penalties if they so much as attempted to assume the name or title of medical practitioners.

"It is a fact, whatever may be its effect in law, that no University in Great Britain has ever yet granted a medical degree to a lady. The medical register of Great Britain only contains the names of two female practitioners—Dr Elizabeth Blackwell and Dr Garrett Anderson. Dr Blackwell obtained her degree in America, and being in practice in Great Britain before 1858 she obtained registration in virtue of the exception in the Act. Dr Garrett Anderson obtained a license from the Apothecaries Hall, London, and is registered as such; but since her admission regulations have been made which prevent any other lady from hereafter obtaining a license from the Apothecaries Hall. Accordingly, the course pursued by Dr Blackwell and Dr Anderson is not open to any of the pursuers, and their only hope of being allowed to practise medicine in Great Britain rests upon their being able to obtain a degree from one or other of the Universities.

"Practically, therefore, the questions are now raised for the first time—Can a lady obtain a medical degree? and, is any lady to be allowed to practise medicine in Great Britain?

"The present action has, of course, only reference to the University of Edinburgh, and the pursuers have the advantage of certain peculiarities in the existing constitution and regulations of that University. At the same time, however, the form of the action is such that its scope is somewhat limited, and various large questions are excluded from the consideration of the Court.

"For example—and this is a peculiarity in the action which must be carefully attended to—the only parties called as defenders are—(1) the Senatus Academicus of the University, and the professors as individual members of the said Senatus; and (2) the Right Honourable John Inglis, the Lord Justice-General of Scotland, as Chancellor of the University. The University of Edinburgh itself, as a corporate body, is not called as a defender, and is not a party to the present proceedings. Neither are any of the governing bodies of the University, excepting the Senatus. Neither the University Court nor the University Council are parties to the action.

"This peculiarity in the action led to the first plea in law for the Senatus, that 'all parties are not called;' and this is the first question of which the Lord Ordinary must dispose.

"The attention of the Lord Ordinary was not called to this plea before closing the record, and as a preliminary plea it ought to have been disposed of in limine. But perhaps this is of little consequence, as the Lord Ordinary is of opinion that the plea cannot be given effect to as a prejudicial plea stopping process, and he has accordingly repelled it.

"The grounds upon which he has repelled this plea, however, are that it is only sought in the present action to fix and define the duty of the Senatus and of the Chancellor under the constitution of the University as it at present stands, and to declare the rights of the pursuers in relation to the Senatus and to the Chancellor. The Senatus and the Chancellor are alone called, because they are the only parties complained of, or whose duties it is thought necessary to fix and define. The action assumes that the University itself, and all the other con-

The Senatus argued;—The University, from its foundation until 1869, had existed solely for male students. If the pursuers were successful this

No. 138.

June 28, 1873.

Jex-Blake v. Senatus of University of Edinburgh.

tituent members or parts thereof, are ready and willing to do their duty to the pursuers, and therefore none are called as defenders excepting the Senatus and the Chancellor. Indeed, it appears from the defence lodged for the Chancellor that even he need not have been called as a party, for he states that he 'has always been, and still is, willing and ready as Chancellor of the University of Edinburgh to confer degrees upon the pursuers, or any women duly recommended by the Senatus Academicus, upon its being ascertained by decree of a competent Court that they are entitled to demand admission as students, and to become graduates of the University.'

"The position thus taken by the Chancellor cannot fail to recommend itself to every one. He stands quite apart from the whole controversy, and is no way mixed up therein. He is ready, as the representative and head of the University, to confer its degrees upon all who may be found entitled thereto, and who are duly recommended for graduation by the Senatus.

"As the only question, therefore, is a question between the pursuers and the Senatus, the Lord Ordinary has repelled the plea that other parties are not called. But then it follows, from the principle upon which this preliminary plea has been repelled, that there is in the present action to be no attempt to impugn in the slightest degree the existing constitution of the University. None of its existing regulations or ordinances are to be challenged to be illegal or ultra vires—the pursuers are not to seek to extend or alter any of its laws, but are only to ask that these laws, exactly as they stand, shall be enforced and applied. In short, everything connected with the existing constitution of the University is to be taken as right, and the Senatus are simply called upon to carry out that constitution, and to give effect to laws and regulations already enacted.

"It will be at once seen how much this view narrows the field of controversy. It is possible that in some respects this restricted view may operate to the disadvantage of the pursuers, but probably in other respects it will be for their benefit. The Lord Ordinary has no doubt that the point has been well and maturely-considered by the pursuers and their advisers, and that they have adopted the course which, on the whole, seemed best suited to accomplish the object in view.

"Before proceeding to consider the merits of the action, the Lord Ordinary deems it proper to make one or two preliminary observations of a general nature.

"The Lord Ordinary is clearly of opinion that by the law of Scotland—indeed, he may say that by the law of every civilised country—there is no inherent illegality in women prosecuting the study of the science of medicine, using the word in its largest sense, or in their engaging in the practice of medicine as a profession.

"It would really be a waste of time to argue in support of this proposition, and it was not impugned by the counsel for the defenders.

"There is no natural impropriety in a woman becoming an educated and accomplished physician or surgeon, and no unsuitableness or impropriety in her practising the profession. Indeed, some branches of the profession are peculiarly appropriate to women, and peculiarly inappropriate and unsuitable to men. For example, in obstetric practice, and in numerous diseases of women, a male practitioner is singularly out of place; and nothing but the deadening effect of habit would ever reconcile the community to that anomaly both in name and in reality,—'a man midwife.'

"The practice of all civilised nations, indeed of uncivilised nations also, testifies most loudly at once to the fitness and to the suitableness of many if not most of the branches of the medical profession being undertaken by women. From the earliest times in Italy medical degrees were conferred upon and medical honours held by women, and at the present date women are allowed fully and freely to graduate in Italy, France, Spain, Switzerland, Russia, and America, as well as in several other countries. Indeed, Britain is almost the only country in which the right of women to graduate in and practise medicine has not been

No. 138.

June 28, 1873.

Jex-Blake v. Senatus of University of Edinburgh.

inveterate custom would be overturned. This custom had only explained the original charters and ratifications, as it had never been the intention fully recognised. One object of the present action is to try whether the right accorded in other countries does not also exist in Scotland.

"If, then, in Scotland there is no inherent illegality in women studying medicine and obtaining degrees therein, it is scarcely necessary to add that there can be no inherent illegality in women practising medicine as a profession. It would indeed be strange if women, merely on account of their sex, were by law excluded from a high and honourable calling, for most departments of which they are peculiarly fitted, and for some departments of which they seem to be by nature almost exclusively designated. The law of Scotland, like that of many other countries, has in many instances been unjust to women, but it has never gone as far as to exclude them from the legal practice of medicine as a profession.

"Keeping these general observations in view the Lord Ordinary will now proceed to consider very shortly the constitution and existing regulations now in force in the University of Edinburgh, so far as they relate to women.

"I. It was broadly maintained by the counsel for the Senatus, in a very powerful and able speech, that the University of Edinburgh was founded, and existed, as an educational institute for male students exclusively—that none but males were entitled to be admitted or to matriculate as students; that males alone were entitled to become members of the University, or to receive instruction therein; and that the privileges and rights of graduation were reserved for males alone.

"If this proposition be well founded there is of course an end of the whole case. The Lord Ordinary, however, has felt himself quite unable to affirm this proposition, but has come ultimately, without any hesitation at all, to the conclusion that there is no foundation for this first and general contention of the defenders.

"(1) The charters of the University give no countenance to the supposition that women were in all circumstances to be excluded from its benefits. The rights, liberties, and privileges conferred upon the University are all expressed in the most general terms, and are all quite consistent with provision being made for the instruction of females as well as of males within the walls of the University, and by its professors duly appointed. Even where the masculine form of noun or pronoun is made use of in speaking of the students the Lord Ordinary cannot doubt that that is done not to exclude females, but merely in conformity with ordinary brevity of expression, detailed enumeration of sexes or of classes being avoided, and the masculine or first sex being used to include everybody. In truth, it is notorious that in common language, and long before Lord Brougham's Interpretation Act was passed, nouns and names of the masculine gender were often used as including females also.

"(2) The reference in the charters to other Universities, and the conferring upon the University of Edinburgh the whole 'liberties, privileges, and immunities quhilk any colledge within this realm bruikes,' though perhaps not very important, certainly favours the view that women were not excluded.

"There was much controversy on this point whether by reference the whole privileges which belonged to the University of Bologna were not conferred, so far as the Crown had power to do so, upon the University of Edinburgh. The argument was, that as Edinburgh had all the privileges belonging to the older University of Glasgow, and as Glasgow, by the Papal bull of Pope Nicholas V., had all the rights and privileges which belonged to the Pope's University of Bologna, and as in the University of Bologna women were instructed and women received degrees, so women must have the same right in the University of Edinburgh which they had in the fifteenth century in the University of Bologna.

"The Lord Ordinary does not attach much weight to this argument. He rather thinks that the privileges referred to in the Pope's bull were chiefly immunities from local and other taxes, and exemption from the jurisdiction of the ordinary tribunals, and as it is certain that none of these privileges now belong ıe founders that female students should be admitted. The true point the right to graduation. The pursuers broadly claimed that right as ıy Scotch University, not much assistance can be got by any party from the s of the Papal bull.

At the same time, however, it seems sufficiently shewn that the Universities cotland were to a great extent constituted upon the model of Bologna and lar institutions in Italy; and it seems a quite fair observation, and one entitled onsiderable weight, that as women were never excluded from the Italian rersities, it cannot have been intended originally to exclude them from those ded in Scotland.

(3) Much stress was laid by the counsel for the Senatus upon the past history practice of the University of Edinburgh, and upon the fact that there is no rded instance of a woman having ever taken a degree therein.

It is impossible to deny that this argument has some weight—perhaps con- rable weight—but the Lord Ordinary thinks it will not bear the stress which defenders lay upon it. At best the practice is merely negative. There is no ınce of a woman ever having been excluded or refused admission or instruc- . If women had originally right to become students or graduates their right not be lost by mere non-usage—that is, by their merely neglecting to use r right. The right in them was one mercæ facultatis, like a man's right to d upon his own ground—a right which will not be lost though no building ıld be erected for hundreds or thousands of years. To extinguish such a t there must be a contrary usage—a possession inconsistent with the exercise ıe right—and this does not exist in the present case.

(4) If, then, there is no express exclusion of women, and nothing necessarily ing to their exclusion, it seems fair to fall back upon the inherent legality appropriateness of the study and practice of medicine for women, and to in- hat a medical school founded in the University cannot have as one of its litions the exclusion of the female sex.

(5) But passing from such general considerations the Lord Ordinary thinks nite conclusive of the whole question that by regulations lawfully enacted by petent and sufficient authority provision is actually and expressly made for admission of women to the study of medicine in the University of Edinburgh, actually detailed regulations have been enacted regulating their studies and ninations. These regulations will be immediately adverted to, as they form ding, and, in the Lord Ordinary's view, a conclusive feature in the pursuers' , and they are only noticed here as absolutely and utterly putting an end to defenders' contention that the University of Edinburgh is a University for s only. The first words of the regulations are—'Women shall be admitted he study of medicine in the University.'

The Lord Ordinary holds, therefore, that the defenders have entirely failed heir attempt to shew that the University of Edinburgh is restricted to males usively.

II. The Lord Ordinary is of opinion that the 'regulations for the education romen in medicine in the University of Edinburgh,' enacted by the Univer- Court on 10th November 1869, and approved of by the Chancellor on 12th ember 1869, are valid and binding in every respect, and form an integral of the constitution and regulations of the University as it at present exists.

At the debate it was felt on both sides that these regulations formed almost turning point in the case, and the counsel for the Senatus, sorely pressed by n, boldly challenged their legality, maintained that they were ultra vires he University Court to enact, and he asked the Lord Ordinary to treat them nullity. Here, again, the Lord Ordinary thinks that the position taken by Senatus is absolutely untenable.

(1) The regulations in question were solemnly, after much discussion, after consideration, and after due communication with the whole governing bodies he University, enacted by the University Court.

Under the Universities (Scotland) Act of 1858 the University Court has, er certain safeguards, very large and almost legislative powers. It reviews

No. 138.

June 28, 1873.
Jex-Blake v. Senatus of University of Edinburgh.

the ultimate result of their right to study, and the question was, were they entitled to it. The right to grant degrees was conferred by a refer-and can alter or reverse the whole decisions of the Senatus. It can (subject to approval of Her Majesty in Council) censure, suspend, or deprive any professor, or even the principal. It can check and control the whole administration of the revenues, and—what is specially important in reference to the present question—it has full power (section 12, sub-section 2)—'to effect improvements in the internal arrangements of the University, after due communication with the Senatus Academicus, and with the sanction of the Chancellor, provided that all such proposed improvements shall be submitted to the University Council for their consideration.

"Nothing can well be broader than the power so conferred. The very care with which safeguards are provided shews the extent of the authority. The admission of women and the regulation of their teaching is so plainly a part of the 'internal arrangements' of the University, that in support of the argument that the regulations were ultra vires the defenders had almost nothing to rely upon but the witty fallacy that although the regulations were 'alterations' they were not in the sense of the statute 'improvements.'

"(2) These regulations were enacted with all the required statutory requisites—'Due communication' was had with the Senatus. The matter was submitted to and deliberately considered by the University Council, and the regulations received the final sanction and approval of the Chancellor.

"The Senatus, the University Council, and the University Court, had all the benefit of the very highest legal skill and experience. Most eminent lawyers were members of all these bodies; and the Chancellor, who put the seal of his approbation and sanction to the regulations, holds with universal acceptance the very highest judicial office in Scotland. It was very startling to hear the majority of the Senatus maintain, through their counsel, deliberately and strongly, that regulations to which they themselves had been a party—regulations enacted in such circumstances, and holding such high sanction—were absolutely null and illegal; and when it was seen how essential this contention was to a great part of the defenders' case the weakness of that part of the case became very apparent.

"(3) Still farther, the Lord Ordinary is of opinion that the validity and binding character of these regulations cannot be impugned or challenged in the present action. No reduction of the regulations has been instituted. They have never been said to be illegal or invalid till this was maintained for the first time in the present argument, and the Senatus itself, as well as everybody else, has hitherto admitted their validity, and acted upon them. So satisfied have the Senatus been of the validity of the regulations that they have actually applied to the enacting power—that is, to the University Court—to rescind them; but saving the rights of those who have acted upon them. The attempt failed. The University Court refused to rescind the regulations, and they still stand part of the law of the University.

As has been already pointed out, neither the University itself, nor the University Court, nor the University Council, are parties to the present action; and it is quite clear that the Lord Ordinary cannot, without calling and hearing all these parties, even entertain a motion virtually to reduce and set aside part of their laws. A declarator of nullity of part of the University regulations will require to be brought in a very different way, and with very different parties from the present action.

"In short, the Lord Ordinary thinks that, looking to the form of the present action, and the parties thereto, he must hold that the ratified and confirmed regulations of 10th November 1869 are in all respects valid and integral parts of the University constitution, and all that he has to do is to apply and carry them out according to their true meaning and import.

"It is almost superfluous to add that these regulations have been in full force since their enactment. They have been regularly published in the University Calendar, and it is upon the faith of them that the pursuers have commenced, and to a certain extent prosecuted, at great expense both of money and of time.

ence in the Parliamentary ratification of 1621 to the powers enjoyed by the other Scotch Universities. The University of Edinburgh was the professional study of medicine in the University of Edinburgh. It would be indeed a serious matter to find that regulations on which so much has followed are absolutely void.

"III. The Lord Ordinary is of opinion that, under the constitution and regulations of the University, including therein the regulations of 10th November 1869, the pursuers are entitled in substance to the declaratory decree which they demand in the present action. The Lord Ordinary, however, has found it necessary somewhat to alter the phraseology, and in one or two particulars to restrict the breadth of the decree of declarator sought.

"(1) The Lord Ordinary thinks that the pursuers are entitled to be admitted as students of the University for the study of medicine therein, that they are entitled to be matriculated as students, with all the privileges of students, subject only to the special condition that they shall be taught in separate classes, confined entirely to women.

"The first article of the regulations is in these words—'Women shall be admitted to the study of medicine in the University.' The Lord Ordinary cannot read this otherwise than as entitling the pursuers to be admitted as students—members of the University, with the full privileges of students, subject only to the conditions specified in the regulations.

"It was strongly contended for the Senatus that women were not entitled to matriculation, and that there was a distinction between admission to study and matriculation as a student. The Lord Ordinary has failed to see any substance in the distinction, and indeed he regards this dispute as little more than a difference about words. The origin of matriculation, or of the formal issue of matriculation tickets, seems to have been in the enaction of certain fees for the library and for janitors, but it has come to be regarded as the form in which a student is admitted. It rather appears that certain classes of theological students are or were exempt from matriculation; but surely that did not deprive them of the status of students of the University.

"The reality of the thing—and this is far more important than the name—undoubtedly is that women are to be admitted as students in the University, whatever be the form in which this is done. In point of fact all the pursuers have matriculated repeatedly, and they all hold tickets as 'Cives Academiæ Edinensis.'

"(2) Now, if students of the University, the Lord Ordinary thinks that the pursuers must have all the privileges of students, subject only to the special conditions under which they were admitted relative to 'separate classes.' The Lord Ordinary cannot assent to the doctrine maintained by the Senatus, that the pursuers were only students by permission, and not students as matter of right. It is impossible to hold that ladies are students with no rights whatever, whereas males are students with legal and enforceable rights. The University has no power to make such a distinction, and, what is of equal importance, it has never attempted to do so.

"(3) It follows that the pursuers are entitled to attend all necessary classes, provided only they can be taught separately. To admit them as students, and yet deny their right to be taught, would be absurd. The provision about separate teaching may create a difficulty; but this is a mere difficulty in detail, which, in the Lord Ordinary's view, ought to be easily and at once surmounted. But this point will be more fully adverted to immediately.

"(4) And lastly; it follows that the pursuers, on completing their studies, and complying with all existing regulations, are entitled, as a matter of right, to demand examination, and, if found qualified, are entitled, equally as a matter of right, to demand full and complete medical degrees.

"The right to medical graduation is really at the foundation of the whole of the present dispute. If the ladies would be content to study as mere amateurs—as mere dilettanti—it rather appears that no question would ever have been raised. But their demand for degrees, and the announcement of their intention

No. 138. June 28, 1873. Jex-Blake v. Senatus of University of Edinburgh.

to enjoy all the privileges enjoyed by other Scotch Universities, and they enjoyed the privileges of the Universities of Bologna and Paris to practise as physicians, has aroused a jealousy which the Lord Ordinary is very unwillingly obliged to characterise as unworthy; and hence this strife.

"But the right to demand graduation is a necessary consequence of the right to study at the University; ordinary medical degrees are not matters of mere favour or of arbitrary discretion. They are the indefeasible right of the successful student—the fitting termination and 'crown' of his completed study. The idea that there may be some students who may study and study successfully but who may not graduate, was never heard of before the present controversy arose, and yet in high quarters a doubt upon this point seems to have arisen.

"The majority of the Senatus, both in their minutes and proceedings, and by their counsel at the bar, have distinctly taken the position that women may be allowed to study, but they must not be allowed to graduate; and the University Court have actually passed, on 8th January 1872, in reference to the present pursuers, the following minute:—'If the applicants in the present case would be content to seek the examination of women by the University for certificates of proficiency in medicine instead of for University degrees, the Court believe that arrangements for accomplishing this object would fall within the scope of the powers given to them by section 12 of the Universities (Scotland) Act.

"The Lord Ordinary is of opinion, without any doubt at all, that the proposal to withhold from successful and fully accomplished female students the regular degrees, and to give them instead mere certificates of proficiency, is incompetent as well as unjust. The proposal is not unnaturally stigmatised by the present pursuers as a 'mere mockery,' and the Lord Ordinary thinks it can only have arisen from an entire misconception of the legal rights of an admitted student of the University. The right to demand a regular degree is, and always must be, an integral part of the right of every lawful student who is found duly qualified, and who complies with all prescribed conditions. The regulations expressly provide that women shall be instructed not merely in medicine, but (section 2) 'for the profession of medicine.' Now, this implies degree, for without a degree they cannot be registered, and without registration they cannot practise 'the profession.' Section 4, again, makes the matter quite clear, for it provides for the admission to certain classes of women who are 'not intended' to study medicine professionally, and the examinations to which women are to be subjected are plainly the examinations preliminary to degrees. The contention that examination means only class or private examinations might almost be characterised as a quibble.

"To the present Lord Ordinary, therefore, the right to demand degrees on all requisites being fulfilled seems indisputable.

"If the present judgment be affirmed, and the right of the pursuers to obtain degrees under the existing regulations be established, the Lord Ordinary feels confident that the Senatus, as well as all other members of the University, will gladly and at once do whatever is necessary to confer upon such of the pursuers as earn it the well merited 'crown.'

"IV. But while the Lord Ordinary has in substance affirmed the declaratory conclusions of the summons, he has found himself obliged to negative the leading petitory conclusions.

"The first petitory conclusion is to ordain the defenders, the Senatus, to make regulations whereby the pursuers shall receive such instruction in the University as is required for graduation in medicine, 'and, in particular, that they should direct and appoint the various professors whose duty it is to give instruction in medicine to permit the attendance of the pursuers upon their classes along with male students.'

"The Lord Ordinary can find no sufficient grounds for pronouncing any such decree, and there are conclusive reasons why no such decree should be pronounced:—

"(1) The defenders, the Senatus, have no power to make such regulations. The University Court and not the Senatus—at least the University Court

No. 138.
June 28, 1873.
Jex-Blake v. Senatus of University of Edinburgh.

ɔursuers alleged that the University of Bologna had been in use to degrees to females as well as males, and that therefore the Univerıtely—is the body by whom such regulations fall to be made; and neither niversity itself nor the University Court are parties to the present action. ɔ the pursuers can obtain an order upon the Senatus they must shew that ɜnatus have power to do the thing to which they are to be compelled. ıas not been shewn, and, the Lord Ordinary thinks, cannot be shewn.

!) The pursuers seek to have the Senatus compelled to make a regulation ly contrary to an existing regulation solemnly enacted by the University . But the University Court is the supreme, and the Senatus is merely the ır tribunal in this matter. The University Court, under the statute, ɔn 12), has power to review all decisions of the Senatus, and to be a Court ıeal from the Senatus in all cases, but no power is given to the Senatus in ıse to rescind or alter a regulation of the University Court. The Univer- 'ourt, as has already been so often stated, is no party to the present action, s rules cannot be touched. When the University Court has prescribed romen shall be taught in separate classes it is perfectly vain to attempt to ɜl the Senatus to make a regulation that women shall be taught in mixed s, and 'along with male students.'

ɜ) This last difficulty was so strongly felt by the counsel for the pursuers ıe virtually abandoned the first petitory conclusion, and relied upon the ative, viz., that the Senatus should be compelled to order the professors to the pursuers in separate classes. But here the same difficulty arises. The ıs have no power to make such an order—at least their power to do so ot been shewn, and the University Court, which probably has the power, here. The Lord Ordinary would require to be perfectly convinced of the : of the Senatus to compel the professors to deliver double courses of lectures ɔ he could make an order such as is now asked.

ı short, the difficulty of getting professors to lecture separately to women t one of the difficulties which arose upon the very face of the regulations of November 1869, and which the pursuers must be held to have had in view they accepted the condition that they should only be taught in separate s.

he other petitory conclusions seem to follow from the declaratory ones, and ord Ordinary has given decree in terms thereof. They only come into when the pursuers have completed the full requisite course of study, and complied with all the regulations and conditions necessary for obtaining dehe Lord Ordinary has only to express, in concluding these observations, ırnest hope and belief that the judgment in the present action, whether ıed or reversed, will terminate the unfortunate controversy which has raged ıg. On the one hand, if the judgment is affirmed, and the right of the ers to study, and, on being found qualified, to obtain degrees, is finally it surely cannot be doubted that the Senatus, the University Court, and 'niversity Council will do whatever is necessary to enable the ladies to com- their course of study. At present there seems too much ground for the remark ɔy the regulations these ladies have been induced to enter upon their ɜs, and have been most unfairly stopped in mid-career. It seems to the Ordinary that this has arisen from a misconception—a quite honest mis- ɔtion—as to the pursuers' right to obtain degrees. If this misconception ıoved the Senatus and all the officials of the University will undoubtedly ; combine to fulfil the honourable understanding on which the pursuers induced to commence their studies.

here is really no practical difficulty in doing so. If not the Senatus, at the University Court, has undoubted power to recognise extra-academical ers, whose courses will be reckoned sufficient for the purposes of graduation. ıers of unquestionable standing and ability are ready to give the pursuers ıstruction in separate classes which state of health or want of time prevents rofessors in the University from imparting. Let such teachers be authorised sity of Edinburgh had that power. That argument was fallacious. The privileges referred to in the ratification were personal privileges, such as exemption from taxation. Further, the alleged admission of ladies to the University of Bologna was not supported by sufficient historical evidence, and, at most, only amounted to certain learned ladies having obtained degrees, and not to their being admitted as students to the University. The true practice to be looked to was that of our own Universities, and in them females had not been admitted. That practice was in accordance with the language of all the documents connected with their foundation, the services expected from the students, and the regulations for their conduct.

No. 138.

June 28, 1873. Jex-Blake v. Senatus of University of Edinburgh.

The Lord Ordinary assumed that the right was one meræ facultatis. There was no evidence that ladies ever had a right at all, but assuming that they had, they had lost it by disuse. They were not to be permitted to force their way into our Universities, and break up their present prosperous working, when they had for so many centuries allowed them to grow up, and their regulations to be framed exclusively for men.

The recent decisions as to the franchise afforded an additional argument against the contention of the pursuers. It had been decided both in England and Scotland that females were not entitled to the franchise,[1] but if they were entitled to graduate they would become members of the General Councils of the Universities, and as such would be entitled to the franchise under the Act of 1858.

The regulations of 10th November 1869 only permitted females to study as a tentative measure, and gave no claim to insist on instruction or graduation. To have gone further would have been ultra vires of the University Court under sec. 12, sub-sec. 2, of the Universities (Scotland) Act of 1858. So far as the regulations went beyond the resolutions of the Medical Faculty approved of by the Senatus and the University Court they were ultra vires of the University Court.

The petitory conclusions ought to be dismissed. They craved that the Senatus be ordained to do what they had no power to do. That being so, the declaratory conclusions fell also to be dismissed, as they could merely declare an abstract right without shewing how it was to be made operative.

---

to give part of the curriculum qualifying the pursuers for degrees. It is apparent from the correspondence referred to on record that this would have been done had not the doubt arisen whether the ladies were entitled to demand degrees, and whether medical degrees could be lawfully conferred upon them. That doubt the Lord Ordinary by the present judgment has endeavoured to dispel.

"On the other hand, if the present judgment is reversed, and if it be finally fixed that by the law of Scotland a woman cannot be a legal student at the University of Edinburgh, and cannot legally obtain a degree, then, though on the other side, the whole controversy will equally be settled. The ladies will only have to deplore that they have been misled by those most authoritative-looking regulations of 10th November 1869, and to seek their remedy against the existing law from some new legislative enactment.

"As the pursuers have been practically successful the Lord Ordinary has awarded them expenses, but only against the Senatus, not against the Chancellor. These expenses, however, are subject to modification, because the pursuers have failed in making good very important petitory conclusions. To avoid possible misconception, the Lord Ordinary has thought it right to reserve questions of relief between the majority and the minority of the Senatus who disclaim the present defence."

[1] Chorlton v. Lings, Nov. 9, 1868, 4 L. R. (C. P.) 374; Brown v. Ingram, Dec. 19, 1868, ante, vol. vii. 281.

No. 138.

June 28, 1873.

Jex-Blake v. Senatus of University of Edinburgh.

The pursuers argued;—(1) The pursuers had been unfairly treated by the University. They were induced to matriculate, and to spend, some one, some two, and some three years in attendance on the medical classes, and were now refused the means of completing their curriculum. Means ought to be devised by the University to enable them to do so. If it was inconvenient for the present professors to give the requisite lectures special lecturers ought to be appointed, or attendance allowed on extra-mural lectures. Special lecturers were at present appointed in place of Dr Wyville Thomson and Dr Hughes Bennett. (2) The University Court did not exceed their powers in issuing the regulations under which the pursuers matriculated, and although degrees were not mentioned in these regulations they might be claimed as of right by any student who matriculated and had studied and passed the usual examinations. The University of Edinburgh had the power and the duty of conferring degrees on all students, whether male or female. It possessed, under the Parliamentary ratification of its prior charters of 1621 all the privileges and powers of the other Scotch Universities, and their privileges and powers were conferred by a reference to the two parent Universities of Bologna and Paris. In particular, by a bull of Pope Nicholas V., dated in 1450, all the privileges of the University of Bologna was conferred on Glasgow, and in Bologna ladies had been admitted to graduation and to hold professorships. The language of the bulls and charters founding our Scotch Universities did not limit their benefits to male students, and although no doubt many of their regulations had been framed solely with a view to these no argument was to be drawn from that, as they were so framed because male students had alone taken advantage of the Scotch Universities. It had been argued that if females were permitted to graduate they would obtain the franchise. That was not so. There were many members of General Councils who could not exercise the franchise,—peers, graduates honoris causa, and graduates under twenty-one. The University Courts were Registration Courts, and would exclude female members of councils from the franchise if they ought to be excluded. (3) Ladies had been admitted to the Universities not only at Bologna, but at Lyons, Montpelier, Paris, Göttingen, St Petersburgh, Moscow, and America. (4) The history of Scotland afforded a sufficient explanation why ladies did not attend the Universities. For four centuries prior to the Revolution of 1688 the country was continually disturbed, and people thought more of personal safety than of study. After the Revolution of 1688 the Rebellion of 1745 broke out, and it was only of late years that the country was fully settled. Prejudice, also, took a long time to change. The present case was one of first impression, and must be judged of as if the charter of erection had been granted yesterday. The Court were called on to give that benignior interpretatio to the charter which would accommodate existing institutions to the social tendencies of the age.

The following opinions were returned, the Lord President declining, as Chancellor of the University:—

Lord Deas.—In the way this case has been pleaded by the parties the first important question arising for consideration is, whether females are entitled, as matter of legal right, without the necessity of any express sanction from the authorities of the University, to become students at the University, and to obtain, on the same conditions with male students, such honours and degrees as the University can confer.

If the fact that, in the order of nature, no superiority, moral or intellectual, can be attributed to the one sex over the other were pertinent to the present question I should at once answer that question in the affirmative. The development of the moral and intellectual faculties is no doubt moulded and varied by sex; and this variation contributes largely to the happiness of the human race. But, balancing what is most to be esteemed in the one sex against what is most to be esteemed in the other, the scales cannot well be said to preponderate on either side, or, at least, not on the side of the male sex. Nor can I doubt that there are at all times such a number of females who would profit by such studies as are pursued at Universities as to make it desirable that means of prosecuting these studies should, as far as practicable, be available to them.

No. 138.

June 28, 1873. Jex-Blake v. Senatus of University of Edinburgh.

But the present question is altogether different. It is true that, in the charters and Acts of Parliament which form the written constitution of the University of Edinburgh there is no express exclusion of females from the privileges of the University. But, at the same time, it is clear enough that, down to the date of the recent regulations quoted in the record, all the arrangements as to teaching and graduation in the University proceeded on the footing that the students were all male students, and, until one or more of the present pursuers came forward, no female seems ever to have proposed to become a student in that University. That, I think, is of itself conclusive against now giving effect to the pursuers' claim as matter of pure legal right, because, without some regulations specially made for the purpose, the pursuers could not practically have been accommodated in the class-rooms and taught by the professors. And if, by the lapse of some centuries, regulations have become essential as a condition precedent to the admission and graduation of females, it seems to me to follow that the authorities of the University must have a discretion as to whether any or what regulations, with a view to such admission and graduation, are practical and expedient, consistently with the interests and discipline of the University. My opinion, therefore, is, that except in so far as this action seeks to vindicate the rights of the pursuers as recognised in the regulations of 1869, no effect can be given to the conclusions of the action, either declaratory or petitory.

But this leads to the second, and not less important question, whether the enactment of the regulations of 1869 was within the power or competency of the authorities of the University.

I am not disposed to hold an action of reduction to be necessary to raise that question. The regulations were no doubt duly and formally enacted by the authorities of the University, in so far as they had power under the constitution to enact them; and I think it was the duty of the defenders, the Senatus Academicus, to act upon and carry out these regulations according to their true spirit and intent, so long as they were not rescinded. Still, if it could be shewn that these regulations were ultra vires of the authorities of the University I think there would be no incompetency in recognising that view in this declaratory action.

My opinion, however, is, that the regulations were not ultra vires. There was nothing in the terms of the written constitution of the University to exclude females. If females had applied at the outset they might or might not have been admitted, according to the views taken of the expediency and propriety of admitting them. But I fail to see that there would have been any illegality or incompetency in admitting them. The purpose of the institution was the education of the human mind,—a purpose applicable equally to males and females. The females of these days were apparently not desirous to relieve men of the heavy labour and responsibility they undertake in following the learned professions for the support of their wives, families, and dependents; and they refrained, perhaps wisely, from seeking that kind of education which, by fitting them for such labours, might have deprived them of the exemption which they happily enjoyed. There is no record of any resolution to exclude females. So long as none presented themselves they could, of course, neither be refused nor admitted. But, on the very first occasion when they did present themselves, the regulations now in question were issued to aid them in their object. It was the absence of any such regulations, and not the absence of power to make regulations, which stood in the way. So long as no females came forward as students it was inevitable that the discipline, rules, and usages of the University should adapt themselves to the only body of students who then existed in the University, namely, male students. But the same power which enabled the authorities of the University to make regulations suitable for the one set of circumstances, enabled, and still enables them, I think, to make regulations suitable for the other.

No. 138.
June 28, 1873.
Jex-Blake v. Senatus of University of Edinburgh.

The decisions finding women not entitled to the parliamentary franchise can, I think, have little weight here. Women must either have had the right to the franchise absolutely or not at all. There neither is nor ever was any regulating body in a position, with reference to the franchise, analogous to the position of the authorities of the University with reference to the matriculation and accommodation of students in the University. Does, then, the fact that the authorities of the University never had occasion till now to regulate the admission and accommodation of female students in the University prove either that they never had any power in that matter or that they have lost that power? The decisions as to the franchise do not seem to me to afford any solution of that question.

A practical difficulty has been urged, with some force—that the authorities of the University not having authorised mixed classes, and having no power to compel the professors to form separate classes for females, the regulations are substantially useless and inept. This does not, however, appear to me necessarily to follow. The professors may be willing. Many of them have been so; and to have all obstacles in the way removed except one, which is merely contingent, is a boon to females which cannot be treated as of no value. The tickets and certificates of extra-mural lecturers, as well as of professors in other colleges, have been, and I understand still are, accepted as sufficient with reference to certain branches of study, and it does not prevent this from being a substantial advantage to students that the authorities of the University have no compulsory powers over the teachers or professors from whom these tickets and certificates are to be obtained.

The references made to Bologna, and certain other foreign Universities, although they do not appear to me to establish the plea of abstract legal right, have unquestionably a bearing upon the question of discretionary power. The defenders say in their case that the statutes of the University of Bologna "do not in any way recognise or contemplate the existence of women in any capacity in the University, or the colleges which composed it. On the contrary, their whole scope and bearing, fairly considered, excludes any such idea." If that be so, the instances in which University honours and privileges have been conferred upon and exercised by women in that University, and in other Universities similarly constituted, become all the more palpably examples of the exercise of discretionary power, under a constitution analogous to what the defenders allege to be the written constitution of the University of Edinburgh.

The existing regulations bear that women shall be admitted to the study of medicine in the University. The pursuers, under the first conclusion of their summons, ask to be found "entitled to attend the classes of any of the professors of the University;" and although they specially claim to be found entitled to medical instruction, and to obtain medical degrees, the third conclusion of their summons seems broad enough to comprehend all kinds of degrees which the University can confer. If they were to be held entitled, as matter of abstract legal right, to become students at the University with a view to the medical profession, without obtaining the sanction of the University authorities, it would seem logically to follow that they are entitled to claim instruction in all the classes, and to obtain all the honours or degrees which male students can obtain. The anomaly of being dubbed, in the masculine gender, doctors of laws, bachelors or masters of arts, or doctors of divinity, would, of course, be no greater than that of being dubbed doctors of medicine. The masculine gender must in either view continue to be used. Admittedly a lady cannot be a mistress of arts in the University, whatever she may be in the drawing-room. But if, as matter of legal right, she could claim to become a doctor of medicine, she would necessarily, I think, have the same right to claim all other University degrees, and consequently to become, in the language of Aikenside, "by commutation strange a reverend divine." My opinion, however, is that no such right can be claimed independently of recognition and regulation by the authorities of the University.

No. 138.

June 28, 1873.
Jex-Blake v. Senatus of University of Edinburgh.

It is true that, in the view I take, it must be within the competency of the University authorities to extend still farther than they have yet done the privileges of females in connection with the University, and to afford additional facilities for the exercise of these privileges. I am not, however, startled by that being a legitimate consequence of the argument. The authorities of the University have, hitherto at least, done nothing so extravagant either in the way of admitting or restricting the admission of females as to justify the interposition of this Court, and it is not to be presumed that they are likely to do so. Their refusal in the meantime to sanction mixed classes is an instance of the caution and discrimination to be expected from them. I do not mean to suggest that the law could have pronounced such classes illegal if the University authorities had sanctioned them. But the small proportion of female students as compared with male students of itself afforded a reasonable objection to such an arrangement. Somehow, either sex feels uneasy when shut up with an overwhelming majority of the other, and if the regulation had sanctioned mixed classes only the grievance might have been regarded by many females as greater than it is now. A central division of a class room, such as there is, or once was, in the chapel of Pentonville prison, whereby both sexes could see and be seen by the speaker, and neither sex could see or communicate with the other, or some analogous contrivance, might possibly have suggested itself to meet the difficulty, had there been funds at command, and a large enough number of female students to justify the necessary expenditure. But in the actual circumstances the restriction to separate classes was not only within the competency of the University authorities, but was a fair and reasonable exercise of the discretionary powers with which I think the law has invested them.

As to the expediency of ladies becoming medical practitioners it is enough to say that it is a fair subject for difference of opinion. To suggest jealousy of the rivalry of women as entering into the objection would be altogether absurd. Those who entertain the objection no doubt conscientiously believe that the result would be to diminish the delicacy and respect by which the female character in well-bred society is so advantageously surrounded. On the other hand, it must be admitted to be remarkable how, in trying circumstances connected with severe suffering, or with danger to life or health, nature throws a veil over delicacy and preserves it uninjured. The fictitious character of Rebecca, the Jewess, commented on in the argument, is not an inappropriate illustration. With consummate knowledge of human nature the author makes the urgency of circumstances supersede all delicacy, and yet tempts his reader to say in the classical words of an older writer, "the starry fable of the milky way hath not her story's purity."

There still remains a third question, what are the rights of the individual pursuers under the existing regulations?

To that question I answer that the pursuers are entitled to receive instruction from those of the medical professors who may arrange to teach them in classes separate from male students; and that if they can thus obtain and produce evidence of having completed the prescribed course of study, and shall successfully undergo the examination prescribed for male students, they will be equally entitled with male students to medical degrees. The right to eventual graduation is, I think, fairly implied under the second head of the regulations, which provides for "the instruction of women for the profession of medicine," contrasted with the fourth head, which provides, conditionally, for the instruction of "women not intending to study medicine professionally." The pursuers have expended time and money on the faith of the regulations, as set forth in the third plea in law, and a construction which would defeat the plain object of the regulations is, I think, altogether inadmissible.

Upon the whole, I am for adhering to the specific findings in the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor, and to the intent and effect of these findings—but to no other or further effect—decerning and declaring in terms of the declaratory con clusions of the summons. Quoad ultra I think the defenders should be assoilzied from the declaratory conclusions.

No. 138.

June 28, 1873
Jex-Blake v. Senatus of University of Edinburgh.

As regards the petitory conclusions with reference to examination and graduation, I think these should be dismissed as premature, in so far as directed against the Senatus Academicus, and as out of place in so far as directed against the Chancellor, who has all along been ready and willing to act upon such recommendations as may be duly made to him. From the remaining petitory conclusions, I think, there ought to be decree of absolvitor.

LORD ARDMILLAN.—In this very interesting and important case we have had the benefit of ample and elaborate pleadings, prepared with great industry, learning, and ingenuity. If some of the questions which have been argued were necessary for decision of the case before us the disposal of these questions would certainly be matter of great difficulty. I have felt much impressed by the literary and historical interest of these questions regarding the origin and early history of our own Universities, and of the seats of learning in other countries. But in the view which I take of the cause immediately before us the materials for decision are to be found within more narrow limits.

This action has been raised by Miss Jex-Blake and the other ladies who are pursuers against the Senatus Academicus of the Edinburgh University. The Chancellor of the University is a nominal defender. But the position which, with his wonted impartial dignity, he has taken, is one of neutrality; and the Senatus Academicus is to all intents and purposes the only defender. The pursuers can get no decree in this action except against the Senatus; and although this may be considered as only matter of form I agree with the Lord Ordinary in viewing it as practically of some importance. On the one hand, if the existing constitution of the University does not support the pursuers' claim as against the Senatus, then the pursuers cannot succeed, whatever may be the grounds on which, if they had other parties in the field, they might challenge that constitution. On the other hand, if the existing constitution of the University does not afford grounds for resisting the pursuers' claim, then the Seuatus, bound to accept that constitution, and acting in the administration of that constitution, cannot have a good defence against the pursuers' claim, even though a party in a different position might challenge some part of that constitution. In short, I am of opinion that the decision of this cause must turn, not so much on the more general questions which have been so ably argued in regard to the origin and history of the Scottish Universities, as on the more immediate and practical question, what is the meaning, the authority, and the effect, of the University regulations of 1869.

The object of the action is to obtain declarator of the right of these ladies, the pursuers, 1st, to prosecute their studies as students at the University of Edinburgh with a view especially to the profession of medicine; and 2d, to obtain from the University as the result and reward of successful study the usual medical degrees on being examined and found duly qualified. To these effects and for these ends decree of declarator is craved. I do not at present advert to the further conclusion for enforcing the pursuers' right to instruction and graduation if so declared. In regard to the mode of pursuing their studies, if entitled to do so, a different question is raised, which I shall afterwards notice.

Whatever may be said in the way of illustration or argument, no question is here involved as requiring present decision, except the right of the pursuers to medical instruction and medical graduation in the University of Edinburgh. The pursuers declare this to be a very important question for them, and of course I assume it to be so. It is certainly a novel question. The claim on the part of women to such instruction, and to graduation as the crown of it, is in Scotland an absolute novelty. Never once during the centuries which have elapsed since the institution of this University has a woman ever taken a degree. Nor does it appear that a woman ever claimed it. It is true that no woman has ever been refused a degree. But there is force, and great force, in the remark that the claim which might have been made at any time during the last three hundred years has now been made for the first time, and that in the argument

No. 138.
June 28, 1873.
Jex-Blake v. Senatus of University of Edinburgh.

before us the claim has been maintained as matter of right existing at common law, in which, as your Lordships are well aware, it has always been held that the consuetudinary element has great weight. Still this argument from custom is not conclusive. The absence of women from the classes of the University, which is a mere matter of fact, is according to long and uniform custom. The exclusion or rejection of women, which implies power to exclude—power in existence and in exercise—has no support or authority in custom. If the University had rejected the claim it may be that the uniform custom would have been viewed as supporting the rejection. But we shall see that this was not the case; for in regard to these pursuers there has been no rejection.

I am not prepared to concur with the Lord Ordinary in holding that there is such an original inherent legality, fitness, appropriateness, and expediency in the study and practice of medicine by women as to be of itself sufficient to overcome the presumption arising from the contrary custom of centuries, and even sufficient to sustain a right to enforce admission, and to render the exclusion of women from the medical school of the University unlawful.

On the other hand, I do not perceive any necessary or natural impropriety, or any inherent and essential illegality, in the study and practice of medicine by women, supposing them to be duly qualified. The question whether the practice of medicine by women is appropriate and desirable is one on which difference of opinion may well prevail, and we have had much able and interesting argument to illustrate as matter of history the views on the subject which have prevailed at different times, and in different countries. I do not feel it necessary to enter on that controversy. Though I have carefully, and with much pleasure, perused the pleadings, I do not think it necessary to express an opinion on that point; and it is sufficient for me to say that neither argument nor authority has been adduced to satisfy me that such medical study and practice by women is essentially and necessarily wrong, and consequently must be held illegal. I do not think it is so. The uniform and long-continued custom of the Scottish Universities has created some presumption against it, which the pursuers must meet. But it is not, in my view, necessarily wrong, nor inherently opposed to moral or legal principle. It is possible that the claim which these ladies now make for present medical study, and ultimate medical graduation, may be supported by the authority of University regulation, if such regulation be clearly expressed, competently enacted, and capable of legitimate practical application.

It is on the solution of this question, touching the nature, authority, and effect of University regulation in Edinburgh, that the case before us must, in my opinion, really turn. I am prepared to negative both of the extreme propositions which have been presented. I do not think that, in the absence of University regulation, and in opposition to long and uniform custom, women are entitled to demand and enforce admission as students into the medical classes of the University with a view to graduation, merely because of any essential suitableness in the practice of medicine or any inherent lawfulness and propriety in their claim. On the other hand, I do not think that their claim for admission to such study and such graduation is essentially and necessary so inappropriate, unreasonable, and illegal as to be beyond the reach of University regulation. There is nothing to prevent the rejection of the claim, or to prevent the concession of the claim by the University. I do not think that the University of Edinburgh is by law so exclusively devoted and restricted to the education of male students only as to render incompetent and unlawful a resolution by the Medical Faculty and a regulation by the University Court sanctioning the admission of women as students of medicine with a view to graduation under reasonable and legitimate conditions. I do not see that law has imposed on this Alma Mater the command "Bring forth male children only." I see no reason to doubt that the University Court, acting in accordance with, and after due communication with, the Senatus Academicus, and with the sanction of the Chancellor of the University, and approval of the University Council, had power to resolve and enact by regulation, either that women should be excluded from the study of medicine in the University of Edinburgh, with a view to graduation and practice of medicine, or that women should be admitted to such study, and with such view.

The matter is, in my opinion, within the scope of legitimate University regulation. There is no such weight and power of inherent right as to entitle women to force their way into the medical classes. There is no such taint or noxious quality of wrong in the demand of women for such admission as to forbid admission, and to require an inflexible and inexorable exclusion.

Several illustrations occur to one. Application for the first time, and therefore contrary to uniform custom, may be supposed to have been, at different periods of our history, made by a Roman Catholic, or by a Jew, or by an Indian or a negro. Can it be said that the University could not by vote and resolution have admitted these persons? But the argument for exclusion in respect of custom alone implies that all these persons must have been inexorably shut out, and that the University could not have admitted them. I am not able to arrive at that conclusion.

I therefore proceed to consider the import and effect of the regulations by the University Court in 1869, and I do not pause to comment on any of the objections which have been taken in point of form to these regulations. None of the technical objections which have been urged by the defenders are, in my opinion, well-founded. The procedure in regard to the proposal, consideration, and adoption of these regulations was correct enough, and in accoradnce with the statutory requirements.

The University Court has under the Act of 1858 very wide and varied powers and discretion. In particular, the University Court has power, under section 12 of the statute, "to effect improvements in the internal arrangements of the University."

I do not say that every alteration in the arrangements of the University which the University authorities adopt is necessarily an improvement. It is possible to conceive a case, though scarcely possible to anticipate it from such a body, where an alteration might be proposed and adopted which is not an improvement. But certainly an alteration in the internal arrangements of the University in regard to the admission of students to the study of medicine—the alteration being embraced in the resolution of the Medical Faculty, agreed to by the Senatus Academicus, adopted and embodied in regulations by the University Court, approved by the University Council, and sanctioned by the Chancellor of the University—cannot possibly be considered by us, sitting in the Court of Session, as otherwise than an improvement in the opinion of the University; and it is a matter of University administration, on which the University Court was entitled under the statute to give an authoritative deliverance. By the approval and adoption of it the University declared it an improvement. The Senatus is a Court of the University,—an official portion of the administrative power and authority of the University; and in my opinion they are bound by the existing constitution. They cannot repudiate and set at nought the resolutions which have been adopted by the legitimate University authorities.

The claim of women for the Parliamentary franchise has in England and Scotland been rejected. The rejection has been founded on here.

I do not think that the decisions on the subject of the franchise are quite in point.

In the first place, the quality or character of the contrary usage was different. The franchise, sustained by whatever qualification the law required, is a public right; and for centuries that public right was exercised in accordance with universal national usages, and, both in England and in Scotland, was limited exclusively to men. That long and uninterrupted national usage, in such a matter as the elective franchise, assumed a constitutional character. The right to study medicine in a particular University is of a different character; and while contrary usage is an important consideration it has not the same weight as in the case of the electoral franchise. Then, there are no direct institutional authorities adverse to the right to pursue medical studies as claimed by these pursuers. But in England there were important authorities, such as that of Lord Coke and Mr Serjeant Heywood, adverse to the claim of women to the franchise. Therefore it appears that both usage and institutional authority were opposed to the claim for franchise.

No. 138.

June 28, 1873. Jex-Blake v. Senatus of University of Edinburgh.

In the second place, the right to sit in Parliament was recognised as a co-relative right to the right to vote for a representative. The case of a peeress in her own right, who cannot sit or vote in the House of Lords personally or by proxy, was considered as analogous and appropriate by Mr Justice Willes, in whose very luminous and instructive opinion the question of the female claim to the franchise is fully disposed of. The report of the decision of the franchise question in our own Court is very brief—Brown v. Ingram, 19th December 1868, 7 Macph. 281. But I was one of the three Judges who decided it; and I recollect, and have notes confirming my recollection, that I referred to the right to sit in the House of Commons or the House of Lords as not only cognate but relative to the right of franchise, and as substantially involved in the question raised. That also is an important distinction,—a peculiarity not here present.

In the third place, the meaning and result of the decision in the case of the franchise was that it was a question for Parliament, and to be decided by Parliament. The view which I take of this claim for University study is, that it is a question for the University, which the appropriate University authority might dispose of by decision for or against the claim. In the meantime, and in so far as regards these pursuers, the University Court, having, as I think, sufficient power, has decided in favour of the claim. That decision may be reconsidered. But, in the meantime, it has been given; and the effect should be the same as it would be in the case of the franchise if Parliament had resolved to confer the elective franchise on women. On these grounds, I think that the decisions on the question of the franchise are by no means conclusive on the question now before us.

Let us next consider what is the true meaning of the resolution and regulation of the University Court. The words are before us. I need scarcely quote them again. I cannot doubt that, according to these regulations, the pursuers are entitled to admission to the study of medicine,—certainly not in mixed classes along with men, but in such separate classes as can be arranged with the professors of medicine. I am further of opinion that, under these regulations women are entitled to matriculation as students (as I understand they have in point of fact matriculated) and that they also are entitled to be admitted to examination with a view to the medical profession, for that end or object qualifies the whole claim made, and the whole arrangements sanctioned.

Lastly, I am of opinion that women, being entitled to enter on such study, and to be admitted to examination with the view to the medical profession, are, on the completion of their studies, on their complying with all the conditions imposed by law, and on passing their examination, and being found duly qualified, also entitled to demand and obtain the usual medical degrees. I think that the University gradus, to which their title is recognised and their admission sanctioned, is incomplete without graduation, assuming that, as the end of the study and the result of the examination, the women who seek graduation are found qualified. I agree with the Lord Ordinary in holding that graduation is "the indefeasible right of the successful student,—the fitting termination and crown of completed study." To admit the pursuers to the study of medicine with a view to the profession of medicine, and to admit them to the testing of that study by examination, and then to refuse them graduation if duly qualified, would be to mock them after encouraging them to hope and stimulating them to effort. It would truly be to lead them into a delusion and a snare. There may be difficulty in taking the first step of admission. That difficulty—arising chiefly from the novelty of the claim and the prevalence of a long and uniform contrary custom—must be admitted. That difficulty I have felt, and fully appreciate. The import and authority of the University regulations has from my mind ultimately removed that difficulty as regards this action and these pursuers. But if their admission has been sanctioned, and the first step taken, and their course of instruction regularly pursued, and their studies completed, and their qualification ascertained by due examination, I have little difficulty in arriving at the conclusion that the usual result must follow, and that graduation must crown the studies of those who have been thus admitted, and who have successfully laboured in University education with a view to the medical profession.

No. 138.

June 28, 1873.

Jex-Blake v. Senatus of University of Edinburgh.

ll are permitted to pursue medical studies it cannot be that the University ree—the reward and token of success—is reserved for one sex only. I am refore of opinion that the pursuers are, to this extent, entitled to succeed in declaratory conclusions of this action.

nother question has, however, been raised, on which I must say a word before onclude. I mean, the manner in which (assuming the rights of the pursuers be declared as I have above explained) they can obtain the end they aim at.

think that the Lord Ordinary has judged rightly in confining his interlo- or to the declaratory conclusions. I confess I do not see my way at present go further.

In the first petitory conclusion the pursuers crave a decree ordaining the natus Academicus to make regulations for the instruction of the pursuers, and their ultimate graduation; and particularly the pursuers crave decree ordain- the Senatus to direct the various professors whose duty it is to give instruc- in medicine to permit the attendance of the pursuers in their classes "along th male students." This proposed mode of prosecuting the study of medicine women—this proposed attendance in classes along with male students—has en, I think, rightly negatived by the Lord Ordinary.

In the first place, I am of opinion that the Senatus (who are the defenders) ve not the power to direct or effect an arrangement for the attendance of omen in mixed medical classes, as here concluded for. It is not the part of e Senatus to direct a change of such importance; and it would be a change pposed to the express words of the regulation of the University Court—the ry regulation on which the only case which the pursuers can present must and. That regulation, which, as the pursuers must contend, and do contend, s the force of University law, declares in express terms that the medical struction given shall be in separate classes; and I cannot discover any autho- ty or any principle to support the conclusion against the Senatus for reversal f the regulation of the University Court.

But, even if the power of the Senatus to direct the arrangement for mixed lasses, as desired by the pursuers, were conceded, I should still be of opinion at this Court ought not to ordain the Senatus to direct such arrangement.

I fully and respectfully recognise the high qualities, capacities, and vocation f women. I recognise especially the fact that the elevation of women in omestic and social position is one of the blessed fruits of Christianity. There re few, indeed, who hold intelligent and virtuous women in higher estimation han I do. It is very much for their own sake, and on account of the respect hich I entertain for them, that on this particular point I feel it my duty to ate my decided opinion that the promiscuous attendance of men and women 1 mixed classes of medical study, such as anatomy, surgery, and obstetric ience, with concomitant participation in dissection, demonstration, and clinical xposition, is a thing so unbecoming and so shocking—so perilous to the delicacy nd purity of the female sex—to the very crown and charm of womanhood—nd so reacting on the spirit and sentiment which sustains the courtesy, reverence, and tenderness of manhood—that the law and constitution of the University, bound to promote, and seeking to promote, the advancement of morality as ell as knowledge, cannot sanction or accept such attendance.

I suggest no doubt in regard to the motives which impel the pursuers to make heir present demand for attendance on mixed classes, in order to attain the ducational ends which they have in view. I give them credit for the best notives; but I entertain the strongest opinion, that the welfare of the University, the character of the medical school, and the best interests of the ladies hemselves, would be put in peril by conceding to them the privilege—I would all it the fatal boon—of attendance in mixed classes in medical study.

The second or alternative petitory conclusion is for decree ordaining the professors whose duty it is to give instruction in medicine to impart that instruction to the pursuers and other women in separate classes.

It is not quite so clear in this matter as in that of the mixed classes that the Senatus has not the power to make an order on the professors to the effect craved in this alternative conclusion. But I am of opinion that they have not the

No. 138.
June 28, 1873.
Jex-Blake v. Senatus of University of Edinburgh.

power. I think that the University Court might probably have power to make such an order if it were right to do so. But the University is not a defender, and the University Court is not a defender, and, under these conclusions we can only pronounce a decree against the Senatus Academicus. Whether, having regard to the terms of the regulations of 1869, in which a command or direction to the medical professors is scrupulously avoided, the Senatus can in this action be competently decerned to issue to the professors a command or order which the University Court refrained from issuing, seems to me extremely doubtful. But, even assuming the competency, I am, after some hesitation, now of opinion that, if there is no arrangement made, as "permitted" by the regulations, between the pursuers and the medical professors, then the Senatus ought not, under this action, to be decerned and ordained by this Court to issue an order upon the subject. The regulations have left it on a permission; and I think it was so left by the University Court advisedly, and in order to secure both to the medical professors and to the ladies the opportunity and the power of adjusting, by arrangement, the question of attendance in separate classes. It is an appropriate matter for arrangement; though it is certainly true that the inducements and facilities for arrangement may be diminished by the irritation of a lawsuit. Besides, there are obvious practical difficulties in the way of arrangement for securing medical instruction to a few ladies in separate professional classes, to be taught by eminent gentlemen, whose engagements within and without the University are numerous and important. Still, arrangements may not be hopeless. At all events, compulsion or authoritative direction was not contemplated in the resolutions.

Another suggestion for the prosecution of the medical studies of the ladies, and for their ultimate graduation, if their right shall be declared, has been adverted to in the pleadings, and is noticed by the Lord Ordinary. I mean the recognition by the University, and by the Medical Faculty, of extra-academical teachers, whose lectures and instructions might be reckoned sufficient for the purposes of female graduation, the ladies being ascertained by examination to be duly qualified. Such recognition, in the event of the failure of arrangement, and of declinature by a medical professor in the University to open a separate class for ladies, might perhaps meet some of the difficulties in the way of giving practical effect to a decree according to the declaratory conclusions of this action. But in regard to any such plan nothing can be done at present. It must be left as matter for arrangement.

I have only to add that I think the leading questions presented to us so important to the administration, the good order, and the whole interests of the University, as to raise no doubt of the right of the defenders to insist for judicial determination of these questions; and I feel sure that, in the course which they have taken, they have been actuated by no unworthy motive, and that if the law is declared against the pleas of the defenders they will deal honourably and liberally with the pursuers.

Though not in all respects concurring in the views of the Lord Ordinary, I substantially concur in the result at which he has arrived; and I think we should adhere to his judgment, as limited to the declaratory conclusions of the action. Beyond these declaratory conclusions I cannot go; and in regard to the petitory conclusions I think that the defenders are entitled to absolvitor.

LORD JERVISWOODE.—I had an opportunity of perusing a proof-sheet of the opinion of Lord Deas in this case, and I have carefully reconsidered that opinion since it has been circulated.

I concur, without reservation, in the general course of reasoning of that opinion, and in the conclusion at which Lord Deas has there arrived; and I therefore prefer to refer to it as the basis of the judgment which ought, in my view, to be pronounced, rather than to run the risk of error in the course of unnecessary repetition.

LORD ORMIDALE.—It is not only unnecessary, but would be quite beside the legal question which the Court has now to determine, to consider whether it is,

No. 138.

June 28, 1873.

Jex-Blake v. Senatus of University of Edinburgh.

r is not, desirable that women should possess, equally with men, the rights and rivileges claimed for them in the present action. The only question which the ourt has to determine is, whether by law women do, or do not, possess these ghts and privileges.

It is certainly a circumstance not a little remarkable that if women have lways possessed the rights and privileges referred to, as maintained by the pur- iers, no instance of their having been ever either claimed or exercised is alleged) have occurred before the present controversy arose, since the establishment of niversities in Scotland about four centuries ago. On the contrary, it is allowed y the pursuers to be taken as an acknowledged and indisputable fact that there as never been any such instance. Nor can the pursuers say that by Papal bull, oyal charter, or other instrument having reference to the foundation of the cottish Universities, the admission of women as students at any of them is xpressly recognised. The utmost the pursuers contend for is, that while by hese instruments the right of women to be students is not expressly recognised, either is there in any of them an express exclusion of women as students. But although this may be so, it is not unimportant to observe that the language, not only of the founding writs of the Scottish Universities, but also of some at least of their disciplinary regulations, are, according to their ordinary and natural sense, indicative rather than otherwise of an understanding, to say the least of it, that males alone were contemplated to be admissible as students, as in point of fact they have hitherto exclusively been. This is of itself sufficient to raise a very strong presumption that the rights and privileges now claimed by the pursuers were never intended to be, and in reality never were, conferred on women.

It will not do to argue, as the pursuers do, that the turbulent condition of the times and state of society in Scotland satisfactorily account for this. That these causes may have to some extent retarded the progress of education and learning in the Universities in Scotland is intelligible enough; but that they should have operated adversely to the female and not to the other sex is scarcely intelligible at all, and has certainly not been shewn to have been the case. The fact, indeed, of the warlike struggles which prevailed in Scotland during the period referred to—engaging as they must have done the young men of the country—not having led to the education and training of the youth of the opposite sex to medical and other peaceful professions, might be founded on with more plausibility and effect by the defenders, in support of their view that females were not admissible as students at Universities.

Having regard, then, to what has been the long, uniform, and uninterrupted usage, not only of the Edinburgh, but all the other Scottish Universities since their establishment centuries ago, it cannot well be questioned, I think, that it must hitherto also have been the general understanding of the country that women had not the right of admission as students at any of them. And if so, the presumption against the existence of any such right, or that it ever was intended to be, or was ever in point of fact conferred on women, seems irresistible.

It is a well established principle of law that writings, even Acts of Parliament, more especially those of ancient date, the terms of which leave their true meaning and effect doubtful or obscure, may be cleared up and interpreted—not controlled or altered—by the usage or possession which has followed upon them. Not only is this principle well and firmly established, but it is also one of very general application. It has been held to operate alike in the interpretation of Acts of Parliament of an old date, ancient charters, and other writings, whether relating to contracts between individuals, or to the constitution of public rights and trusts affecting local as well as national interests. Thus, in the case of the Magistrates of Dunbar v. the Heritors of Dunbar, 10th April 1835, 1 Sh. and M'L. p. 134, Lord Brougham, in reference to the question how far usage was admissible to interpret the true meaning and effect of a statute, observed—"When the statute uses a language of doubtful import the acting under it for a long course of years may well give an interpretation to that obscure meaning, and reduce that uncertainty to a fixed sense: optimus legum interpres consuetudo, which is sometimes termed contemporaneous exposition; and where you can carry back the usage for a century, and have no proof of a contrary usage before that time, you fairly reach the point of contemporary exposition." So also in the case of Macdonald v. The Governors of Heriot's Hospital, 7th April 1830, 4 W. and S. 98—a case of contract between individuals—Lord Wynford in the House of Lords, in moving the affirmance of the judgment of this Court, observed that "old writings might be expounded by contemporaneous usage," and that "there can be no means of getting at the meaning of old instruments so satisfactorily as that of seeing how the parties acted under them at the time they were made, and have since continued to act." So also in the recent cases of White v. The Kirk-Session of Kinglassie, 14th June 1869, 5 Macph. 867, and Flockhart v. The Kirk-Session of Aberdour, 14th November 1869, 8 Macph. 176, where the question was whether certain property and funds which had been constituted by ancient writs in trust "for behoof of the poor of the parish," without specifying particularly what description or class of poor was meant, it was decided, on interpreting the writs by the usage and possession which had followed on them, that the property and funds in dispute fell to be administered under the Poor-Law Amendment Act of 1845 by the heritors and kirk-session for behoof of the legal poor of the parish—Lord Curriehill, who gave the leading judgment in the former of these cases, concluding his observations as follows:—"I think that the usage which has followed on the title by which this trust was constituted, and under which it was held at the time of the passing of the Act of 1845, and the manner in which it has been possessed and dealt with, satisfactorily explain that according to its true import the trust thereby created was for behoof of the poor of the parish in the sense of the 52d section of the Poor-Law Amendment Act." And in accordance with these precedents—and many more, in varying circumstances, might be cited in the law and practice of Scotland—there may be noticed, as illustrative of the same principle in the law and practice of England, the case of the Attorney-General v. Drummond, 1 Drury and Warren, p. 353, where, in reference to a question touching the objects of a trust, and the parties entitled to participate in the benefits of it, Lord Chancellor Sugden observed (p. 368 of the report), "One of the most settled rules of law for the construction of ambiguities in ancient documents is that you may resort to contemporaneous usage to ascertain the meaning of a deed. Tell me," said his Lordship, "what you have done under such a deed and I will tell you what it means."

No. 138.

June 28, 1873. Jex-Blake v. Senatus of University of Edinburgh.

What, however, is perhaps of still greater importance and applicability to the present case are the very recent decisions of the Courts, both of Scotland and England, on the right of women to the exercise and enjoyment of the electoral franchise. In the case of Brown v. Ingram, 19th December 1868, vol. vii of the 3d series of the Court of Session Cases, p. 281, in Scotland, and of Chorlton v. Lings, 9th November 1868, vol. iv. Law Reports, Common Pleas, 374, in England, it was determined, without any dissent on the bench, that women have no such right; and it is clear from the published reports of the cases that this determination was arrived at, not in respect of women being expressly debarred, by statute or otherwise, from exercising the electoral franchise, but mainly, if not entirely, in respect of the immemorial usage which had prevailed in the matter. The report of the case in Scotland, although very brief, expressly bears that "their Lordships rested their decision upon the fact that there was a long and uninterrupted custom in Scotland limiting the franchise to males." And in reference to some exceptional instances to the contrary of a very old date, founded on in the English case, Lord Chief-Justice Bovill is reported to have remarked—"But these instances are of comparatively little weight as opposed to uninterrupted usage to the contrary for several centuries; and what has been commonly received and acquiesced in as the law raises a strong presumption of what the law is, at least throws upon those who have questioned it the burden of proving that it is not what it has been so understood to be."

I am unable, therefore, to see how, in the face of these authorities, and the well-established principle of law illustrated by them, women are now for the first time, and after centuries of a uniform and uninterrupted adverse usage, to be found entitled to the enjoyment and exercise of the rights and privileges

No. 138.

June 28, 1873.

Jex-Blake v. Senatus of University of Edinburgh.

aimed for them in this action. Nor can I see that the usage of the Bologna : any other foreign University can affect a question which must be governed r the usage of this country alone. The reference in one of the founding arters of the Edinburgh University to the rights and privileges of the other cotch Universities, and in that way indirectly, through the founding writs of e University of Glasgow, to a Papal bull conferring certain rights and privi- ges on the University of Bologna, can, I think, be held at most merely to late, in the words of the Lord Ordinary in the note to his judgment in the esent case, to "immunities from local and other taxes, and from the jurisdic- on of the ordinary tribunals; and as it is certain that none of these privileges ow belong to any Scottish University, not much assistance can be got by any rty from the Papal bull." Not only do I think that no assistance can be got om the Papal bull referred to, but that the fact that, notwithstanding the ference made to it in the establishment of the University of Glasgow, and in e establishment of the University of Edinburgh to that of Glasgow, these niversities have not been saved even from local and other taxes, or from the risdiction of the ordinary tribunals, is very significant, as shewing that it never as intended, and cannot be held, that a Scottish University, founded subse- uent to the Reformation, as the University of Edinburgh was, should, in respect f a bull issued by the Pope, in a country where at the time he was held to be all ut omnipotent, stand in the anomalous and unconstitutional position of enjoy- ng rights and privileges unknown to and inconsistent with the laws and usages f Scotland. Besides, the alleged usage of the University of Bologna and other oreign Universities, on which the pursuers so largely found, is not, on their wn shewing, so satisfactorily explained and established as to be relied on as vidence at all in the judicial determination of any litigated cause. In no view, herefore, can I see that the alleged foreign usage can be held in the present ispute to obviate the effect of the long and uninterrupted usage of every Uni- ersity in Scotland.

And just as little can it, in my opinion, be taken as sufficient to obviate the ffect of this long and uninterrupted usage in Scotland adverse to the rights and rivileges now claimed for women, that such rights and privileges are of the ature of res meræ facultatis, and therefore that, as it has not been shewn that uch rights and privileges have ever been claimed and refused, the non-exercise f them is of no consequence; for any such view as this obviously proceeds on he assumption that the alleged rights and privileges originally existed and still xist. But that is the question in dispute; and if my previous reasoning be ound, and the authorities I have referred to at all in point, there can be no oundation for any such assumption.

On the leading, and as it appears to me the fundamental question, therefore, nvolved in the present controversy, I can entertain no doubt that women are ot entitled by and under the constitution of the Edinburgh University, as it xisted prior to the regulations immediately to be noticed, to the rights and rivileges claimed by the pursuers.

It is maintained, however, and is apparently relied upon by the Lord Ordinary s the chief support of his judgment, that the right of women to be educated for he medical profession in the University of Edinburgh has been established, if t did not previously exist, by the regulations of the University Court of 10th November 1869. Now, although it may be, and I think it is, matter of regret hat anything should have occurred, however unintentional, calculated to mis- ead the pursuers, or to inspire them with expectations which are incapable of ulfilment, I am quite unable to see—giving to these regulations all the effect hat can legitimately or reasonably be ascribed to them—how the Senatus Academicus, who are the only parties besides the Chancellor called as defenders n the present action, have the power, even were they willing, to afford to the ursuers the University education and privileges they claim. The Senatus is ubject to the control of the other governing bodies, and especially of the Uni- ersity Court. The latter, again, have, by the regulations referred to, merely ound that women may receive medical education at the University in classes y themselves, separate from the male sex; but the pursuers have entirely une 28, 1873. ex-Blake v. enatus of niversity of Edinburgh.

No. 138.

failed to shew how in existing circumstances, or under the present constitution and establishment of the University, arrangements for that purpose could be made and enforced. Certain it is, at least, that according to the University Act of 1858, independently of everything else, the Senatus Academicus are by themselves powerless in the matter. It is impossible to assume, and assuredly it has not been shewn, that the Senatus can, by any power or means they at present possess, provide separate classes for the education of women, and yet the Lord Ordinary in the note to his judgment says that he thinks "the pursuers are entitled to be admitted as students of the University for the study of medicine therein, and they are entitled to be matriculated as students, subject only to the special condition that they shall be taught in separate classes confined entirely to women." But how, and in what manner, such separate classes are to be for the first time established in the University has not been explained. Who are to be the professors or teachers of such separate classes? Surely not the present professors of the University, who received their appointments upon a totally different footing. Again, if separate professors or teachers are to be appointed for such separate classes, who are to appoint them, and by whom are they to be paid? Surely not the Senatus Academicus, or the Chancellor of the University, or both together. And, as already explained, the Senatus Academicus have not in existing circumstances the power to admit women as students to be educated in the ordinary classes along with males, and accordingly the Lord Ordinary has himself remarked that "when the University Court has prescribed that women shall be taught in separate classes it is perfectly vain to attempt to compel the Senatus to make a regulation that women shall be taught in mixed classes along with male students." In short, the more the regulations referred to are examined the more clearly will they appear to be insufficient to support the action as laid by the pursuers.

It is, indeed, an important and very serious question whether these regulations were within the competency of the governing bodies of the University, all or any of them, to enact, and whether they can be recognised as having any effect at all. The University Court, by whom they were enacted, could have had no power to do so except under the Universities Act of 1858. Now, the only power bearing on the matter which they have, or are said to have, under that Act, is that which is contained in the 12th section, authorising them "to effect improvements in the internal arrangements of the University." But it appears to me to be very clear that this neither warranted nor contemplated any alteration of the previously existing constitution of the University. I think the words "improvements in the internal arrangements" must be taken to mean, as the words themselves necessarily import, not changes on or beyond, but within and in accordance with the constitution as it existed. And it would be strange indeed if a power had been given to the University authorities, or any of them, to change the constitution of the University by the enactment merely of regulations from time to time as they saw proper, altering, it might be, one day what they had enacted on another. The University Court is only one of the governing bodies of the University, and it cannot be supposed that they were, either separately or in combination with the other governing bodies, intended to have had any power conferred on them by the Act of 1858 beyond its purpose, as expressed in its preamble, viz., "To make provision for the better government and discipline of the Universities in Scotland, viz., the Universities of St Andrews, Glasgow, Aberdeen, and Edinburgh, and for improving and regulating the course of study therein."

If, therefore, it is to be held, as I think for the reasons already stated it must, that by the fundamental constitution of the University of Edinburgh, as it stood prior to and under the Act of 1868, women were not admissible as students, or had the other rights and privileges claimed by the pursuers, and that it were necessary to challenge the validity and binding nature of the regulations in question as going beyond the constitution of the University, and as being ultra vires of the University Court to enact, I should think that this could be done, and may be held to have been effectually done by the defenders, notwithstanding of there being no reduction at their instance, for I can observe no trace of such a

No. 138.

June 28, 1873.

Jex-Blake v. Senatus of University of Edinburgh.

chnical objection of bar in the record. Be this, however, as it may, these gulations when closely examined will, for the reasons already stated as well as hers, be found to be of little or no efficacy. Most assuredly they create and ipose no obligation or duty either on the Senatus or the Chancellor, who are e only defenders called in this action. So far as they relate to the teaching of omen as students in the University they merely enact (1) that "Women shall admitted to the study of medicine in the University of Edinburgh; (2) that e instruction of women for the profession of medicine shall be conducted in parate classes, confined entirely to women; and (3) that the professors of the culty of Medicine shall for this purpose be permitted to have separate classes r women." Taking these regulations together, as they must in order to be in-lligible at all, it is very obvious that there is nothing enforceable in them as ainst the Senatus Academicus, the Chancellor, or the professors. The professors e merely "permitted" to have separate classes for women if they please, but at cannot be converted into an obligation upon them to have such classes hether they please or not. The pursuers do not maintain anything so absurd, nd, accordingly, their action or complaint is not directed against the professors, r any of them. And what is their complaint or ground of action against the enatus Academicus and Chancellor, the only defenders they have called? If ey could have said and had said that either of these parties had improperly terfered to prevent the professors having separate classes for women, one could nderstand that an action, in some form or other, might lie against them, in rder to put an end to such improper interference, but no allegation, or plea, or round of action to this effect is to be found in the record. It is clear, indeed, om the pursuers' statement and pleas in the record, as well as from their argu-ent in their written case, that their complaint is, not that the defenders or any ther party had prevented or attempted to prevent them enjoying the full benefit, —whatever that may be,—of the regulations in question, but that arrangements ave not been made whereby the difficulties and obstacles in the way of their ttaining their objects under these regulations as they stand might be removed. hey accordingly, finding that the professors did not choose to open separate lasses for the education of women, would appear to have made various efforts, hich they set out in the record, to have the difficulties thus arising obviated or vercome. But it also appears that these efforts of the pursuers proved unavail-ng; and, in particular, it appears on their own shewing, in the 19th article of heir condescendence, that the University Court,—not the Senatus or the Chan-ellor, the only defenders here,—on the 8th of January 1872, shortly before the stitution of the present action, declined to assist the pursuers further than they ad previously done in the attainment of their objects.

So standing matters, the present action was brought, containing several decla-atory conclusions in the broadest and most comprehensive terms of the pursuers' ight to be admitted as students and to receive education in the University of dinburgh, not in separate classes, providing the professors were pleased to open uch for them in terms of the regulations, but independently of the regulations nd the conditions they impose altogether, and these declaratory conclusions are llowed by various petitory ones, intended obviously for the purpose of enforcing he decree asked for in terms of the former. In short, it is manifest, I think, eyond all question, that the object of the pursuers, looking not only at the con-lusions of the summons, but also at their statements and pleas in the record, as to obtain something quite different from what they could obtain under the egulations. This, indeed, is sufficiently obvious from the note of the Lord Or-inary. Thus the pursuers, in the first petitory conclusion, insist that the Senatus hall be ordained to make regulations whereby they may receive such instruction in the University "as is required to qualify for graduation in medicine," and, in particular, to use the words of the Lord Ordinary, "that they should direct and appoint the various professors whose duty it is to give instruction in medicine to permit the attendance of the pursuers upon their classes along with male students." But the Lord Ordinary remarks upon this that there are "no sufficient grounds or pronouncing any such decree, and there are conclusive reasons why no such decree should be pronounced." The Lord Ordinary then proceeds to deal with benefits they desire is noticed by the Lord Ordinary towards the e where he says that "if not the Senatus, at least the University doubted power to recognise extra-academical teachers whose course cient for the purposes of graduation. But in making this observa Ordinary would appear to have overlooked the fact, brought out b themselves in the nineteenth article of their condescendence, that t Court have refused, before this action was instituted, to adopt an Nor do I see how the University Court could be compelled to do this action, to which they have not been called as defenders at all, e it were within their power. Clear it is, however, in my apprehen have no such power, for, as explained by them when they refused t which had been made to them on the subject before this action wa proposed measure would imply an alteration in one of the ordinan tion, and that such alteration can be made "by the University C the consent expressed in writing of the Chancellor, and with the ap Majesty in Council." It is not said, however, that the consent of t or the approval of Her Majesty has been obtained or even appli compulsitor can be given, and none is asked for in the present ac the University Court, or any of the other governing bodies of th could be compelled to take the requisite steps for obtaining for the benefit of extra-academical classes.

In no view, therefore, that I can take of the conclusions of the mons have I been able to see how they can be given effect to within the competency of the Court to pronounce in the present
Lord Ordinary has, no doubt, by assuming that the regulations of t Court of 10th November 1869 are valid and binding, and must as forming part of the constitution of the University, given effect t declaratory conclusions, subject always to the conditions imposed lations. But this, in substance and reality, amounts to no more pursuers may, if they can get it, receive instruction in medicine in t in separate classes. It has been shewn, however, and is indeed mad part of the pursuers' complaint, on which their action is founded, not get such instruction, as the necessary means for giving it, in th which it can be given, do not exist. And it has also been shewn, a ledged by the Lord Ordinary, that neither the Senatus nor any governing bodies of the University, or all of them together, have

No. 138.

June 28, 1873.

Jex-Blake v. Senatus of University of Edinburgh.

that effect. Nor have they at any time or in any shape, so far as I can dis- proposed to amend, restrict, or modify the conclusions of their summons to fect or extent. It is true that in their argumentative case it is stated that ht be "of some importance to the pursuers that their ground of action . be affirmed, even to the limited extent of having it found that they are no personal disabilities to be the recipients of University degrees, because case the pursuers would have a moral claim to the intervention of the rsity to complete their studies, even if it should be held that the pursuers ; legally compel the University to take the necessary steps." But while rsuers make this incidental observation in their argumentative case they liately go on to state what the real objects of their action are, viz., those ded for in their summons, and certainly not those which are given effect the judgment under review. I can, indeed, very well understand that . decree as that which has been pronounced by the Lord Ordinary is cal- l to operate prejudicially in place of favourably to the pursuers, for, in ice to any other steps they may find it necessary to take for the purpose of ng their objects, it might be urged against them that as they had already ed or got a decree, it must be held to be the measure of their rights, d which they can have no further claim.

ust own, therefore, my inability to see any reason for thrusting upon the rs a decree for which they do not ask, and which can be of no practical them. And as to giving them a decree which is not concluded for,— may possibly be prejudicial to them,—and which, at any rate, can only as a "moral" lever to assist them in obtaining in some other form what annot get in the present action,—it appears to me that to do so would be ry to sound legal principle, and, as I believe, unprecedented in the practice Court.

he view I have taken of this case, as now explained, it is unnecessary to on the question whether, if the pursuers were to succeed in qualifying elves by the requisite University education, they would be entitled to all nours and privileges of graduation, for, obviously, matters are not advanced position which calls for, or admits of, the satisfactory determination of ch question.

ve only further to remark that, if the pursuers have failed, as I think ave, to support their claims consistently with the constitution of the rsity, whether considered in connection with the regulations of the 10th of nber 1869, or independently of these regulations, it is unnecessary to in- whether any other, and what remedies are open to them. I may, however, mitted to remark that if it be desirable, and for the interests of the country I do not say it may not—that women should receive University educa- qualify them as medical practitioners, it rather appears to me that it is Crown or Legislature, and not this Court, to determine upon what foot- d under what arrangements this should be done.

the reasons I have now stated I am of opinion that the interlocutor under r is erroneous, that it ought to be recalled, and that the defenders are en- to absolvitor from the present action as laid.

D MURE.—I am unable to view this case, as raised in the summons and , as one in which the main question to be disposed of is, whether the pur- in respect of the regulations passed by the University Court in November are entitled to decree to a qualified extent, in terms of some of the declara- onclusions of this action, with a view to their admission to graduation in ine in the University of Edinburgh, in the event of such additional regula- being made by the University authorities as will enable the pursuers to , which they cannot at present do, that instruction within the University is essential to graduation, and which, by assoilzieing the defenders, the s Academicus, from the two leading petitory conclusions of the summons, as to be admitted that the pursuers, even under those regulations, are not d to demand, and are therefore not in a position to enforce.

arger question, and one of more general importance is, in my opinion, dismentary ratification of the 14th of August 1621, by which the U established; and which, while they do not contain any express females from University rights and privileges, conferred upon th then constituted, all the rights, liberties, and privileges which pert other College in the realm. And the pursuers' claim, as I und rested not so much on the express words of the charter and P ratification of 1621, as upon the fact that by these deeds there w upon the College of Edinburgh all the privileges which pertained Colleges in Scotland which were founded by Papal bulls, by whic tained that these Colleges, and the University of Glasgow in pa placed in all respects on the same footing as the University of Bolog females appear to have been occasionally admitted to corporate p graduation.

As regards this reference to the usage at Bologna it does not that the pursuers can take any benefit by it; because, having r conflict of evidence which there is in the information which has bee the Court in regard to the admission of females to graduation at B not satisfied that there is evidence sufficient to instruct that any usa that University of the nature contended for on the part of the p even if there were such evidence it appears to me that in considering of usage, as bearing upon the construction of the charter of a Scotch it is by the usage of Scotland, and not by that of Bologna or of Universities, that the question must be disposed of. Putting asid reference to the usage at Bologna as having no direct bearing o case, I do not think that the language of the Papal bulls tends in s strengthen the pursuers' claim. Because, while in the foundation Edinburgh University, taken by themselves, there is no express females, neither are there any words expressly descriptive of th those for whom alone the University was founded. The language bulls, however, is different in this respect, inasmuch as in the preamble of all these deeds men only are expressly mentioned as t whom the Universities were founded, while the passages in each applicable to the granting of degrees rather appear to me to have so as to apply to the male, to the exclusion of the female sex. question now at issue had been raised upon the terms of these de themselves, and apart from any question of usage, I should have h culty in holding that they were either calculated or intended to fou sity except for the education of male students. But when the four

No. 138.

June 28, 187
Jex-Blake v.
Senatus of University of Edinburgh.

hich are so fully explained by Lord Ormidale in his opinion on this branch of e case, in which I entirely concur, based, as that opinion is, upon the applica-on of rules of construction which have been laid down in a series of decisions the Court of last resort of the most authoritative description, as well as upon e decisions applicable to the analogous question of the admission of females the elective franchise to which he refers.

The pursuers having thus, as I conceive, failed to shew that they have any gal right to demand admission to the privileges of students in the University, hile it is beyond question, on the other hand, that under the foundation deeds ales have that right, the remaining branch of this case must, I apprehend, be alt with on the footing that the main fundamental object and purpose of the unders of the University of Edinburgh was to establish an institution for the ucation of the male sex, and that the University is, therefore, one which by s constitution is limited to males. And if that be so it appears to me to follow at the defenders will be entitled to be assoilzied from the whole conclusions of e present action, unless it can be shewn that, in respect of some regulations hich the governing body of the University was empowered to pass, the pur-ers are entitled under this action to insist upon being admitted to the study of edicine to the extent that may be necessary to enable them to proceed to aduation, and are entitled to obtain a decree to that limited and qualified ect.

The disposal of this question, however, involves the consideration of the true eaning and effect of the regulations passed by the University Court in Novemer 1869, because two very different constructions appear to have been put pon them. In one view of these regulations they may simply mean that omen may be admitted to study medicine in the University in separate classes the professors of the Faculty of Medicine see it to be proper to have separate asses for them, without laying down any rules relative to graduation or other niversity privileges. And if this be the true meaning and only import of the gulations they appear to me not only to afford no support to the pursuers' tion as laid, but insufficient also to warrant a declaratory decree to any limited nd qualified extent. And they are in that view, moreover, regulations which I m not prepared to say that it may not have been within the power of the Uni-ersity Court to adopt.

But there is another view which may be taken of them, and that is the one hich I understand has been adopted and given effect to by the Lord Ordinary, iz., that they amount, and were intended to amount, to a declaration that omen were entitled to be admitted to the study of medicine in the University s matter of legal right, and to all the rights and privileges of students, in-uding graduation, subject only to the condition of the pursuers being able to btain instruction in separate classes. And if this be the true meaning of the gulations they cannot, I conceive, be founded upon by the pursuers to tablish the claim, or any part of the claim, made by them under the present tion, unless it can be shewn that the University Court, as the governing ody of the University, had a discretionary power, either at common law or in spect of the provisions of the Act of 1858, to make regulations for the admision of females as well as males to the rights and privileges of students.

Now, upon this point I am very clearly of opinion that at common law the overning body of a University of this description has no power to alter the onstitution of the institution with the management of which they have been ntrusted. And I have been unable to look upon the regulations as so interreted, and which are to have the effect of conferring upon females the right of dmission to all the privileges of a University which was founded exclusively or male students, in any other light than that of an alteration of the constitution
f the University which it was beyond the power of the governing body to enact.
Neither have I been able to bring myself to see that, under the provisions of the ct of 1858, any greater powers in these respects were conferred upon the Uni-ersity Court. That Act of Parliament was passed for the better government 'and discipline of the Universities in Scotland" as then constituted; and by he 12th section the University Courts are empowered "to effect improvements decide—any general question as to the constitution of all the U Scotland, or even any general question as to other studies or other the studies and curriculum enacted in the University of Edinburg fession of medicine. The judgment which I pronounced applies the University of Edinburgh, and is confined to the case of la therein "for the profession of medicine." It rests entirely and exc the regulations passed by the University Court on 10th Novemb approved of by the Chancellor on 12th November following; an the judgment does not and cannot go beyond these regulations. I on the one hand, that the pursuers cannot claim anything which tions do not give them expressly or by necessary implication: and hand, that the Senatus of the University, who are the only defend fuse to give effect to these regulations according to their true and f meaning.

In pronouncing the judgment under review, therefore, I simpl find that the regulations were valid and binding, and that the Uni so far as the regulations related to their functions, were bound out, and to give them effect; and I endeavoured to read the regul ascertain what were the rights of the lady students and the duties o under these regulations. If the judgment in any respect goes bey beyond the enforcement of such rights and duties, then I have erre

Apart from the regulations, and independent thereof, I am of opi ladies could not as a matter of right demand admission as students i sity. Without these regulations the answer would be conclusive th no arrangements made for the instruction of female students in m know of no power short of statute which could compel the Univers of any University to make such arrangements. Arrangements o must almost of necessity be different in different Universities. It and expedient in one University to make arrangements for the females either in medicine or in music, or in any particular science, v be impossible or inexpedient to do so in another University. I appears to me the matter is one of arrangement to be effected by th authorities of each University—an arrangement which cannot be forehand or forced upon any University, but which, when once ma enacted, must be obeyed and carried out by the individual members sity, and by the subordinate bodies of which the University consi versity, to make the arrangements for female students in medicine which are contained in the regulations of 10th November 1869? I can see no incompetency and no illegality in these regulations. They transgress no statute, they offend no rule either of law or of morality; and if they introduce a novelty this is no more than could be said of many improvements which are loudly called for in the interests of education. The University Court is the ultimate Court of appeal for the regulation of the whole studies within the University. To it is finally committed by statute the discretionary power "to effect improvements in the internal arrangement of the University," certain safeguards being provided under which this power shall be exercised. I am of opinion that the University Court legitimately exercised this power in enacting the regulations now in question. I think they did so in due and competent form. I think the formal objections taken by the defenders, the Senatus, are quite unfounded; and it humbly appears to me that to refuse to give effect to these regulations would be virtually to interfere with the final discretion vested in the University Court, and to review a decision of that Court upon its merits. I think that the Court of Session cannot do this, for it is not to the Court of Session or to the civil Courts of the country that the internal regulations of the University are committed.

Still further, if it be intended to challenge the abstract legality of the regulations of 10th November 1869 I think it very unfortunate that this question should arise in the present form. The legality of these regulations was unchallenged for nearly three years. They have been acted upon by the pursuers, and it may be by others. Their validity and their legality has been assumed even by the Senatus itself, for the attempt to get the regulations altered or repealed, which was made by the Senatus on 11th November 1871, implies that until repealed the regulations were effectual. On the faith of these regulations the pursuers have been allowed to prosecute their studies, to spend their time and their money, and now, without any action of reduction, without any declarator of illegality, and without calling the University Court or the University Council, or the University itself as a corporation, it is demanded that these regulations shall be utterly disregarded and treated as an absolute nullity. I am not prepared to do this. I think that to do so would be unjust as well as illegal.

I am quite aware that in the argument and pleadings for the pursuers they have maintained rights independent of the regulations. They have put forward some claims not warranted by the regulations, and some claims inconsistent therewith. They have pleaded their case much too high,—for example, in their demand for mixed classes instead of separate ones, and in various other particulars. The conclusions of the action are far too broad. But this is no good ground for throwing out the action altogether. Because a pursuer asks too much is no reason for refusing that to which he is justly entitled.

In reference to this point, however, I may remark that perhaps the judgment under review falls short in not giving absolvitor from some of the conclusions of the summons instead of merely dismissing them. I certainly intended to decide as emphatically that the pursuers are not entitled to demand or compel teaching in mixed classes as to decide that they are entitled to attend separate classes when such are provided, and to all the privileges which successful students can claim. This, however, is matter of form rather than of substance, and while it may modify the form of the interlocutor it would not affect the grounds upon which, I think, judgment should proceed.

I have only one other remark to make. It is true that the judgment does not contain in itself, and cannot contain, the means for securing to the pursuers, or compelling the defenders to give to the pursuers, a complete medical education. This may require the appointment of additional professors, or the sanction of extra-academical teaching, and the Senatus, who are the sole defenders, have no power by themselves to do this. It is possible, therefore, that the ladies, for want of teachers, may be hindered in getting their degrees, but this seems to me to be no reason for not enforcing the regulations so far as they go. Above all, it seems to me no reason for negativing the demand of the ladies that if they procure the teaching, and if they successfully complete their studies, they shall and otherwise they are entitled to proceed to examination for d grees; fourth, that the Senatus Academicus is bound to provide su to the pursuers, and thereafter to admit them to examination as medical degrees, and, on their being found qualified, to recommend Chancellor of the University for such degrees; and fifth, that the bound to confer such a degree upon any of the pursuers found qu recommended. The pursuers further conclude that the Senatus should be ordained to make regulations whereby they may receive tion in the University as is required to qualify for graduation in m in particular, that they should direct and appoint the various medi to permit the attendance of the pursuers upon their classes along students, or otherwise to teach the pursuers, and any other wom constitute themselves into a class, separately from the male studer ment of the proper fees; and that the Senatus Academicus shoul to admit the pursuers to examination for medical degrees, and, found qualified, to recommend them to the Chancellor for such that the Chancellor should be ordained to confer such degree up pursuers who may be so recommended.

Under these conclusions the pursuers maintain that they are e whole rights and privileges competent to male students in the Edinburgh, subject only to the condition that their instruction in be conducted in classes confined entirely to women, should the Sen cus so direct. The question thus raised for the decision of the whether the pursuers, being females, are by the law and consti
University of Edinburgh entitled to the rights and privileges clai

In order to arrive at a satisfactory conclusion upon this questi be necessary to consider, first, what the rights of women are, acc law and constitution of the University of Edinburgh, independe gulations passed on 10th November 1869 by the University education of women in medicine in the University; and, second these regulations any rights were conferred upon women which ca pursuers' claims.

I. It cannot, we think, be disputed that when the University and its charters were granted and ratified, the sole object contem education of the male youth of the community in languages, philoso medicine, law, and the other liberal sciences, and that the educati in the University was not thought of or provided for. The educat in the various branches taught in Universities was contrary to th tions of all classes and the opinions of the time; and the arrange tions were passed by the University Court, no woman has been admitted, or has even claimed to be admitted, within its walls as a student. In none of the other Scotch Universities have any women ever been admitted as students. This long-continued and uninterrupted usage of nearly three centuries shews, in our opinion, what was the intention of the founder, and what is the true interpretation of the general words in the charters and Act of Parliament establishing the University of Edinburgh, nam consuetudo est optima legum interpres. An illustration of the force and importance of long-continued usage is to be found in the cases which occurred in this country and in England regarding the right to the franchise claimed by women after the passing of the Acts in 1867 and 1868 to amend the laws relating to the representation of the people. The decisions in these cases appear to us to be direct authorities on the question now under consideration, and against the view entertained by the Lord Ordinary, that the right of women existed in abeyance, or depended only upon the University authorities making regulations and arrangements for its exercise.

Having regard, then, to the terms of the University charters and of the Act ratifying the same, and to the long and uninterrupted usage which has followed thereon, we are of opinion that women are not entitled by the law and constitution of the University of Edinburgh, as the same existed in 1869 before the regulations of the University Court were passed, to attend the classes of the professors, or to receive instruction within the University as students, or to obtain University degrees.

The pursuers in support of their claims have founded upon what they allege to have been the practice of the University of Bologna, and of other foreign Universities from the earliest times. It appears to us that the pursuers have failed to establish that women were admitted as students in any of these Universities until very recently; and further, that even although this had been established, such practice could not affect the decision of the question now raised by the pursuers, which must be determined by the law and constitution of the University of Edinburgh, and not by the constitution or by the practice of any foreign University.

II. The next question for consideration is, whether the pursuers are entitled to prevail in the conclusions of their summons, in respect of the regulations for the education of women in medicine passed on 10th November 1869 by the University Court. In dealing with this question we think it right to say that these regulations are contained in the extract from the minutes of the University Court, of date 10th November 1869, which were approved of by the Chancellor on 12th November 1869, and that these regulations are not to be extended by the previous resolutions of the Medical Faculty or of the Senatus Academicus. It is only the University Court which is empowered by the Universities Act to make improvements in the internal arrangement of the University.

1. By the Universities (Scotland) Act, 1858, section 12, the University Court is empowered "to effect improvements in the internal arrangements of the University, after due communication with the Senatus Academicus, and with the sanction of the Chancellor." But there is no power conferred upon the University Court to make any change upon the law and constitution of the University. The power given is to improve the internal arrangements of the University. This is administrative, not legislative, power—power, recognising existing rights, to make suitable arrangements for their exercise, but not power to confer the rights of students on a class or division of the community who had not such rights before.

By the regulations of 10th November 1869 the University Court enacted that 'women shall be admitted to the study of medicine in the University;" that 'the instruction of women for the profession of medicine shall be conducted in separate classes confined entirely to women;" and that "the medical professors shall for this purpose be permitted to have separate classes for women." Considering as we do that women were not then entitled by the law and constitution of the University to be admitted as students of the University, we are of opinion that the University Court was by these regulations (limited as their extent in from such of the medical professors as chose to give them such ins professor was enjoined to give them such instruction, and the w professors might have refused to give it. A number of them did they change their minds the pursuers cannot, as they admit, compl of study within the University required for a degree. Further, no in these regulations as to the right to a degree; and, so far as we are no provisions which, even by implication, confer upon wom receive a full University course of instruction in medicine, the rig on passing the usual examinations.

3. It appears to us also, although we do not rest our opinion under the ordinances of the University Commissioners, enacted und conferred by the Universities Act with reference to the University men are alone entitled to receive degrees in arts and medicine. Th can only be altered under section 19 of the Universities Act by t Court, with consent of the Chancellor of the University, and with of Her Majesty in Council.

On these grounds we are of opinion that the interlocutor of the I should be recalled, and that the defenders should be assoilzied clusions of the summons.

At advising,—

Lord Cowan.—The opinion which I have formed in this import repeated consideration of the very able written pleadings now befo is in conformity with that adopted by those of the consulted consider that the defenders should be assoilzied from the concl summons.

The main propositions sought to be established in this actio enough stated in the 1st and 2d pleas in law set forth in the re
That, according to the law and constitution of the University o women are entitled, on payment of matriculation and profes attend the classes of any professor as students, and are entitle instruction from such professor, which he is bound to give them;
according to such law and constitution women are entitled to obtai medicine, on proving that they are qualified in point of attainmen ledge for that distinction. The conclusions of the summons di these matters for the decision of the Court, on the ground of lega pursuers to have decree of declarator—(1) That they are entitled classes and to receive instruction from any of the professors on the with other students; (2) that they are entitled to have in

No. 138.

June 28, 1873.
Jex-Blake v. Senatus of University of Edinburgh.

regard to the special position in which the pursuers are placed, under the regulations of November 1869 and relative proceedings of the University authorities. To some extent these questions run into and affect each other, inasmuch as it may be said that the regulations of November 1869 have affected and now form part of the law and constitution of the University. But the course of pleading and the opinions of the consulted Judges require that the more general question should be, in the first place, separately considered.

On this all-important question, however, it is unnecessary for me to dwell, seeing that all the consulted Judges, without exception, have returned opinions to the effect that the legal rights asserted by the pursuers cannot be maintained or enforced irrespective of the regulations, and their effect on the constitution of the University. In this view I entirely concur. I cannot hold it to be doubtful that by the original charter and Parliamentary ratification in 1621, and the other documents forming the foundation of the University of Edinburgh, the institution was framed on the footing of providing for the education of male students alone; and that any doubt suggested as to the true effect and meaning of these constitutional documents, because of the non-express exclusion of females, has been removed by the usage that has followed for three centuries. The reasoning on this point contained in the opinion of Lord Ormidale has my entire concurrence.

On this essential part of the argument it requires to be kept in view that the exclusion of females does not rest, as some of my brethren consider, on the mere want of regulation by those who had, prior to the statute of 1858, authority to determine the internal arrangements for the education of students, i.e., the Magistrates and Council of the city. I cannot concur in the view that if females had presented themselves for matriculation their demand was open to refusal solely on the ground that no regulations existed such as those recently passed: Nor can I accede to the proposition which is at the basis of the opinion of Lords Deas and Jerviswoode, "that it was the absence of any such regulations, and not the absence of power to make regulations, which stood in the way." The objection, as I view it, does not rest on so shallow a ground, but springs from a deeper source, viz., that no power was conferred by the original foundation of the University on any parties connected with its government to admit females for education within its walls. Being an institute for male students, and actually regulated and managed accordingly, it formed an inherent part of its constitution that females could not be admitted to its benefits. A radical change behoved to be made by the Legislature or the Crown ere the admission of female students could have been or can be sanctioned by the University authorities.

On this branch of the argument, however, I may observe that the proposition referred to is scarcely consistent with the denial of the legal claims asserted in this action. Supposing the Magistrates and Council prior to 1858 to have had power to pass regulations for the admission and education of female students in the University, it would seem to me that they were under obligation to have exercised that power, and might have been compelled to do so. It cannot be thought that the non-exercise of powers of regulation actually possessed should be permitted to exclude from instruction any part of the community for whose behoof the University was established. The possession of the power to make regulations with regard to the education of females as much as of males may fairly enough be held to lead, as a necessary inference, to the recognition of a legal right in female students to have instruction. Had I been able to adopt the proposition that the University authorities all through its existence had power to pass such regulations as are before us I would have been inclined to sanction rather than to refuse the legal right.

This leads directly to the second matter for discussion, viz., the legality and effect of the regulations of 1869. Viewing this question in its purely legal aspect some matters have been stated in the argument which require to be eliminated from its true merits.

I cannot consider it at all legitimate to bring into this argument a discussion as to the intellectual superiority or inferiority of the sexes. And it appears to

My understanding is, that the pursuers themselves plead no such tion; and it would indeed have been singular had it been otherwis the defence of all parties not having been called was specially re early stage of the litigation. Although the Senatus Academic called as defenders this discussion must be held to proceed on the as if the University Court, or the University Council, or the Uni as a corporation, had been called as parties. The question whet done by the University authorities was beyond or within their pow be put aside or in any way affected by the form in which the act brought. The effect of any other conclusion would merely be to de sion of the cause till these parties were in the field. And this ce desirable for any of the parties interested, least of all for the pursue

Another observation I must make in reference to the jurisdiction in such manners as the present. The Court have no power to revie fere with any legitimate regulations passed by the University autho ing the internal arrangement or management of the institution. It it is alleged by individuals or by corporate bodies, whose rights or at stake, that these authorities have gone ultra vires, and enacte which they had no power at common law or under their statutory to enact, that their proceedings can be at all interfered with judicia the regulations of 1869 were within their powers they are altoge the control or review of this Court. There is no jurisdiction here t And assuming the admission of females to the medical classes t within the power and competency of the University Court the might have sanctioned the education of students, male and fema classes, or might have been made applicable, and may still be, to t of females, not to the medical faculty only, but to their admission a the faculty of arts, or of law, as well as of theology. In short, assu the power to admit females to the University no regulation pa authorities with regard to their education, whether along with or s the other sex, could be reviewed or in any respect controlled by thi say that hitherto the power has been acted on with so much discret call for "judicial interposition" is entirely to mistake the matte interposition could legally take place. And here, in my apprehen chief importance of the inquiry whether the regulations of 1869 not within the power and competency of the authorities by whom th examination and graduation, whether for the medical or any of the other faculties. This seems to me to be the issue on which the decision of this case depends.

Now, second, the statute 1858, which conferred so great a boon on the higher educational seminaries of Scotland, sets forth in its preamble that it is expedient for the advancement of religion and learning "to make provision for the better government and discipline of the Universities in Scotland," "and for improving and regulating the course of study therein." All the statutory enactments and provisions which follow are in strict accordance with the object of the statute thus announced. The better government and discipline, and the improvement and regulation of the course of study, are alone within the purview of those enactments. A Chancellor is to be elected and a University Court to be constituted in each of the Universities. The powers of the Senatus Academicus are regulated, and a General Council is appointed to be constituted, to consist of the members having the qualification specially set forth. Then by section 12 the powers conferred on the University Court are enumerated, to which it is not necessary to refer for the purpose of this argument farther than to notice the second and third subdivisions of the section. By these the Court is (2) to effect improvements in the internal arrangements of the University, after due communication with the Senatus, and with the sanction of the Chancellor, and (3) to require due attention on the part of the professors to regulations duly enacted as to the mode of teaching, and all other duties imposed on them. The University Court has no other power or authority whatever conferred on it by the statute. Assuming the passing of the regulations of November 1869 to have been within their power I do not think that there is any well-founded objection to them in respect of the steps taken, or of the mode adopted in their enactment, as is contended for by the defenders. The radical, and to my mind fatal objection, to which they are exposed, is that the Court exceeded its statutory power in recognising by these regulations the right of female students to matriculate with the view to examination, and graduation as the inevitable result in the event of success in their studies. I consider this to be an essential innovation on and change of the law and constitution of the University as then established. Such enactment cannot be regarded as falling within the objects of the statute, and as little, in my apprehension, can it be regarded as an "improvement in the internal arrangements of the University." Taking the condition of things as they stood under the existing constitution, and, inter alia, the fact that the only students admitted within its walls were male students, the Court are authorised to effect all manner of improvements on the internal arrangements made or to be made for their education, and for that end to take care that the professors pay due attention to such regulations as are enacted by the Court as to the mode of teaching and their other duties. In all this I do not perceive a trace of intention on the part of the Legislature to confer any authority, or of power actually conferred, to innovate on the established constitution of the Universities of Scotland in a matter so essential and inherent as that with which these regulations have dealt, and so to change their whole character as to recognise a right in females to matriculation,—or, in the words used by the senior counsel for the pursuers at the oral pleading, and not abandoned in the written argument, to make provision for boys and girls being equally eligible for matriculation in all or any of the faculties. I seek in vain for any expressions that can be held to have that import, and I see no provision empowering the Court to compel the professors to instruct any other class of students than such as have from the institution of the University been admitted within its walls.

And, third, the admitted inability to give practical operation to the regulations by judicial decree may be fairly enough viewed as a conclusive test in the present inquiry. The proposal is that the Court should to a certain extent and effect recognise the rights claimed by the pursuers, but, quoad ultra, assoilzie the defenders from the declarator, and dismiss the conclusions which seek enforcement of those rights. The Senatus has no power to compel the professors to give the required instruction. And we have seen that the University Court has no authority to pass regulations to secure such instruction at the hands of the professors. Hence it is that an operative decree cannot be pronounced, and thus it

That there is nothing improper or unbecoming in women, if d practising medicine—that women who are so employed, especially ought to receive a scientific education beyond that which mere emp can secure for them—are questions which I conceive can be ans one way. From the earliest times of which there is any recor practitioners have been not only admitted, but found necessary.
department, as in every other, knowledge is power; and the wel
the safety of the patient may be measured by the skill of the atte present summons raises no such questions, nor are its conclusio with by any such considerations. Females may obtain medical i means of what has been termed extra-mural teaching, without i those institutions which are appropriated and necessarily appro other sex.

The main and most important question we have to determine i whether women are entitled to matriculate, and to obtain their ed University of Edinburgh just as if they were males. Whether w qualified, are incapable of holding degrees, or of receiving acaden are totally different, and, in my opinion, altogether subordinate qu true that in the present summons the latter question is put only with and as a consequence of the former. But I think it necessary those two matters of inquiry; because I observe that in the arg pursuers it seems to be maintained that because foreign Univer several instances, conferred degrees upon women, therefore it must that they allowed the matriculation and instruction of female stu Universities. But if I mistake not there is no well authenticat the latter practice, although undoubtedly there are many instances

The two things are in themselves altogether different, and hav connection. The Universities of the Continent might well have th marking out for honours and distinction accomplishment and learn as well as in males. But that females should be entitled to qualify such honours, by obtaining their education in Universities, is a to matter. Now, that is the primary object of this summons, with pursuers would place no value upon any other concession. N sion of their summons embraces the matter of degrees, except with University education as a preliminary to the attainment o tion.

University, the Magistrates and Town Council of Edinburgh, or any others, could have had power to authorise the admission of women as students in the University.

No. 138.
June 28, 1873.
Jex-Blake v. Senatus of University of Edinburgh.

In regard to the regulations of 1869 I am of opinion that the Act of Parliament passed in 1858, under which the Senatus professed to act in passing these regulations, gave them no power of so far subverting the original constitution of the University as to admit female students within its walls for matriculation and regular education in any of its faculties. On this branch of the case I have had the privilege of seeing and deliberately considering the judgment which my brother Lord Cowan has just now delivered, and I concur with his Lordship in all that he has said.

To conclude, I agree with him, and with the majority of the whole Judges in thinking that the defenders ought to be assoilzied from the whole conclusions of the action.

Lord Neaves.—I am of opinion that the interlocutor under review ought to be recalled, and that the defenders ought to be assoilzied from the whole conclusions of the action.

I am of opinion that the Universities of Scotland—and by the nature of the case I feel compelled to look incidentally to the whole University system—were instituted and maintained for the special and exclusive purpose of conferring the benefits of the higher education upon male students without the necessity of their resorting for that purpose to foreign countries. The three earlier of the Scotch Universities, which were established in different parts of Scotland and at different periods during the fifteenth century, and that of Edinburgh, more immediately here in question, which had its origin about the time of the Reformation, and was ultimately established in the beginning of the seventeenth century, had all the same object—one which Themistocles declared to be so noble—that of converting a little state into a great one. That object was successfully attained in Scotland, and attained mainly, as I can conceive, by means of those great educational arrangements which were designed to produce able, learned, and accomplished men, for the salvation of the state and the advancement of the public welfare,—learned and able divines for the service of religion, learned and able lawyers for the practice of the law, skilful and enlightened magistrates and judges for the administration of justice, and wise and prudent politicians and statesmen for the great purposes of national legislation. The purpose, I take it, was to confer a complete and generous education, which Milton has defined to be, "that which fits a man to perform justly, skilfully, and magnanimously all the offices, both private and public, of peace and war."

I need not dilate upon the considerations which lead me to take this view of the original design of these institutions, for the real evidence on that subject must impress itself on every one; and I think I may say that the whole of the consulted Judges have arrived at the conclusion that the purpose contemplated in founding these Universities was the education of young men. That view seems to be confirmed by a general reference to the charters of the Universities, to the history of the country, to the state of public feeling upon such subjects; and I agree with the majority of the consulted Judges that the long usage which has followed, and which all of our brethren admit to be an important element, is here a conclusive consideration. From the year 1411 to about the year 1860, a period of 450 years, there is no instance produceable of a woman having been educated at any Scottish University. I need not dwell on the legal importance of that fact, which is so well demonstrated and enforced in some of the opinions we have received; and I do not think that any satisfactory or even plausible answer has been made to it.

The attempt at an answer consists in this, that the resort to an University is merely optional—what is called in law res meræ facultatis, a mere privilege—which the party entitled to it may enforce or not as he pleases, and which cannot be lost non utendo; and the case is put of an abstinence from University study by Roman Catholics, Jews, Indians, or negroes. It is asked, "Can it be said that the University could not, by vote and resolution, have admitted these

To a great extent this has always been our own law. In some been relaxed from special considerations; in others it has even extended. Women could not be tutors by the Roman law, but they to be so by our law, from our having come to consider that tutory Romans regarded it, a public office, but merely a private and dom for which women might be perfectly well qualified. They were lo with us from being witnesses, except in cases of necessity, and t competent as instrumentary witnesses only as the result of recen
From judicial offices they have always been excluded, and are neith nor qualified to act upon juries, unless it be on that limited kind of must consist entirely of females. Generally speaking, it will be co no political office can be held by any female, with one illustrious exception.

In this state of the law—there being an undoubted category by wh in consequence of their sex, are excluded from certain functions males—it becomes a question depending upon the general evidenc the actings of parties, whether the privileges, honours, and functior with University education were designed for men alone, as they h enjoyed, or were designed for young men and women indiscriminate

This seems to me to be the first and great question in the case. I to think that it is the only question, but it is certainly the leadi and it is put forward as such by the pursuers in their first declar sion—namely, that it should be declared "that the pursuers are attend the classes of any of the professors of the University of Edi to receive instruction from the professors in said University, upon payment of all fees exigible from students at the University for said
This is a very clear proposition, and one which, if decided in t favour, would be conclusive of the whole cause. It is very plain meaning, and what would be its effect. The Universities were instituted for the education of male students. Were they also instituted for the education of females? If so, every female presen as a student at the door of the College is entitled to be admitted to the usual terms. If there is not this equality, have male students and to what extent and effect, and on what clause or rule of law d ference rest? It seems to me impossible to take any middle co matter as to abstract right, or to draw a distinction at all betwee

No. 138.

June 28, 1873.

Jex-Blake v. Senatus of University of Edinburgh.

'the summons, instead of merely dismissing them. I infer from these ıat the Lord Ordinary now thinks the defenders entitled to absolvitor ladies' claim to attend the classes of any of the professors, on the ıt the general right is not supported by the regulations, which are con-ely to the medical classes. But in speaking of the claim to a general ord Ordinary seems to give, as his reason for negativing it, that with-gulations there were no arrangements made for the instruction of dents in medicine. Now, this may or may not be a good reason for cluded females from the medical classes prior to those regulations.
ns wholly irrelevant,—at least I cannot follow its connection with the f general right. Had ladies from the first a right to admission to the ısses of the University—to the Humanity and Greek classes, to the Logic and Moral Philosophy, to the Law and Divinity classes? Cerıe branches of instructions needed no special arrangements,—at least ıem did not. A woman bent upon learning Greek and Latin needed arrangement for following in the footsteps of the many distinguished ıo have successfully applied themselves to those studies. If they had ı attend those classes the exclusion must have rested, not upon matters echanical arrangement, but upon the principle that the University life tended for them, but for the other sex.

ds me to the consideration that very weighty reasons may have operated ional mind in constituting and continuing the Universities as exclusive
: the academical education of young men. It is not necessary that we opt all the views of our ancestors in this respect. It is enough if we ıch views existed and were entertained with an earnestness that acted ı the national will, which, after all, is the great foundation of all laws e institutions. It is a belief, widely entertained, that there is a great in the mental constitution of the two sexes, just as there is in their ınformation. The powers and susceptibilities of women are as noble f men; but they are thought to be different, and, in particular, it is . that they have not the same power of intense labour as men are en-
th. If this be so, it must form a serious objection to uniting them same course of academical study. I confess that, to some extent, I ıis view, and should regret to see our young females subjected to the incessant work which my own observation and experience have taught ıider as indispensable to any high attainment in learning. A disregard ı inequality would be fatal to any scheme of public instruction, for, as n that the general mass of an army cannot move more rapidly than its nd slowest portion, so a general course of study must be toned and down to suit the average of all the classes of students for whom it is and that average will always be lowered by the existence of any conıumbers who cannot keep pace with the rest.

this the special acquirements and accomplishments at which women but from which men may easily remain exempt. Much time must, o be, given by women to the acquisition of a knowledge of household family duties, as well as to those ornamental parts of education which ıch to social refinement and domestic happiness; and the study neces-ıastering these must always form a serious distraction from severer vhile there is little doubt that, in public estimation, the want of these rts and attractions in a woman would be ill supplied by such branches lge as a University could bestow.

his I assume that regard is to be had to the average powers of the nd, and not to the different position of remarkable and exceptional nd, in reference to this subject it may be noticed that we are apt to get r of the question by comparing extraordinary women with ordinary men, ıe true rule is, to compare together the ordinary run of both sexes, and ı please, to compare the rarer examples of superior excellence among men n—the Agnesis, the Lady Jane Greys, the Martineaus, and the Somer-ı the Galileos, the Bentleys, the Adam Smiths, and the Isaac Newtons.
ı no reason why a false delicacy should prevent us from considering far as I know, it has always been the rule in our grammar schc females. This has certainly been the case in the distinguished gr with which we are all acquainted in this city, and to which many much. The same rule has unquestionably been observed in all ou and surely there are very cogent reasons for such a system.

The period of life attained by the youth who are there educ sixteen to twenty-two, is the most of all susceptible of the more t of our nature; and, without the slightest suggestion of anything i gree culpable, how is it possible to feel secure that, with a number and women assembled together at a University, there shall nc attachments and premature entanglements, that may exercise a bligl on all their future life? What effect it might exercise upon th studies it would be hazardous to conjecture. It might, in some ca strange emulation; it might in others lead to total idleness amor schoolfellows. In any view, he would be a bold man who would c at a College, and send out some hundreds of young men and wom

"Inter sylvas Academi quærere verum," with whatever number of chaperons he might try to guard them.

One other consideration I must here touch upon as likely to h public feeling in this matter.

Our Universities were necessarily corporations. Our individua generally so as well, and it deserves to be remembered that this of corporation was very different from those modern associations porate privileges have been conferred by statute or otherwise.
company now-a-days is little better than a trading partnership, ar require little or no personal qualification, the great object being tc their funds and to get a good return from them, with certain speci transference or transmission. A corporation of that more ancient Universities and Colleges belong was a very different institution.
be called a body politic, for its functions, its benefits, and its reasc were much more of a public than a private character. Many, ir corporations were, directly and influentially, political, as conne municipal institutions.

Now, it appears to me that, as a general rule, the members of su were exclusively male, and that no woman could be a corporator.
that in some peculiar cases, as in some trading guilds, there m custom of extending, at least partially, the benefits of some corp to the widows or even to the daughters of guild brethren, but, i tion was both created and limited by the custom. In the higher

No. 138.

June 28, 1873.

Jex-Blake v. Senatus of University of Edinburgh.

Upon all these grounds I am satisfied that the non-attendance of women at the Universities in times past, which is an indisputable fact, was not a mere accident, or a mere arbitrary abstinence from the enforcement of a legal privilege, but arose from a consciousness, shared by them with the whole community, that the Universities were not instituted for them, though women would undoubtedly receive indirectly the benefits the Universities were calculated to confer, in making better men of their fathers, their brothers, their husbands, and their sons.

I have dwelt thus long on a point virtually conceded by all the consulted Judges because I think the condition of matters prior to the late regulations is of the utmost importance, and because the strength and solidity of the considerations which determined the old practice and constitution of the Universities enable us better to decide whether these could be, and have been, effectually changed in the case of the University of Edinburgh.

The argument here in favour of the ladies' claims arises out of the power given by the late Act of Parliament (21st and 22d Vict. 1858). The University Courts there established have this power conferred on them, videlicet, "to effect improvements in the internal arrangements of the University, after due communication with the Senatus Academicus and with the sanction of the Chancellor;" and on 10th November 1869, the University Court of Edinburgh made a regulation that "women shall be admitted to the study of medicine in the University."

It is upon this and other relative regulations that the interlocutor under review must now be considered as exclusively based. This view of their case does not seem to be satisfactory to the pursuers, who complain of it as evading their just legal demands, and leaving their position to rest on a very precarious and slippery foundation. I do not wonder at this feeling, and I confess that, if the pursuers' claims were to be held as entirely dependent on the regulations of the University Court I should consider this state of things as a great calamity to all concerned. If the admission of women to the study of medicine is to be held a mere matter of regulation it is of course liable to be changed, modified, or repealed from time to time, as the enacting body may think proper. This is inherent in the nature of such regulations, and the consequence would be that no reliance could be placed on the continuance of the privilege or permission thus given, which might be suddenly withdrawn or curtailed, to the great disappointment and injury of those interested. There could be no fixity of tenure in such circumstances. No class in the community, no individual woman, could trust to medicine as an available professional opening, and no justice could be done to a system thus imperfectly introduced. In the meantime, the question, involving, as it does, important interests and exciting considerations, would remain a subject of keen and bitter contention, and make the University Court a permanent battle-field between the partisans of the opposing factions. How far this would conduce to the interests of science, and to the peace or prosperity of our Universities, it is not difficult to conjecture.

But apart from these views I consider that the regulations in question, admitting women to the study of medicine in the University of Edinburgh, are wholly illegal, and palpably beyond the statutory power conferred upon the University Courts. Those Courts are empowered to effect improvements in the internal arrangements of the University, but the proposal to confer on women a right of admission to the study of medicine, not previously possessed by them, appears to me to be not an internal regulation, but an external innovation, and that, too, of the most serious kind. I cannot consider it to be mere matter of arrangement whether one-half of the population has or has not a right of admission to the University. To admit those who, in consequence of their sex, had no legal claim to University study, and to declare that they now should have such a claim, appears to me to be an essential and fundamental alteration, or rather subversion, of the established consuetudinary constitution of the University, which it is wholly beyond the power of a University Court to effect.

I do not suppose it can be maintained that the University Court can make any change they please. I should think even that if the University Court here have put upon them—I consider it quite unnecessary, in order to se that a reduction of them should be brought. The University authority over the University or over the Senatus Academicus, the province which the statute has assigned to it. Beyond those no standing, and its dealings and declarations are mere waste paper

I ought, at the same time, to advert to the view that these regul import, in any practical form, what they are said to infer; and i they are liable to the observation that they do not at all support t sought to be deduced from them. Accordingly, the declarator wh Ordinary has pronounced comes, on the face of it, to be a mere br that can have no effect and can lead to no result.

Women, it is said, are admitted to the study of medicine, but th they find classes that they can attend; they are only to be taugh classes, and professors are permitted to have separate classes; but professors are enjoined to have such classes, and it cannot be said fessor is bound to have them, while, as to graduation, nothing wha
This, then, is a decree which is wholly unenforceable, and can estal or available right. It is not the business of a Court of law to p clarators that lead to nothing, and this Court has always refused to

It is clear that the pursuers themselves see the case in this ve hence it is that with strict logical propriety they rested their act first of their conclusions, namely, that they are entitled to attend any of the professors upon payment of students' fees. Had they n proposition they would have had a plain and enforceable right, professor refusing to receive them would then have been guilty of duty. But as that general right seems now universally given up, an tions alone relied upon by the Lord Ordinary, and those Judges wh him, there seems no solid ground left on which the action or decree

Before concluding I shall make one or two observations on some points that have been referred to in the argument.

I agree in thinking that the examples which have been cited, of nected with foreign Universities, have no bearing on the case. Th after all come to very little, and chiefly amount to this, that, honorary titles conferred on women, it has happened that in one or t a wife or daughter was allowed to read her husband's or father's indulgence which might be easily conferred by the autocratic aut Pope or Emperor for the time being, to whom the Universities

tion of women in Scotland, and the course of our national history generally, to be wholly unsuccessful. Though naturally and willingly keeping aloof from public life, the condition of Scottish women in the 15th and 16th centuries was anything but slavish or degraded, nor were they considered as very timid or submissive. The evidence of Don Pedro d'Ayala, who was the Spanish Ambassador at the Court of James IV., is conclusive on this subject, and it is acknowledged that he was a keen and correct observer, as his character of that noble but unhappy monarch too plainly shews. The Scottish women, he tells us, "are courteous in the extreme," and, he adds, "they are really honest, though very bold." "They are absolute mistresses of their houses, and even of their husbands in all things concerning the administration of their property, income, or expenditure." Such women could not easily have been stopped from asserting a legal right intended for them, but they were doubtless aware that their proper place was at home, learning to rule their husbands, and bring up their children, with those happy domestic results of which Scotland has so much reason to be proud.

In deciding this case, as I am bound to do, upon strict legal grounds, I do not take up the time of the Court in saying much as to the personal feelings which it is calculated to excite. I will say this, however, that I have felt great sympathy with these ladies, both as to the object they had in view and as to the position in which they have been placed. I think that, from very natural motives and with the best intentions, but with unfortunate results, their friends have led them to form expectations which could never be realised in the way contemplated. Again, I think it very natural for those ladies who feel a vocation in that direction to wish to make themselves useful, and to earn an honourable independence, and I have no doubt there are departments of medical or surgical practice in which women may be fitly and successfully employed. There was an important branch of surgical practice in which their sex was long exclusively engaged, and which continued indeed to be their appanage from the time when Moses was found in the ark of bulrushes down till the beginning of the sixteenth century; for in 1522 a doctor was burnt alive in Hamburg for personating a woman in an obstetric case. That branch of practice in women's hands may now be looked upon with some contempt, but this I think a great mistake, and it might probably with great advantage be associated with other branches of domestic practice, for which women would be well adapted. This might surely be done without any material change in the constitution of the Universities. The rules of the London University, with its advanced notions, throw some light on this subject, for they refuse to accord to women the honour of graduation. In fact, any grievance of the pursuers arises out of the Medical Act of 1858. It is for the Legislature to determine the matter; but, if it was thought right, that Act might be amended by opening a somewhat wider door for medical qualification. The case certainly affords no ground for subverting the constitution of our Universities, or affecting the dignity and weight which belong to the highest honour attending the medical profession. The national object here is, and ought to be, to accomplish and adorn the character of a British physician, not only with all medical and physiological science, but also with the highest philosophy, intellectual and moral, and with all the resources of literature and learning which can aid him in his high functions. Any change that would incur the risk of lowering the standard that now exists, and which we have seen exemplified in so many of our great physicians and professors, is infinitely to be deprecated, and such a danger, I think, would be incurred by the revolution in the medical teaching of our Universities that has here been attempted to be brought about; while at the same time it would otherwise affect, and, in my opinion, deteriorate our Universities in a way unknown to any period of their history.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—As I was a member of the University Court of the University of Edinburgh during the period to which part of the proceedings refer, I should gladly have been relieved of the duty of judging in this case. But as your Lordships and the rest of my brethren have not thought that cir-or social expediency, our individual views are merely units hard on the sum of public opinion. The question of expediency, as far concerned, has been settled for us by the only competent authority

On the merits of this action my opinion coincides with that of the other consulted Judges who adhere to him. Lord Gifford, addition to his note, has very concisely expressed the views whi I think this is a question of purely academical administration, and be relegated to that department from which it is unfortunate for it ever was removed.

I am anxious in the outset to bring the case back from the wide dissertations by which it has been adorned and obscured to the which are raised in this summons. It is an action which has for its limit to define and enforce the duty of the Senatus Acade Chancellor of the University towards the pursuers, as matriculat the matters raised in the summons. No decree which can be pro action can go beyond this, and any such decree can only affirm a operative duty on the part of the defenders under the existing r their authority is regulated and defined.

However wide, therefore, the demands made in this summons m they must be read in the light of the position and obligations of t executive body of the University. This has been brought to a plea stated for the defenders, that all parties were not called; meant that they could not be required to do any act which was by the existing rules of the University, and that the summons r in which their academical superiors were the proper contradicto Ordinary, on the ground that no such question could be raised un summons, repelled that plea, and I do not understand that it is n sustain it. It therefore may be held as fixed that the summons farther effect than to enforce the duty of the defenders as defined rules of the University.

Although, therefore, such a course would have excluded an i most elaborate discussion, I greatly regret that the argument has fined within these limits. The pursuers manifestly could not existing laws of the University without bringing into Court t entitled to defend and had power to enforce them. The Senat on the other hand, who justly pleaded that their duty was obedie laws, and that they were not bound to answer to a challenge of th are entitled to insist on the question being confined to their pre not question the legality of the very laws which they plead they h

No. 138.
June 28, 1873.
Jex-Blake v. Senatus of University of Edinburgh.

matriculate as students with a view to the prosecution of the study of medicine, provided their instruction was conducted in separate classes confined entirely to women, and for this purpose the professors were permitted to have separate classes. The sixth of these regulations was as follows:—"All women attending such classes shall be subject to all the regulations now or at any future time in force in the University as to the matriculation of students, their attendance on classes, examination, or otherwise."

Under these regulations the pursuers passed the preliminary examination in arts prescribed for medical students, matriculated in the ordinary manner, and received their tickets of matriculation; were registered as students of medicine in the Government Register; and finished the first portion of the medical curriculum by attending the prescribed classes. Some of them passed the examination in the middle of the curriculum; but at this point their farther progress was arrested by two elements. The first was, that they could not find professors willing to teach them in separate classes. This difficulty might perhaps have been got over had not the Senatus Academicus raised the second, by intimating very clearly that they intended to resist the admission of any of the pursuers to graduation, and raised doubts whether to do so would not be contrary to law. They ultimately applied to the University Court to rescind the regulations of 1869. The University Court declined to rescind the regulations, but finding the legal question raised, although not indisposed to aid the pursuers, they held their hand, and the pursuers accordingly raised this action.

The conclusions of the action accordingly raise these two practical questions: The first is, whether the professors in the Medical Faculty are bound to teach the pursuers, either in separate or in mixed classes, under the existing laws of the University? The second, whether the defenders are bound to admit the pursuers to graduation on their complying with the other regulations of the University?

Although the pursuers, driven, as they thought, to vindicate their legal rights, have endeavoured to solve their difficulties by the first of their conclusions, I think there is manifestly no ground on which it can be supported. The University Court has defined the conditions under which alone they can be admitted to study within the University, and these conditions leave it optional to the professors to teach or not, but prohibit them from teaching in any but separate classes. There is therefore only one practical question which remains to be considered, and that is, whether under the regulations of the University Court, and subject to the conditions therein expressed, the defenders were bound to admit the pursuers to graduation? On that question I entertain no doubt whatever. These regulations had no object, and no meaning, as regarded those women who intended to follow medicine as a profession but to enable them to qualify for graduation, nor do their terms in my opinion admit of any other interpretation. In the faith of these regulations the pursuers have entered on the course of study prescribed, and incurred the delay and expense of going through a considerable portion of the curriculum. To deny them the degree which was essential to their entering the profession, with a view to which they studied, on the pretext—for it is no better—that no such end was ever contemplated, is in my opinion entirely unjust and unwarranted, and that all the more that the evils said to be connected with the admission of females to the University attach only to the study which is permitted, while the honour can injure no one and is only valuable as the passport to the medical profession, with which as a body the defenders have no concern.

That this question of graduation, from whatever cause, is in reality the sole matter in dispute, is sufficiently evident from the pleading of the defenders themselves. No doubt they devote a large portion of their argument to prove that women never have been and never ought to be admitted to University study; but in the sequel they disclose with sufficient clearness that if the pursuers would have contented themselves with mere certificates of proficiency, and would have abandoned their claim for graduation, they might possibly have fared better, and they suggest that a charter like that granted to the London University might have removed all the difficulty as long as the right to graduation was denied. All these alternatives imply University study, and therefore the cardinal point of the case is the right to graduation. My opinion is, that on completing the curriculum as matriculated students the pursuers are entitled, by the existing rules of the University, to be admitted to graduation, and indeed I have found little in the shape of argument addressed to prove the contrary.

No. 138.

June 28, 1873. Jex-Blake v. Senatus of University of Edinburgh.

This, in my opinion, is sufficient for the decision of this case. It is, however, maintained by the defenders that the University Court had no power to pass these regulations. They say that by the constitution of the University no woman can be permitted to enter within its walls either for study or for graduation, and that the regulations themselves, and all that has followed on them, are a mere nullity, and can receive no effect.

I think this answer entirely irrelevant. Questions may no doubt arise between the superior and the subordinate powers in the University as to the legality of orders given by the former; and that these may be legitimately called in question I do not doubt. But when a student has entered the University, and has duly conformed to the rules on the faith of which he entered, it can be no defence on the part of the Senatus Academicus to his claim to graduate that the rules under which he was admitted are liable to legal objection. The duty of the Senatus is to obey the de facto law of the University, and any other principle would be not only subversive of academical discipline but would lead to the greatest injustice, as I think is the case here. The matriculation of the student creates an implied contract between him and the University authorities that if he comply with the existing rules they will confer the benefits in the hope of which he resorted to the University. They cannot, after the student has performed his part of the engagement, refuse to fulfil theirs on the pretext that the contract was made under rules which it was beyond the power of their academical superiors to make. They cannot compel the student, as a condition of his obtaining graduation, to take upon himself the defence of the laws of the University. His sole duty is to obey them, and if their lawfulness is to be disputed that must be done in a question with those who made them, not with the student who trusted to them.

I have therefore no difficulty in finding this defence wholly irrelevant as against the present pursuers, and inconsistent with the academical position of the defenders. But as the question of the legality of these regulations has been so largely discussed I shall shortly state the views which I entertain in regard to it.

The challenge has been founded on two grounds—the original constitution of the University, and the usage of many centuries. The latter element has some plausibility; the former seems to me quite unsupported, but, on the best consideration I have been able to give them I think both grounds are fallacious.

On this part of the question both parties have resorted to extreme propositions, which, while they have added to the interest, have been far from increasing the pertinency of the argument. The contention of the pursuers,—that females are entitled at once, and subject only to the same regulations as male students, to be admitted to the University, and that the authorities are bound to make needful preparation for their reception,—is in my opinion a hopeless one, against which the long-continued usage is conclusive. On the other hand, it has surprised me to find it contended, in the name of the Senatus Academicus, that it is a mistake to suppose that the University of Edinburgh ever had by its original constitution a legal right to confer degrees on any one, and that the practice to the contrary was probably a mere assumption. We must reduce this controversy within more reasonable limits.

I am of opinion that it is clear, from the terms of its foundation, that the University of Edinburgh was intended, like that of Glasgow and that of Bologna, the prototype of both, for the instruction of the community. I can give no weight to the criticisms, which are failures even within their own narrow limits, on the use of masculine nouns and adjectives in these foundations. One example will suffice. The words of the bull of Pope Nicholas V., founding the University of Glasgow, were actually pleaded to us as indicating that the education of males was alone contemplated, because one ground of granting was said to be "ut viros

No. 138.

June 28, 1873.

Jex-Blake v. Senatus of University of Edinburgh.

lucat consilii maturitate conspicuos, virtutum redimitos ornatibus," &c. But purpose would continue to be as true as it was then were the pursuers to eed in all for which they have contended. It will always continue to be main object for which this and the other Universities were founded, to train rorthy men for the service of the state. But the words which immediately w truly express the generality of the objects in view, "Sitque ibi scientiarum irrigans, de cujus plenitudine hauriant universi literarum cupientes imbui imentis," which includes every member of the community who is desirous of iting by the fountains of knowledge. It is a public highway, along which who are anxious enough and strong enough are at liberty to travel, without inction of age, or rank, or creed, or sex, or nation,—such is the import of the ds, and such is admitted, with one exception, to be their import. Does it ify that from time to time the regulations of different Universities have ed, sometimes introducing domiciliary regulations which might exclude one s, or financial regulations which may exclude another, or religious observances ch may exclude a third? These and such like may limit, and practically do it, the members of the community who immediately profit by these institu- s to the merest fraction of those for whom they were intended. But this acts nothing from the catholicity of the institution itself. If the same words foundation were applied to any public object,—an infirmary or hospital, a lic library, an institute of science, of language, of painting, or of music,— ld they necessarily include one sex only and exclude the other? Many al instances of the reverse will occur to every one, in which even the joint ly of adults of both sexes is not unknown. The important fact in the present is, that as the University of Edinburgh is at present constituted the regula- s are entirely consistent with its practical administration, and have been nd by experience to be so.

With regard to the argument drawn from usage, it is sufficiently plain that there been any usage the other way this question never could have arisen. t no woman has ever been admitted, or has ever asked to be admitted, to duate in a Scotch University is quite true. But I think the weight due to t fact is considerably misapprehended.

n the first place, before usage can be held to restrict or limit powers which othewise general, the usage must be reasonably connected with the limita- L. Before a University could admit a woman to graduation, some woman st have applied for graduation; and if the Universities never had the oppor- ity of exercising the power, it is difficult to see how the fact of its never ing been exercised can limit the generality of the grant. But it is quite ain that the non-application of women to be admitted as students in the iversity had no connection whatever with the power or want of power on the t of the University to admit them, but on social considerations, obvious ugh in themselves, and which, whatever our judgment in this case, will con- ue to limit the number of female students to a fraction. If the Universities ginally were intended for the benefit of the whole community, the use of the blic right by any one of the community preserves it for all the rest, and it is no moment that hitherto the benefits have only been claimed by the sex, or class, or nation, or creed, who found it suit their objects in life to take ad- tage of them. As members of the community, females were not excluded the original grant, or rather there was no limitation laid on the University ich prevented them from admitting any member of the community, and the ver, in my opinion, remains as unrestricted as it was at the first.

While, however, those members of the public who take advantage of these titutions preserve the right for the rest, in like manner the course and habit administration may come materially to restrict those who demand that that rse of administration should be altered to suit their views. Persons placed circumstances which have hitherto prevented them from availing themselves University instruction are not entitled to require the University either to r their rules to suit their circumstances, or to admit them on conditions pre- icial to the interests and discipline of the great mass of the students. If the nciliary character which at one time prevailed in the other Universities had continued to prevail in Edinburgh, it would of course have operated a practical exclusion of the demands of the pursuers. The same thing would have excluded all who resided beyond the University limits. A non-resident could no more have demanded a relaxation of the rule to meet his case than could a woman. So in the English Universities, which have preserved this kind of character longer than any others in Europe, the same rule would unquestionably apply. But time has abrogated these customs which were engrafted on the original general powers of the Scotch Universities, and it has been found to be possible and expedient, without any relaxation of academical discipline, to introduce this new arrangement into the University system. But I apprehend that was a matter entirely within the discretion of the University authorities.

No. 138.

June 28, 1873. Jex-Blake v. Senatus of University of Edinburgh.

I attach but little weight to the argument drawn from the franchise, or to the notion that a University degree implies a public function. As to the first, the distinction is manifest; as wide as the distinction between the education and cultivation of the intellect on the one hand, and political power on the other. It was the nature of the subject-matter which alone gave pertinency to the allegation of usage in the case of the franchise. The franchise is a public function from which, from its nature, the presumption is that women are debarred unless there be a specific law to the contrary. The usage was justly held to prove that the general terms of the Act of Parliament could not be regarded as a specific law to the contrary. The presumption in the present case is exactly the reverse.

Lastly, as to the supposed public nature of a University degree. The argument on this head, although very able, runs into untenable refinements. There is nothing cabalistic or mysterious in a University degree. It is simply an attestation of academical merit. It may, like the ownership of property, be taken as a test for civil functions, but it does not follow that a woman, although a graduate, is competent to discharge them. While the analogies drawn from the Continental practice do not greatly aid the general argument, I think it has sufficiently dispelled the notion that it ever was the academical law of Europe that a woman could not be a graduate. On the contrary, in the cases which have been handed down to us, the European Universities of yore hailed and proclaimed the successes of those of the gentler sex who were thought worthy of the honours of the learned. I find in Bayle, in his notice of the works of Ronaldini, an Italian mathematical writer, published in 1684 (Bayle, Œuvres, i. 361), that that author published a treatise in which he discussed the question, "If it be competent to confer on women the degree of Doctor in Theology" (Caroli Ronaldinii, Mathematicæ Analyticæ, pars tertia, 1684). His theme was taken from the case of Helen Piscopia Cornaro, "of glorious memory," as the writer says, on whom the University of Padua wished to confer this distinction, but who found, as the pursuers have found, an antagonist, in the shape of Cardinal Barbarigo, the Bishop of Padua, who protested successfully against that theological honour being conferred on a woman, and she was accordingly obliged to content herself with the degree of Doctor of Philosophy. The account of this lady (Cornaro) in Moreri's Dictionary says that this honour was conferred upon her in the presence of many Venetian nobles and other grandees of Italy, and more than a hundred ladies of rank who had come express to Padua to witness so unusual a ceremony. We may smile at the enthusiasm of the seventeenth century; nor is it for us to judge which of the two ancient Universities might best maintain the true academic spirit—one in throwing open their gates with acclamation to those aspirants to their honours, the other in sternly shutting them. But, on the whole, I think the defenders have entirely failed to prove that graduation is, or has ever been held to be, among the great Continental Universities, beyond the ambition of a woman, or that there exist any solid grounds, even could the question be raised in this action, for questioning the power of the University authorities to pass the regulations in dispute.

THE COURT, on 27th June 1873, pronounced the following interlocutor:—"The Lords having resumed consideration of the cause, with the written opinions of the consulted Judges, in conformity with the opinions of a majority of the whole Judges, recall the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary of date 27th July 1872: Assoilzie the defenders from the whole conclusions of the summons, and decern: Find the defenders, the Senatus Academicus, entitled to expenses, and remit to the Auditor to tax the same and to report: And in respect it is stated for the defender, the Chancellor of the University, that he makes no claim for expenses, find no expenses payable to him."

No. 138.

June 28, 1873.

Jex-Blake v. Senatus of University of Edinburgh.

MILLAR, ALLARDICE, & ROBSON, W.S.—W. & J. COOK, W.S.—JAMES ALLAN, S.S.C. —Agents.

GEORGE DEMPSTER AND ALEXANDER DEMPSTER, Pursuers.—Fraser.
REV. ROBERT R. RAE AND REV. JOHN E. RAE, Defenders.—Scott.

No. 139.

July 1, 1873.

Dempsters v. Raes.

Issue—Agreement—Reduction—Fraud—Fraudulent Concealment—Essential Error.—Residuary legatees under a settlement brought an action to reduce an agreement between them and other legatees under the settlement, averring that the defenders, taking advantage of the pursuers' ignorance of their rights and the amount of the succession, had by fraudulent misrepresentation and concealment induced them, greatly to their prejudice, to enter into the agreement. The defenders objected to an issue of fraudulent concealment, on the ground that there was no duty to disclose. Held (1) that in entering upon the contract there was a duty of disclosure incumbent on the defenders, and that the pursuers were entitled to an issue of fraudulent misrepresentation or fraudulent concealment; and (2) (diss. Lord Cowan) that the pursuers' averments were insufficient to found a separate issue of essential error.

2D DIVISION. Ld. Mackenzie R.

THIS action was brought by George and Alexander Dempster, the nearest of kin and heirs-at-law of the late Dr Francis da Cruz M'Cowan, Edinburgh, against the Rev. Robert Reid Rae, and the Rev. John Ellis Rae, second cousins of the said Dr M'Cowan, and legatees under his will, for reduction of an agreement entered into between the pursuers and defenders relative to the succession of Dr M'Cowan, on the ground that the pursuers were induced to enter into it through fraud on the part of the defenders.

The following were the circumstances under which the action was brought:—Dr M'Cowan died on 6th October 1872, leaving a trust-disposition and settlement, dated 25th March 1870, whereby he disponed his whole estate to certain persons as trustees for the purposes therein mentioned. By this settlement several legacies of money and specific articles were made, and, inter alia, there was left to the defender Robert Reid Rae a legacy of £500, and to the defender John Ellis Rae a legacy of £500. As regarded the disposal of the residue, after paying the bequests, the deed proceeded thus:—"In the next place, I direct my said trustees, as soon after my death as they may find convenient, or as the state or circumstances of my succession may permit, to realise and convert into cash the whole of my estate and effects (excepting such articles not specially appropriated by me for bequests as my residuary legatee or legatees may desire to be delivered up to them in kind) which shall arise, after fulfilling the other purposes of the trust before specified, and to divide, deliver, and pay over the residue thereof to such person or persons as I may hereafter nominate and appoint to be my residuary legatee or legatees by any codicil or other writing by me clearly expressive of my will, tho' not formally executed, and failing such nomination and appointment, then to my heirs and representatives whomsoever." Dr M'Cowan subsequently left a codicil which, except in so far as it recalled the appointment of one of the trustees, and gave one of the defenders £600 and the other £400 instead of £500 each, did not interfere with the provisions of the trust-deed.

No. 139.

July 1, 1873. Dempsters v. Raes.

As nearest of kin and heirs-at-law to Dr M'Cowan the pursuers were entitled to the residue, which amounted to a sum of £9000 or thereby.

The pursuers averred;—(Cond. 8.) "The defenders, immediately after they became aware that they were only to receive the above legacies of £400 and £600, and that the pursuers would each be entitled to several thousands, formed a fraudulent scheme for the purpose of defrauding and circumventing the pursuers, and inducing them to forego their rights under the will, and to divide the estate equally with the defenders, so that instead of the defenders getting only £400 and £600 respectively, each of them should carry off £2500 or thereby." (Cond. 9.) "In pursuance of this scheme the defender John Ellis Rae wrote to the pursuer George Dempster, on 10th October 1872, the day after Dr M'Cowan's funeral, a letter stating,—'You and your brother are not mentioned in the Dr's will, but you have a deep interest in it,' and invited them to come down to Glasgow to him, and that he would go to Edinburgh with them." (Cond. 10.) "Accordingly, the pursuer George Dempster arrived in Glasgow on the morning of 15th October 1872. The pursuer Alexander Dempster arrived there on the evening of that day. The pursuers remained at the defender John Ellis Rae's house all night, and came to Edinburgh with him next morning. Before reaching Edinburgh the defender John Ellis Rae did not communicate to the pursuers any facts regarding Dr M'Cowan's will, or the amount of his estate, or inform them of what had been left to the defenders, or what interest the pursuers had under the will, or what were their rights as next of kin and heirs-at-law, and the pursuers had no knowledge whatever in regard to these matters. The only information given by him to the pursuers was, that he and his brother were mentioned in the will but that the pursuers were not. The defender John Ellis Rae, in pursuance of the defenders' fraudulent scheme, spoke in most unfavourable terms of the trustees to the pursuers, without having, as the pursuers have since learned, any ground for doing so, saying that they were very bad men, bore a bad character, and were not to be trusted, that it would be important for all parties interested in the estate to get rid of them if possible." (Cond. 11.) "The defender John Ellis Rae informed the pursuers that the other defender Robert Reid Rae would meet them in Edinburgh. On arriving in Edinburgh, he took them at once to York Place, to Dr M'Cowan's house, and on the way there they were met by the said Robert Reid Rae, who returned with them to the house. They were there shewn into the dining-room, where David Kerr Smith, a writer, but not practising as such, and whom the pursuers had never before seen, was standing. The defenders at once began to abuse the trustees, stating that the trustees' object was to protract the winding up of the estate, and to cause expense, and that unless the estate could be got out of their hands it might be years before anything could be got out of it. The defenders did not inform the pursuers what the amount of the legacies left to the defenders was, but they represented to the pursuers that as they were not named in the will they could claim no beneficial interest in the estate, but that as they, the pursuers, were the nearest of kin, their co-operation was necessary to get the estate out of the trustees' hands. They therefore proposed that, if the pursuers would co-operate with them, they would throw their legacies into the general estate and divide it equally with the pursuers. This they falsely and fraudulently represented would be a most beneficial arrangement for all parties, and one by which the estate could be taken out of the hands of the trustees, who were trying to hang up proceedings and fritter it away in expenses, so that no party would get any substantial benefit under it. They further proposed that the pursuers should then and there sign an agreement, under which the estate,

No. 139.

July 1, 1873.
Dempsters v. Raes.

fter all other debts and legacies were paid, except those to the defenders, ould be equally divided amongst the pursuers and defenders."

The pursuers further averred that having perfect confidence in the de- nders they agreed to this proposal, and on Mr Smith's producing a ritten agreement they signed it along with the defenders. That they ever saw the trust-disposition and settlement until after they had signed is agreement, and that they were induced to sign it solely by the false nd fraudulent representations of the defenders. That they signed the greement under essential error as to the nature and effect of the trust- isposition and settlement, as to the nature and effect of the agreement, nd as to their rights as next of kin and heirs-at-law, induced by the raudulent representations and fraudulent concealment of the defenders.

The agreement which was now sought to be reduced was in the following erms:—"Agreement between George Dempster of 31 Arundel Street, ondon, Alexander Dempster, Newport, Isle of Wight, the Rev. Robert leid Rae, minister of the parish of Avondale, and the Rev. John Ellis lae, Port-Dundas, Glasgow.—The parties above-named and designed, eing the nearest relatives of the deceased Francis da Cruz M'Cowan of 7 York Place, Edinburgh, have agreed, and do hereby agree, as follows, iz.,—First, The said parties have renounced and do hereby renounce their espective interests and claims on the estate of the said deceased in favour f one another. Second, That the said parties shall aid and assist one nother to the utmost in the winding up of the estate of the said deceased, nd in order that the same be done as speedily as possible whatever oney may require to be borrowed for this purpose each is to take his hare of the responsibility. Third, That on all legal claims on the said de- eased or his estate being satisfied and paid, whatever residue of the said eceased's estate remains is to be divided in equal portions between s, the parties hereto.—In witness whereof," &c.

In answer, the defenders denied that they had been guilty of misrepre- entation or concealment, and averred that the agreement was entered into t the suggestion of the pursuers.

The pursuers pleaded;—(1) The said agreement ought to be reduced, in espect that the subscription of the pursuers was obtained by fraud on the art of the defenders. (2) The pursuers having signed the said deed nder essential error, induced by the fraudulent representations and con- ealment of the defenders, it ought to be reduced. (3) The defenders aving circumvented the pursuers, and induced them to sign said deed hen under essential error as to the effect of the said trust-disposition and ettlement, and of their rights as next of kin and heirs-at-law foresaid, the aid agreement ought to be reduced. (4) The defenders having, while pro- essing to advise the pursuers disinterestedly as to the course they should ollow, fraudulently represented that it would be a benefit to the pursuers o sign the said document, and fraudulently concealed important facts elating to the succession which formed the subject of the negotiations etween them and the pursuers, and the deed in question having been ranted in consequence thereof, it ought to be reduced."

The defenders pleaded;—(1) The averments in the condescendence are rrelevant, and insufficient in law to support the conclusions of the action, r any of them. (2) The agreement sought to be reduced being a valid nd binding agreement, and no good objection or reason of reduction being verred or existing in fact, the defenders should be assoilzied, with ex- enses.

The Lord Ordinary pronounced an interlocutor approving of the follow- ng issues:—"It being admitted that the writing, of which No. 6 of pro- ess is an extract, was executed by the pursuers and defenders on or about the 16th day of October 1872: 1. Whether the pursuers were induced to execute the said writing by fraudulent misrepresentations or concealment made, or caused to be made by the defenders, or either of them, in regard to the pursuers' rights and interests as next of kin and heirs-at-law of the late Dr Francis da Cruz M'Cowan, of No. 27 York Place, Edinburgh? 2. Whether the pursuers executed the said writing under essential error, induced by the misrepresentation or concealment of the defenders, or either of them, as to the pursuers' rights and interests as next of kin and heirs-at-law of the deceased Dr M'Cowan?"

No. 139.

July 1, 1873. Dempsters v. Raes.

The defenders moved the Court to vary the said issues by substituting a single issue in the following terms:—"It being admitted," &c., "Whether the pursuers executed the said writing under essential error, induced by the misrepresentation of the defenders, or either of them, as to the pursuers' rights and interests as next of kin and heirs-at-law of the late Dr Francis da Cruz M'Cowan, of No. 27 York Place, Edinburgh? or in such other terms as your Lordships may think meet. Or otherwise, to alter and vary the said issues by deleting from both of them the words 'or concealment.'"

Argued for the defenders;—An issue of misrepresentation was sufficient, for there was no duty to reveal incumbent on the defenders.[1] That being so an issue of concealment would not be relevant.

Argued for the pursuers;—In this case a duty to disclose was laid upon the defenders, for they opened negotiations; they knew the position of parties and the amount of the estate, and also knew that the pursuers were ignorant on these matters.[2] Therefore it was necessary to have an issue of concealment.

At advising,—

Lord Justice-Clerk.—The case for the pursuers is that they, being entitled under Dr M'Cowan's settlement to a residue of £9000, were induced by the defenders to execute a contract, by which the defenders, who were mere legatees to the extent of £400 and £600, were to receive an equal interest in the succession with the pursuers. The pursuers expressly aver that in going into that contract they were unaware of their right under the settlement, which was really that of residuary legatees, and of the amount of the succession; and that the defenders knew that they were in that state of ignorance. In regard to the first issue, it was contended for the defenders that non-disclosure of facts could not be made the subject of an issue, because there was no duty to disclose on the part of the defenders, and an elaborate argument was based upon this assumption; but in my opinion the foundation vanishes on which the whole edifice rests. Instead of there being no duty of disclosure, the most candid and full disclosure was incumbent on the defenders. The contract was not an ordinary one. It was a contract between parties who had an interest in a succession, and the proposal was that these interests, being entirely unequal, should without consideration be equalised. If the party who is to lose is in ignorance, and the party who is to gain is well informed, and being aware of the ignorance of the other, takes advantage of that ignorance, it is a case of the grossest fraud. In Railton v. Mathews and Leonard this doctrine was applied in a case not so

[1] Fox v. Mackreth, 1787, 1 White and Tudor's Leading Cases in Equity, p. 115; Gillespie v. Russel, Feb. 28, 1856, 18 D. 677, and June 26, 1857, 19 D. 897; Hogg and Others v. Campbell and Others, March 12, 1864, ante, vol. ii. 848; Alexander v. Alexander, Jan. 12, 1866, ante, vol. iv. 291; Ritchie v. Ritchie's Trustees, Jan. 13, 1866, ante, vol. iv. 294; Richmond v. Railton, Jan. 26, 1854, 16 D. 405; Broatch v. Jenkins, July 5, 1866, ante, vol. iv. 1051; 1 Bell's Com. 381; Keats, Jan. 20, 1851, 20 L. J. (C. P.) 76; Smith, June 6, 1871, 40 L. J. (Q. B.) 221.

[2] Wilson v. Caledonian Rail. Co., July 6, 1860, 22 D. 1408; Johnston v. Johnston, March 10, 1857, 29 Jur. 320; Love v. Marshall, ante, vol. ix. 291; Railton v. Mathews and Leonard, Jan. 27, 1844, 6 D. 536.

No. 139.
July 1, 1873.
Dempsters v. Raes.

strong for its application. It was there held that a contract between an employer and the cautioner for a servant or agent in his employment was so much one of good faith that the employer was bound to disclose circumstances within his knowledge which were material to the risk. But the contract in the present case was one into which a person was certainly not entitled to go without putting the other party in full possession of the facts. I am accordingly of opinion that the first issue must be granted, but that to prevent ambiguity the word "fraudulent" should be inserted before concealment.

I think it undesirable to burden the case with the second issue. If the pursuers are wrong in point of fact on the first issue I doubt where there is ground for a separate issue. The ground of action is that the pursuers were ignorant, and known to be ignorant by the defenders, who took advantage of this to make a most unfair bargain. It is not so much any specific error that is alleged as general ignorance. On the whole matter, looking to the substance of the allegations, I consider that the whole case may be perfectly well tried on the first issue.

LORD COWAN.—I concur in approving of the first issue, which seems to me quite appropriate and well fitted to get at the justice of the case. Mr Scott called attention to the defenders' statement that they had stated and explained to the pursuers the provisions of the trust-deed, and their rights to the residue, and if this be proved the defence will be good. But take the pursuers' case as stated on the record, and there is a denial of these statements, and averments are made of a directly opposite character. I therefore concur with your Lordship as to the first issue.

In regard to the second issue, however, I think it should stand as approved of by the Lord Ordinary. It is true that there is no very specific averment on record of essential error as regards the matter of the error. But the whole averments proceed, as I read them, on essential error as the very basis of the pursuers' case; and if that error arose from misrepresentation there should be an issue to bring out that ground of action. In the record it is not only stated that the pursuers were not aware that they would have got the succession if they had left matters alone, but in article 11 of the record this is stated—"The defenders did not inform the pursuers what the amount of the legacies left to the defenders was, but they represented to the pursuers that, as they were not named in the will, they could claim no beneficial interest in the estate." So these Englishmen were led on in the supposition that as their names did not occur in the will they could claim nothing under it. Then, again, in article 17 of the record, there is this averment—"The pursuers executed the said agreement under essential error as to their rights as next of kin and heirs-at-law, induced by the defenders' representations foresaid." Thus I cannot see but that there is sufficient allegation of essential error to justify an issue.

LORD BENHOLME.—I think that under the first issue the whole of the case can be tried, and that the insertion of the word "fraudulent" is all that is necessary to make that issue sufficient.

My objection to the second issue is that there is no sufficient statement of essential error on record. Besides, if the issue were allowed without the word "fraudulent" it would change very much the nature of the onus. Now, in this case the onus ought to be as heavy on the pursuers as is implied in the word "fraudulent." I therefore think that we ought to refuse the second issue.

LORD NEAVES.—I concur with your Lordships as regards the first issue, although I should have preferred the word "undue" as qualifying "concealment;" but this is not of much consequence. I do not see good grounds for granting the second issue. I do not quite understand the state of mind in which the pursuers allege themselves to have been. They were told that they were not named in the settlement. They must have then thought that they were going into a contract under which they were to get half of an estate in which they had no interest. Their case is not intelligible unless they aver that it was their belief that the defenders were entitled to the whole. If "misrepresentation" in the second issue is meant to cover innocent misstatement, I do not think they are entitled to an issue of that kind at all. If it means "fraudulent misrepresentation," then the second issue just tries over again the question involved in the first issue. The first issue is, whether the pursuers were induced to execute the deed by the fraudulent misrepresentations of the defenders; and the second issue comes to this, whether the pursuers fell into essential error in consequence of the fraudulent misrepresentations of the defenders, which error led them to execute the deed. I am of opinion that the first issue, modified as your Lordship suggests, is sufficient for the trial of the case.

No. 139.

July 1, 1873. Dempsters v. Raes.

THE COURT appointed the following to be the sole issue for the trial of the cause:—"Whether the pursuers were induced to execute the writing No. 14 of process by fraudulent misrepresentations or fraudulent concealment on the part of the defenders, or either of them, in regard to the pursuers' rights and interests as next of kin and heirs-at-law of the late Dr Francis da Cruz M'Cowan."

W. G. ROY, S.S.C.—A. K. MORISON, S.S.C.—Agents.

No. 140.

July 2, 1873. Fotheringham's Trustees, &c.

ANDREW FOTHERINGHAM'S TRUSTEES, First Parties.—Black.
JAMES PATERSON, Second Party.—Black.
JOHN HAY AND OTHERS, Third Parties.—Jameson.

Succession—Heritable and Moveable—Conversion—Trustee—Power of Sale.—A testator directed his trustees, after certain liferents were satisfied, to divide his estate, which consisted chiefly of house property, into nine equal shares, and to "dispone, assign, and pay over" one of these shares to each of nine persons. The trustees were empowered to sell the whole or such part of the heritable property as they might think proper. Held that as a division of the estate was practically impossible without a sale conversion took place, and that the shares of the beneficiaries formed part of their moveable succession.

2D DIVISION. R.

THE late Andrew Fotheringham died on 1st October 1861, leaving a trust-disposition and settlement dated 27th December 1844, by which he conveyed to trustees his whole estate, heritable and moveable, and, without prejudice to the said generality, a number of heritable subjects therein described, chiefly house properties.

The purposes of the trust were as follows:—"In the first place, that my said trustees shall, out of the first and readiest of my means, estate, and effects, satisfy and pay my deathbed expenses and funeral charges, with the expense to be incurred in carrying these presents into execution: In the second place, in the event of there being any other debts owing by me at the time of my death, and my said wife being then in her life, I direct and appoint my said trustees to borrow money for paying off the same, and to grant a bond or bonds over the whole or any part of the subjects hereby disponed in favour of the lender, and I appoint the interest to be paid out of the rents, yearly or half-yearly, as the case may be, aye and until the death of the foresaid Mrs Elizabeth Swanson or Fotheringham, my wife, when the principal shall be paid off as soon as my trustees can accomplish the same; but in the event of my wife's predeceasing me, then my whole debts shall be paid out of the first and readiest of my means, estate, and effects, or money borrowed on bond for the purpose, as before mentioned, to be afterwards retired from the annual produce of my subjects."

By the third purpose the trustees were directed to pay to his wife, in the event of her surviving him, the free income of his whole estate, after deducting the interest of money borrowed, insurance, repairs, and other

No. 140.

July 2, 1873.
Fotheringham's Trustees, &c.

essary expenses; and also to deliver to her for her own use and be- f his household furniture and plenishing.

y the fourth and fifth purposes the trustees were directed, after truster's death, or the death of his wife, in the case of her sur- ng him, to pay the free rents of two specified subjects, the first Andrew Richardson and his wife, and the longest liver of them ing his or her life, and the second to James Thomas. "In the enth place, I appoint my said trustees, after my death, or the death ny said wife, in case she survives me, and making the payments re mentioned, and also paying all repairs, insurance, and what- r other expenses may be necessary in regard to the said subjects, or carrying these presents into execution, to devote and pay the free due and remainder of the rents or yearly produce of the said subjects, the first place, in extinction of whatever debts may have been left ng by me at the time of my death, or may be contracted by my tee in the execution of this trust, and have not otherwise been dis- rged; and so soon as these purposes are fulfilled, to pay to the surer of the City and County of Perth Infirmary, for the benefit of that itution, a free year's rent of the said subjects, after deducting insur- e, public burdens, and ordinary repairs and expense of management the year: In the eighth place, after the whole purposes before men- ed are implemented and fulfilled I direct and appoint my trustees to ide the remainder of my said heritable and moveable property into e equal shares or divisions, and to dispose, assign, and pay over one hese to my sister, Catherine Hay, in liferent, and one to each of the John Hay, my brother, Isabella Hay or Comb, Catherine Hay, and et Hay, my nieces, the said William Hay and David Hay, my hews, and Rachel Corner and Elizabeth Fotheringham M'Gregor, es of my said wife, in fee, and their heirs, executors, and assignees ectively: In the ninth place, on the death of the said Catherine Hay, lrew Richardson and his wife, and James Thomas, as these events l severally occur, I direct and appoint my said trustees to dispose, gn, and pay to my own and my wife's relations last above mentioned, their foresaids, the parts of my heritable property so severally life- ed by the said Catherine Hay, Andrew Richardson and his wife, and es Thomas."

he trust-deed contained the following provision:—"And I do hereby ıer authorise and empower my said trustees before named, or to be rwards assumed, after the death of the longest liver of me and my wife, and after the whole debts owing by me, or contracted by my tees in the course of their management, and provision to the City and nty Infirmary have been paid, and the liferents of the said Catherine , Andrew Richardson and his wife, and James Thomas, severally satis- to bring the whole or such part of my heritable property to sale as may think proper, and to grant absolute dispositions to the pur- ers, should they be of opinion that such sale is advisable for more tually carrying the purpose of this settlement into execution."

he heritable property left by the testator was estimated as of the e of £4050 or thereby in all. The yearly rental amounted to £280. moveables left by the testator consisted chiefly of the furniture and rs bequeathed to his widow. The remainder of the moveable estate taken to pay the deathbed and funeral expenses, and the expense of mournings mentioned in the settlement, with some floating debts ch were due by the deceased, and which required to be paid at the . The other debts due by the testator at his death consisted chiefly ans which he had obtained on personal security. Those other debts, of the fourth purpose of the trust, Andrew Richardson, alte of the widow, drew the rents of the subjects conveyed to death. The gross yearly rents of the remaining subjects belo trust-estate amounted to £270 or thereby, of which there ren per annum, or somewhat less, after paying public burdens and also the interest due upon the testator's unpaid debts.

Of the beneficiaries mentioned in the trust-deed the trus died on 14th April 1872; Mrs Barbara Salmond or Richard Andrew Richardson, died on 4th April 1869; James Thomas
March 1865; Catherine Hay died on 21st February 1871;
Richardson, who was alive at the date when the present spec presented, died on 23d June 1873.

As it would be several years before the debts still remaini paid out of the free rents of the trust-estate, and as the cr pressing for payment, the residuary legatees called upon t with the consent of the treasurer of the infirmary mentic settlement, to sell the whole of the trust-estate, and after the proceeds the whole debts owing by the trust-estate, an paying to the said treasurer such sum as had been agreed charge of his claim under the settlement, to distribute among the beneficiaries entitled thereto. Negotiations had progress for adjusting the amount to be paid to Andrew Rich discharge of his claims, and for his consent to the arrangeme
His death relieved the trust-estate of his liferent, and the spe accordingly amended.

Janet Hay, mentioned in the settlement, married Robert P died intestate on 22d October 1866, leaving two children, Jam beth. A question arose as to the disposal of the share of the resi to be paid to Janet Hay, and her heirs, executors, and assignee on whether the said share was to be held as heritable or mov

The parties to this case were (1) the trustees of Andrew Fo
(2) James Paterson, (3) the other residuary legatees unde ment.

The following questions were submitted to the Court:—"1.
tees entitled, with the consent of the second and third parties the treasurer of the said infirmary, now to sell the said trus

n;—There was no constructive conversion of what was in its a heritable subject into a moveable subject.[1] ied;—It was impossible to carry out the purposes of the trust ; a sale, and there was therefore constructive conversion.[2] lvising,—

No. 140.
July 2, 1873.
Fothering-ham's Trus-tees, &c.

JUSTICE-CLERK.—There are two questions presented to us in this case, eference substantially to the eighth purpose of the trust-deed, which is llowing terms:—"In the eighth place, after the whole purposes before ed are implemented and fulfilled I direct and appoint my trustees to he remainder of my said heritable and moveable property into nine equal and to pay them over to the persons there mentioned.
irst question is, whether the period of division has arrived. I am of that it has, and that the first question should be answered in the affirma- everything required by the previous purposes of the deed has been done. low is dead, the truster's debts will now be provided for, and the only at remains is to divide. So I think that we should answer this question ffirmative.
econd question raises the question whether the share of one of the bene- is heritable or moveable. The general rule, and one mainly fixed by s in revenue cases, is this: where trustees hold an estate with a direc- sell, that estate becomes moveable; but when the trustees are only given o sell, there is no conversion unless it appear that sale is essential to the n of the trust.
eading case on this branch of law is the case of Buchanan v. Angus. lgment in that case was very strong, and if there had been more than eficiaries I think it would have been doubtful. It was a case in which ter directed his trustees, after the discharge of legacies, to pay over the to his brother and sister equally, with power to the trustees, if neces- convert the same into money. The House of Lords held that the settle- d not convert the heritable into moveable estate, and laid down that if t to sell is made to depend on the discretion of trustees, or is to arise case of necessity, there is no conversion.
whatever may be said of that opinion, there is no doubt that in the pre- e we can come to no other conclusion than that the estate cannot pos- main as heritage in the due execution of this trust. A division of the operty into eight shares is substantially impossible without a sale, and trustees are directed to do before they proceed to pay over any part of e only way to divide this estate equally is to convert the heritage into le property. Although the subsequent expressions in this deed indicate truster thought and spoke of the existence of the estate in its existing m, I do not think that sufficient to alter the clear effect of the provisions ighth purpose of the deed.
only other thing in the deed to which it is necessary to advert is the terms in which the power of sale is given to the trustees. The power o be exercised (1) until the fund is liberated, and (2) unless the trustees think that such sale was advisable for more effectually carrying out the of the trust-deed. But if the purpose of the trust cannot be carried out a sale then to sell is what is advisable and what the trustees are here l to do. I think the second question should be answered to the effect e share of Janet Hay or Paterson belongs to her heirs in mobilibus.

COWAN.—There are peculiar clauses in this trust-deed, but which are ed for by the nature of the subjects conveyed to the trustees. The value e subjects is stated to be about £4050, and the yearly rental amounts to £280, and from the trustees' statement it would seem that the subjects mainly, if not wholly, of house property, yielding a higher rental than ith, June 13, 1854, 1 M'Q. 760; Buchanan v. Angus, May 15, 1862, 4 74.

vocate-General v. Blackburn's Trustees, Nov. 27, 1847, 10 D. 166.

No. 140.

July 2, 1873. Fothering-ham's Trus-tees, &c.

the price if realised would have done of yearly interest. This, I think, explains the second purpose, which directs that, so long as his wife survives, the debts owing by the truster should be paid off by means of money to be borrowed on the security of the trust subjects. The liferent of his whole property was provided to his widow, and it was no doubt with the view of securing to her a higher yearly income that a sale of the subjects was thus postponed while she survived. And hence may be accounted for also the provision made as to the payment of debts thus contracted by the trustees before the division and sale of the residue should take place. Extensive powers, however, are conferred with regard to their realisation of the estate, and, in particular, they are empowered, "after the death of the longest liver of me and my said wife, and after the whole debts owing by me or contracted by my trustees have been paid, and the liferents provided for" have been satisfied, to bring the whole or such part as they think proper of the truster's heritable property to sale, "should they be of opinion that such sale is advisable for more effectually carrying the purpose of this settlement into execution."

From the facts stated in the case it appears that the widow died in 1872, and that the liferents provided of certain small portions of the estate no longer exist. The debts, however, have not been discharged, and the creditors are now pressing for payment, and further, there remains of the rental little more than £100 per annum, after payment of public burdens, repairs, and interest of debt.

Having regard to the terms of the trust-deed and the circumstances set forth in the case, I am of opinion that the trustees are entitled now to exercise their power of sale, and that the first question should be answered in the affirmative.

The second question depends upon the inquiry whether it is to be held that by the directions of the deed there has been effected conversion of the heritage conveyed to the trustees into moveable estate in succession as regards the several shares of the property to be distributed among the children of the testator. The words of the deed are,—"I direct and appoint my trustees to divide the remainder of my said heritable and moveable property into nine equal shares or divisions." Such are the express words employed by the testator as regards the distribution of his estate, and effect cannot, as I think, be given to them without reducing the whole property by sale of the heritage into a divisible fund. A pro indiviso conveyance of the property to the nine children will not meet the directory words. There must be division, and that is simply impossible, having regard to the nature of the subjects, consisting of houses and shops. No doubt there follow the words, "and to dispone, assign, and pay over one of these (shares) to my sister in liferent, and one to each" of the parties named "in fee, and their heirs, executors, and assignees respectively." But although the word "dispone" does occur, I do not think it can alter or affect the clear and unambiguous terms of direction contained in the previous part of the sentence, which, as I have said, is not capable of being fulfilled otherwise than by the heritable property being sold. And any difficulty that might have been experienced, or any necessity that might have existed of applying for judicial interposition, are obviated by the power of sale conferred on the trustees. No doubt that power is conferred in words implying that it was to be exercised according to their discretion and as they might judge as to its exercise being advisable for more effectually carrying the testator's purpose into effect. The words are not such as in express terms to make it imperative that they should exercise the power of sale, but they truly have that effect when the truster's purpose in the division of his estate cannot be otherwise carried into effect. There might have been room in the course of the subsistence of the trust-management for the trustees being called on to consider the advisability of a sale, and in whole or in part to exercise the option conferred on them. But when the trust requires to be wound up and the estate distributed the trustees are in effect called on and bound to exercise the authority and power conferred on them by the deed to bring the subjects to sale. Nor does the ninth purpose of the trust, as I read it, present any obstacle to the adoption of this construction. All that it does is to make provision that the subjects liferented by the parties named should be dealt with on the same footing as the rest of the estate upon their several deaths "as these events shall severally occur." In the decision of the House of Lords in the case of Buchanan v. Angus,

4 Macq. 374, the direction as to the residue was different, inasmuch as there was no express direction to divide as occurs in this deed, nor any order to make a division into nine parts. The direction there was simply to pay and make over to two parties equally, share and share alike. For these reasons I am of opinion that the share that would have been taken by Janet Hay had she survived belongs to her children, James and Elizabeth, equally, as her heirs in mobilibus. No. 140. July 2, 1873. Fothering-ham's Trustees, &c.

LORD BENHOLME.—I concur. Our conclusion as to the first question has a great bearing on the answer to be given to the second question. The number of shares into which the estate is to be divided, and the fact that one of the shares was to be distributed between a liferenter and fiars, render the case so complicated that the trust cannot well be extricated without a sale. I therefore hold the shares to be of a moveable character.

LORD NEAVES.—I am of the same opinion. The primary direction is to divide; there is not to be a general conveyance pro indiviso. When the number of persons among whom the property is to be divided is large it becomes practically impossible to allow it to retain its heritable state. In the case of Buchanan there were only two beneficiaries. Division among two is always easy, according to the old Saxon rule "one deals and the other wales," which always ensures a fair division among two. But to divide a number of heritable properties like these among nine is quite impracticable.

THIS interlocutor was pronounced:—"Find (1) that the trustees are entitled, with the consent of the second and third parties, and of Andrew Richardson and the treasurer of the City and County of Perth Infirmary, now to sell the trust-estate, and after paying out of the proceeds the whole debts due by the trust-estate, to distribute the balance forthwith among those entitled thereto: (2) That the share of the said balance effeiring to Janet Hay or Paterson belongs to James Paterson and Elizabeth Paterson equally, as the said Janet Hay or Paterson's heirs in mobilibus, and decern: Find the parties to the special case entitled to payment of their expenses in connection with the same out of the trust-funds, and remit," &c.

W. & J. BURNESS, W.S.—D. F. BRIDGEFORD, S.S.C.—Agents.

ROBERT GILMOUR, Pursuer.—Millar—Crichton.
ALEXANDER GILMOUR AND JAMES GILMOUR, Defenders.—M'Laren. No. 141. July 3, 1873. Gilmour v. Gilmours.

Trust-disposition for behoof of Creditors—Radical Right—Conveyance—Service—Heir.—An infeftment on a trust-disposition bearing to be for behoof of creditors does not divest the granter of the radical right of property, and his heir cannot complete his title by conveyance from the trustee.

THE late William Gilmour, timber merchant in Glasgow, acquired by purchase eleven different heritable subjects. On 23d February 1848 he executed "a trust-deed for behoof of his creditors, whereby, on the narrative that he was unable to meet his engagements, and in order to prevent preferences, and with a view to the equal distribution of his estate, he conveyed to James Brock, accountant in Glasgow, as trustee for the purposes thereinafter mentioned, the whole of his means and estate. The purposes were—1st, to secure to the granter, as a bankrupt, the privileges conferred by the second and third Victoria, cap. 41—2d, to hold the means and estate in trust for behoof of the just and lawful creditors of the granter, with power to the trustee to sell the estate and to grant all necessary titles—3d, for the purpose of dividing among the creditors the produce of the estate when realised—4th, that the creditors acceding to the trust should not be held to surrender any securities held by them— 2D DIVISION. Ld. Ormidale. I.

property by declaratory disposition and entry with the continued to possess down to the year 1871, before which ti debts had been paid, and a large reversion of the estate rem consisting of heritable property.

William Gilmour died in 1848. He had three childre deceased him without issue. A daughter (Margaret You died in 1869 unmarried, and the only remaining child was Gilmour. Both John M'Ghie Gilmour and Margaret Yo were imbecile, and James Gilmour was appointed their cura

In 1871 the debts of the deceased William Gilmour were pa position dated the 17th March of that year Alexander Gilmo factor on the trust-estate, with the consent of James Gilmour a to the two children of William Gilmour, disponed to John M' the several heritable subjects which had been conveyed by t

No special powers were asked, and John M'Ghie Gilmo served to his father William Gilmour. After the dispositio factor was exonered and discharged.

John M'Ghie Gilmour died on 30th April 1872 unma Gilmour was his heir in heritage, being his father's immedi brother. He claimed the properties as such. Robert Gil father's immediate elder brother and heir of conquest. H properties on the ground that John M'Ghie Gilmour never to his father the right to them belonged still to the father, a claimant as his heir of conquest. He brought this action agai and James Gilmour to reduce the disposition to John M'Gh

The pursuer pleaded;—(1) John M'Ghie Gilmour not ha a title to his father by service, the heritable subjects describ clusions of the summons remained in the hæreditas jacens William Gilmour, and, on the death of the said John M' passed to the pursuer as the heir of conquest of the said Wil

The defenders pleaded;—(3) The action cannot be mai spect that it was the right and duty of the defender Jame curator bonis of the said John M'Ghie Gilmour, to require, and duty of the defender Alexander Gilmour, as judicial trust-estate of the deceased William Gilmour, to grant th sought to be reduced. (4) The action is excluded by the operation and discharge granted by the Court in favour of efenders reclaimed, and argued;—The original trustee and the actor in his place were authorised to grant conveyances of the subjects in dispute were purchased in 1845 by the pursuer's immediate brother, William Gilmour, and thereafter the latter executed a trust- n of all his estate, heritable and moveable, including the subjects in n favour of Mr Brock as trustee for behoof of his creditors. It is im-) observe that this deed is not in the form or terms of an absolute and id disposition, but expressly bears, in grœmio, to be in favour of Mr trustee for the granter's creditors, and for the purpose of paying his id although the deed contains a power of sale, it also expressly bears is granted with and under the burden that, after payment of his debts xpenses of executing the trust, the reversion, if any, of his estate should ted for to the truster.

Brock, the trustee, having died, the defender, Alexander Gilmour, was ry 1852 appointed judicial factor in his place on the trust-estate; and purposes having been fulfilled, and the truster himself being then dead, ts now in dispute were in March 1871 disponed by the judicial factor, the deeds now challenged, to John M'Ghie Gilmour, a lunatic son of sed truster, with the consent of the other defender, James Gilmour, as r bonis. John M'Ghie Gilmour had not at this time connected him- rvice or otherwise with the truster, nor had the truster's radical right to the trust-estate been vested in that individual, or taken up by or for y form whatever. John M'Ghie Gilmour has since died, and there is r descendant of his father, the truster, surviving.

in this position of matters that the present action has been brought by er as entitled to succeed to the subjects in question as heir of conquest eased brother, William Gilmour, the truster. The object of the action the interposed title, which was taken and made up in favour of John ilmour, reduced and set aside.

the subjects in question must be held to be still in hæreditate jacente e William Gilmour, and that the pursuer, as that individual's heir of has right to them—supposing the interposed title made up to them in John M'Ghie Gilmour to be invalid—is not disputed. And whether f John M'Ghie Gilmour is invalid or not is the question for considera-

Lord Ordinary is of opinion that the alleged title of John M'Ghie Gil- and is invalid. He holds it to be clear on the authorities that the ght to the subjects in question remained in William Gilmour, notwith- the trust-disposition granted by him in favour of Mr Brock. By the rms of the deed it was limited to certain purposes, and therefore the ical right to his estate must be held to have remained with the truster. rily follows from this that on the purposes of the trust being accom- is they have been, the full right and title of the truster revived. questions appear to have been, in varying circumstances, raised on the he Lord Ordinary must hold the principle, as he has now stated it, to nd for some time back, conclusively settled by the cases of Campbell ines' Creditors, 14th January 1801, Mor. Adjudication, Appendix No. M'Millan v. Campbell, 9 Shaw, 551, and 7 W. and S. 441. And that n held to be so settled, and doubtless since acted on by conveyancers of business, may be inferred from the statements on the subject in udal Conveyancing, p. 436, Menzies' Lectures (1st edition), p. 821, gomery Bell's Lectures, p. 751.

Lord Ordinary can find no room for distinction in principle between to which he has now referred and the present. The only distinction by the defenders was that arising out of the circumstance that here e, Mr Brock, or rather the defender, Alexander Gilmour, as having his place as judicial factor, on the purposes of the trust being fulfilled, the subjects in question to John M'Ghie Gilmour, who in point of fact on and heir of the truster, entitled to succeed to him. But it must be

No. 141.

July 3, 1873. Gilmour v. Gilmours.

subjects. John M'Ghie Gilmour, as his father's representative, was entitled to demand and receive such a conveyance when the trust-purposes were fulfilled.

In Ker's trustees[1] there was strong authority for holding that a title might be made up through trustees. The conveyance to John M'Ghie Gilmour gave him a title. No service was required.[2]

The pursuer argued;—An infeftment under a trust-disposition for creditors does not divest the granter of the feudal title, but merely operates as a burden on his title. The heir of the granter must make up his title by service to the granter.[3] He cannot avail himself of the trust-infeftment or accept a conveyance from the trustee as a purchaser can.[4] borne in mind that there was no express power in the trust-deed to Mr Brock to convey the residue to John M'Ghie Gilmour, and that that individual never became vested, by service or otherwise, in the radical right and title which had all along remained in his father, William Gilmour, and which was at his death, and has ever since been in hæreditate jacente of him. The disposition therefore by the judicial factor in favour of John M'Ghie Gilmour must be held to have been granted by the judicial factor without any warrant or authority, and, as already said, no such warrant or authority is to be found in the trust-deed itself, for according to its terms the reversion was expressly declared to belong to the truster, and the trustee taken bound to convey it to him. Besides, from the very nature of a trust bearing in gremio of the deed to be granted for a limited purpose, that purpose being fulfilled, the radical right and title of the truster necessarily revived without the necessity of any reconveyance by the trustee. The radical right and title thus remaining from the beginning in William Gilmour, under burden merely of the trust right, and having, prior to the disposition by the judicial factor in favour of John M'Ghie Gilmour, been entirely freed from that burden, it seems to the Lord Ordinary to be incontrovertible that the judicial factor had no power whatever to grant such a disposition. Had John M'Ghie Gilmour taken up the succession of his father, William Gilmour, and put himself in the place of that individual quoad the subjects in question, by service or otherwise, the matter might have stood very differently, for on that assumption the pursuer's right and title would have been cut off, whether the disposition by the judicial factor could in itself be held to be an efficacious and habile title or not.

---

"The Lord Ordinary has only further to observe, that he has been unable to see that the discharge by the Court of the judicial factor can be held to affect in the least the question which has now been discussed, more especially seeing that it is expressly admitted by the defenders, in their answer to the 12th article of the pursuer's condescendence, that the defender, Alexander Gilmour, as judicial factor, did not apply for or receive any antecedent warrant or authority from the Court to grant the disposition in favour of John M'Ghie Gilmour, and also that the other defender, as curator bonis of that individual, did not apply to, or receive any authority from the Court to concur in that disposition, or to make up a title to the subjects in the person of John M'Ghie Gilmour, and that no such title, by service or otherwise, was ever made up."

[1] Ker's Trustees v. Ker, June 17, 1825, 1 W. and S. 381.

[2] Fogo v. Fogo, February 25, 1840, 2 D. 651, and August 18, 1843, 2 Bell's Apps. 194; Rose v. Fraser, January 26, 1709, Ross' Leading Cases (Land Rights), vol i. p. 452.

[3] Menzies on Conveyancing (2d ed.) 757; Colquhoun v. Colquhoun, July 8, 1831, 9 S. 911; Young's Trustees v. Young, July 19, 1867, ante, vol. v. p. 1101; Buchanan v. Angus, May 15, 1862, 4 Macq. 374; M'Laren on Trusts, vol. i. p. 93, vol. ii. p. 49.

[4] Bell's Com. (M'L.) ii. p. 392; Campbell v. Edderlines' Creditors, January 14, 1801, Mor. Adjud. App. No. 11; Macmillan v. Campbell, March 4, 1831, 9 S. 551, August 11, 1834, 7 W. and S. 441; Brock v. Johnston, November 23, 1827, 6 S. 113.

No. 141.
July 3, 1873.
Gilmour v. Gilmours.

At all events the judicial factor was not entitled to make up the title of his imbecile ward by such conveyance without the sanction of the Court. There was an option whether the imbecile should make up a title as heir or not, and that option could only be exercised by the Court.[1]

At advising,—

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—The question to be decided in this case arises under the following circumstances:—The late William Gilmour executed on 23d February 1848 a trust-deed for behoof of his creditors, whereby, on the narrative that he was unable to meet his engagements, and in order to prevent preferences, and with a view to the equal distribution of his estate, he conveyed to James Brock, accountant in Glasgow, as trustee for the purposes thereinafter mentioned, the whole of his means and estate. The purposes were—1st, to secure to the granter the privileges conferred by the 2d and 3d Victoria, cap. 41, as a bankrupt—2d, to hold the means and estate in trust for behoof of the just and lawful creditors of the granter, with power to the trustee to sell the estate and to grant all necessary titles—3d, for the purpose of dividing among the creditors the produce of the estate when realised—4th, that the creditors acceding to the trust should not be held to surrender any securities held by them—and, in the 5th place, the deed contains a provision that "these presents are granted with and under the burden, after realising and distributing my said estate, my said trustee or trustees shall account for and pay over to me any surplus that may remain after the payment of said debts, expenses, and others before-mentioned."

The trustee was infeft under this disposition, and realised certain portions of both the moveable and the heritable property. The truster, William Gilmour, died in 1849, and James Brock, the trustee, died in July 1851, at which time the debts had not been fully paid off. On the 10th February 1852, the defender, Alexander Gilmour, was appointed judicial factor on the trust-estate. He made up his title to the heritable property by declaratory adjudication and entry with the superior, and continued to possess down to the year 1871, before which time the whole debts had been paid, and a large reversion of the estate remained, chiefly consisting of heritable property. William Gilmour left a son and a daughter, both of whom were imbecile. James Gilmour, another brother of the truster, and the heir in heritage of the imbecile son John M'Ghie Gilmour, was appointed his curator bonis in 1859. The daughter died in 1869. In 1871 Alexander Gilmour, the judicial factor, executed a disposition of the trust-estate in favour of John M'Ghie Gilmour, who was then and had all along been in a state of imbecility; and on this disposition infeftment was taken in his name. Thereupon Alexander Gilmour presented a petition to the Court for exoneration and discharge, narrating the disposition which he had thus granted, and obtained decreet of exoneration, dated 19th July and 17th October 1871. John M'Ghie Gilmour, the son, never made up any other title as the heir of the truster; and he having died in 1872, the heritable property is now claimed in this action by the immediate elder brother of the truster, who has served himself heir of conquest in general to the truster and to his son. On the other hand, James Gilmour, who is the heir in heritage of the deceased John M'Ghie Gilmour, claims the heritable property in that character. The question we have to decide is whether John M'Ghie Gilmour, the son of the truster, died lawfully vest and seized in the heritable property. The Lord Ordinary has found he did not, and I am of opinion that his judgment is right.

The question turns mainly upon the effect of the trust-disposition granted by William Gilmour in 1848. Ever since the case of the Creditors of Edderline, 14th January 1801, it has been settled that an infeftment under a trust-disposition for payment of the creditors of the truster does not divest the granter of the feudal title to the subjects conveyed, but only creates a burden on that title. Such a deed, when combined with a power of sale, gives the trustee a title to grant a sufficient conveyance to a purchaser, just as an heritable bond and dis-

[1] Thoms on Factors, p 261.

No. 141.
July 3, 1873.
Gilmour v. Gilmours.

position in security gives a similar power to a creditor, although, no doubt, the powers of a trustee under such a conveyance may be free of some of the impediments which stand in the way of a sale by an heritable creditor. But, excepting in so far as creditors accede to such a trust, it is nothing; and if the estate be not sold, or, in so far as it may not be sold, the title of the trustee is nothing but a burden or security, which may be terminated and extinguished by a simple discharge, or by the payment of the debts aliunde. Meanwhile the title of the granter remains to all effects precisely as it was before the trust was granted, subject only to the security thereby created, and the acts of the trustee in conformity with the powers conferred upon him.

These principles have been well fixed, and are laid down in all books of conveyancing as settled law. Such a deed being a conveyance inter vivos, the conditions of which qualify any infeftment which can be taken upon it, is entirely different in its feudal effect from an absolute conveyance in trust mortis causa, or an absolute conveyance inter vivos, qualified by a latent or undisclosed trust. In both of the last cases the granter is divested of his feudal right. In the first case absolutely, as in the case of a mortis causa disposition. In the second case the granter has nothing left but a jus crediti to enforce the personal right to obtain a reconveyance. But in either of these cases the feudal fee is transferred. In the case of a mortis causa disposition the absolute fee conferred by the granter may come to be held, from failure of purposes, for the heir at law. In the case of an inter vivos absolute conveyance, qualified by a latent trust, the radical right to obtain a reconveyance remains with the granter. But when the infeftment proceeds on a disposition executed inter vivos for the payment of creditors, the fee remains undisturbed in the person of the granter, who continues to be as free to deal with it as he is after granting any other heritable security.

This was the doctrine established in the case of Edderline. Lord President Campbell has a note on his papers in this case, expressive of a doubt whether an adjudication led by a creditor against the trustee would not also have been good. But this doubt does not affect the general doctrine, and must have proceeded on the trustee's power to sell for payment of debt. The question arose more than once in election cases, whether a trust conveyance for payment of debt divested and disfranchised the granter. In one of these, Donaldson, 11th March 1786, Lord Braxfield said,—"As long as the estate is not sold it is my property. And I may, when I please, denude the trustees by paying off the debt." Lord Eskgrove observed,—"The right is in the debtor, although the creditors have power to sell."—Hailes 2, 994.

The same question arose in Campbell v. Speirs, which is the more in point because in that case the trustees had granted a renunciation of their procuratory of resignation in favour of the heir-apparent. The Court did not, however, proceed on that, but on the ground that the granter had never been divested. On this renunciation President Campbell's note bears in reference to the reconveyance by the trustee,—"I doubt if it be a feudal method of securing Sir Alexander in the superiority." But he held he had never been divested—"Infeftment (is) in security until sale actually takes place, which will of course actually denude him. But in the meantime the estate belongs to nobody but him."—1 Ross (Land Rights), 465. These two cases may be compared with that of Ferguson v. Fairlie, 5 S. 938, in which a disposition ex facie absolute, but in reality granted in trust to split superiority and property, was found to divest the granter.

The case of Macmillan, which occurred in 1831, recognises this distinction in the clearest possible manner. The question there was whether an heritable proprietor, who had granted a trust-disposition for payment of debt, and had taken an ineffectual reconveyance from the trustee, could execute a valid entail. Lord Moncreiff held that he could, and the Court and the House of Lords affirmed the judgment—the reason being that he had never been divested. He says in his note that "the case of Edderline settles the point that a trust-conveyance, almost identical with the trust in the present case, does not divest the granter of his feudal title, and is only to be considered as a burden on that title." Such, I apprehend, is now well fixed as a principle of feudal conveyancing. Thus Mr Montgomery Bell says, vol. 2, p. 751, dealing with trust for payment of creditors,—"The trust merely created a burden on his right, and on fulfilment of the purposes the burden is extinguished, and the lands are at his free disposal, just as if he had granted a bond and disposition in security to a creditor, and had paid and obtained a discharge of the debt."

These principles are hardly disputed by the defenders in this case. But it was argued with very great ability that, although it is quite true that a trust of this description only burdens the right of the granter, yet that the granter, or his heir, may, if he think fit, avail himself of the trust-infeftment, and accept a conveyance from the trustee as a feudal title to the lands, just as a purchaser from the trustee might have done; and we have been referred to the case of Lady Essex Ker[1] as establishing the proposition that where there is a formal feudal title in a trustee, and a radical title remaining in the truster to the same lands, the person entitled to the radical right may select which of the two rights he chooses to be the foundation of his own feudal progress.

There appear to be two conclusive answers to the doctrine contended for in this plea. I do not doubt that a title may so stand that the proprietor having the radical right may use a trust title as the foundation of his feudal progress, although, if he had chosen to disregard it, no one had right or interest to plead on the trust title. A strong illustration of this is to be found in the case of Rose v. Fraser, in which the infeftment of a trust disponee, who held a right granted for election purposes, and apparently absolute, was yet held to entitle the widow of the granter to her terce. But the distinction to which I have already adverted lies at the foundation of this decision, viz., between a right which is ex facie absolute, although in reality only a trust, and a right which is ex facie only a burden or security.

The distinction is well illustrated by the case of Lady Essex Ker. In that case the Duke of Roxburghe had granted a trust-disposition mortis causa for certain purposes to be declared. These purposes were declared on deathbed, and they were reduced by the heir-at-law. Thereafter the heir-at-law granted a trust-bond, on which adjudication followed at the instance of the trustee, with a view of making up a title; and a conveyance to the decree of adjudication was granted to the heir-at-law by the trustee. But instead of proceeding to complete the adjudication title, the heir-at-law accepted a disposition from the trustee under the mortis causa settlement, and completed a title under that deed. The title so completed was sustained by the Court. But in that case the title of the trustee was entirely unqualified. By the failure of the purposes it resolved into a trust for the heir-at-law, which no one but the heir-at-law could make available, and which, had he thought of it, he might entirely have disregarded. But such a case is entirely different from a title which on the face of it was from first to last nothing but a burden.

The application which was made of this case in the case of Macmillan was founded on the opinion expressed by the Court that the heir-at-law might have completed his title by proceeding on the adjudication,—proving that the radical title still remained in hereditate jacente of the Duke of Roxburghe. This was doubted by Lord Gifford in giving judgment in the House of Lords (1 W. and S., p. 395); but, even if it did, the trust title, for want of purposes, was a trust only for the heir-at-law. But it was on the face of it an absolute title as against the rest of the world; and if the heir chose to use it as part of his feudal progress it was good in point of form, and no one could challenge it.

Although it were otherwise, the case which we have at present before us stands very differently. Even supposing that the heir-at-law had a right to accept the title of his ancestor's trustee as the regulating title of his estate, I doubt greatly if the judicial factor on the estate, at his own hand, and without the authority of the Court, was entitled to complete the title of the lunatic in that way. Supposing there had been an option, it was one which the lunatic could not declare, and which, without judicial authority, at all events the judi-

[1] June 17, 1825, 1 W. and S. 381.

No. 141.
July 3, 1873.
Gilmour v. Gilmours.

cial factor could not make. I am, therefore, of opinion that the reconveyance by the judicial factor would have operated nothing but a discharge of the burden; and, even in that view, being granted to one who did not represent the granter, was a mere nullity.

LORDS COWAN, BENHOLME, and NEAVES concurred.

THE COURT pronounced the following interlocutor:—"Refuse said note, and adhere to the interlocutor complained of, with additional expenses."

D. CRAWFORD & J. Y. GUTHRIE, S.S.C.—RONALD & RITCHIE, W.S.—Agents.

No. 142.
July 3, 1873.
Macadam v. Macadam.

HANNAH MOORE MACADAM AND OTHERS, Pursuers.—Sol.-Gen. Clark—Trayner.
MARGARET MACADAM, Defender.—Watson—Strachan.

Jurisdiction—Executor—Arrestment jurisdictionis fundandæ causa.—A person resident in England intromitted with a Scotch executry estate. Held that arrestment of her private funds in Scotland was sufficient to found jurisdiction against her in a question between her and beneficiaries claiming a share of the executry estate.

2D DIVISION. Lord Mure. I.

THOMAS MACADAM senior died domiciled at Newton-Stewart in Scotland in 1848, leaving a will by which he gave to Mrs Hannah Breeze or Macadam, his wife, the liferent of everything belonging to him, appointed her his sole executrix, and directed his property at her death to be divided among his children in certain proportions.

On the death of Thomas Macadam senior Mrs Macadam went to reside in England, obtained letters of administration in the Court of Probate at Chester, and intromitted with and liferented her husband's estate.

Mrs Macadam died on 31st July 1864, and her daughter, Mrs Margaret Macadam, as one of the next of kin, obtained letters of administration from the District Court of Probate at Manchester.

The pursuers averred that under these letters of administration the defender realised and intromitted with the estate of Thomas Macadam senior, as well as of Mrs Macadam, and gave up a residue account of his estate. In a declaration appended to this residue account she declared that she was entitled to retain the sum set forth in the account for "my own use, and for the use of my bothers and sisters."

Thomas Macadam junior died in Jamaica in 1864 without receiving payment of his share of his father's estate, and his children accordingly brought this action for recovery thereof against his sister, Margaret Macadam, as administratrix to her mother, and arrestments to found jurisdiction were used in the hands of various persons who were debtors to the defender.

The defender stated that Mrs Macadam had invested £2000 belonging to the executry estate on debenture bond with the Great-Western Railway Company, who on her death refused to take the discharge of the beneficiaries, and required the appointment of an executor. This was caused entirely by the widow having lent the £2000 in her own name, instead of taking the bond to herself in liferent and the beneficiaries in fee. To obviate this difficulty and at the suggestion of Mr Martin, writer in Newton-Stewart, who had been employed by Mrs Macadam as agent in her husband's succession, the defender allowed herself to be named administratrix of her mother, and that solely for the purpose of calling up the sum lent by her mother upon the said debenture bond, and handing it over to Mr Martin. The defender never intromitted with any portion her father's succession, nor did she pay any legacies or anything else connection with the estate. All this was done by Mr Martin, in whose nds everything was left by the whole parties interested.

No. 142.

July 3, 1873.

Macadam v. Macadam.

The pursuers pleaded;—(1) The defender is amenable to the jurisdic- n of the Supreme Courts of Scotland in respect of said arrestments and e funds thereby attached. (2) The defender having, as executrix esaid, realised and intromitted with the estates of the said Thomas acadam senior is liable in the sum sued for, as the proportion of said ates falling to the said Thomas Macadam junior, and now resting ing and due to the pursuers. (3) The defender being justly due and lebted to the pursuers the sum sued for, the pursuers are entitled to cree as libelled.

The following was the first plea in law for the defender;—No juris- tion, in respect that the defender is not resident in this country, d no funds belonging to the executry estate of the mother have been tached by the arrestments ad fundandam jurisdictionem used by the rsuers.

The Lord Ordinary pronounced this interlocutor:—"Repels the first plea law for the defender, in so far as it is pleaded as preliminary, and ex- ding the jurisdiction of this Court; and appoints the case to be put to e roll for further procedure, reserving in the meantime all questions of penses."*

The defender reclaimed, and argued;—This was an action against the fender in her fiduciary character only, as executrix of her mother. I

---

* "NOTE.—This case is in some respects not free from difficulty, but in the ew the Lord Ordinary takes of it the question raised is not so much one of risdiction as of forum competens or conveniens, which is not made the matter a separate plea in defence, and which the case of Brown's Trustees, 17th De- mber 1830, mainly relied on by the defender, truly was.

"The circumstances of the case, however, are in some respects different from ose of Brown's Trustees; for the present is not strictly speaking an action in hich an executor is called to account for the execution of his office, or to enter to a general accounting relative to the affairs of the deceased party dying broad, but one in which the defender is sued for payment of a legacy bequeathed the father of the pursuers by the late Mr Macadam senior, and for which the fender is alleged to be liable as an intromitter with Mr Macadam's estate; and she is resident in England arrestments to found jurisdiction have been used this country of certain funds admittedly belonging or due to the defender, but hether in her own right, or as part of the late Mr Macadam's estate, does not stinctly appear. The case therefore is one in which the jurisdiction of this urt to entertain the action has, it is thought, been established by the arrest- nts used against the defender, and falls to be dealt with, in this respect, ac- rding to the rules applied in the cases of Campbell, 2d March 1809, Hume, p. 8, and Inverarity, 7th March 1840, 2 D. p. 816, rather than that of Brown's ustees, which, as explained in the opinions of the Judges in the case of Mac- rnie, 16th January 1845, was not a question of jurisdiction, but of forum con- niens; and the present case is distinguishable from that of Brown's Trustees, in s respect also, that although probate of the will of the late Mr Macadam and the defender's mother appeared to have been taken out in England the inven- y of Mr Macadam's estate was actually given up and recorded in Scotland, ere the will had been made, and the greater part of the testator's property was uated. This is shewn by the residue account, No. 22 of process, signed by the fender, and which appears from the statements in the record to have been pre- red and given up by an agent employed on her behalf, and in this respect the e is not dissimilar in one of its features to that of MacMornie already referred in which the plea to jurisdiction was repelled, leaving it open to the Court to l with the question of forum conveniens on the case being proceeded with."

No. 142.
July 3, 1873.
Macadam v. Macadam.

decree were given against her in absence it could only be put in force against the executry funds, and could not touch her personal estate.[1] So the question arose, did arrestment of private funds found jurisdiction? The theory of the matter was, that there must be an arrestable subject which might be made available on decree. But here no executry funds were arrested, and so the arrestment did not afford the Court any means of making the judgment available to the successful party. The defender was not personally liable, nor was her personal estate liable, for she was only called as executrix of her mother, and, therefore, even supposing the claim to be well founded, arrestment of her personal estate was not sufficient to found urisdiction against her.[2]

Argued for the pursuer;—Although the defender was called as executrix she was bound to answer the claim personally. Both a vitious intromitter and an executor were liable personally, but the claim against the former was universal, whereas against the latter it was limited by the inventory. So this action having been brought to establish personal liability personal funds had been arrested.

This was a Scotch succession, and all the transactions in connection with it took place in Scotland.[3]

At advising,—

Lord Justice-Clerk.—This case might certainly, and as far as I see conveniently, have been tried in England in the forum of the alleged debtor; but it does not follow that this Court has not jurisdiction to entertain it. The objection stated by the defender that the funds arrested are not the funds of the executry estate cannot be sustained. This objection would have been good had there been two or more executors, for then the arrestments would not have been of the funds of the debtor, but here there is only one. The obligation of the executrix is personal, limited only by the amount of the inventory, and the arrestment therefore of her funds is sufficient to found jurisdiction against her.

I doubt, however, whether an English executor should in the ordinary case be made amenable to our Courts at all, or whether it is in this case advisable to exercise the jurisdiction founded by arrestment. When an English executor comes here he is responsible in our Courts; but, as a general rule, he is responsible to the jurisdiction under which he administers. But that goes to the question whether we should exercise our jurisdiction in such a case. That we have jurisdiction I do not doubt.

Lord Cowan.—It appears to me that the only question before us is, whether the Scotch Court has jurisdiction. The objection taken in support of the plea of no jurisdiction is, that the fund arrested is of such a nature that the pursuer is not entitled to proceed against the defender upon that arrestment, but that, to found jurisdiction, funds of a different character should have been arrested. I do not think that that objection is well founded, for the liability of the executrix is personal, and therefore the arrestment of personal funds is sufficient to found jurisdiction; so when we have funds arrested in Scotland why should we not allow the case to go on here?

It may be, although it was not argued before us, that the question here is not so much a question of jurisdiction as of forum conveniens. I do not think, however, that the question of forum conveniens arises here, for nearly all the transactions and intromissions with the executry estate which gave rise to this

[1] MacMornie v. Cowie, Jan. 16, 1845, 7 D. 270; Gillon v. Dunlop and Cobbett, Feb. 27, 1864, ante, vol. ii. p. 776.

[2] Campbell v. Rucker, March 2, 1809, Hume, 258; Houston v. Stirling and Others, Feb. 3, 1824, 2 S. 672; Brown's Trustees v. Palmer, Dec. 17, 1830, 9 S. 224; MacMaster v. MacMaster, June 7, 1833, 11 S. 685.

[3] Clements v. Macaulay, March 16, 1866, ante, vol. iv. p. 583.

e took place in Scotland, and I therefore think that the Scotch Court is the per Court to try the cause. No. 142.

It is not suggested by any of the pleas in law that it is in England that this e should be considered, nor that the question at issue is the effect of the glish letters of administration, but the only question raised is as to the juris- tion of this Court. I think there is no doubt that this Court has jurisdiction, l that we must adhere to the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary. I think, wever, that the Lord Ordinary should have simply repelled the plea, and wed the case to proceed. July 3, 1873. Macadam v. Macadam.

LORD BENHOLME concurred.

LORD NEAVES.—I think that we should adhere to the interlocutor of the Lord linary. This, however, is a case in which we should be cautious not to anti- ate points which may arise. It involves some questions of English law, and m not sure that it does not involve some questions of international law also, there is a specialty in the case. The estate to which Miss Macadam ministered executrix was not her mother's property, although it was vested in r by a Scotch executry title. The mother had only a liferent, yet the defender ok up the estate as if she had a fee, and made up a title as if it had been the other's absolute property. Now, if a party in England takes out letters of ministration for the purpose of taking possession of an estate, known by her be a Scotch executry estate, the question arises whether she does not subject rself to the laws which govern that executry estate. That specialty, however, s not been discussed.

There are several other nice points which arise in this case, but I think we n investigate them as well here as in England.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—I had expressed my opinion only on the first point, t since so much has been said on the question of forum I must fairly say that y impression is that this Court is not the appropriate forum to try this case. he next step must be to decide what proof we are to have, and I think it not asonable to put the parties to the expense of an intricate proof in a Court which not the forum of administration. The question on the merits is a question of nglish law, and very much a question of English fact. The real truth has to disclosed, whether the lady did really only lend her name for the purpose of tting up an English debenture bond, and the legal bearing of that has to be cided. I am of opinion that the English Courts should deal with this. No ubt the original estate was Scotch, but it has long ceased to be so, so far as is question is concerned.

THE COURT adhered.

M'EWEN & CARMENT, W.S.—WATT & ANDERSON, S.S.C.—Agents.

RICHARD DUDGEON AND WILLIAM MACGEORGE, his Attorney, Complainers.—Balfour—W. F. Hunter.
WILLIAM THOMSON, Respondent.—Sol.-Gen. Clark—Asher. No. 143.

July 4, 1873. Dudgeon v. Thomson.

Patent—Provisional Specification—15 and 16 Vict. cap. 83.—The title of a tent under the Act 15 and 16 Vict. cap. 83, is explained by the provisional cification, and where it is pleaded that a patent is invalid in consequence of final specification embracing too much the final specification is to be com- red with the title and the provisional specification read together.

Patent—Specification—Misrepresentation.—A patent was objected to on ground of misrepresentation in the specification, which set forth that the nciple of the invention was expansion of boiler tubes by means of rollers which uld be worked by the hand, whereby the use of mauls or sledge hammers uld be dispensed with, while, in point of fact, the machine could not be rked without the use of hammers. It was proved that the machine could not stated in the complete specification to be "to enable the en tubes to be expanded in the holes in the flue-sheet. Previou vention it has been customary to expand the ends of tube panding tool, composed substantially of a series of swag from a common centre, and caused to diverge by means of a t driven into the centre of the tool by the repeated blows of a ma

The principle of the invention, which constitutes the subje this patent, is to expand the tube by rolling the metal, by the
of one or more pressure-rollers to the interior of the tube, metal is expanded by rolling, in contradistinction to the ol driving it outwards by hammering, and as the roller can be hand, the use of mauls or sledges, and all the inconveniences their employment, are dispensed with."

After describing in detail various methods of constructin expanding tool invented by the complainer, the specification
"Although a tapering or wedge-formed plug is preferred as th instrument, the invention is not limited to an expanding ir that form, as circumstances may render expedient the use of ing instrument of different form—thus, when a tool is suffi an arrangement of toggle-jointed levers may be inserted in it pose of expanding the roller in place of a tapering plug." T tion then concludes thus:—"In all the above-described mod the roller expanding tool, at least one roller is combined wit plug (or its equivalent, by whose action the roller is forced the tube), and with a stock or holder by which the roller from twisting sidewise as it is turned round in the tube. Th strumentalities are all that are absolutely essential to the co
the roller expanding tool, but the cutter and ratchet handl with the said instrumentalities or implements, useful combina are supplementary to the aforesaid fundamental combinatio claimed, therefore, as the invention to be secured by letters-p combination in an expanding tool of the following impleme roller, roller-stock, and expanding instrument,—these three combination substantially as set forth. Also the combinati panding tool of the following implements, viz., the roller, roll panding instrument, and cutter for trimming the tube all

866, in pursuance of the proviso contained in the said letters-patent, and, particular, from making, vending, or using any apparatus for expanding iler tubes constructed or used in the manner described in the said ecification, or in manner substantially the same, and from infringing e said letters-patent in any other manner of way.

No. 143.

July 4, 1873.

Dudgeon v. Thomson.

The respondent had obtained letters-patent for a similar invention ted 18th August 1868, and sealed 16th February 1869. He stated in s defences that this invention was novel and original in various par-ulars, and that the tube expanders made and sold by him under his rn letters-patent were in principle and in all material respects different om those alleged to be protected by the complainers' letters-patent. He ecified the particulars in which they differed; and averred further;—"In e provisional specification of the complainers' letters-patent the alleged ivention was declared to be for 'improvements on apparatus used in ex-anding boiler tubes,' and the advertisements of said application so de-cribed the nature of said alleged invention. But this title was misleading, nd did not sufficiently disclose the true nature of the invention claimed, hich, in addition to being an apparatus for expanding boiler tubes, also laims to be a cutter for trimming boiler tubes, besides other combina-ions and purposes. The title of the patent and its nature were thus inconsistent with and disconform to each other. The final specification founded on by the complainers further sets forth that by means of the lleged invention 'the use of mauls and sledges, and all inconveniences hat attend their employment, are dispensed with.' In practical opera-ion, it has been found that the alleged invention cannot effect the object lleged to be accomplished by it without, either, first, the use of mauls r sledges or hammers, as a means of forcing in the expanding plug, with hich any other mode of forcing in the same would be inadequate to ccomplish these results, and no other means of forcing it in are provided; r, second, by the boiler-makers attaching a rod to the inner end of the pering plug, and pulling it inwards by the help of a screw and nut in he further end of the rod which projects out of the opposite end of the ube; but this is a mode of operation wholly different from any described n the specification founded on by the complainers. There was thus a isrepresentation and failure to make a full and true disclosure of what as necessary to render the alleged invention effectual, or to enable a orkman of ordinary skill to put the same into practice."

The complainers pleaded;—The respondent having infringed the com-lainers' said patent rights, as above condescended on, and having refused o discontinue said infringement, the complainers are entitled to have nterdict as craved.

The respondent pleaded, inter alia;—3. The suspension and interdict ught to be refused, as the letters-patent founded on by the complainers re invalid, in respect—(1) of the disconformity of the provisional speci-cation with the letters-patent and final specification; (2) of the mis-epresentation in the final specification above stated; and, (3) of the ilure in the said specification to make a full and true disclosure of the ivention, such as would enable a workman of ordinary skill to put the me into practice. 4. The suspension ought also to be refused, in re-ect the respondent has not infringed the letters-patent founded on by e complainers.

The Lord Ordinary allowed a proof, the import of which is given in s Lordship's note and the judgment of the Lord President.

The Lord Ordinary pronounced the following interlocutor:—"The rd Ordinary having heard the counsel for the parties, and considered e closed record, proof, and process, sustains the reasons of suspension, tion effectual, and to enable a workman of ordinary skill to put practice?

"1. The complainer's letters-patent, for 'improvements in ap expanding boiler tubes,' are dated 7th March 1866. On 18th A respondent obtained letters-patent for 'improvements in tools o expanding and cutting tubes and metallic rings, part of which i applicable for withdrawing ferules from the ends of boiler tubes.
apparatus of the respondent has been extensively manufactured a since the date of his letters-patent, and the question is, whether t tube expander is either in whole or in part a tool of the descript the complainer's specification, or of a description substantially the

"The Lord Ordinary is of opinion that it is clearly proved that t tool embraces in all substantial respects the combination or a panding tubes patented by the complainer.

"Previous to the date of the complainer's letters-patent, bo fastened in the boiler plate by means of hammering out the tube them fit the holes in the boiler plate, or by driving a conical iro the tubes with repeated blows of a heavy maul or sledge hamm of placing in the tube a hollow iron cone cut into swages or segm ing with repeated blows of a heavy maul or sledge a tapered iro centre of the swages. For the purpose of ensuring tightness, a flat iron, with a greater taper, was sometimes, in addition, driven i means of a hammer, and made to distend in succession still furt ference of that part of the tube which was in contact with the b all these modes the expansion was obtained by percussion alo advantage was not only that a very large percentage of the b split in the ends and spoiled, but that the adjoining tubes, whic in the boiler plate, were loosened. By the invention of the c disadvantages were entirely removed. That invention consist sion of the tube, as his specification states, 'by the application pressure-rollers to the interior of the tube, so that the metal rolling it, in contradistinction to the old system of driving it ou mering.' This was a novel and very useful invention. There stated by the respondent in the record either to the novelty or the complainer's invention.

"The essential parts of the complainer's apparatus are the co expanding tool of a roller stock, one or more rollers, and a t expanding instrument. Various modes of carrying out the i forth in the complainer's specification. But that which for gene

The respondent reclaimed, and argued;—The complainer's letters-patent were invalid, in respect of the disconformity between the title

No. 143.

July 4, 1873.

Dudgeon v. Thomson.

tool substantially as set forth in the complainer's specification. The respondent's tool is, like that of the complainer, composed of a roller stock, three rollers, and an expanding instrument. His roller stock is called in his specification a 'hollow cylindrical body.' His rollers are called in one part of his specification 'expanding cones,' and in another part 'conic rollers,' and his expanding instrument is called a 'central cone.' The sides of his roller stock, as originally constructed by him, were not extended so as to keep the rollers straight when caused to rotate, which made the tool unworkable, and he was obliged twice to extend the stock between the rollers so as to keep the rollers straight. The progress of the respondent's tool is well shewn in the three productions, Nos. 28, 29, and 30 of process. The Lord Ordinary considers that all these are mere colourable variations of the complainer's roller stock, and that the last of them only wants a cap fitted on to make it identical. The complainer's rollers work in slots in the body piece. So also do the respondent's. The only difference in the mode of fixing the rollers is that the complainer's body piece having a cap, his rollers are formed with journals at each end so to work and rotate in radial slots, while the respondent's body piece having no cap, his rollers work only at one end in slots, these slots being made dovetailed, or wider below than above, and the rollers being formed with a head like a screw nail so as to catch and rotate in the dovetailed slots. But that mode of connecting the rollers with the roller stock or body piece is, the Lord Ordinary considers, a mere mechanical equivalent for and a colourable variation of the complainer's mode.

"The respondent maintains that his rollers are conical or tapered, and that his central cone or expander has a corresponding taper the reverse way, which produces parallel expansion of the tube, and that there is nothing in the complainer's patent corresponding to it. But the complainer's specification is not limited to tapered expansion or to parallel rollers, or to any particular form of roller. And while he states that 'in the drawings the rollers are represented with profiles adapted to expand the tube in the form commonly produced by the old expanding tools,'—that is, from within outwards,—he also states that the profile of the rollers 'should be the same as that of a longitudinal section of the interior of the extremity of a tube when properly expanded.' To use other words, that is to say, the nature of the expansion being determined on, and the tapering plug or expander being conical, the rollers must be constructed with such a profile as to produce the desired shape. If conical expansion is desired, then parallel rollers operated on by a tapering plug will produce it, and if parallel expansion is desired, then the rollers must be so tapered in the opposite direction that the tapering expander and tapering rollers will be the complement of each other, and make together a parallelogram.

"The respondent also contended that while complainer's plug or expander is tapered inwards and is forced inwards, his expander or central cone tapers from within outwards, and operates by being pulled outwards. Such a distinction as this requires, it is thought, no remark.

"But the respondent further maintained as part of his invention the method of expanding or pressing his rollers against the tube by means of a nut working on a screw placed on his central cone, which nut when turned by a wrench pulls the central cone outwards, and causes it to expand the rollers. This superinduction of a screw and nut upon the tapering expander might or might not have been a good subject for a patent. As to that, the Lord Ordinary is not called upon to express any opinion. But even although this had been the case, it cannot warrant the incorporation with it and the claim, as part of the invention, of the complainer's apparatus, or the essential parts thereof. Such an incorporation, and such a claim, as is made by the respondent for the combination patented by the complainer, may invalidate, but cannot strengthen, the respondent's patent, even as regards the screwed expander and nut, supposing these to be new and original, on the ground that the introduction of any one objectionable item into a patent is fatal to the whole.

No. 143.

July 4, 1873.
Dudgeon v. Thomson.

and provisional specification, and the final specification.[1] The final specification also misrepresented the invention, and failed to give such

"2. The respondent pleads as an objection to the complainer's patent that the title 'improvements in apparatus used in expanding boiler tubes' is misleading, and does not sufficiently disclose the true nature of the invention claimed, which, in addition to claiming an apparatus for expanding boiler tubes, also claims a cutter for trimming boiler tubes, besides other combinations, so that its title and nature are inconsistent with and disconform to each other.

"The Lord Ordinary cannot adopt this objection of the respondent. What the complainer patented was improvements in expanding apparatus. One of the improvements so patented is thus described in his specification :—'In order that one tool may be used for performing the two operations of expanding the tube and of turning off its end, the expanding rollers and stock are combined with a cutter E, which is arranged to turn upon the stock of the expanding rollers, so that the compound tool thus formed may be used first to expand the tube, and then, by turning the cutter without withdrawing the tool, to trim off the end of the tube. In this case the rollers retain their positions in the groove which they have formed by rolling, and hold the tool in the tube while the cutter is operating.' That was, the Lord Ordinary conceives, such an improvement in the apparatus used in expanding as to be fully covered by the title of the patent. That is the case also as regards the other improvements claimed by the complainer, in reference to which the objection was not urged in argument. All these improvements are fully set forth both in the provisional and final specifications, and these specifications may be brought in aid to explain the title, which, in the opinion of the Lord Ordinary, they fully do.

"This is sufficient, it is thought, for the disposal of this objection. But, further, the title of the patent, and the provisional specification, both received the allowance of the law officer acting in terms of the Patent Law Amendment Act, 15 and 16 Victoria, c. 83. By that statute (sections 6, 7, and 8), which for the first time required a provisional specification to be lodged with the petition for the letters-patent, these are to be referred to the law officer acting under the statute; and it is provided that, 'in case the title of the invention, or the provisional specification, be too large, or insufficient, it shall be lawful for the law officer to whom the same is referred to allow or require the same to be amended.' The title and provisional specification received the allowance of the law officer, and the objection taken to them cannot, the Lord Ordinary thinks, now be urged. The final specification claims nothing that is not set forth in the provisional specification. The respondent's objection on this ground falls therefore to be repelled—(Penn v. Bibby, 6th December 1866, Law Reports, Ch. App. ii. 127).

"3. The complainer's patent is also said to be bad in respect of misrepresentation in the final specification, and of failure in that specification to make a full and true disclosure of what is necessary to render the alleged invention effectual, or to enable a workman of ordinary skill to put the same into practice. The grounds of these objections are set forth in the seventh statement of the respondent, and are to the effect that whereas the complainer sets forth in his specification that by means of his invention the use of mauls and sledges, and all the inconveniences that attend their employment, are dispensed with, yet in practice it has been found that the invention cannot effect the object without the use of mauls or sledges, or hammers, as a means of forcing in the expanding plug—that any other mode of forcing in the same would be inadequate—and that no other means are provided.

"By the modes in use before the complainer's invention boiler tubes were expanded by percussion alone. The most common modes were by driving with repeated blows from heavy mauls or sledges a tapered mandril into the tube, or a tapering plug into the centre of a hollow cone cut into segments and inserted in the tube. By the invention of the complainer the tube is expanded by rolling

[1] Hindmarch on Patents, 43; Croll v. Edge, 9 C. B. 479.

No. 143.

July 4, 1873.
Dudgeon v. Thomson.

description of it as would enable a workman of ordinary skill to use it.[1] he respondent had not in fact infringed the letters-patent, his apparatus eing materially different from that claimed by the complainer.

The complainer argued;—There was no material variance between the itle and provisional specification and the complete specification. The rovisional specification was intended to describe generally and fairly the ature of the invention without detail;[2] and it could not, after being llowed by the law officer of the Crown, be impeached as too general.[3] he description in the complete specification was sufficient to satisfy the equirements of the law; it was in accordance with the actual machine in he metal by the application of one or more pressure rollers to the interior of the ube, so that the metal is expanded by rolling in contradistinction to the old ystem of driving it outwards by hammering. These rollers are made to diverge nd rotate by a tapering plug or expander being forced inwards and turned round nd round. The complainer does not limit his mode of forcing the tapering plug r expander inwards to the hand of the operator. He only says, when describing he subject-matter of his patent, that as 'the roller can be operated by hand' he use of mauls or sledges and their attendant inconveniences are dispensed with. It is, the Lord Ordinary thinks, proved that the complainer's tapering plug or expander can both be forced in and turned upon its axis by the hand. Some of the respondent's witnesses said that this could not be done. But numerous witnesses examined by the complainer deponed that they had successfully worked it by the hand. Further, the complainer gives two descriptions of apering plugs with shallow flat screw threads, which draw themselves inwards hen turned by the hand, and also an apparatus with the axis of the rollers lightly skewed to the axis of the tube, the effect of which is, as was demonstrated before the Lord Ordinary, to cause the tapering plug when turned in one irection to draw into the tube, and to expand the tube, and when reversed, to oosen itself within the rollers. These three apparatus are worked more easily an the others, but it is proved that the others can also be worked by the and. It is not, the Lord Ordinary considers, a good objection to the patent, at the workmen, instead of using the hands alone to force the tapering plug wards, find it easier to give it a slight blow with a light hammer or wooden allet (not a heavy maul or sledge), so as to place the rollers in position, or to ite the tube before they proceed to turn the tapering plug round, in order to use the rollers to revolve within the tube, and to expand it by rolling. That a very different thing from the old practice of expanding by driving an exander into the tube with heavy mauls or sledges. The invention of the comlainer is 'the combination in an expanding tool of the following implements, iz., the roller, roller stock, and expanding instrument, these three operating in ombination substantially as set forth.' It is clearly proved that they do so perate in combination, and produce the required expansion. The mode of pplying the requisite power to force the expander inwards is no part of the atent. That may be done by a common brace, or in various other ways. But ven if the complainer had by his specification limited his mode of forcing in the xpander to the hands of the workman, it is proved that the said three impleents operating in combination can be worked by the hands alone, and that, hen so worked, they will produce the desired expansion. There is thus, the ord Ordinary is of opinion, no misrepresentation in the specification, and no ilure to make a full and true disclosure therein of what is necessary to render ie alleged invention effectual, or to enable a workman of ordinary skill to roduce the effect set forth in the specification."

---

[1] Rex v. Wheeler, 2 B. and Al. 345; Lord Cochrane v. Smethurst, 1 Stark, 05; Neilson v. Househill Coal and Iron Co., Jan. 27, 1842, 4 D. 470—Nov. 5, 1842, 5 D. 86.

[2] In re Newall, 4 C. B. N. S. 269, 288—27 L. J. C. P. 237.

[3] Penn v. Bibby, L. R. 2 Ch. Ap. 127—36 L. J. Ch. 455.

No. 143.

July 4, 1873.
Dudgeon v. Thomson.

use, and enough to enable any ordinary workman to use it.[1] The apparatus made and sold by the respondent was plainly identical in all essentials with the invention patented by the complainer, however he might attempt to disguise it by the use of different language in describing it.

At advising,—

LORD PRESIDENT.—This is an application for interdict against an alleged infringement of a patent for improvements in apparatus used in expanding boiler tubes. The respondent, besides denying the alleged infringement, has stated three objections to the validity of the patent, and it is desirable to dispose of these in the first place before proceeding to the question of infringement. He says that the letters-patent are invalid—first, in respect of the disconformity of the provisional specification with the letters-patent and final specification. Now, that plea as stated is altogether futile, nor do I think it a relevant plea in law, because, if the letters-patent and complete specification are in accordance with one another, and the two together make a valid and complete patent, then an imperfection in the provisional specification, I apprehend, would be altogether immaterial. But the objection as argued assumed a somewhat different form, and I understood the Solicitor-General to contend on the part of the respondent that there was a disconformity between the title and specification, but whether he meant to say that the disconformity was between the title, on the one hand, and the provisional and complete specification, on the other hand, or whether he meant to say that the title and the provisional specification, on the one hand, were disconform to the complete specification, on the other, I could not even in the end ascertain.

I shall consider the matter in both these lights. The title, as already mentioned, is "improvements in apparatus used in expanding boiler tubes," and the first question is whether that title is in accordance with the complete specification, the objection stated by the Solicitor-General being that the complete specification covers more than is covered by the title—that there is a certain part of the invention which is not within the title, and cannot be covered by the title, because, as he says, it is not an improvement in apparatus used in expanding boiler tubes, but an improvement in apparatus used for a different purpose than expanding boiler tubes. The complete specification describes very distinctly the nature of the invention, and gives a very clear view of its object. It says—"The object of the invention is to enable the ends of boiler tubes to be expanded in the holes in the flue-sheet. Previous to this invention it has been customary to expand the ends of tubes by an expanding tool composed substantially of a series of swages radiating from a common centre, and caused to diverge by means of a tapering plug driven into the centre of the tool by the repeated blows of a maul or sledge." And then—"The principle of the invention which constitutes the subject-matter of this patent is to expand the tube by rolling the metal by the application of one or more pressure rollers to the interior of the tube so, that the metal is expanded by rolling, in contradistinction to the old system of driving it outwards by hammering; and as the roller can be operated by hand, the use of mauls or sledges, and all the inconveniences that attend their employnent, are dispensed with." So far, I think, this specification is expressed with almost exceptional clearness. The old system of expanding tubes when they reached the flue-sheet was by driving in a tapering plug by means of repeated blows of a maul or sledge, and causing the swages which radiated from a common centre to diverge so as to expand the tube. This was an inconvenient system, for reasons which are afterwards explained, that the violent percussion which was applied was very apt to split the tubes instead of expanding them, and it also was apt to have the effect of disturbing the other

[1] Sturz v. De la Rue, 5 Russ. 322; Neilson v. Harford, 8 M. and W. 806; Webster's Patent Cases, 331; Prale v. Millar, Feb. 28, 1863, ante, vol. i. 450; Coryton on Patents, 133.

No. 143.

July 4, 1873.

Dudgeon v. Thomson.

tubes in the flue-sheet which had already been expanded and fixed. The detailed description which follows with reference to the figures it is not necessary to read, but the claim at the conclusion of the specification is, for the purpose of the present case, most important. He says—"These three instrumentalities,"—which he has several times mentioned—the roller, the roller stock, and the expanding instrument—"are all that is absolutely essential to the roller expanding tool; but the cutter and ratchet-handle constitute with the said instrumentalities or implements useful combinations which are supplementary to the aforesaid fundamental combination." Now, this cutter and ratchet-handle he has previously described as something which may be usefully employed in combination with his expanding tool for the purpose of finishing off the end of the pipe at the same time or by means of the same apparatus which is used to expand. And therefore he claims, first of all, in combination, the roller, roller stock, and expanding instrument, these three operating in combination substantially as set forth. In the second place, he claims the combination of the roller, roller stock, expanding instrument, and cutter for trimming the tube, all operating in combination; and the third combination merely adds to all these a ratchet-handle for turning the cutting instrument. Now, the objection which is taken is, that the cutter and the ratchet-handle for turning it are not part of an expanding apparatus, but something different and additional, and that therefore they do not fall under the title. But the title is not for an expanding apparatus. The title is "improvements in apparatus used in expanding boiler tubes," and it would rather appear to me, if it were at all necessary to decide that question, that an improvement in the apparatus used in expanding boiler tubes may be not to produce expansion but to do something else.

But, in short, it is quite needless to pursue that line of argument, which would have been a sufficiently important one before the Act of 1852 was passed, because, I apprehend, this question must be determined upon a different view altogether since the passing of that Act. There was here lodged, in terms of that Act, a provisional specification. But the provisional specification comes into existence at the very same time as the title. The first step that is taken by a patentee in order to obtain a patent is to present a petition at the office of the commissioners, and in that petition he sets forth the title, accompanied by a declaration, in which he undertakes to shew it is new and useful, and by the provisional specification which the stutute requires he describes the nature of the invention. Now, a great object of the provisional specification, introduced for the first time by the Act of 1852, was to avoid difficulties which had frequently occurred and which were embarrassing both to the patentee and to the public, or those of the public who were engaged in investigations and improvements in the same line of work or business as the patentee. The great object of the provisional specification was to secure less of a distinct statement of the patentee's claim than was to be found in the final specification, and more than was to be found in the mere title of the invention as it used to be presented, and upon which letters-patent were granted, and accordingly the provisional specification must state the nature of the invention. It does not go so far as the complete specification, which must state not only the nature of the invention, but the manner in which the same is to be performed; but in stating the nature of the invention the provisional specification necessarily goes a good deal further than the title does, and gives additional information to the public of what it is that is claimed, and at the same time it secures a certain benefit to the patentee. The petition with the provisional specification is submitted to the law officer, and it is part of his duty to see that the provisional specification and the title correspond with each other, and if the one is too large, or is insufficient, then it is his duty, under the statute, to amend it or to allow it to be amended so as to bring the two into harmony. When that has been done, then the patentee has a provisional specification, and he goes on under that provisional specification until the warrant is issued for the letters-patent, and he obtains the actual letters-patent themselves. It appears to me that in these circumstances the true question under a plea of this kind is whether the complete specification goes beyond the title and provisional specification, for these two must be taken together.

No. 143.
July 4, 1873.
Dudgeon v. Thomson.

The one is to interpret or to explain the other, and they are taken together, therefore, and are in the same position in a question of this kind now as the title would have been alone previous to the passing of the Act of 1852. Is there, then, something more claimed in the complete specification than was claimed and disclosed in the title and provisional specification? It is quite impossible to say that, because in the provisional specification there is just the same statement about the cutting implement, and the ratchet-handle by which it is turned. He says—"In order that one tool may be used for performing the two operations of expanding the tube and of trimming off its end, the expanding rollers are combined with a cutter which is arranged to turn upon the stock of the expanding rollers," and so on. In short, he stops short, as he was entitled to do in the exercise of proper caution, from going into details of the manner in which the invention was to be performed, and confines himself to a general statement of its nature, but he very distinctly brings out that its nature is that in the one tool there may be and will be combined expansion by rolling and a cutter to trim off the end of the tube. I think, therefore, that the plea here altogether fails, and that there is nothing in the complete specification which goes at all beyond the title and provisional specification, and consequently that the patent is not assailable upon this first ground.

But then, in the second place, the respondent contends that the patent is invalid in respect of misrepresentation in the complete specification, and that raises a point of a different kind. He says it is proved in evidence that the patent apparatus or expanding tool cannot be used without percussion—that while the patentee in his specification professes to dispense altogether with blows of a maul or sledge hammer to drive in the tapering plug, it is not possible in actual work, however it may be in experiment, to drive it in without the blow of some hammer. Now, it may be admitted, I think, that in practice workmen using this apparatus do use a hammer to drive the plug into the roller stock so as to enable it to bite the inside of the roller stock. At the same time, it is proved, I think, that it can be made effectually to do its work without the blow of a hammer. Probably the respondent is entitled to say that in practice it never will be, because it is much more difficult to do it without the blow of a hammer, and therefore that in any proper practical sense it is not true that the roller can be operated by the hand alone; and he says that the patentee has pledged himself to dispense with percussion altogether, and to operate by the hand only. The part of the specification to which he refers in regard to this is that which I read at the commencement of the specification; where the patentee is describing the principle of the invention he says—"The principle of the invention which constitutes the subject-matter of this patent is to expand the tube by rolling the metal by the application of one or more pressure rollers to the interior of the tube, so that the metal is expanded by rolling, in contradistinction to the old system of driving it outwards by hammering, and as the roller can be operated by hand, the use of mauls or sledges, and all the inconveniences that attend their employment, are dispensed with."

Now, that is the misrepresentation complained of. It appears to me this is a somewhat narrow point, but upon the whole I cannot think there is a misrepresentation. I think it is true that the use of mauls and sledges is dispensed with, because mauls and sledges are hammers of a very heavy kind, the use of which produces very violent percussion. We, in Scotland, are not very familiar with these words "mauls" and "sledges," but I take it, that when translated into Scotch they mean mells and fore-hammers, and everybody knows that these are the two heaviest of the class of hammers used by human hand with which we are acquainted, the one being the heaviest kind of wooden hammer, and the other the heaviest kind of metal hammer. Now, I think that the use of such heavy instruments as these is dispensed with by the patentee's mode of expanding. It may be that slighter percussion is very convenient, and is commonly used to put the tapering plug into its place, and enable it to bite the metal in the inside of the tube, so as afterwards, by means of the roller attached to it, to expand the metal of the tube all round. But all that the patentee has said upon that subject is, that the roller can be operated by the hand, and so it can. It is capable of operating by hand, and therefore the percussion by hand is so slight that the use of mauls or sledges is altogether dispensed with, and, what is of more consequence still, the inconveniences that attend their operation are got the better of, and altogether avoided. That is in evidence before us. There is no longer such an amount of percussion as to lead to the splitting of the tube and the displacement of other tubes that have already been placed in the flue-sheet; and therefore I think that while perhaps the patentee here was a little too sanguine in believing he could do without a hammer at all, he was not guilty of any misrepresentation, in any proper sense of the term, in the words he has here used.

That disposes of the second objection to the validity of the patent; and the only remaining objection is, that the patent is invalid in respect of the failure in the said specification to make a full and true disclosure of the invention, such as would enable a workman of ordinary skill to put the same into practice. I understood that objection to be founded on the same ground as the second—that the misrepresentation in regard to the mode in which the tapering plug has to be got into its place would prevent a workman of ordinary skill from making use of the apparatus until he had found out for himself that he must resort to the hammer again. But there, again, I think the objection is not good, and the best proof is that many workmen of ordinary skill, and many who were examined as witnesses, had no difficulty whatever in using this patent apparatus, and had no difficulty whatever, when they found that the tapering plug would not go very readily into its place, in taking a small hammer handy for the purpose and giving it one or two slight blows to put it in.

The only question that remains for consideration is the question whether the respondent has infringed the patent, and here there is really no room for doubt. It is quite true that the tool which is used by the respondent differs in some respects from that which is described in the specification, but this is by no means sufficient. It may be—I do not say that it is—that the respondent's is a better tool, but that would not prevent him being an infringer if he has adopted the principle of the patent invention. Now, there is no doubt in the world that although the respondent in his specification adopts different language from that which is used in the complainer's specification, he does use in combination rollers and a roller stock and a tapering plug for the purpose of expanding tubes by rolling, and that is the subject-matter of the complainer's patent. It is quite true that in the case of the respondent's tool there is produced what he calls perfectly parallel expansion, while a tool made in terms of the complainer's specification will not give perfectly parallel expansion. That may be, for aught I know, an improvement. But, then, observe how that improvement is brought about. It is by a slight modification of that which is the subject-matter of the complainer's patent. He tapers the roller stock as well as the tapering plug, and makes the taper of the one correspond precisely with the taper of the other, so that the effect is that the tube is expanded exactly as much for the whole length of the roller. Each roller produces exactly an equal expansion throughout its whole length, and the roller of the complainer, not being tapered so as to correspond with the taper of the plug, produces not an equal or parallel expansion of the tube, but an expansion which in the tube is of a tapering nature. Now, the one may be better than the other; but the question is, whether this variation, whether for good or for evil, is not just simply a variation upon the patent of the complainer, and therefore is the use of a patent invention. If a man discovers a great improvement upon an invention already patented he is very well entitled to take a patent for it, and can obtain a patent for it, but he must come to terms with the original patentee, and pay him a duty, or in some other way satisfy his right. Then, again, it is said that the one differs from the other in this, that whereas the tapering plug is inserted from the outside and is driven in, in the case of the complainer's patent e converso, in the case of the respondent's tool it is introduced from the inside and drawn outwards by means of a screw and nut. That is quite true. "And the effect of that," says the respondent, "is that percussion is not only not required in my instrument, but is impossible, because the head of the tapering tool not being outside but inside the tube to be expanded, it is impossible to get at it for the purpose of percussion, and you are therefore driven, of necessity, to depend entirely upon the screw and nut." That is another change which may or may not be an improvement; but suppose it be an improvement, it is still an improvement upon a patent invention, and it is impossible to use the improvement without using the patent invention; and there, again, the respondent in his own very description of these differences is practically confessing that he is using a patent invention. The infringement is therefore a matter of fact, I apprehend, and attended with no difficulty whatever; and upon the whole matter I am satisfied that the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor ought to be adhered to.

No. 143.
July 4, 1873.
Dudgeon v. Thomson.

LORD DEAS.—As your Lordship has stated, the answer of the respondent resolves itself into three heads. In the first place, objections to the disconformity between the title and the provisional and final specifications; in the second place, misrepresentation of the nature of the invention; and, in the third place, that the patent of the respondent is not an infringement upon that of the pursuer. I concur in the views stated by your Lordship on all these three points, and I think there is really no difficulty except upon the second point, to which alone I shall therefore advert.

The objection under this head is threefold. First, it is said, that the expansion is not produced entirely by the pressure of the roller on the interior of the tube, but is to some extent produced before that pressure begins to operate. Second, it is said that the expansion is represented as operated by the hand; and third, it is said that the use of mauls and sledges is represented as being entirely dispensed with. Now, I do not think expansion can really be said to be produced before the roller begins to operate. What takes place before that is simply the introduction of the roller to produce the expansion. The difficulty mainly is whether it is represented that the expansion is operated by hand, and without the use of mauls and sledges. The words used are certainly not very cautious. The roller can, no doubt, be operated by the hand, so that these words, taken literally, are not contrary to the fact; but then, if it is meant that the use of mauls of all kinds is, in every instance, dispensed with, that would not be a correct representation of what practically takes place. There is a nicety here, and a difficulty, but I am disposed to agree with your Lordship that the real meaning is, in the first place, that it is possible to do it altogether by the hand (which is quite true), and, in the second place (which is also true), that at all events the use of mauls and sledges—that is, the use of heavy hammers either of wood or iron—is dispensed with, meaning that sort of heavy hammers which give rise to risk of splitting and of injury. As your Lordship has said, a maul may be taken as equivalent to what in Scotland is called a mell,—that is, a large heavy wooden hammer,—and a sledge, as an appropriate enough word for what we call, more familiarly, a fore-hammer,—that is, a large and heavy iron hammer.

It is said that an ordinary workman could not follow this description. That comes under the question whether the description would or would not mislead the workman by making him think that expansion was produced entirely by rollers, and that the use of a hammer, however light, was to be uniformly dispensed with. I do not think that would be so, and upon the whole, I think that your Lordship's proposed judgment is correct.

LORD ARDMILLAN.—I have, after attentive consideration of the most able arguments on both sides, formed the same opinion as the Lord Ordinary and your Lordship. If there is no good objection to the complainer's letters-patent, then I am of opinion that infringement has been proved, and that the complainer is entitled to succeed. On the evidence before us, and on a comparison of the tool or instrument used by the respondent with the tool or instrument for which the complainer has a patent, I really entertain no doubt that the complainer's rights under his letters-patent have been infringed. I do not know whether the respondent's instrument is or is not, in some respects, an improvement on the complainer's. But in its most essential and important features it is a copy,

No. 143.

July 4, 1873.
Dudgeon v. Thomson.

obviously a borrowing of that for which the complainer holds a patent. On this question I have nothing to add.

But the more difficult part of the case is, the attack which has been made by Mr Thomson, the respondent, on the letters-patent held by the complainer.

It is not necessary to decide whether the respondent's objection, in respect of disconformity between the title and the specification, would have been conclusive before the date of the statute of 15 and 16 Victoria. I am not satisfied that the objection would even then have been conclusive. But since the date of that statute the title is legitimately explained by the provisional specification, and the title and provisional specification, read together, are to be compared with the final specification. That is really the comparison which we must make. The title, plus the provisional specification, must be carried on to be compared with the final specification. As the result of that comparison I arrive at the conclusion that there is no such disconformity as can render these letters-patent invalid. I think that the true nature of the complainer's invention, and of the mechanical instrumentality by which he practically works it, are sufficiently disclosed. The "cutter" and the "ratchet handle" are subordinate, and merely for the purpose of trimming and turning, and both are set forth in the provisional specification as well as in the final specification.

Another objection is that the specification is inaccurate and deceptive, because it sets forth that the principle of the invention is expansion by rolling, whereas, in point of fact, the "tapering plug" is first introduced into the tube by propulsion or insertion, and then, after the "bite" on the sides of the tube has been got by the insertion of the plug, the expansion by internal rolling commences. This, it is said, is not entirely expansion by rolling. I am of opinion that this objection, however ingenious, is not well founded. It must be assumed that in the process of rolling a certain amount of displacement of surface, which workmen call a "bite," must precede the rolling which produces the desired expansion. No expansion could take place if the "tapering plug" or "mandril" were so much less than the tube as to have no "bite." The first insertion of the expanding instrument must take effect in producing a "bite;" but however that mere insertion is accomplished, it is only introductory to the "expansion by rolling," which is the invention.

The third objection taken is that the complainer's instrument is falsely described, because the instrument is represented as wrought or capable of being wrought by the hand, and as dispensing with the use of "mauls or sledges," and the inconveniences that attend their employment. Now, I think that the specification is not very happily expressed. But reading and construing it fairly, I am of opinion that we should not sustain the objection. It is proved that the complainer's instrument can be wrought by the hand, and has been sometimes so wrought. But it is, I think, also proved that "mauls," by which I understand heavy wooden hammers, and "sledges," by which I understand fore-hammers, or smith's hammers, are no longer used or required, but small mallets or light hammers are found to be practically useful, and are generally used. In consequence of the inaccurate expression used in the specification a difficulty has here arisen. But, bearing in mind that the heavy hammers, mauls, and sledges, with the attendant inconvenience arising from their weight and power, are really dispensed with, and that expansion by rolling—possible by hand, and yet more effectively accomplished by the aid of light mallets—is within the intelligence and the power of a workman of ordinary skill, I think that we should not do justice to the complainer if we refused to acknowledge and to support his letters-patent.

LORD JERVISWOODE concurred.

THE COURT adhered.

MACNAUGHTON & FINLAY, W.S.—RONALD, RITCHIE, & ELLIS, W.S.—Agents.

No. 144.

July 4, 1873.
Erskine v.
Earl of Kellie.

JOHN FRANCIS ERSKINE GOODEVE ERSKINE, Pursuer.—Adam—Asher.
The Right Honourable WALTER HENRY ERSKINE, EARL OF KELLIE, Defender.—Sol.-Gen. Clark—Balfour.

Entail—Destination.—A deed of entail contained a destination to A and the heirs-male to be procreate of her body, whom failing, to the heirs whatsomever descending of her body. The narrative of the deed set forth that it was granted in implement of an obligation to dispone to A and the heirs of her body. Held that the narrative and the destination were not inconsistent with each other, and that the whole class of heirs-male must be exhausted before heirs whatsoever could succeed.

1ST DIVISION. Lord Shand. B.

THIS was an action by John Francis Erskine Goodeve Erskine, claiming to be Earl of Mar, against the Earl of Kellie, to have his right to the estates of the earldom of Mar established under a deed of entail executed in 1739.

In 1715 John Earl of Mar was attainted, and his estates were forfeited. The friends of the family afterwards determined to acquire the forfeited estates from the Commissioners for the Sale of Forfeited Estates. Accordingly, James Erskine of Grange and David Erskine of Dun purchased the estates, and executed a disposition and deed of entail on 6th December 1739.

The following are the most important parts of the deed of entail:—"Likeas I, the said James Erskine, by my disposition and assignation, of the date the 23d day of March 1725 years, mentioning the writts before narrated, and subsuming that albeit by the foresaid disposition, indenture, contract of bargain or sale, the whole price of the foresaid purchase and interest due thereupon is said to be paid by me, the said James Erskine, and the disposition thereof taken in my name, only yet the equall half of the said purchase-money and interest thereof was truely advanced and payed by me, the said Mr David Erskine, and that it was previously concerted and agreed betwixt us that I, the said James Erskine, should dispone and convey to him the equall half of the said purchase in maner and under and with the reservations and provisions therein mentioned, Therefore I thereby sold, annailzied, and disponed from me, my heirs and successors whatsomever, to and in favours of me, the said Mr David Erskine, my heirs and assigneys whatsomever, heretablie and irredeemablie, subject alwayes proportionally to the burdens mentioned in the foresaid minute of sale and disposition above narrated, and with and under the reservations and provisions therein mentioned, the just and equall half of All and Haill the lands and estate therein and above mentioned, as the samen was brooked and enjoyed by the said John, late Earl of Marr, at the time of his attainder, and as the samen are more particularly exprest and designed in the rights and infeftments thereof, and minute or contract of sale before narrated, as the said disposition, of the date foresaid, containing ane assignation to the writts and evidents and mealls and duties of the said lands, and severall other clauses, insert and registrat in the Books of Councill and Session upon the 2d day of August 1736 years, also more fully bears: And in like manner we, by our backbond, of the date the 23d day of March 1725 years, mentioning the writts above narrated, and that we were willing that the benefite of the said purchase should be for the behoove of Thomas Lord Erskine, only lawful son to the said John, late Earl of Marr, and the other persons after named, Therefore we thereby band and obliged us, our heirs and successors, to denude ourselves of the said estate, at leist so much thereof as should remain unsold and disposed upon, for payment of the debts therein mentioned, and to dispone the same to and in favours of the said Thomas, Lord Erskine, and the heirs of his body; whom failling, to any

No. 144.

July 4, 1873.
Erskine v. Earl of Kellie.

full sister of the said Thomas, Lord Erskine, and the heirs of her body; ɔm failling, to me, the said James Erskine, and the heirs of my body; ɔm failling, to the nearest agnate of me, the said Mr James Erskine, of sirname of Erskine; whom failling, to me, the said James Erskine, heirs and assignees whatsomever, with and under the provisions and ditions therein mentioned and underwritten, as the said back-bond, taining thereintill severall other obligements and clauses, more fully rs: And we being now most willing and desirous to divest and denude selves of so much of the foresaids lands and estate as yet remain un- l in the termes of our back-bond above narrated, excepting the lands l estate after mentioned, for the reasons and causes specified and con- ıed in ane contract past betwixt the said Thomas, Lord Erskine, and of the date of thir presents, and for that effect to grant this present position in maner under written, Therefore witt ye us to have sold, ıailzied, and disponed, as we do by thir presents in implement, as said with and under the reservations, provisions, burdens, declarations, con- ions, clauses irritant and resolutive underwritten, and no otherwayes, l, annailzie, and dispone from us, our heirs and successors whatsom- r, to and in favours of the said Thomas, Lord Erskine, and the heirs- le lawfully to be procreat of his body; whom failling, to the heirs atsomever descending of the said Thomas, Lord Erskine, his body; m failling, to Lady Frances Erskine, his sister, and the heirs-male to be reat of her body; whom failling, to the heirs whatsomever descending of body; whom failling, to me, the said James Erskine, and the heirs- le lawfully procreat or to be procreat of my body; whom failling, to heirs whomsoever descending of the body of me, the said James kine; whom failling, to the nearest agnate of the said Thomas, Lord kine, of the sirname of Erskine; whom failling, to the said Thomas, d Erskine, his heirs and assigneys whatsomever, heretablie and irre- mablie, without any maner of reversion, redemption, or regress what- ıever, the eldest heir-female and the descendants of her body excluding ɔther heirs-portioners, and succeeding allwayes without division through whole course of succession in all time coming, with and under the ditions, provisions, declarations, burdens, faculties, restrictions, limita- ıs, clauses irritant and resolutive after-mentioned, and no otherwayes, and Haill the earldom of Mar, which sometime belonged to John, ı Earl of Mar, in so far as the same has not been disponed and alienated us, and now comprehending the lands, lordships, barronies, and others ır-mentioned, viz." . . . . "As also with this provision allwayes, as it is hereby expressly provyded and declared, that the eldest female r of tailzie above specified, and the descendants of her body, shall ex- le the younger and her descendants as heirs-portioners, and shall ceed allwayes without division; and that the whole heirs of tailzie ve mentioned, as well male as female, and the descendants of their lies who shall happen to succeed to the saids lands and estate by tue of the foresaid destination, shall be obliged in all time after their cession to assume and constantly use and bear the sirname of Erskine, l take and carry the armes which before the attainder of the said ın, late Earl of Marr, were worn by the family of Erskine and ırr, in so far as the same or any part thereof can be obtained, and ally and warrantablie born, and in case the attainder of the said John, ı Earl of Marr, shall be reversed, the title, dignity, and honours of family of Erskine of Marr, and the armes thereof, as their own per sirname and armes in all time thereafter." . . . . . eclaring allwayes that if the said Thomas, Lord Erskine, and the other rs of tailzie above-mentioned succeeding to the said lands and estate,

No. 144.

July 4, 1873.
Erskine v. Earl of Kellie.

shall failzie to assume, use, and bear in all time thereafter the sirname and armes above written, or that the said Thomas, Lord Erskine, or any of the saids heirs of tailzie above written, shall contraveen or failzie to fullfill the provisions and conditions of the said tailzie, or any of them, any maner of way, and specially but prejudice of the generallity, by altering or changing the order of succession, or disponing, selling, wadsetting, or burdening with infeftments of annualrent, or other servitudes or burdens, the saids lands, or any part thereof, or by granting tacks or rentales otherwayes than as above, or by contracting of debts, or doing any other facts or deeds, civill or criminall, whereby the saids lands may be burdened, evicted, forefeited, confiscate, or adjudged, or possessing of the saids lands by vertue of any other title or right than the foresaid tailzie, infeftments, and conveyances to follow thereon, or by not inserting in their severall services and retours, generall as well as speciall, conveyances and infeftments, the haill conditions and irritancies hereof, or by lying out unentred, or by not-payment of the casualities of superiority and publick burdens, whereby the saids lands may be anywayes apprized, adjudged, or evicted for the same, or by not purging the saids apprizings and adjudications in the termes above-mentioned before the expiration of the legall, or by granting liferent infeftments to their husbands and wives, or bonds of provision to their younger children, otherwayes than as is above provided, then and in either of these cases, not only all such facts, deeds, and debts committed, done, or contracted contrary hereunto, with all that may follow thereupon, shall be in themselves voyd, null, and of none availl, force, strength, nor effect, sicklike as if the same had never been committed, done, or contracted, so far as concerns the saids tailzied lands and estate above exprest, which nor no part thereof shall be anywayes affected or burdened therewith in prejudice of the saids heirs of tailzie and provision above specified appointed to succeed by vertue of thir presents, which is made and granted sub modo, and with and under the provisions above specified, and no otherwayes; but also such person or persons so contraveening or failling to fullfill the above written conditions and provisions, or any of them, shall for themselves only ipso facto amitt, loose, and forefeitt their right and intrest in the said lands and estate, and the samen shall become voyd and extinct. . . . . As also with this provision allwayes, likeas it is hereby expressly provyded and declared, that the eldest female heir of tailzie above specified, and the decendants of her body, shall exclude the younger and her decendants as heirs-portioners, and shall succeed allwayes without division, and that the whole heirs of tailzie above mentioned, as well male as female, and the decendants of their bodies who shall happen to succeed to the saids lands and estate by vertue of the foresaid destination, shall be obliged in all time after their succession to assume and constantly use and bear the sirname of Erskine, and take and carry the armes which before the attainder of the said John, late Earl of Marr, were worn by the family of Erskine and Marr, in so far as the same or any part thereof can be obtained and legally and warrantablie born; and in case the attainder of the said John, late Earl of Marr, shall be reversed, the title, dignity, and honours of the family of Erskine of Marr, and the armes thereof, as their own proper sirname and armes in all time thereafter."

The institute, Thomas, Lord Erskine, died in 1766 without issue, and the estate devolved on his sister, Lady Frances Erskine.

Lady Frances died in 1776, and was succeeded by her only son, John Francis Erskine, who became Earl of Mar, the attainder having been removed by Act of Parliament in 1824.

John Francis Erskine, Earl of Mar, died in 1825, leaving three sons, of

No. 144.

July 4, 1873.
Erskine v.
Earl of Kellie.

hom the eldest, John Thomas, succeeded him in the titles and estates. ohn Thomas died in 1828, leaving a son, John Francis Miller, who suceeded to the titles and estates, and died in 1866 without issue, and two aughters.

One of these daughters, Lady Frances Jemima, married, and her eldest on, John Francis Erskine Goodeve Erskine, was the pursuer of the preent action, and claimed the title of Earl of Mar.

The defender, the Earl of Kellie, who was the son of Walter Coningsby rskine, who was the son of Henry David, the son of John Francis, the estored Earl, also claimed the earldom of Mar. The pursuer was thus he heir whatsoever of Lady Frances Erskine, and the defender was heirale. The question of the right to the earldom was in dependence before he House of Lords.

The pursuer pleaded;—(2) Upon the death of the said John Francis filler Erskine, Earl of Mar, without issue, the succession to the earldom f Mar and others under the said disposition and deed of entail opened to he eldest of his heirs-portioners, being his heirs whatsoever, and the purner being one and the elder of the two such heirs, is now entitled to the aid earldom and others, and to make up titles thereto as heir of taillie nd provision under the said entail. (3) The pursuer being in lawful ossession of the honours, dignities, titles, and arms of the Earls of Mar, c., is, on the true construction of the said disposition and deed of entail, ntitled to the lands and estates thereby conveyed. (4) The pursuer is ntitled to have the right of the defender to the said entailed estates eclared void and extinct, in respect that the defender is not entitled to ear the title, surname, and arms of the family of Erskine of Mar, and hat the pursuer has the only lawful title to bear, and does bear, the said itle, surname, and arms, as required by the entail.

The defender pleaded;—(1) The pursuer has no title to sue, in respect hat he has no right to the title, dignity, or honours of Earl of Mar, or at ll events he cannot insist in the action while the competition for said itle, dignity, and honours between him and the defender is sub judice in he House of Peers. (2) Separatim, the pursuer has no title to sue, in espect that he is not heir-male of the body of Lady Frances Erskine. (4) The defender ought to be assoilzied, in respect that he is the heirmale of the body of Lady Frances Erskine, and as such has right to the estates in question by virtue of the destination contained in the deed of entail libelled.

The Lord Ordinary pronounced this interlocutor:—"Finds that the defender, as the nearest heir-male of the body of Lady Frances Erskine, has right to the estates in question by virtue of the destination contained in the deed of entail libelled: Finds that the pursuer, as an heir-female or heir whomsoever of the body of the said Lady Frances Erskine under the said entail, has no right or title in a question with the defender to the said estates: Sustains the defender's second, third, and fourth pleas in law: Finds that the pursuer has no right or title to insist in the conclusions of the present action, and accordingly dismisses the same, and decerns: Finds the pursuer liable in expenses, allows an account thereof o be given in," &c.*

---

* "NOTE.—In the year 1866, on the death of John Francis Miller, Earl of Mar and Kellie, without issue, the defender's father, Walter Coningsby Erskine, Earl of Kellie, was served nearest and lawful heir-male of taillie and provision n general to him to the earldom or estates, which form the subject of the present ction.

"This service was expede under and by virtue of the disposition and deed of of tailzie and provision to him under the deed of entail above m that he had then, and still has, the right to make up all proper lands as such heir of tailzie and provision, and to enter upon a estates as proprietor thereof. By the reductive conclusions of t pursuer seeks to reduce—(1) The various services and other writs late Walter Coningsby Erskine, Earl of Kellie, the defender's fat his title to the estates in 1866; and (2) the decree of general ser and recorded in Chancery 20th May 1872, pronounced by the Sher in favour of the defender, Walter Henry Erskine, Earl of Kellie, lawful heir of tailzie and provision of his father, the said Walter C of Kellie, under the deed of entail above mentioned.

"The action is maintained on the footing and averment that t heir of line, succeeded to the title and dignity of Earl of Mar upo the late John Francis Miller Erskine above mentioned, his uncle suer founds on a decree of general service in his favour, dated 14th recorded in Chancery 4th March 1867, granted by the Sheriff of C favour, by which he was served as one and the elder of the two portioners of his uncle, the late John Francis Miller Erskine, Earl named.

"The defender, the Earl of Kellie, maintains that he is Earl of the claim of the pursuer to that title and dignity is unfounded.
claim to the title is based on the allegation that the peerage des general, while the defender maintains his right to the peerage as tl male of the last Earl; and the question whether the pursuer has ri in preference to the defender is at present sub judice of the House it is said may be decided in the course of the present year.

"As the pursuer's claim to the estate in question is rested e ground of his being the person having right to the title and dig Mar, and as the question whether he has such right cannot be dete
Court, and may be decided by the House of Peers within a short t Lord Ordinary was at first disposed to sist the present action unti should be decided, for if it should be decided against the pursuer his claim under the present action would be swept away. The ever, objected to this course, and pressed the Lord Ordinary to dispose of his second, third, and fourth pleas in law. Under th maintained that, even on the assumption that the pursuer has ri and dignity of Earl of Mar, and that this should be declared by Peers, he has nevertheless no right to the estates in question, ina

the destination, and the words "whom failing" let in the other class. If the words used in the destination are per se susceptible of different meanings, as he has a legitimate interest to require that the action shall be now disposed of in place of being sisted, if there are grounds which enable the Court to do so.

"In this view the question now for determination is whether, assuming the pursuer to be the Earl of Mar, as he alleges, he has right to the estates in question under the entail; and the Lord Ordinary is of the opinion, to which he has given effect in the preceding interlocutor, that the pursuer has not such right, but that the defender is lawfully in possession of the estates as heir of entail under the subsisting destination.

"The question thus raised is one entirely as to the meaning and effect of the destination contained in the entail. The pursuer maintains that the destination must be read as carrying the estates always to the person who holds the title and dignity of Earl of Mar, while the defender maintains that this is not its true meaning, and that although it may be inferred from one clause in the entail that the granters of the deed had contemplated that the title and dignity of Earl of Mar should accompany the estates, this has not been provided by the destination, which gives him right to the estates independently altogether of whether he has or has not right to the title and dignity.

"The entail, which, as already stated, was executed in 1739, was made by James Erskine of Grange, and Mr David Erskine, one of the Senators of the College of Justice, after they had purchased the estates from the Commissioners and Trustees for the Sale of Forfeited Estates in Scotland. And the destination in the entail was, in the first place, in favour of Thomas, Lord Erskine, only lawful son of John, then late Earl of Mar, and eleventh Lord Erskine (who was attainted in 1715, and whose estates had been in consequence forfeited), and the heirs-male lawfully to be procreate of his body, whom failing, to the heirs whatsomever descending of the said Thomas Erskine his body. Thomas, Lord Erskine, died without issue in 1766, and the branch of the destination which then took effect, and is now subsisting, is in the following terms:—'Whom failing, to Lady Frances Erskine, his sister, and the hers-male to be procreate of her body, whom failing, to the heirs whatsomever descending of her body.'

"The defender is the nearest heir-male of the body of Lady Frances Erskine. This is instructed by the services produced, and the relationship on which these services proceed is not disputed by the pursuer, nor is it disputed that the defender is the nearest heir-male of Lady Frances Erskine and of the late John Francis Miller, Earl of Mar, whose right to possession of the estates during his life is admitted by both parties. The pursuer, on the other hand, is somewhat nearer in degree of relationship to John Francis Miller, Earl of Mar, but he is an heir-female, and not an heir-male of the body of Lady Frances Erskine, nor an heir-male of the late John Francis Miller, Earl of Mar. As in the case of the defender so in that of the pursuer, his alleged relationship or propinquity is not disputed.

"Further, if the destination were alone to be looked at it seems to be quite clear that the pursuer has no right or title to the estates in a question with the defender. The destination itself is expressed in clear, distinct, and ordinary language, and carries the estates, in the first place, to the heirs-male of the body of Lady Frances Erskine, in preference to the heirs-female or heirs whatsoever of her body. The defender is called to the succession as an heir-male under this destination, and until such heirs-male are exhausted the pursuer, as an heir-female, has no place in the destination. The two branches of the destination are separated by the ordinary term 'whom failing,' denoting that the heirs-male, of whom the defender is one, must be exhausted before an heir-female can claim right to the estates.

"Accordingly it was pleaded for the pursuer that the destination is controlled by other clauses in the entail, and that in respect of these clauses its language ought to receive a different meaning from that ordinarily given to it in similar deeds, and that the effect of these other clauses is to call under the destination an heir-female of the body of Lady Frances Erskine possessing the title and in the first place, the narrative of the deed quoted in article 14 scendence, and in the next the provisions narrated in condescen 16 and 18, to the effect that the heirs of tailzie who should hap to the estates by virtue of the above destination should be oblig after their succession to assume and constantly use and bear th Erskine, and in case the attainder of the said John, late Earl of M reversed, the title, dignity, and honours of the family of Erskine the arms thereof, as their own proper surname and arms in all ti and the relative provision that if the heirs of entail succeeding 'shall fail to assume, use, and bear in all time thereafter the surn above written'—(here follow a reference to the contraventions of t hibitions in the entail, and a relative clause of irritancy)—'but al or persons so contravening or failing to fulfil the above written c provisions, or any of them, shall, for themselves only, ipso facto and forfeit their right and interest in the said lands and estate, a shall become void and extinct, and it shall be lawful for the next who would succeed if the contravener were naturally dead, albei the contravener's own body, to obtain and pursue declarators up vention or failing to fulfil any of the saids provisions and condit adjudications of the foresaids lands and estate, or to obtain them retoured, entered, infeft, and seased therein as heirs to the person vest and seased in the samen before the contravener had right, i the right of the contravener is hereby declared to become void a said is, and the right of succession to the foresaids lands and es provided to devolve and pertain to the next heir of tailzie for t the said declarator, adjudication, or service, and retour, or legal blishing the right of the said tailzied lands and estates in their p used and obtained.'

"The Lord Ordinary is of opinion that these clauses do not affe tion of the estate, as is maintained by the pursuer, the narrative having reference to the obligation which the entailers, as pur estates, had undertaken to entail. The residue which remained of certain debts specifies the destination to be one 'in favour of Erskine, and the heirs of his body; whom failing, to any lawfu said Thomas, Lord Erskine, and the heirs of her body,' and s different branches of the destination, without indicating that th each stirps were to be exhausted before the heirs-female of that st called to the succession. This, however, is in no respect inconsist

No. 144.
July 4, 1873.
Erskine v. Earl of Kellie.

The defender argued;—There is no conflict between the various parts of the deed. A destination "to heirs-male of the body, whom failing," John, Earl of Mar, is introduced, not as affecting or controlling the clause of destination, or the meaning of the particular terms there used, descriptive of different classes of heirs, but for a different purpose, and it cannot, in the opinion of the Lord Ordinary, have that effect. If it had been the purpose of the entailers that the estates should only descend to the person in right of the title, in the event of the attainder being reversed, it is only reasonable to believe that this would have been expressly provided by some words or clause directly qualifying the destination itself, and this all the more that the language of the destination, without such qualification, is perfectly clear in calling the different heirs in a definite order, heirs-male taking before and to the exclusion of heirs-female. The Lord Ordinary is of opinion that the clause in question does not affect the meaning of the destination or the order of heirs thereby called, and that its true meaning and effect is to impose upon the heirs of entail the obligation of using the arms and title, dignity and honours, of the family of Erskine of Mar, in so far as they can lawfully and warrantably do so. The present action is not designed, or, as the Lord Ordinary thinks, suited, to try the question whether an heir in possession like the defender, under the destination, would contravene the entail and be liable to an action of forfeiture in respect of his failure to use the arms and title and dignity of the family of Mar, provided he was not in fact entitled to use these arms and title and dignity. That question can only be properly tried in an action of contravention and forfeiture, and the Lord Ordinary will merely observe upon it here, in the first place, that the clause of forfeiture is very limited, and does not in its terms refer to the title and dignity of Earl of Mar at all; and further, that the argument of the pursuer has failed to satisfy him that an heir of entail in possession of the estates could be held to have contravened the entail by failure to use the arms and dignity of the Earl of Mar, if he were in a position to shew that he had a lawful excuse for not using these, in respect that he was not entitled to do so, and that the title and dignity belonged to another person. Reference was made for the pursuer to a number of cases, and in particular to the following, viz., Sutherland, 1801, Mor., voce Tailzie, Appendix No. 8; Leslie, 1774, 6 Paton, 792; Lockhart, 1842, 1 Bell's Appeals, 202; Braid v. Ralston and Waddell, 22 D., 433; and Forbes v. Clinton, 1868, 6 Macph., 900. It appears to the Lord Ordinary, however, that none of these cases affect the decision of the present. In the first of them it is true that the destination in the dispositive clause was interpreted and affected by another clause in the entail, viz., the procuratory of resignation; but the destination itself was there repeated in terms which shewed the meaning which the entailer applied to the dispositive clause. In the various other cases referred to the meaning of the terms used in the destination was gathered mainly, if not exclusively, from the terms and structure of the clause of destination itself; and in none of the cases was plain and ordinary language, such as is used in the present entail for the purpose of calling heirs-male in preference to heirs-female, held to be controlled or affected in such a way as to reverse the order in which the heirs are called, which would really be the result of the pursuer's argument.

"On the whole matter, therefore, the Lord Ordinary has come to the conclusion that, whether the pursuer shall succeed in establishing his right to the title and dignity of Earl of Mar or not, he has no title to the estates held under the entail in a question with the defender, who is an heir called before him under the destination.

"In dismissing the action on preliminary defences lodged against satisfying the production, in place of having a record on the merits made up, the Lord Ordinary has followed the course of procedure which was adopted by this Court and by the House of Lords in the case of The Earl of Perth v. Lady Willoughby d'Eresby's Trustees, 11th March 1869, 7 M., 666. If the pursuer has no title to the estates, it is evidently the best course for him that that should be now determined on the record as it stands, without further expense being incurred."

purchase by Mr David Erskine, and a back-bond containing a trust, and upon that narrative proceeds to settle the estate. The in these words :—"To and in favours of the said Thomas Lord E the son of the forfeited Earl) and the heirs-male lawfully procrea whom failing, to the heirs whatsomever of the said Thomas Lor body ; whom failing, to Lady Frances Erskine, his sister, and th be procreat of her body ; whom failing, to the heirs whatsomever her body ; whom failing, to me, the said James Erskine, and lawfully procreat or to be procreat of my body," and so on.

Now, the institute, Thomas Lord Erskine, died in 1766 with consequently the estate devolved on his sister, Lady Frances Ersl in 1776. She had a family, and her son, John Francis Erskine her and died in 1825. In his person the title of Earl of Mar wa the estate and title became again united. He left two sons, of wh John Thomas, succeeded him in the estates and titles, and Henry the grandfather of the defender, the Earl of Kellie. John Tho son of John Francis, died in 1828, and was succeeded by John who died without issue in 1866. The succession was thus contin uninterrupted through males down to 1866. That branch of th to an end with the Earl, John Francis Miller. He was survive Lady Frances Jemima, who is mother of the pursuer. The pursu whatsoever of the body of Lady Frances Erskine, but not heir-mal

On the other hand, the second son of the restored Earl, Henry I died in 1848, leaving a son, Walter Coningsby, who succeeded t of Kellie, and the defender is his son. So the defender is neare the body of Lady Frances Erskine, while the pursuer is nearest he If, therefore, the descent is to heirs whatsoever of the body, o whatsoever of the heir-male of her body, the pursuer will be entit But if it was a male descent which was provided in the first ins fender will be entitled to succeed. The words here are scarcely construction, because they are "to Lady Frances Erskine, his s heirs-male to be procreat of her body ; whom failing, to the he descending of her body." These are the only words, and their m is that heirs-male must be exhausted before the succession can whatsoever.

But it is said that these words may be controlled by reference words of the deed. It is a settled rule of construction that such so construed if they are susceptible of more meanings than one.

No. 144.

July 4, 1873.

Erskine v. Earl of Kellie.

the dispositive clause, and that the two must be so read as to be consistent. It appears to me that the recital and the dispositive clause are quite reconcileable. In the recital it is not necessary to specify very particularly the order in which the succession is to go. There is only there a general statement that the estate was to be settled on Lord Erskine and his descendants, whom failing, on Lady Frances Erskine and her descendants. But this is more particularly set out in the dispositive clause, which gives the succession first to the male line, and then to the heirs succeeding through females.

Further, it is said that the other parts of the deed make it appear that the intention was that the title and estates should not be separated. The heirs of entail are taken bound to carry and bear certain arms, and to use and bear the sirname of Erskine. But heirs of entail can only be bound so far as they can lawfully carry such arms. Now, if the estate comes into the hands of a person who is not Earl of Mar, he may be entitled to hold it, unless it has been so settled that the title and the estate are to go together. The question is, whether this is so. The pursuer says that he is entitled to the earldom of Mar, and that he is prosecuting his claim to that title in the House of Lords, and if he succeeds in that it will be because the earldom descends to the eldest heir whatsoever, in preference to a remoter heir-male. Is it not the case that in the dispositive clause a remoter heir-male of the body of Lady Frances Erskine is preferable to a nearer heir whatsoever or heir-female? If that be so, then the earldom and the estate are necessarily severed, because the destination in the entail is not the same as the destination of the title of Mar. But it is further contended that we must read the dispositive clause as if it meant that the first heir-male of the body of Lady Frances Erskine should take in the first place; and that her eldest son, having taken, the "heirs whatsoever descending of her body," who were immediately afterwards substituted, must mean or be construed to mean the heirs whatsoever of the body of that first heir-male. Reference has been made to two cases, in particular, as favouring that construction—the case of Largie, and the case of Fettercairn; but there is a very material distinction between the words of the destination here and the words of either of those cases. Here the words are "to Lady Frances Erskine and the heirs-male to be procreat of her body; whom failing, to the heirs whatsomever descending of her body." The two clauses are separated by the words "whom failing." The class first named must be exhausted before the second can succeed. In the Largie case the destination was "to the said Elizabeth Macdonald and the heirs-male of her body of this present marriage, and the heirs-male whatsomever of the body of the said heirs-male." This was read in such a manner that each heir-male should take first, and then that his heir whatsoever should take. It was a case of great difficulty, but has no application to the present case, where there are no such words, nor words susceptible of a similar construction.

In the case of Fettercairn, the destination was "to Sir William Forbes, Baronet, of Pitsligo, and the heirs-male procreated of the marriage between him and the deceased Dame Williamina Stuart or Forbes, my daughter, his spouse, and the heirs-male of their bodies respectively, whom failing, to the heirs whatsoever of the bodies of such heirs-male respectively." There was a considerable similarity between that case and the present, but there are also material differences. The destination is to a class of heirs already ascertained,—the existing sons of Sir William Forbes. There could be no more in this class, as Lady Forbes was dead. This was just the same as if they had been called nominatim. Then follow the words "and the heirs-male of their bodies respectively." The eldest heir-male having taken, the difficulty arose whether the words "whom failing" applied to the whole class. But the language of the destination in that case is so entirely different from the present that it does not aid the pursuer. The words used have so fixed and plain a meaning that I can find nothing in the deed to warrant the construction attempted to be put on them by the pursuer.

I therefore think that the Lord Ordinary is right, and that the class of heirs-male must be exhausted before heirs whatsoever come in.

LORD DEAS concurred.

and the title. The clause of destination is in the following ter Thomas Lord Erskine died without issue. His only sister,] Erskine, succeeded. Her son, John Francis, succeeded to her, a 1824 restored to the earldom of Mar, which had been forfeited in person of his grandfather, John Earl of Mar. The pursuer of this heir whatsoever of the Lady Frances Erskine. The defender, the I is the heir-male of the body of Lady Frances Erskine. The ques is entitled to succeed to these estates under the destination which l

The right to the peerage of Mar—a title of great antiquity—or immediately involved in this case. Nor has this Court the powe of that question of peerage succession. It must be decided by Peers. We have only to deal with the pursuer's claim to the est same time, it is not to be overlooked that, on the supposition tha succeeds, as we must assume that possibly he may, to the title, t judgment against him in this action would be to separate the est title. It is naturally and forcibly urged that such a separation c been intended, and that the deed of entail on which this questio be so construed as to prevent that separation, and to maintain t between the peerage and the estates. I appreciate the force of t
If there were any ambiguity in the words of destination, the argu on the presumption against an intention to separate the estates would be appropriate. But if the words are not ambiguous, such is inappropriate and must be excluded. Presumed intention can effect when contrary to expressed intention. The entail itself, and clause of destination in the entail, must be read and construed an there is room for reasonable doubt as to the meaning of the words of the intention expressed, then the supposed or conjectured int
the title and estates together may perhaps be founded on in suppo struction of the doubtful expression which seems in accordance v sumed intention. But if the words are clear and plain, so that doubt rests on the expressed destination, then there is no room an place for conjectural aid to construction. I adopt the words of I in the Largie case, June 24, 1840,—"The general rule unquestion deed must be construed according to the true force of the expressi in it. The meaning of one clause, if ambiguous in itself, may b the context."

being the grandchild of a son, and in short is not limited to the first heirs-male of the body, viz., the sons. There are many instances in which the words have been so construed. But the expression never can comprehend either an heir-female of the body, or a male descending from or through an heir-female. On the other hand, the words "heirs whatsomever descending of the body" must mean in this destination all heirs soever descending of the body, except the heirs-male of the body who are previously called. The clause then proceeds, "whom failing" (as Thomas Lord Erskine and his heirs did fail) then to Lady Frances Erskine and the heirs-male to be procreate of her body." The defender is undoubtedly heir-male of the body of this Lady Frances Erskine, he being the great-grandson, through males only, of John Frances Erskine, the restored Earl, who was the only son of that Lady Frances Erskine. The destination proceeds, "whom failing"—that is, failing Lady Frances and the heirs-male of her body—then to the heirs whatsomever descending of her body,—that is, to heirs-female descending of the body of Lady Frances Erskine. Now, the pursuer is the heir whatsoever, the heir-female descending of the body of the same Lady Frances Erskine being the son of a younger Lady Frances Erskine, who was granddaughter of the restored Earl, and the defender is the heir-male of the body of Lady Frances Erskine. To me it appears very clear that until the heirs-male of the body of Lady Frances Erskine have failed the heir-female of the body of Lady Frances Erskine cannot succeed under this destination.

After the exposition already given by your Lordship it is unnecessary for me to explain the grounds on which I arrive at this conclusion. Unless a doubt can be set up, founded on the two decisions which have been urged on us by the counsel for the pursuer, viz., the case of Lockhart v. Macdonald, and the case of Forbes v. Baroness Clinton, both of which were decided in the House of Lords, there is, in my opinion, no authority opposed to the contention of the defender, that as heirs-male of the body of Lady Frances Erskine he is entitled to succeed under this destination.

These two decisions are, however, of very high authority, and we must be careful in dealing with this case so to read the destination as to give effect to the principles of construction laid down by the House of Lords, affirming in both cases the decisions of our own Court.

I am, however, of opinion that in construing as we now do the words of this destination we do not run counter to the decision either of the Largie case or of the case of Lady Clinton.

In the Largie case the destination was to "the heirs-male of the body of Elizabeth Macdonald and the heirs whatsoever of the bodies of the said heirs-male." The word "and," instead of "whom failing," is a peculiarity in the clause in the Largie case which does not occur here, and which some of the Judges thought important; but still more important are the words "heirs whatsoever of the bodies of the said heirs-male," not heirs whatsoever of the body of Elizabeth Macdonald. It was held, as I think, that the words "the said heirs-male" could not be construed collectively as denoting a class, but must be construed distributively as denoting each individual in succession holding the character of heir-male. This appears to have been considered by Lord Mackenzie and Lord Fullerton as an important peculiarity of the clause, and if I do not misapprehend the remarks of Lord Cottenham he is of the same opinion. Not only did Lord Cottenham propose the affirmance of the judgment, but I think he expressly agreed with the view taken by Lord Mackenzie and Lord Fullerton.

Each heir-male is called seriatim, and each heir-male so called is a stirps in the case of Largie. He is, as the Solicitor-General well expressed it, a "compo-ite stirps," comprehending the heirs whatsoever of his own body as within the destination, and I think that these heirs did under the Largie entail partake of the precedence of the stirps as heirs of whom they were called in succession.

In the case of Lady Clinton, again, the expression in the clause of destination is, if possible, even more clear. The destination is to the entailer and the heirs-male of his body, whom failing, to Sir William Forbes and the heirs-male procreated of his marriage with the entailer's daughter, "whom failing, to the heirs manifest. Therefore I come to the conclusion that the words of d the present case are clear, and that we are not entitled to call in th jectural or presumed intention. The case of the defender rests on destination. Accordingly I agree with your Lordship in the chair adhering to the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor.

LORD JERVISWOODE concurred.

THE COURT adhered to the interlocutor of the Lord Ord

W. & J. COOK, W.S.—GIBSON-CRAIG, DALZIEL, & BRODIES, W.S.—A

No. 145.

July 4, 1873.
Traills v.
Small & Boase.

ANDREW TRAILL and ROBERT TRAILL, Pursuers.—Kirkp
SMALL AND BOASE, Defenders.—Fraser—J. Guthrie Sm

Reparation—Culpa—Machinery—Factory Acts, 7 and 8 Vict. c 19 and 20 Vict. c. 38, sec. 4.—The Act 7 and 8 Vict. c. 15, requir the mill gearing in a factory to be securely fenced.

The Act 19 and 20 Vict. c. 38, limits the obligation to fencing t the mill gearing "with which children and young persons and wome come in contact, either in passing or in their ordinary occupations in

Held that there is still an obligation to fence such mill gearing a to women and children, and not merely such as they are liable to tact with in the regular course of their employment.

Question as to the age at which a person can be guilty of negligence.

2D DIVISION.
Lord Shand.
I.

IN this action Andrew Traill, Leven, and Robert Traill as l trator-in-law, sued Messrs Small and Boase, hemp spinners damages for personal injury.

The condescendence set forth that the pursuer, Andrew T under fourteen years of age, had been employed at a carding the defenders' works, and that he had been injured in conseq machinery not having been properly fenced, as required by t tion of the Act 7 and 8 Vict. c. 15.*

* Section 21, enacts "that every fly-wheel directly connected wi engine, or water-wheel, or other mechanical power, whether in the

No. 145.

July 4, 1873.
Traills v. Small & Boase.

The pursuers pleaded;—(2) The pursuer, Andrew Traill, having sustained severe and permanent bodily injury through the neglect of the defenders, or those for whom they are responsible, in not causing the lesser gearing of the machine at which the pursuer was engaged, and from which he sustained the injury, to be securely fenced in terms of the 21st section of the Act 7 and 8 Vict. c. 15, he is entitled to decree against them as concluded for.

The defenders pleaded;—(3) The accident in question not having been occasioned by any fault on the part of the defenders, and separatim, having been caused by the pursuer's own fault, the defenders should be assoilzied.

A proof was led, which shewed the structure of the machine and the mode in which the accident had occurred. These are given in the opinion of the Lord Justice-Clerk.

The Lord Ordinary (Shand) pronounced this interlocutor:—"Finds that the pursuers have failed to prove that the injuries sustained by the minor pursuer, Andrew Traill, on or about 9th October 1871, at the defenders' works in Leven, were caused by fault or negligence on the part of the defenders: Therefore assoilzies the defenders from the conclusions of the summons, and decerns: Finds the pursuers liable in expenses."*

The pursuers reclaimed, and argued;—Mill-owners were under an obligation to fence their machinery where there was reasonable risk of the young persons employed about their works being in danger. It was not necessary that there should be risk while following their usual duties about the mill. The damage done to the pursuer was occasioned by no fault of his. He was following out his duty in the employment of the defenders, and it arose from the fault of the defenders in having the machinery unfenced.[1]

The defenders argued;—They were only bound to fence machinery where children or young persons would be exposed to danger while performing their work about the mills. If they pleased to run into danger the defenders were not liable. The pursuer had no right to be where he was. There was contributory negligence on his part.

---

mill gearing, shall apply only to those parts thereof with which children and young persons and women are liable to come in contact, either in passing or in their ordinary occupation in the factory."

* "NOTE.—The Lord Ordinary stated his views of the evidence in detail to the parties in giving judgment. He thinks it sufficient here to state (1) That he is of opinion on the evidence that, having regard to the place in the defenders' works at which the machine by which the pursuer was injured was situated, there was no obligation by statute or otherwise on the defenders to fence the machine as alleged by the pursuer; (2) that the pursuer has failed to prove as maintained by his counsel at the debate at the close of the evidence (although not pleaded on record) that there was neglect on the defenders' part, or on the part of those for whom they are responsible, to give the pursuer proper and necessary instructions for the performance of a duty said to be attended with danger; and (3) that even if the working of the machine had been attended with danger and there had been a failure to give the pursuer proper or necessary instructions, the fault lay with the manager or foreman of the works who were with the pursuer in the service of the defenders, and these persons having been men of experience and well fitted for their duties the defenders would not in law be liable for their fault in omitting to perform the duty of warning the pursuer."

[1] Grizzle v. Frost, 1863, 3 Foster and Finlason, 622; Wilson v. Merry and Cunningham, May 29, 1868, 1 S. Apps. 326; Gemmills v. Gourock Ropework Co., Feb. 1, 1861, 23 D. 425; Pollock v. Cassidy, Feb. 26, 1870, ante, vol. iii. p. 615.

the machine looking from the feeding-table, and consequently or of the boy, who worked opposite it, where the tow was discharged machinery was worked by a belt passing over two revolving cyl removal of which by the hand the machine, when choked, cou without stopping the general motive power. This machine wa building with the right portion of it, on which the revolving situated, within thirteen or fourteen inches of the wall; the b worked in this space. Some three months before the pursuer, w under fourteen, was engaged at this machine, its mechanism had b covered in and fenced, but owing to some alterations on it the fen removed, and when the pursuer commenced the working there w prevent him going between the machine and the right-hand wall.
when the machine got clogged, to remove the belt in question fron on which it worked, and thereby suspend for the time the revolu the machine until it cleared itself. It appears from the evidence that he was in the habit of performing this operation by squ between the machine and the wall, where the wheels in question and so making his way to the cylinder on which the belt worke site end of the machine, and after taking off the belt when th choked to return in the same way between the wheels, which stil revolve, and the wall. He had only been engaged two days a when, according to his account, on returning from lifting the b caught in one of the revolving wheels, and his right arm was so that it had to be amputated below the elbow. The present a brought against the mill-owners to recover damages for his injury.

The first question is, whether the defenders were in fault for n machine fenced. Under the statute 7 and 8 Vict. cap. 15, sec. 51 inter alia, that all parts of the mill gearing in a factory shall be s and had that statute regulated the present question I entertain the machine was not properly fenced. It is quite true that th placed against the wall, but not so placed as to prevent a boy pass the pursuer describes. But it is said that this statute was altered 1856, by which the operation of this clause was limited to such women and young persons are liable to come in contact with, and that the true reading of that statute is that no fencing is required a situation as children or young persons, in the ordinary and re their employment, are in danger of coming in contact with, argued that if the pursuer was working the machine according t

No. 145.

July 4, 1873.

Traills v. Small & Boase.

having been seven feet from the ground. But Lord Campbell, Chief Justice, said, "the sooner such an interpretation of the statute is corrected the better; the Legislature has not said that when there shall be danger machinery shall be fenced, but has declared in the most absolute manner that in all the cases mentioned the machinery shall be fenced."

As this judgment, which was contrary to the opinion of Mr Justice Cresswell, posed on the mill-owners a very serious obligation in regard to those parts of e machinery that were truly not accessible to children and young persons gaged in mills, the limiting statute of 1856 was passed; but it was by no ans intended to restrict the operation of the 7th and 8th Vict., along with hich its provisions were directed to be read, further than to render it unnecesry to fence machinery in regard to which there was no reasonable risk that ildren and young persons should be exposed to it. In the present case this achine had been previously fenced. The evidence shews that it was subsequently fenced; and Paterson, who was in the employment of the defenders at the time, says that he thinks the fencing should have been replaced, and that the machine was not safe without it.

It certainly does not necessarily follow that because the machine was not properly fenced every accident thereby occasioned to those employed in working it can found a claim of damages against the mill-owner. In the case I have referred to as decided by Lord Campbell it was found that although the machine was not properly fenced yet that the injury having been caused by the improper act of the man injured he was not entitled to recover. But that, in the first place, was the case of an adult under the former law. It is obvious that the continuation of the former law as regards children and young persons necessarily implies that they are more likely to come in contact with the dangerous parts of the machinery than adults, and the object of the statute was to have the machinery so fenced that in the course of their ordinary employment they could not come in contact with it. Without saying that a boy under fourteen cannot be guilty of contributory negligence where the statutory provision has been violated I do not think that such is the case here. The evidence leaves it very much in doubt what the instructions were which the pursuer received. The defender says that he told him always to go round by the feeding end of the machine. The pursuer himself says that he received no such instructions; and the man Wallace, who fed the machine and was there all the time until the accident happened, says that he cannot tell whether the pursuer went round by the back,—that is, by the feeding end,—and at last says that he sometimes went the one way and sometimes the other. The result of the evidence, to my mind, is that the boy was in the habit of squeezing between the wall and the machine, as the shortest way, when he required to take the belt off, and that he never was checked for doing so by the man Wallace, who stood at the other end of the machine. It is remarkable that although this man was present when the accident occurred he is wholly unable to tell where the boy was when it happened. Mr Nicol thinks that the boy could not have gone between the machine and the wall from the place where he worked, but this, I think, is not supported by the evidence.

On these two points, therefore, I am of opinion that this machine ought to ave been fenced, and that the pursuer, being under fourteen and engaged at he time in his ordinary occupation, has not liberated the defenders from their esponsibility by taking that method of discharging his duty. It ought not to ave been left open to him to do so. This being so, I am also of opinion that he responsibility of fencing the machine lay with the employer and not with ny subordinate.

The machine has been since fenced, and without giving undue weight to that ircumstance I think it shews that it was possible to fence it. I have no doubt hat the employers thought that the machine was safe enough, and that they id not anticipate the mode of working which the pursuer adopted. But they ught to have performed their statutory duty, and must be liable for the consequences of not having done so.

LORD BENHOLME.—This case mainly depends upon the words and these words are so explicit that they do not allow us to take tion carelessness on the boy's part. Here the boy was, in the pro work, near the unprotected machinery, and the result was that h
In these circumstances I think the statute requires us to give dam

LORD NEAVES concurred.

THE following interlocutor was pronounced:—"Find th established by the proof that the pursuer, Andrew T the course of his ordinary occupation in the works of was injured by coming in contact with a wheel, bein machine libelled, while the same was in motion: F said machine and the machinery and gearing ther securely fenced or protected: Find that the machine and used in the works of the defenders as that the m being under fourteen years of age, was liable to com with the parts or gearing thereof in the course of occupation: Find that it is not proved that the m came into contact with the gearing in question thr dience of orders: Find that the gearing of the machin had been securely fenced until a few months prior rence libelled, and that it has been since fenced:
terms of the statute 7 and 8 Vict. c. 15, sec. 21, a Vict. c. 38, sec. 5, the defenders were bound to h fenced the said machine and gearing, and that they fa and are responsible for the injury thereby occasione recall the interlocutor complained of: Find the defen the pursuer in the sum of £150 of damages, an expenses of medical attendance consequent on the sa decern for payment thereof by the defenders to the find the defenders liable in expenses of process, and remit."

ROBERT A. VEITCH, S.S.C.—JOHN GALLETLY, S.S.C.—Agent

No. 146.

July 9, 1873.
Irvine v. Irvine.

2D DIVISION. I.

nieces, and that the grandchildren of a nephew were entitled to succeed per stirpes to the share which their predeceasing parents would have had.

Opinion (per Lord Cowan) that the condition si sine liberis, when applicable, embraces all the descendants of the parties called to the succession towards whom the testator stands in loco parentis.

ALEXANDER IRVINE, merchant in Aberdeen, died on 19th December 1849, leaving, inter alia, a testamentary writing, dated 8th October 1842, in which he made the following provision as to the residue of his estate:—"Lastly, the whole free residue of my property I wish to be divided among my nephews and nieces, in proportion of one and a-half share to my nephew Thomas, and one share to any other nephews and nieces. The shares of my nephew, Thomas, and of my nieces, Margaret and Ann, to be invested by you in your names (if thought proper not to give the principal, but, if for their advantage, you can give them it as you please); but if not given, it will be for behoof of them, and their husbands in life-rent, and children in fee, and to be declared alimentary, and not attachable for their debts or deeds in any way; and failing children, the shares of those deceasing to go to the survivors of my nephews and nieces, or the families of such as may have predeceased."

By testamentary writing, dated 10th December 1844, Mr Irvine provided that in consequence of the death of one of his nephews "the share of my means which would have fallen to my nephew, had he survived me, shall now belong equally to his family."

One of the testator's nieces, Mrs Margaret Irvine or Smith, died on 16th April 1872, a widow, without issue and intestate, and a question arose as to the division of her share of the residue in the following circumstances.

The whole of the testator's nephews and nieces had predeceased Mrs Smith except one, the Rev. Alexander Irvine.

James Irvine, one of the testator's nephews, had left five children. Of these, a son, John Irvine, alone survived Mrs Smith; of the remaining four children, two died unmarried, and two, Louisa and Alexander, left issue. The question was whether John Irvine was entitled to the whole share of residue payable to his father's family at Mrs Smith's death, or whether the children of Louisa and Alexander were entitled to the proportions of that share which would have been payable to Louisa and Alexander respectively, if they had survived Mrs Smith.

A special case was therefore presentd for the opinion and judgment of the Court by the Rev. Alexander Irvine, the only surviving executor of Alexander Irvine, the testator, and the said John Irvine.

The following questions in law were submitted to the Court:—"(1) Whether the second party is entitled, as the sole survivor of James Irvine's family at the date of Mrs Smith's death, to receive the whole share payable to that family on Mrs Smith's death? or (2) Whether the first party hereto is bound to reserve out of the said share, for behoof of the children of the said deceased Louisa Irvine or Garrow, and of the child of the said deceased Alexander Irvine, the proportions thereof which would have been payable to the said Louisa Irvine or Garrow and Alexander Irvine respectively, if they had survived Mrs Smith?"

Argued for the first party;—The word "families" in the testamentary writing is more flexible than children of predeceasers.[1] But if the terms of the writing are not themselves sufficient to let these children take their parent's share the conditio si sine liberis applies, the testator having stood in loco parentis.[2]

---

[1] M'Laren (Wills and Suc.), 726; Fyffe v. Fyffe, Jan. 13, 1841, 3 D. 1205.
[2] Wallace v. Wallaces, Jan. 28, 1807, 12 F.C. 596; Mor. No. 6, App. Clause.

No. 146.

July 9, 1873. Irvine v. Irvine.

Argued for the second party;—(1) The ordinary and natural meaning of the word "family" is children.[1] And the connection in which the word is used in other parts of his testamentary writings makes it clear that that was his meaning, for he provides that in consequence of one of his nephews having died his share is to go "equally to his family." Now, if grandchildren are included by the same word that is used to denote children they ought to claim per capita, which they are not doing. (2) The conditio si sine liberis does not apply, because the testator has himself contemplated the event of the institute dying before the period of division leaving issue, and has provided for it, and wherever that is the case the law does not add its implied substitution to the express substitution of the settlement.[2] Here the testator has done precisely what the law would have done for him, and it is not bound to do anything more. Although a man may be technically in loco parentis to the remotest generations, the conjectura pietatis grows weaker as you descend in the scale of relationship.[3]

At advising,—

LORD COWAN.—This special case relates to the share of the deceased's estate effeiring to his niece, Margaret Irvine or Smith, appointed by his will to be invested by his executors for behoof of herself and husband in liferent, and of her children (if she had any) in fee; and failing children, the share is directed "to go to the survivors of my nephews and nieces, or the families of such as may have predeceased." It is admitted by the parties that the share did not vest in Margaret, and that, as she died a widow without children, the succession to it falls to be regulated by this clause. Only one of the nephews and nieces of the testator, the Rev. Alexander Irvine, survives, but there are families of predeceasing nephews and nieces; and as regards the immediate descendants of these parties it is not disputed that they are entitled to participate in Margaret's share along with the surviving nephew of the testator. But as regards the share payable to the family of the deceased James Irvine, one of the predeceasing nephews, it is to be decided whether his immediate descendants alone are to be preferred, or those more remote to be conjoined with them in the succession. These parties are (1) John Irvine, the second party hereto, the son of James, who alone survived Mrs Smith; and (2) the children of Louisa and Alexander, son and daughter of the said James Irvine, who predeceased Mrs Smith, the former leaving a family of four daughters, and the latter one child. It is to regulate the respective interests of these parties that the questions of law are presented for the opinion of the Court.

The construction of the words of the deed, fixing the destination of the testator's residuary estate, seems to me to be attended with little or no difficulty. Margaret Irvine's share, as appointed by the deed, falls to be taken by surviving nephews and nieces, and (for the disjunctive "or" must plainly be read as conjunctive) by the families of predeceasing nephews or nieces per stirpes; and, as regards the family of James, the testator's nephew, who predeceased Mrs Smith, and whose share is in question, they take as his descendants that equal share which he would have taken had he survived. There is no room for holding that they take on any other footing than as in right of James. It is per stirpes not per capita that the succession is to be regulated. The family are to take the share, and I think it must necessarily be held that when immediate descendants fail, leaving issue, that issue takes their parent's place. The word "family" is of large significancy in a question of this kind, and includes all descendants, so that all may participate in the succession according to the order of law, children repre-

[1] Fyffe v. Fyffe, Jan. 13, 1841, 3 D. 1205.

[2] Rhind's Trustees v. Leith and Others, Dec. 5, 1866, ante, vol. v. 104 (Lord Neaves' opinion, p. 111).

[3] Sturrock v. Binny, Nov. 29, 1843, 6 D. 117.

No. 146.
July 9, 1873.
Irvine v. Irvine.

ng their parents in their several generations. Assuming, however, that the should be regulated by the application, or not, of the conditio si sine liberis, ntended for in the argument, I have no hesitation in holding that, on prin- as well as on authority, that condition does apply to a case of succession the present. The testator was admittedly in loco parentis. Had the nation been merely to "nephews and nieces" that would have led to the ndants of predeceasers being included, so as to take their parent's share, her they were of the first or second generation of descendants. This was lisputed in the argument for the second party. But it was ingeniously con- ed that, because the families of predeceasing nephews and nieces are ex- ly named, this indicated an intention on the part of the testator that the generation of descendants only was to be included,—a construction of the s which, though there might be living descendants of a remote degree, d, in a certain state of the family at the time of distribution, have led to tacy, as, e.g., had all the nephews and nieces and their immediate issue pre- ased, and only great-grandnephews and great-grandnieces being alive. But view is to mistake the effect of the condition si sine liberis, which, when icable, embraces all the descendants of the parties called to the succession rds whom the testator stands in loco parentis; and it is also to narrow the effect and meaning of the very words of this deed in calling the families of eceasers to the succession.

or these reasons I am of opinion that the first question should be answered ie negative, and the second in the affirmative.

ORD BENHOLME concurred.

ORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—I concur in the judgment. I am not altogether able rame any very uniform rule out of the decisions on the subject. The im- ant elements in this case are, first, the testator was in loco parentis to the ficiaries; secondly, it was a share of residue that was bequeathed, and not ecific legacy; thirdly, the term "family" is more comprehensive than that children," and prima facie excludes delectus personæ, and includes descen- ts.

ord Neaves authorises me to state that he concurs in the judgment.

ORD NEAVES was present when the case was heard, but absent when it was ised.

THIS interlocutor was pronounned:—"The Lords having heard counsel on the special case are of opinion, and find (1) that the second party is not entitled, as the sole survivor of James Irvine's family at the date of Mrs Smith's death, to receive the whole share payable to that family on Mrs Smith's death; and (2) that the first party hereto is bound to receive out of the said share for behoof of the children of the deceased Louisa Irvine or Garrow and the child of the deceased Alexander Irvine, the proportions thereof which would have been payable to the said Louisa Irvine or Garrow, and Alexander Irvine respectively if they had survived Mrs Smith, and decern: Find the party of the second part liable in expenses to the party of the first part, and remit," &c.

ANDREW & WILSON, W.S.—MORTON, NEILSON, & SMART, W.S.—Agents.

No. 147. THE LORD ADVOCATE, on behalf of Her Majesty and the Commissioners of Woods and Forests, Objector.—Sol.-Gen. Clark—Kinnear.
THE EARL OF GALLOWAY, AND JOHN FLETCHER HATHORN, Esq., Respondents.—D.-F. Gordon—Marshall.

July 11, 1873. Lord Advocate v. Earl of Galloway, and Hathorn.

Teinds—Locality.—Teinds had belonged to a priory before the Reformation, had never been erected into a temporal lordship, but after the Reformation were held in commendam by laymen until 1612, when they were regularly united to a bishopric. They were inalienable in the hands of the bishop before the submissions to King Charles I. in 1627 and 1628, and fell to the Crown on the abolition of Episcopacy in 1689. Held, in a locality, that these were bishops' teinds in the hands of the Crown and entitled to be postponed to teinds held on heritable right.

1ST DIVISION. Lord Gifford Teind Clerk.

THIS question arose upon objections by the Lord Advocate, on behalf of the Crown, to the interim schemes of locality in the conjoined processes of locality of the stipend of the parish of Whithorn. The following narrative is taken from the opinion of the Lord President:—

"The Lord Advocate, on behalf of the Crown, objects to the locality, as it has hitherto been adjusted, on the ground that the stipend has been localled on the teinds in the hands of the Crown to the effect of relieving the teinds of the Earl of Galloway, and of Mr Fletcher Hathorn of Castlewigg, which are held on heritable right.

"The ground of the objection is that the crown teinds are bishops' teinds. Of course that objection lays the burden upon the Crown to prove that they are so in point of fact, and I am of opinion that this onus has been discharged, and the fact established.

"The history of these teinds can be very shortly stated. The church of Whithorn before the Reformation was certainly a patrimonial church of the priory of Whithorn, and after the Reformation that priory was given in commendam first to one layman and afterwards to another for a considerable time. It was shortly after the Reformation that the heritable rights now claimed respectively by Lord Galloway and Mr Hathorn came into existence. In 1569 the then commendator granted a feu of the ten merk land of old extent, called Mains of Whithorn, and another feu of the five merk land of old extent of Preistrie, these being part of the patrimony of the priory, along with the teinds, the conveyance in each case being cum decimis inclusis. This conveyance led to a mistake, it being considered that it was cum decimis inclusis nunquam antea separatis, which it certainly was not. Now, this conveyance was undoubtedly illegal altogether, and if it had been challenged tempestivè it could not have stood. It has however so stood for 300 years, and it is impossible for the Crown, especially after recognising it by charter of confirmation, to challenge it now. It must therefore be assumed that Lord Galloway and Mr Hathorn, who are now in right of these feus, have good heritable rights to their teinds. This explanation is necessary, because otherwise the fact of these conveyances having been granted would be wholly inconsistent with the contention for the Crown that the teinds of Whithorn in their hands are bishops' teinds. From the above narrative it will be seen that the heritable rights to these teinds came into existence before the teinds were bishops, teinds, and when they were the property of the priory and of a lay commendator.

"The grants in commendam continued for some time, and the last was about 1580 in favour of Patrick Earl of Orkney. In 1605 James VI. carried out his favourite scheme of restoring the order of bishops, though it was not actually put in force till 1606. His Majesty was, however, in difficulties how to supply maintenance for his new bishops. While cast-

No. 147.

July 11, 1873.

Lord Advocate v. Earl of Galloway, and Hathorn.

ng about for a source of revenue for the bishops of Galloway, he found ortunately that Patrick, Earl of Orkney, had turned traitor, and his states were forfeited, and among them the emoluments of the priory of Vhithorn. Accordingly in that year, 1605, he granted the patrimony of hat priory to Gavin Hamilton, the first restored bishop of Galloway, for is maintenance, but for his life only. Thereafter, on 31st July 1612, he ranted the same to William Coupar, Hamilton's successor, for his life also. hese grants in liferent would never have made the teinds of Whithorn, ishops' teinds—they were only grants in commendam of priory teinds. ut in 1612 an Act of Parliament was passed, which changed the character of these teinds altogether. This Act annexed the priory of Whitorn to the bishopric of Galloway, to the effect that the whole revenue f the priory was given to the Bishop of Galloway for his maintenance. he Act is not in existence, but its tenor and effect are clearly stablished by contemporary writings. I think, therefore, that the teinds in question became in 1612 proper bishops' teinds, and continued in the hands of the bishops of Galloway as such until the troublous times in 1639. They were again held by the bishop after the Restoration, and finally came into the hands of the Crown at the Revolution in 1689 as bishops' teinds."

The Lord Advocate pleaded;—1. The whole teinds of the parish, except those held on heritable right, being bishops' teinds in the hands of the Crown, the augmentations ought to be laid primo loco on teinds held on heritable right.

The respondents pleaded;—2. The objector has no right or title to maintain that the augmentations should have been allocated primo loco on the teinds held on heritable rights, in respect that it has not been shewn that the teinds upon which the augmentations have been localled are bishops' teinds in the hands of the Crown, and the objections ought therefore to be repelled. 3. The objections are excluded—(1) By mora and acquiescence; and (2) by prescription. 4. The objections ought to be repelled—(1) In respect that they are ill founded in point of fact; and (2) That they re untenable in law, and the respondents should be found entitled to xpenses.

A proof having been led, which consisted entirely of documentary evilence, the Lord Ordinary (June 22, 1871) pronounced an interlocutor inding "that the teinds of the parish of Whithorn in the hands of the rown are bishops' teinds, or at all events are church teinds entitled to ll the privileges in allocation of bishops' teinds in the hands of the rown: Finds that in allocating the stipend in the present conjoined rocesses of locality the augmentations ought to be laid primo loco upon inds held on heritable right, or at all events the same same should e laid on teinds held on heritable right before any part thereof is laid pon the teinds in the hands of the Crown, and to this extent sustins the objections for the Lord Advocate, and remits to the teind clerk rectify the locality accordingly: Finds the Lord Advocate, as repreng the Crown and the Commissioners of Woods and Forests, entitled to xpenses," &c.*

* "NOTE.—The questions raised in the present record are—(1) Whether the inds of the parish of Whithorn are bishops' teinds; (2) Whether, at all events, ey are priors' teinds, entitled in questions of allocation to the same privileges bishops' teinds; and (3) Whether, in the present conjoined processes of locality, e said teinds in the hands of the Crown ought to be postponed in allocation to e teinds held on heritable rights. In substance, the Lord Ordinary has nswered these questions in the affirmative, and the result is that he has sustained he objection stated by the Crown, and appointed the locality to be rectified.

No. 147. The respondents reclaimed. The Court appointed the parties to lodge cases.

July 11, 1873.
Lord Advocate v. Earl of Galloway, and Hathorn.

"A proof was allowed, but it consisted entirely of an extensive recovery of old title-deeds, rentals, and other documents, no oral proof being necessary or even possible. The documents raise several important questions both of fact and of law. The Lord Ordinary will shortly notice the questions which he has virtually disposed of by the present judgment.

"(1) The Lord Ordinary thinks it is proved that the whole teinds of the parish of Whithorn—at least the whole teinds thereof now in the hands of the Crown—were originally priors' teinds. They belonged to the priory of Quhithorne. This seems established not only by the rentals of the great church benefices given up in 1561, but by the various grants, presentations, and tacks in the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries, many of which are in process, and specimens of which are printed in the joint print for the parties.

"Whithorn was never, strictly speaking, either a bishopric or a part of the patrimony of a bishopric, and although, as will be immediatcly noticed, the teinds of Whithorn were made over to the bishop of Galloway, it becomes a serious question whether this grant had the effect of converting what were originally priors' teinds into bishops' teinds. This question of law directly arises in the present case, but in point of fact it can scarcely be disputed that the teinds of Whithorn were originally not bishops' teinds but priors' teinds belonging to the priory of Whithorn.

"(2) It seems to be proved that these teinds—that is, the teinds of the priory of Whithorn—were given in commendam to various laic commendators prior to 1605. This is established, for example, by the tack by Robert, commendator of the priory of Whithorn, of 3d October 1572, and by the tacks by Patrick Earl of Orkney, as commendator of said priory, granted in 1591 and 1596. It is true these commendators only held the teinds in commendam and not heritably, and only at most for their lives; but it may not be immaterial that before they were granted to any bishop they were given to laic commendators.

"(3) The said teinds were first given to the bishop of Galloway in 1605, and then only for the life of the existing prelate, Mr Gavin Hamilton. This is proved by the crown grant of 29th November 1605, which bears in gremio that the teinds had come back to the Crown by the rebellion and denunciation of Patrick Earl of Orkney, the last commendator. It is material to notice that the grant expressly bears to be made because the emoluments and patrimony of the bishopric were dilapidated and exhausted, so that Bishop Gavin Hamilton could not therefrom maintain suitable state and dignity. The grant, however, was only for Bishop Gavin Hamilton's life.

"(4) A similar liferent grant was made by the Crown in favour of the next Bishop of Galloway, Bishop William Coupar, dated 31st July 1612.

"(5) These temporary grants of the priory, including the teinds of Whithorn, were followed, in or about 1612, by a permanent union of the priory and teinds of Whithorn to the bishopric of Galloway.

"This union is said to have been effected by an Act of Parliament passed in October 1612; but this Act is now lost, at least no copy of it can be found. It is referred to, however, not only in various deeds dated very shortly after its passing, but in other Acts, and it is expressly renewed and confirmed by the Act of Parliament of 28th June 1633. Reference may be made to the charter of confirmation by the Bishop of Galloway in favour of Lord Garlies, dated 3d March 1615, in which it is expressly said that the priory of Whithorn and the abbacy and monastery of Glenluce and Tongueland, both temporality and spirituality, were united, annexed, amd incorporated with the bishopric of Galloway by the Act of October 1612, to remain so in all future time.—(See also Thomson's Acts, vol. iv. p. 522.)

"The same thing is repeated in the charter of novodamus of May 1615, in the crown charter of confirmation of July 1615, and elsewhere.

"The Act of Parliament of 28th June 1633 (v. Thomson's Acts, p. 73) confirms certain grants to the bishopric of Galloway, inter alia, the grants of the

The respondents argued;—In order to succeed the Crown must establish three propositions—(1) That the teinds in question truly are

No. —
July 11
Lord Ad
v. Earl Gallowa
Hathorn

priory of Whithorn and the teinds thereof, and ratifies the same, 'togider with the former Actes of Parliament quhairby the saids Pryorie of Quhithorne and Abbacies of Tungland and Glenluce wer annexit unit and incorporat into and with the said bishopric of Galloway in all and sundry pointes articles and clauss' therin contenit.' The Act then proceeds of new to annex, unite, and incorporate, inter alia, the priory and teinds of Whithorn with the bishopric of Galloway, to remain in all time coming 'ane proper pairt of the patrimonie thereof.'

"The Lord Ordinary holds that the evidence of this statute, and of the other deeds, sufficiently instructs that in 1612 the teinds of Whithorn were made a proper part of the benefice of the bishopric of Galloway. They were certainly so in 1633; but in one view of the law the earlier date, 1612, may be of importance.

"(6) Holding the above facts to be proved, the Lord Ordinary is of opinion that the teinds of Whithorn became in 1612 proper bishops' teinds. That they were originally priors' teinds seems to be of no importance. Bishops got their teinds under various ecclesiastical arrangements, and got their emoluments from various sources. Lands were mortified to the bishoprics by private donors. Abbacies, priories, or even proper parsonages, might be suppressed in order to enlarge the bishop's revenue; but the Lord Ordinary thinks that all teinds which ultimately came to be the bishop's exclusive property and at his absolute disposal, so that he might devote the same, if he pleased, to maintain 'his state and dignity,' were bishops' teinds, whatever their prior history may have been. Kirks made mensal kirks—that is, to support the bishops' table—were bishops' kirks, and the teinds thereof were bishops' teinds, and this though originally they may have been proper parsonages. From and after 1612, therefore, it is thought that the teinds of Whithorn were bishops' teinds.

"(7) If this be so, the Lord Ordinary thinks that, in point of law, these teinds, which on the abolition of Episcopacy fell into the hands of the Crown, are, while they continue in the Crown's hands, entitled to postponement in allocation.

"The respondents no doubt maintained that to give the teinds this privilege they must be bishop's teinds at the date of the Reformation—that is, at or about 1560. The Lord Ordinary cannot find authority for this. The passage founded on in Connell (pp. 507-8) is obscure and ambiguous, and none of the cases seem to make any limit of the date of acquisition by the bishops as an essential of the privilege.

"There is nothing in principle which should limit the date, and give teinds acquired by a bishop in 1560 a greater privilege than those acquired in 1612, or should give teinds mortified to a Popish bishop a greater privilege than those originally mortified to a Protestant one. Indeed the privilege, such as it is, only rests upon practice, which could not commence till after 1633, and the practice seems not to have to any extent depended on the date of the acquisition of the teinds by the bishop. The first case is that of Arngask, 15th July 1715, 1 Connell, 504. The privilege was recognised in many subsequent cases. See, among others, Officers of State v. Lochnell, 7th March 1770, Mor. 14,796; Officers of State v. Christie, 16th July 1788, Mor. 14,818; Deans of Chapel Royal v. Hay, 11th December 1799, Mor. App. and Teinds, No. 6. Whatever be its origin, the existence of the privilege must be held to be established.

"(8) The respondents founded strongly upon the case of the Lord Advocate v. Gordon's Trustees, 17th January 1868, affirmed in the House of Lords 9th June 1871, where it was held that a usage of allocation for a hundred years was inconsistent with the Crown's claim of postponement for bishops' teinds. But in that case the true question was, whether the teinds were in point of fact bishops' teinds or not. They could not be distinguished from other teinds which were not bishops' teinds, and the judgment really went on a failure to prove the fact. In the present case, according to the Lord Ordinary's view, there is no doubt about the fact that the teinds became bishops' teinds in 1612.

"(9) Even if the teinds in question were to be held priors' teinds in the

No. 147.

July 11, 1873. Lord Advocate v. Earl of Galloway, and Hathorn.

bishops' teinds in the hands of the Crown; (2) That such teinds are entitled to exemption; and (3) That they are entitled to such exemption in a question with the respondents, whose heritable rights to the teinds have flowed from the Crown, and from former ecclesiastical holders of these teinds. The onus should be laid upon a party claiming such an extraordinary privilege, because the general rule is that teinds held by heritors upon heritable right are liable to be localled upon only ultimo loco.[1] But not only has the objector failed to establish these propositions, but the respondents have established the negative of all these propositions. They have established,—

I. That the teinds of the parish of Whithorn, belonging to the bishops of Galloway at the Revolution, and thereafter and now to the Crown, never were "bishops' teinds," because (1) The whole teinds of Whithorn were priory teinds before the Reformation; (2) for nearly half a century after the Reformation these teinds were in the hands either of the Crown or of a lay commendator, by whom a large portion of the teinds was feued out for onerous considerations to vassals now represented by the respondents; (3) although the teinds not so feued out were afterwards annexed to the bishopric of Galloway, they were annexed only as priory teinds to the benefice of the bishopric; (4) neither the bishop nor the bishopric ever at any time possessed or had right to the whole teinds of the parish; (5) the kirks of the priory, including Whithorn, were truly common kirks of the bishopric, which have no right of postponement such as is contended for.[2]

II. That the teinds so belonging to the bishop, even if changed by the annexation from priory into "bishops' teinds," are not entitled to any privilege in localities as against teinds held by heritors on heritable right, hands of the Crown, the Lord Ordinary would be disposed to give them the same privilege in allocation, though certainly this point is very open to dispute. The reason for the privilege is the same. The privilege of postponement has been extended to teinds for pious uses, and even to college teinds.—See Heritors of Portmoak v. Douglas, 9th December 1795, Mor. 14,823. The analogy is very important, and shews that the privilege is not peculiar to the Crown.

---

"(10) Lastly, the respondents founded very strongly upon the usage of allocation as barring the present objections.

"The Lord Ordinary doubts whether mere usage or neglect on the part of the Crown would ever bar the Crown from claiming the right, if it really existed; but he thinks the usage in the present case is sufficiently explained by two circumstances:—

"1. Until recently the Crown teinds were always under tack, and the Crown, which always drew its full tack-duty, however the stipend was allocated, had really no interest in the allocations; but,

"2. And chiefly, the reason of the former allocations seems to have been that the teinds claimed on heritable right, which were postponed or rather exempted altogether in the allocation, were claimed on a decimæ inclusæ right, that is, as being teind free altogether, and this right was without any inquiry conceded. It was only in the present process of locality that it was decided that these decimæ inclusæ rights were bad as such, as they were not held with the clause nunquam antea separatis. The alleged decimæ inclusæ right has now therefore been found to be a simple heritable right, and it is now for the first time that these teinds are to be allocated upon as held on heritable right. Their former exemption cannot be pleaded upon as affecting the new order of allocation, because it is only now that a question of the order of allocation with them arises for the first time."

[1] Bankt. ii. 8, 169; Connell on Teinds, vol. i. p. 483.

[2] Solr. of Tithes v. E. of Moray, May 23, 1797, M. 15,704; Solr. of Tithes v. Belches, Dec. 3, 1800, M. App. Teinds, 10.

No. 147.

July 11, 1873. Lord Advocate v. Earl of Galloway, and Hathorn.

ecause (1) There is no foundation for the alleged privilege either in principle r in statute, or in judicial decision, the Arngask[1] case having been a decision n specialties, and having been imperfectly known to or understood by the udges who decided the cases of Lochnell[2] and Elmslie.[3] (2) The teinds of ıensal kirks are not entitled to any such exemption, in respect that during Episcopacy the bishop was bound, out of these teinds, to provide ministers ith competent stipends, and they cannot now be more highly privileged han when in the hands of the bishop. (3) Even assuming teinds of ıensal kirks to be privileged, the privilege is confined to kirks which ere mensal kirks of bishops before the Reformation, and does not extend to hose which were acquired from religious houses after the Reformation;[4] ut Whithorn was never a mensal kirk of the Bishop of Galloway; it was priory kirk, and was not acquired by the bishop till 1612, and even then he bishop did not acquire right to the whole teinds of the parish.[5] (4) The nveterate usage for 250 years, both during Episcopacy and since its abolition, as been to allocate the stipend primo loco upon the teinds in question, and to xempt altogether, or at least to postpone in the allocation, the teinds held n heritable right, and the bishops, or the Crown as successors of the ishop, have always been parties to the processes in which the teinds in uestion have been so dealt with.

III. That even if the crown teinds are bishops' teinds, and entitled to exnption from allocation as in a question with teinds held on heritable rights, ıey are not entitled to such exemption as against the respondents' teinds, ecause (1) The Crown having, while the priory was held by a commendar, sanctioned an onerous grant of the teinds of the respondents' lands, it was ot entitled, after resuming possession of the priory, to make any grant of ıat benefice, except under burden of the feu-rights of the said teinds. (2) he grant in favour of the bishop was accordingly made subject to these ;u-rights, which were, for onerous considerations, renewed from time to me by the bishops, and by the Crown after the abolition of Episcopacy. 3) Neither the bishops nor the Crown were or are entitled to plead an lleged privilege of postponement in allocation as against their own nerous grants in favour of the respondents or their authors, but, on the ontrary, the free teind remaining in their hands as superiors and titulars ıust, according to the law as settled in numerous cases, be exhausted efore the respondents can be called upon to contribute to the stipend.

It was argued for the Lord Advocate;—It was true that in previous ocalities the teinds of the respondents were not localled upon, but that as because their lands were erroneously supposed to be held cum decimis clusis. The question as to the mode of allocation therefore arose now or the first time. The objector (the Crown) must prove that the Crown

---

[1] Minister of Arngask, 1715, cited in Officers of State and E. of Breadalbane . Campbell of Lochnell, March 7, 1770, M. 14,796; see also Connell on Tithes, 405; Sess. Papers, Arniston Coll. in Adv. Lib. vol. xi. No. 23; Forbes Coll. ol. iii. p. 328, seq., vol. vi. p. 675, seq.

[2] 1770, M. 14,796.

[3] Skene and Elmslie v. Officers of State, June 3, 1795, M. 14,822; Balfour . Officers of State, June 16, 1742, Elch. Teinds, 16, and Connell, i. 506, enthorn case, 1734, Connell, i. 507, and Elch. l.c.; Officers of State v. Christie, uly 16, 1788, M. 14,818; Littledean case, Sess. Papers, Arniston Coll. vol. i. No. 23; Locality of Prestonkirk, Nov. 14, 1846, 9 D. 61.

[4] Ld.-Adv. v. Gordon's Trs. Jan. 17, 1868, ante, vol. vi. 250,—aff. ante, vol. ix. L.L. 73.

[5] Stair, ii. 8, 35; Hope's Minor Pract. ii. 1 and 2, 13; Forbes on Tithes, pp. 5, 73; Bankton, ii. 8, 9, 12; Connell on Teinds, vol. ii. App. p. 291; Keith's at. of Scottish Bishops, p. 161.

No. 147.

July 11, 1873. Lord Advocate v. Earl of Galloway, and Hathorn.

was titular, that before the abolition of Episcopacy the teinds were bishops' teinds, and that on that event they passed to the Crown. There was no doubt as to the crown right of titularity. The history of the parish from the Reformation downwards shewed that the teinds in question were bishops' teinds before 1689. The priory of Whithorn had never been erected, but held in commendam, and therefore continued to be a church benefice after the Reformation. The church of Whithorn was one of the proper churches of the priory, and, along with the others, and the teinds that had belonged to the priory, was given to the Bishop of Galloway for his maintenance, and permanently united to the bishopric in 1612 by an Act of Parliament which, though lost, is sufficiently proved by various contemporary deeds.[1] But the respondents denied the privilege of postponement claimed for bishops' teinds, and objected that there was no sound or intelligible principle on which it could be maintained. The privilege was not one of exemption, but of position in a locality. It was idle therefore to look for the source of the privilege to any period before the Reformation, for then the parson's right was to levy the teinds for his own use, and even where he was a stipendiary the teinds belonged to a bishop or religious house, who levied them all, and there was no such thing as a lay heritor entitled to the teinds of his own lands. In a variety of leading cases, subsequent to the Reformation and to the abolition of Episcopacy, the privilege had been recognised, and rested on very intelligible grounds. The judgment in the Arngask case was a determination of the general question, and it had been followed as a leading case in the Lochnell case, and in Officers of State v. Skene and Elmslie.[2] In short, the point has been regarded as fixed law, and hundreds of localities have been made out, acquiesced in, and approved by the Court on that footing.[3] Where the point has been adverted to at all, it has been only to confirm the general rule. The objector referred to the interlocutors of Lord Moncreiff and Lord Barcaple,[4] printed at the end of this report.

The contention that only those bishops' teinds, if any, were entitled to the privilege, which were bishops' teinds before the Reformation, was chiefly supported by a dictum of Sir John Connell's,[5] which was somewhat ambiguous, but could not bear the meaning attached to it by the respondents. The ground of decision in the cases of Littledean and others referred to by him was not that the teinds were acquired at any particular date, but that they had been feudalised in the person of a layman, and acquired from him by a temporal title.

The objection that this was not a mensal church proceeded on a misapprehension of the nature of the bishops' right in the teinds of mensal churches,[6] and the objection that the annexation appropriated the church and teinds to the bishop and chapter in common was hardly more intelligible.[7] The statutes referred to shew that if, after the Restoration, a bishop is found in possession of the teinds of a parish which his prede-

[1] See deeds printed in app. to record, and Thomson's Acts, v. p. 72.

[2] See also 1693, c. 23; Heritors of Portmoak v. Douglas, Dec. 9, 1795, M. 14,823; Deans of Chapel Royal v. Hay, M. Teinds, App. 6.

[3] Connell on Tithes, i. 506; Bain v. Officers of State, June 1, 1858, 20 D. 1006.

[4] This was also before the Court in reference to another question, in Lord-Adv. v. L. Arbuthnott, &c. July 8, 1868, ante, vol. vi. p. 999.

[5] Connell, i. 507.

[6] Connell, i. 59, 66; Hope's Minor Pract. tit. ii. p. 83; Stair, ii. 8, 27; Ersk. ii. 10, 11; Da Gauge, voce Mensa; Craig i. 15, 7, 8.

[7] Freeman on the Cathedral of Wells, 45; Innes's Sketches of early Scottish History, p. 81; 1606, c. 2; 1617, c. 2; 1594, c. 199; 1662, c. 1.

cessors had also enjoyed before 1639, it must have been a part of the proper patrimony of the bishop himself, and could not by possibility have been a common kirk. The same result is shewn by the different treatment at the Revolution of teinds which had belonged to bishops and those which had belonged to chapters.[1] And it was no answer to the present claim that the bishop was liable to support the minister of Whithorn, for all bishops' teinds during the subsistence of Episcopacy were subject to the same burden.[2]

At advising,—

LORD PRESIDENT.—(After the narrative above quoted)—That being the state of the facts, the question is, is there any reason in point of law that these teinds should not enjoy the privilege of being postponed to all the other teinds in the parish? That is, are they to be localled on before or after the teinds to which the proprietors of the land have acquired heritable right as above described?

It was contended on the part of the respondents that this alleged privilege of bishops' teinds has no reasonable or sound foundation in law. I am afraid it is too late to maintain that proposition, because it has been settled by a series of decisions that teinds which were bishops' teinds when they came into the hands of the Crown are entitled to the privilege here claimed. No doubt, if the teinds had once been erected into a temporal lordship and had come into the hands of the Crown, even though they again returned into the hands of a bishop, and on the abolition of Episcopacy fell to the Crown, they would not be bishops' teinds; they would have been feudalised by having been in the hands of a layman, and would not be entitled to the privilege of bishops' teinds. These teinds, however, never were erected into a temporal lordship. When they were in the hands of laymen they were held only in commendam, which is quite a different thing. The cases therefore where it was decided that the bishops' teinds, which had been erected into a temporal lordship, were not entitled to the privilege here sought have no application.

It was also contended that the nature of this privilege could not easily be explained or defined. There is no difficulty in that. It is quite settled that the test of this privilege is whether the teinds are or are not inalienable,—not inalienable in the hands of the Crown, but in the hands of the original possessor. If the teinds were inalienable in the hands of the bishop then they are entitled to the privilege, and so with college teinds, hospital teinds, and teinds devoted to pious uses, which are exempt in virtue of statute 1693, cap. 39, where it is declared "that the said commission shall not be extended to the buying or selling of teynds which formerly pertained to the bishops and now belong to their Majesties by the abolition of Prelacy, so long as the said teynds shall remain in their Majesties' hands undisponed, nor to teynds belonging to colledges and hospitalls or mortifyed or destinate for pious uses."

In the case of the Deans of the Chapel Royal v. Hay, 11th December 1799, M. App., voce Teinds, No. 6, it was laid down that that was the true rule for ascertaining whether teinds are entitled to this privilege.

It was further maintained by the respondents that the grant by the statute 1612 to the Bishop of Galloway was truly not to the bishop but to the chapter, or at all events to the bishop and chapter. It appears to me that the answer to that by the Lord Advocate is both conclusive and historically correct. It is said for him that at the time of the Act of 1612 there was actually no chapter in existence in Galloway. The statute of 1594, cap. 99, had the effect of destroying all chapters and their right to their patrimonial kirks. After that Act there was truly never such a thing as a kirk belonging to a chapter. That [1] 1690, c. 23; 1693, c. 23; 1693, c. 25.

[2] 1581, c. 100; Connell, i. 100; Knox's Hist. of the Reformation, b. iv. vol. ii. p. 298, ed. 1848; Keith's History of the Affairs of the Church of Scotland, App. to b. iii. vol. iii. p. 346; Hope's Minor Pract. 102, 103; Connell, i. 90; i. 504, 505.

Episcopacy at the Revolution. They could not then have been i the chapter, because chapters were not restored after the Rest were therefore restored to the bishop as proper bishops' teinds. I quite plain that these teinds came to the Crown at the Revol bishops' teinds.

But it is contended further for the respondents that no bish entitled to this privilege which were not bishops' teinds before th I cannot see any good ground for this contention. The only t any weight to it is the fact that Lord Colonsay, in the case of the
v. Gordon's Trustees, decided recently in the House of Lords, is re used some expressions in his opinion which have been quoted t view. I confess I am unable to understand how the passage qu way into the report. It is quite unnecessary to the decision o Crown there having failed to make out that the teinds were bisho it is in direct opposition to many opinions expressed by that no Lord when he presided in this Court. I cannot help thinking th misreported or misunderstood. I cannot find any ground for holdi teinds are not entitled to this privilege unless they were bishops' te Reformation. I can quite understand its being said that they claim to the privilege unless they had existed as bishops' teinds mission to Charles I. Unless the teinds we are dealing with teind, and inalienable before the submission to the King, and bef arbitral was embodied in the statute of 1633, they could not this privilege, because then they would have belonged to that which might be bought by the heritors at nine years' purchas already said, the proper test is whether the teind was inalienable holder, and I have shewn that it was so in this case. No teind this exemption unless it was bishops' teind before the statute of submission in 1627 and 1628. It is impossible, however, to find holding that the date at which teind must be bishops' teind in titled to the privilege is antecedent to the Reformation.

The reason why this privilege is given to inalienable teind is o alienable teind was liable to be localled on the same way as ordi all other teind being alienable, the heritors would buy up their tei heritable rights to it, and so the whole burden of stipend would b the inalienable teind, because it never can be bought up. The wh being made inalienable would thus be defeated. That is the reaso vilege was granted, in order that the teind might remain for the coll

No. 147.

July 11, 1873.
Lord Advocate v. Earl of Galloway, and Hathorn.

s." Now, if they are not bishops' teinds they are not entitled to the pri- e claimed. If they are church teinds, belonging to other churchmen than ps, they have no privilege. That has been decided in two cases,—the itor of Tithes v. the Earl of Moray, 23d May 1797, M. 15,704; and the itor of Tithes v. Belches, 3d December 1800, M. App., voce Teinds, No. 10. Lord Ordinary says in his note, with regard to this,—"Even if the teinds uestion were to be held priors' teinds in the hands of the Crown, the Lord nary would be disposed to give them the same privilege in allocation, though inly this point is very open to dispute. The reason for the privilege is the . The privilege of postponement has been extended to teinds for pious and even to college teinds.—See Heritors of Portmoak v. Douglas, 9th mber 1795, M. 14,823. The analogy is very important, and shews that privilege is not peculiar to the Crown." The analogy seems to me most ading and false, because college teinds and teinds devoted to pious uses are red by statute equal with bishops' teinds and to have the same privileges, eas other church teinds belonging to chapters or priors never had this pri- e, and are not inalienable in the hands of the Crown. With that exception ee with the Lord Ordinary, and hold that the Crown has proved that these ls are entitled to the privilege.

he other Judges concurred.

THE following interlocutor was pronounced:—"Recall the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary in so far as it finds that the teinds of the parish of Whithorn are bishops' teinds, or at all events are church teinds entitled to all the privileges in allocation of bishops' teinds in the hands of the Crown, and in place thereof find that the teinds in the parish of Whithorn in the hands of the Crown are bishops' teinds: Quoad ultra adhere to the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary, and find the Lord Advocate entitled to additional expenses; appoint an account thereof to be lodged, and remit," &c.

V. H. SANDS, W.S.—RUSSELL & NICOLSON, C.S.—JOHN GIBSON Jun., W.S.—Agents.

INTERLOCUTOR and NOTE by Lord Moncreiff in Locality of Kinneff and Caterline, referred to in argument for pursuer.

18th December 1830.—The Lord Ordinary having considered the revised ctions for the Reverend Patrick Stewart, and the revised answers for Lord th's trustees, and having heard parties' procurators, Finds it sufficiently blished that the teinds of the parish of Caterline, which is now united to the ish of Kinneff, are all bishops' teinds, entitled to the privilege generally nging to such teinds, in so far as the circumstances of the case admit of the inary rules of allocation being applied; but finds that, as the parish of neff now consists of two united parishes which were originally distinct, the stion whether the stipend ought to be allocated on the two parishes indisminately as one parish, or separately and proportionally on each parish, must end on the question of fact whether there exist any special interest to exclude principle of joint allocation: Finds that though in this case it appears pro- le that the general titularity of the two parishes are in the same party, it is r that certain of the heritors, and particularly the respondents, hold heritable its to the teinds of their own lands, whereby they have the same interest to ct to a joint allocation which would be competent to a separate titular who right to draw the teinds of the parish of Kinneff: Therefore finds that the nary rules of allocation in united parishes, where there is but one titularity, not justly be applied to the present case: Finds that the stipend must be ated separately on the two parishes according to the proportions hitherto rved: Repels the objections, approves of the locality on this point, and finds respondents entitled to expenses; allows an account," &c.

NOTE.—It was justly observed that it is scarcely conceivable that the parishes ld ever have been united on the principle that the whole stipend should be laid on one parish, which would be the result of the objector's argument. But the Lord Ordinary further remarks that as the objector has no heritable right to his teinds, and consequently bound to pay them to somebody, he has scarcely a legitimate interest to maintain his foresaid plea."

No. 147.

July 11, 1873. Lord Advocate v. Earl of Galloway, and Hathorn.

INTERLOCUTOR and NOTE by Lord Barcaple in Locality of Traquair.

"10th March 1865.—The Lord Ordinary having heard counsel for the parties, and considered the closed record on the question between the Crown and the Duke of Buccleuch, Finds that bishops' teinds now in the hands of the Crown in the old parish of Traquair, although they may have been under tack in the year 1629, cannot be localled upon until the teinds in said parish, held by the Duke of Buccleuch on heritable right, should have been exhausted: Finds the Duke of Buccleuch liable in the expenses of this discussion; allows an account," &c.

"NOTE.—It is contended for the respondent that the privilege of being postponed in the allocation of stipend attaches only to such bishops' teinds now in the hands of the Crown as were not under tack at the date of the king's decree-arbitral in 1629. No authority is referred to as establishing this proposition. The argument in support of it is rested upon the terms of the submission by the bishops, and of the decree-arbitral, and upon the Acts 1662, c. 9, and 1663, c. 28, prohibiting valuations of teinds of which the bishops were in possession, by leading and drawing the teinds or by rental bolls. It is attempted to trace the privilege attaching to bishops' teinds as to being localled upon to the stipulation in the submission as to valuation, and to the effect given to that stipulation in the decree-arbitral and subsequent statutes, and it is maintained that this privilege remained after the exemption from valuation was abolished.

"The Lord Ordinary thinks that this is a novel and unauthorised view of the source of the privilege. No allusion is to be found to it in the opinions of the Judges in the case of Prestonkirk, 14th November 1846, 9 D. 61, where that matter was much considered. The Lord Ordinary has never understood that the recognised privilege of bishops' teinds is subject to any such exception, and he does not perceive any principle on which it can be established. He did not understand it to be disputed that in the case of Arngask, referred to in 1 Connell, 505, the teinds had been under tack. The judgment expressly refers to teinds formerly belonging to bishops and their tacksmen."

No. 148.

July 16, 1873. Walker v. Langdales Chemical Co.

JOHN WALKER, Pursuer.—Millar—Keir.
LANGDALES CHEMICAL MANURE CO., Defenders.—Sol.-Gen. Clark—Asher—Innes.

Sale—Delivery—Risk.—A person sold a number of carcases of whales in Shetland at a price per ton, to be delivered at the buyers' wharf at Newcastle. The carcases became unfit for use on the voyage. Held that the risk was with the seller, as (1) neither the quantity sold nor the price could be ascertained till delivery; and (2) as the seller had undertaken to deliver at the buyers' wharf.

1ST DIVISION. Lord Mure. B.

THIS was an action at the instance of John Walker, farmer, Shetland, against the Langdales Chemical Manure Company, Newcastle, concluding for £362, 10s., which he alleged to be the agreed-on price of 145 tons of carcases of whales, at the rate of 50s. per ton, with certain other charges for demurrage and expenses.

In December 1871 the pursuer sold to the defenders 212 carcases of whales. This contract was entered into by certain letters and telegrams, from which it appeared that the pursuer was to deliver the carcases at the defenders' wharf at Newcastle. The ship the "Mars" in which the carcases were shipped was detained, and never came to the defenders' wharf. The carcases had become putrid, and were ordered to be destroyed by the Board of Health of Newcastle.

No. 1.
July 16, Walker v. Langdale Chemical

The pursuer pleaded;—(1) The defenders having purchased the carcases from the pursuer, and delivery having been tendered, the defenders are liable for the price thereof, and they are also bound to relieve the pursuer of the claim made by the owner of the "Mars." (2) The defenders, in the circumstances, are justly due and addebted to the pursuer in the price of the whales' carcases, and are bound to relieve the pursuer of the claim made against him for the expense of destroying the cargo, and for demurrage.

The defenders pleaded;—(1) The pursuer having failed timeously to deliver or tender delivery to the defenders, in terms of the contract, of the goods contracted for, in such condition as by the contract they ought to have been, he cannot maintain the present action. (2) Having regard to the time when and the condition in which the goods arrived in Newcastle, the defenders were not bound to accept delivery thereof under the contract.

After a proof had been taken the Lord Ordinary pronounced the following interlocutor:—"Finds, as matter of fact, 1st, That in the end of December 1871 a contract was entered into between the pursuer and the defenders, by which the pursuer undertook to deliver at the defenders' wharf at Newcastle 212 or thereby carcases of whales, then lying at Uyea Sound, in Shetland, with heads, at the rate of 50s. per ton, to be paid on delivery; 2d, That upon the carcases arriving at Newcastle, which they did on the 7th of March 1872, they were in a putrid state, and unfit for being used in the manufacture of chemical manure; 3d, That when the condition of the cargo was made known to the Local Board of Health at Newcastle proceedings were taken by them to prevent the cargo from being landed, and it was thereafter condemned and destroyed, at their instance, as a nuisance and injurious to health; 4th, That when the whale heads arrived at Newcastle in the end of March they were also in a putrid condition, and unfit for the purpose of manufacture: Finds, in these circumstances, in point of law—(1st), That as the pursuer, by the contract founded on, undertook to deliver the carcases in question at Newcastle, the property, until delivered, was at the risk of the pursuer; (2d), That the defenders were entitled to refuse to take delivery of the carcases in the condition in which they were when tendered to them for delivery; and (3d), That the pursuer failed to deliver the goods contracted for to the defenders in terms of the contract; Therefore assoilzies the defenders from the whole conclusions of the action, and decerns: Finds them entitled to expenses," &c.*

---

* "NOTE.—(1) It is very clearly established by the evidence in this case that the contract in question was one to deliver at Newcastle, and also that this obligation was deliberately undertaken by the pursuer. Because, in the earlier communications which passed between him and the defenders relative to the contract, the carcases were offered at 30s. per ton, 'free on board at Uyea;' but upon being informed by the defenders that they could not arrange for a vessel to take delivery in Shetland, and requested to offer the carcases for delivery at Newcastle, the pursuer did so at 50s. instead of 30s. per ton, thereby stipulating for 20s. per ton more, with a view, it is presumed, to meet the expense of transit and some of the consequent risks.

"(2) Such being the nature of the contract, it appears to the Lord Ordinary that the carcases, until delivery, were in law at the risk of the pursuer. It is so laid down by Erskine, iii. 3, 7, and Prin. iii. 3, 3; in Bell's Coms., vol. i. p. 444; and it was so decided in the cases of Spence, 25th January 1687, M. p. 3153, and Milne, 1st February 1809, F. C.

"(3) In these circumstances it is not necessary, in the view the Lord Ordinary takes of the case, as between the pursuer and the defenders, to inquire whether

No. 148.

July 16, 1873.

Walker v. Langdales Chemical Co.

The pursuer reclaimed. He argued that the sale was of a specific quantity of carcases, and the price being ascertained at so much per ton the condition of the cargo when the vessel arrived at Newcastle was occasioned by improper delays and mismanagement of the cargo during the voyage. These are questions which must, it is thought, be disposed of between the pursuer and the owners of the vessel in which the carcases were shipped, because the pursuer by his contract was bound to deliver at Newcastle; and if the carcases, when there tendered for delivery, were in such a condition as entitled the defenders to reject them, it is, in the opinion of the Lord Ordinary, of no moment whether that was caused by unnecessary delays and mismanagement on the part of the master of the vessel during the voyage, or arose from delays occasioned by stress of weather or unavoidable causes. In the case of Milne, above referred to, the condition of the wheat which led to and was held to warrant its rejection appears to have arisen, not from any fault on the part of the seller or those employed by him, but simply from the wheat having become heated in the course of the voyage, and being in that state when tendered for delivery.

---

"(4) As regards the condition of the carcases in question at the time of their arrival at Newcastle, it is, in the opinion of the Lord Ordinary, plain upon the evidence that they were then in an advanced state of decomposition,—putrid, and unfit for disembarkation by any ordinary process. This is proved by the scientific witnesses examined who saw the cargo, two of whom, viz., Dr Newton and Dr Hardcastle, inspected it on the 13th of March upon the employment of the defenders, and the other, Mr Pattinson, on the 14th, upon the employment of the pursuer, and whose evidence is fully more decided than that of the witnesses who inspected it for the defenders. The opinion of these witnesses is confirmed by that of the defenders' foreman, who inspected it on Monday the 11th, of the inspector of nuisances, who superintended its removal, and of the parties engaged under him in carrying out his directions. And this body of evidence from parties who saw the cargo is, in the opinion of the Lord Ordinary, more to be relied on upon a practical question of this description than the opinion of a scientific man even of the high position of Dr Stevenson Macadam, who had not an opportunity of examining the cargo.

"(5) This evidence, moreover, appears to the Lord Ordinary to be sufficient to shew, not only that the carcases were not in a fit state to be landed, but also that they were not in a fit state to be manufactured into chemical manure, which was the purpose for which they had been bought. The defenders' foreman is very distinct upon this point, and, while there is no contrary evidence, his opinion in that respect is corroborated by that of the managing director of the defenders, and by two other chemical manure manufacturers at Newcastle, who say that carcases in such a putrid condition were not a merchantable commodity, could not be worked up without endangering the lives of the workmen, and would not therefore be received into any of their works. And that this opinion is acted upon is borne out by the fact that another cargo of whales purchased by the defenders, which arrived some time before the one in question, and which, when landed at a distance from Newcastle, was found to be in a decomposed state, was buried there, and has not yet been used, and that it is in evidence that the defenders do not intend to use it for several years to come, or until the flesh and obnoxious matter have been absorbed, and nothing is left but the bones.

"(6) It is strongly contended on the part of the pursuer, that even if in ordinary circumstances the risk under a contract of this description lay with the seller till delivery, it had here been transferred because of the defenders' refusal to allow the pursuer to use the necessary quantity of carbolic acid for the preservation of the flesh. But the Lord Ordinary is unable to read the communications which passed between the parties in this light, for he does not think that there was any refusal on the part of the defenders to allow carbolic acid to be used. They no doubt seem to have hesitated at first, as they do not appear to have been aware of the precise effect it might have upon the whales as an article of manure. But when informed by the pursuer that the chemists he consulted said it would

No. 148.

July 16, 1873.

Walker v. Langdales Chemical Co.

risk passed to the purchaser. The pursuer had shipped the cargo in ordance with his contract, and from that time he was not responsible it.[1]

The defenders argued;—The contract was not for a specific subject, but a quantity of a specific subject. The contract might have been implemented by sending the carcases of any whales. The price could not be ertained till delivery took place, as it would vary according to the antity delivered. Therefore the risk remained with the seller.[2]

At advising,—

LORD PRESIDENT.—The question raised in this case is of some importance, but annot say that it is attended with any difficulty. A contract of sale was en- ed into between the pursuer, who was resident in Shetland, and the defenders, o are chemical manure manufacturers in Newcastle. It was concluded by ans of various telegrams and letters, but it is needless to go into their terms, ause the result of them is quite clear. The pursuer sold to the defenders ut 150 tons of whale flesh, meaning thereby flesh as distinguished from bones l blubber, and to this, by a subsequent arrangement, a certain quantity of bones s added. Now, these materials were sold at a certain rate per ton, and it ears in the first place that the sale was venditio generis and not venditio rei cificæ, and, in the second place, that the price must have remained unascer- ned until delivery, because the quantity to be delivered was not ascertained. is is plain, for when the cargo was put on board the "Mars" for Newcastle find the shipmaster and the seller differing about the quantity, one of them imating it at 170, the other at 140 tons, and even that was not the entire ount to be sent, for another vessel was engaged to carry a further quantity. s see, therefore, that the quantity was quite unascertained, and the price in sequence is in the same position. But further, the seller undertook to give ivery at the defenders' wharf at Newcastle, so that the time of delivery there s the first time that the price to be paid could be ascertained, and that was first place at which delivery could be made. Whose, then, was the risk ore the delivery at the defenders' wharf at Newcastle? For the arrival of the sel at Newcastle is not the point of time, even if delivery had been actually dered, but her arrival at the defender's wharf. On both the grounds on ich the case has been argued I think the risk was the seller's, and the whale sh having admittedly become unfit for use from the length of the voyage, he st be the party to suffer loss. The circumstance that the subject of sale was liverable at Newcastle is of itself sufficient to settle the case against the pur- er, for both Erskine and Bell distinctly lay down that if a place be fixed for livery the goods are held to be still the seller's till brought thither for deli- ry, the intermediate risk being his, and the two cases of Spence and Miller are ect authorities to this effect. But further, the uncertainty of the amount of e subject and of the price is a circumstance which settles the law against the no harm, they seem at once to have consented to the pursuer using as much he might see it prudent to do.

---

"Upon the whole matter, therefore, the Lord Ordinary has come to the con- sion that, as the pursuer was under a contract to deliver at Newcastle, and e cargo when it arrived there was not only unfit for use but even for being ded with safety, the pursuer has failed to deliver in terms of the contract, and at he is not therefore entitled to recover against the defenders, in terms of the nclusions of the summons.

[1] Hardy v. Austin, May 25, 1870, ante, vol. viii. p. 798; Mercantile Law n. Act, 19 and 20 Vict. c. 60, sec. 5; Jaffé v. Ritchie, Dec. 21, 1860, 24 D. 2; Hutchison v. Henry and Corrie, Nov. 20, 1867, ante, vol. vi. 57.

[2] Hansen v. Craig, Feb. 4, 1859, 24 D. 432; Bull v. Robison, July 7, 1854, Exch. 342; Gardiner v. Gray, March 6, 1815 (English case) 4 Campton, 4; Bell's Pr. 117; Abbot on Shipping, 453; Ersk. iii. 3, 84; Spence, Jan. 25, 87, M. 3153; Milne v. Miller, Feb. 1, 1809, F. C.

No. 148.

July 16, 1873. Walker v. Langdales Chemical Co.

pursuer, because while these are uncertain the risk is not transferred. The general rule is res perit domino, and the transference of the risk to the buyer is an exception to that rule, and only comes into existence when the subject and the price are both so fixed that the buyer can insist on the delivery of a specific article and the seller on the payment of a fixed sum. The impossibility of enforcing a contract in such circumstances as the present is illustrated by the way in which the action is laid. The summons concludes for payment of £362, but how is that amount ascertained? Simply by assuming that the quantity on board the "Mars" was 145 tons, for there are no means of ascertaining this. It was only by weighing the cargo at the place of delivery that the amount could have been ascertained. That has now become impossible, and so the summons is founded on mere conjecture. I am for adhering to the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor.

LORD DEAS concurred.

LORD ARDMILLAN.—I have very little to add to what has been said. It is unfortunate that here we have two innocent parties complaining of a loss for which neither of them is to blame. The question is on whom the loss is to fall. The seller says the loss should fall on the purchaser, the purchaser says that it should fall on the seller. Now, I have come to the same conclusion as your Lordships, that the risk remains with the seller till delivery.

There was here a venditio generis, not the sale of a specific ascertained article. It was not possible that either the exact amount sold or the exact price could be ascertained until the vessel arrived. That is the first step in the case. The next step is that delivery to the pursuer was part of the contract, and capability of delivery was a quality of the article sold. Capability of delivery was thus a condition of the contract. The vessel was the seller's vessel pro hac vice, and when the vessel arrived delivery had become legally impossible.

There was a very important change made in the contract. Originally it was contemplated that the seller should give delivery in Shetland, and that the purchaser should procure a vessel and take the carcases to Newcastle. That was altered, and in consequence of the alteration a higher rate per ton was fixed as the price. It is obvious that the increase exceeded the mere cost of carriage, and the increase of price was added for the risk of delay. I do not think that the Mercantile Law Amendment Act applies. I think that it is important that we should adhere to the well-established rule of the law of Scotland that when a contract is made for delivery of a specific quantity at a particular port if the article perishes before it is delivered at the port it perishes to the seller.

LORD JERVISWOODE concurred.

THE COURT adhered, with additional expenses.

ANDREW & WILSON, W.S.—BOYD, MACDONALD, & LOWSON, S.S.C.—Agents.

No. 149.

July 16, 1873. Robertson v. Ross.

ELIZABETH WILSON OR ROBERTSON AND HUSBAND, Pursuers.
ELIZABETH BAIN OR ROSS AND HUSBAND, Defenders.—Guthrie.
THOMAS H. DOUGLAS, Defender.—Thoms.
J. M. MACQUEEN, Compearer.—Scott.

Agent and Client—Personal Liability of Agent.—An agent for a private pursuer of an action of declarator of contravention of lawburrows used the name of the Lord Advocate as joint pursuer without his authority. Held that the agent was personally liable in expenses to the defenders.

1ST DIVISION. Ld. Mackenzie. B.

THIS was an action of declarator of contravention of lawburrows at the instance of Elizabeth Wilson or Robertson and her husband, "and the Right Honourable George Young, our advocate for our interest," against Elizabeth Bain or Ross, and Charles Ross, her husband, and Thomas Douglas.

No. 149.

July 16, 1873.
Robertson v. Ross.

The Lord Ordinary pronounced the following interlocutors:—

"11th March 1873.—In respect that it is admitted by the counsel for the pursuers, Mr and Mrs Robinson, that the authority of the Lord Advocate was not obtained by them or their agent before inserting the name of the Lord Advocate as pursuer in the action, appoints intimation to be made by the defenders to the Lord Advocate of the dependence of this action by service of a copy of the summons and record upon his Lordship, and upon the Crown Agent, and continues the cause in the procedure roll until Tuesday next the 18th instant."

Appearance was made for the Lord Advocate, and it was stated for his Lordship that he had granted no authority to use his name in the instance.

"18th March 1873.—The Lord Ordinary, having heard counsel for the parties, makes avizandum with the debate and the process."

"22d March 1873.—The Lord Ordinary having heard counsel, and considered the closed record, in respect that the Lord Advocate has not granted his concurrence to the summons, dismisses the action, and decerns: Refuses the motion of the defenders that the pursuers' agent should be found liable to them in the expenses of process: Finds the pursuers, Elizabeth Wilson or Robinson and John Ivinson Robinson, liable in expenses to the defenders, of which allows accounts to be given in, and remits."

The pursuers reclaimed, and when the reclaiming note was called in the short-roll, no appearance being made for the reclaimers, the Court pronounced an interlocutor ordering the reclaimers' agent to be personally present. When the case was called again the agent was present, and it was stated that he had withdrawn from the agency. There was no appearance made for the pursuers.

The defenders moved the Court to find the pursuers' agent liable to them in the expenses of process. They argued that the action being of a penal nature could not have gone on without the concurrence of the Lord Advocate. It was competent when a person's name has been made use of without his consent to find the agent so using it liable in expenses.[1]

At advising,—

LORD PRESIDENT.—This is an action of declarator of contravention of lawburrows, raised at the instance of Elizabeth Wilson or Robertson and her husband for his interest, "and the Right Honourable George Young, our advocate for our interest," and the petitory conclusion of the summons is that "the defenders ought and should be decerned and ordained, by decree foresaid, conjunctly and severally, to make payment of the sum of 400 merks Scots, or £22, 10s. sterling . . . . one-half thereof to us, and the other half to the pursuers, the said Elizabeth Wilson or Robertson, now Robinson, and John Ivinson Robinson." Now, it is needless to say that the action could have been raised in no other form in order to be an effectual declarator of contravention of lawburrows. One-half of the penalty goes to the Crown, and the other half to the informer, but the whole sum must be sued for. It now appears that the Lord Advocate gave no authority to institute this summons in his name. This is not a case in which his mere concurrence would be of any avail. He must be a joint pursuer, and he gave no authority to raise this action in his name. After the summons had been executed it was called in Court as at the instance of Mrs Robertson and others, and in order to justify the use of the word "others," the Lord Advocate must be a pursuer as well as Mrs Robertson and her husband. The summons was therefore called as at the instance of all the pursuers. Now, I need hardly say that this was altogether wrong, and that the agent who libelled this summons, and procured it to be executed and called without being duly authorised, was acting improperly. It would have been a [1] Cowan v. Farnie, March 4, 1836, 14 S. 634; M'Call v. Sharp, Jan. 31, 1862, 24 D. 393.

No. 149.

July 16, 1873. Robertson v. Ross.

more serious matter had the pursuers maintained that they had authority from the Lord Advocate, when in truth they had not. But I am happy to think that they did not do so; for it appears from the first interlocutor pronounced by the Lord Ordinary after closing the record that the pursuers' counsel admitted that the authority of the Lord Advocate had not been obtained. The Lord Advocate having declined to adopt the action or to appear as a pursuer the Lord Ordinary has dismissed the action, and found the private pursuers liable in expenses to the defender. That is undoubtedly right, as far as it goes; and there is now no appearance by the pursuers in support of their reclaiming note. But the defenders, on 22d March, moved the Lord Ordinary to find the pursuers' agent also liable to them in expenses, and they now ask an alteration on the interlocutor to that effect. I am of opinion that their motion ought to be granted. I think that the pursuers' agent, by his misconduct (for I cannot call it anything less than misconduct), has been the cause of the defenders incurring expense, and that being so, there can be no doubt, both on principle and authority, that he must be liable to them in costs.

I have spoken of the agent's misconduct, for I think it amounted to that; but I am of opinion that he acted more from rashness or heedlessness than from intention, and I am therefore not prepared to suggest to your Lordships that any censure should follow on our judgment. But I have no doubt as to the agent's liability for the expenses of process.

LORDS DEAS, ARDMILLAN, and JERVISWOODE concurred.

THE COURT pronounced the following interlocutor:—"Recall the said interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary in so far as it refuses the motion of the defenders, that the pursuers' agent should be found liable to the defenders in the expenses of process: Find the pursuers' agent, Mr J. M. Macqueen, S.S.C., liable to the defenders in the expenses of process moved for before the Lord Ordinary, and also in the additional expenses since the date of the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor; quoad ultra, in respect of no appearance for the pursuers, adhere to the interlocutor, and refuse the reclaiming note, and find the pursuers, Elizabeth Wilson or Robertson and her husband John Ivinson Robinson, liable in additional expenses: And remit to the Auditor to tax the account or accounts of expenses now found due, and to report."

J. M. MACQUEEN, S.S.C.—DAVID FORSYTH, S.S.C.—LINDSAY MACKERSEY, W.S.—Agents.

No. 150.

July 16, 1873. Breadalbane's Trustees v. Jamieson, &c.

THE TRUSTEES OF THE FIRST MARQUIS OF BREADALBANE, Pursuers and Real Raisers.—Kinnear.

GEORGE AULDJO JAMIESON (Judicial Factor on the estate of the second Marquis of Breadalbane), Claimant and Defender.—Sol.-Gen. Clark—Balfour—Campion.

THE EARL OF BREADALBANE, Claimant and Defender.—Watson—Adam—Macdonald.

Trust-Settlement—Codicil—Construction.—A truster conveyed his unentailed lands and property, heritable and moveable, to trustees, and directed them, in the third place, for the period of twenty years after his death, to invest and accumulate the whole free rents and proceeds of the trust-estate, and to employ the funds so invested in the purchase of lands. In the fifth place, the truster directed the trustees, at the termination of the twenty years, to settle the estates conveyed by the trust-deed, and the lands purchased by them, in strict entail upon the truster's son, and his heirs-male, whom failing, upon the heirs entitled to succeed to the truster's entailed estate. In a codicil the truster directed that the trustees, "instead of investing the free rents of my unentailed estate in manner before mentioned, shall annually pay over the whole free proceeds of the same to my two daughters, equally between them, while both shall be in e, and to the survivor, and shall continue to do the same as long as both or her of them shall be alive." Held that provisions in the codicil in favour of e truster's daughters were not limited to the period of twenty years after the ster's death. No. 150. July 16, 1873. Breadalbane's Trustees v. Jamieson, &c.

Annuity—Revenue.—Held that annuities granted by the proprietor of heritle and moveable estate were after his death payable out of the rents of the ritage.

SEQUEL of case reported 3 D. 357, 2 D. 731, and 14 S. and D. 309. 2D DIVISION. R.

This action of multiplepoinding was raised in 1834 by the trustees der the settlement of the first Marquis of Breadalbane.

The first Marquis died on 29th March 1834 leaving a widow, a son he second Marquis), and two daughters, one of whom became Duchess Buckingham, and the other Lady Elizabeth Pringle. The Marquis ft a large succession. Besides the entailed estates of Breadalbane he ft large unentailed property and a large sum of money.

By his trust-settlement he conveyed his fee-simple lands and his oveable estate to trustees for, inter alia, the following purposes:— In the first place, for payment of all my just and lawful debts, and eathbed and funeral charges, and any legacies, annuities, or donations I ay give or bequeath to any person or persons by a writing under my nd, with the necessary charges and expenses of executing this trust; hich expenses shall be held to be sufficiently liquidated and ascertained r the signed accounts of the said acting trustees or trustee, without any her proof or document." By the third purpose the truster directed his ustees to accumulate the rents, &c. for twenty years after his death, and rchase land. The fifth purpose of the trust was thus expressed,—"It hereby expressly provided and declared that at the termination of the id twenty years, or as soon after as may be, the said trustees or trustee ting for the time shall be bound and obliged to settle and secure the hole lands, teinds, and other heritages conveyed by me to them, and also ose purchased by them as aforesaid, in strict entail, and to vest the same r disposition, procuratory of resignation, or other legal deed as shall be adsed, to and in favour of the said John Viscount Glenorchy, my son," &c.

A codicil, of date 26th August 1829, bore,—"In virtue of the power reinbefore reserved to alter and innovate these presents I hereby direct at my said trustees, instead of investing the free rents of my unentailed nds and estates in manner before mentioned, shall annually pay over e whole free proceeds of the same to my two daughters, Lady Elizabeth mpbell and Mary Marchioness of Chandos (afterwards Duchess of Buckgham), equally between them, while both shall be in life, and to the rvivor, and shall continue to do the same as long as both or either of em shall be alive; but that always without prejudice to the obligations d provisions granted by me in favour of Mary Countess of Breadalbane, to the obligations contained in the contract of marriage between John scount Glenorchy and Eliza Baillie, his spouse."

By inter vivos deeds he granted annuities in favour of various persons. e Duchess of Buckingham, having claimed and taken legitim, was found have forfeited the provisions in her favour contained in the settlement her father, and her claim to the rents of the unentailed lands, in terms the codicils to his settlement, was repelled by interlocutor of 5th March 40. That forfeiture was found, by interlocutor of 15th January 1841, operate, during the life of the Duchess of Buckingham, in favour of the ustees of the first Marquis.

During the whole period from the commencement of the trust in 1834 the death of the Duchess of Buckingham in 1862, the trustees of the st Marquis paid one-half of the free rents of the unentailed lands to

No. 150.

July 16, 1873.
Breadalbane's Trustees v. Jamieson, &c.

Lady Elizabeth Pringle, and since the Duchess's death they paid the whole of the said free rents to Lady Elizabeth Pringle. To meet the deficiency created by the Duchess having successfully claimed legitim, the trustees during her lifetime drew the rents forfeited by her, and applied them as part of the general fund of the trust-estate, to increase the residue destined for the purchase of land to be entailed. From time to time they made purchases of land, in fulfilment of the purposes of the trust.

In 1873 the judicial factor on the trust-estate of the second Marquis, who died 8th November 1862, claimed,—(1) That the trustees of the first Marquis should make up and exhibit proper accounts of the income of the trust-estate from 15th May 1854 (being the date of expiry of the period of accumulation directed by the trust-settlement) down to 8th November 1862, and that he should be ranked and preferred to the revenue of the trust-estate for the period between these dates, including the half of the rents of the unentailed lands from Whitsunday 1854 to the date of the Duchess of Buckingham's death in 1862. (2) That, in ascertaining the amount of the income to which he is entitled, the annuities bequeathed and granted by the first Marquis should, for the period subsequent to Whitsunday 1854, be debited, not to the revenue, but to the capital of the trust-estate. (3) That in ascertaining the said income there should be credited thereto the whole percentages paid by the life-renters of the unentailed lands in respect of permanent improvements, or other outlays made by the trustees thereupon as aforesaid.

The trustees, in answer, pleaded;—(3) The annuities in question, forming a proper charge against the income of the trust-estate, the judicial factor's claim to have them paid out of capital ought to be repelled. (4) The judicial factor is not entitled to have the whole percentages paid in respect of outlays on permanent improvements charged to income, in respect that a portion thereof represents repayments of capital advanced.

The Lord Ordinary pronounced the following interlocutor:—"Finds that Mr George Auldjo Jamieson, as judicial factor on the estate of the second Marquis of Breadalbane, is not entitled to the one-half of the rents of the unentailed lands left by the truster, the first Marquis of Breadalbane, for the period from Whitsunday 1854 to 8th November 1862; and to that extent repels the claim of the said judicial factor: Finds that the trustees of the first Marquis of Breadalbane are bound to retain the whole of the said rents for the period between Whitsunday 1854 and 28th June 1862, the date of the Duchess of Buckingham's death, as a surrogatum for the sums taken from the capital of the trust-estate, and paid as legitim to the Duchess of Buckingham, and to apply the same accordingly; and to that extent sustains the claim for the Earl of Breadalbane: Repels the second and third claims of the said judicial factor, and decerns: Appoints the cause to be put to the roll with a view to farther procedure, and reserves all questions of expenses." *

* "NOTE.—The Duchess of Buckingham, having claimed and taken legitim, was found to have forfeited the provisions in her favour contained in the settlement of her father, the first Marquis of Breadalbane, and her claim to the rents of her father's unentailed lands, in terms of the codicils to his settlement, was repelled by interlocutor dated 5th March 1840. That forfeiture was found, by interlocutor, dated 15th January 1841, to operate during the life of the Duchess of Buckingham in favour of the trustees under the settlement of the first Marquis. By the two codicils of 30th June 1829 and 26th August 1829 the trustees are directed to pay to the Marquis's two daughters, Lady Elizabeth Pringle and the Duchess of Buckingham, equally between them, and to the survivor, the free rents of his unentailed lands. According to the true construction of these codicils, and of the trust-disposition and settlement, it is, in the

The judicial factor reclaimed. At advising,— No. 150.

LORD BENHOLME.—This is an action of multiplepoinding, which was brought in the year that the first Marquis died, for the purpose of regulating his succession. The action has been the means of deciding various important questions in our law, and the interlocutor that we are now to review presents three questions for determination, and these are of some little importance. July 16, 1873. Breadalbane's Trustees v. Jamieson, &c.

The first Marquis died in 1834. He left a widow, a son (the second Marquis), and two daughters, one of whom became Duchess of Buckingham, and the other Lady Elizabeth Pringle. The Marquis left a large succession. Besides the entailed estates of Breadalbane he left large unentailed property and a large sum of lying money. But various events took place that interfered very much with the original scheme of the Marquis's settlement. I must mention to your Lordships two of the clauses of the settlement upon which the first of the points now before us turns. The fifth purpose of the trust was thus expressed—"It is hereby expressly provided and declared that at the termination of the said twenty years, or as soon after as may be, the said trustees or trustee acting for the time shall be bound and obliged to settle and secure the whole lands, teinds, and other heritages conveyed by me to them, and also those purchased by them as aforesaid, in strict entail, and to vest the same by disposition, procuratory of opinion of the Lord Ordinary, only upon the death of the survivor, Lady Elizabeth Pringle, that the rents of these unentailed lands will become payable to the heirs of entail of the Breadalbane estates called by that trust-deed. The second Marquis of Breadalbane, the first called of these heirs, who died on 8th November 1862, had no right to any part of these rents. One-half of them was payable to Lady Elizabeth Pringle, during the life of her sister, the Duchess of Buckingham, and, on the Duchess's death, Lady Elizabeth Pringle acquired right for her life to the whole of these rents. During the Duchess's life the half of these rents provided to her fell to be retained by the trustees as surrogate for the sums taken from the capital of the trust-estate, and paid to her as legitim, and the proceeds of that half must be invested and applied by the trustees in terms of the first Marquis's trust-settlement.

---

"The Lord Ordinary has on these grounds repelled the claim of the judicial factor on the estate of the second Marquis to the rents of the unentailed lands. But the judicial factor also claims to be ranked and preferred to the other revenue of the trust-estate from Whitsunday 1854 to 8th November 1862. If there had been any such free revenue his claim would not be disputed, but the trustees aver that there was no such free revenue, and that there was, on the contrary, a deficiency. In support of this statement they have lodged their accounts, with reports thereon by the late Mr Mansfield, C.A. Should the judicial factor, notwithstanding these reports, which distinctly state the annual deficiency from 1854 to 1864, insist in his objections in regard to this matter, a remit to an accountant will be necessary.

"2. The Lord Ordinary has been unable to find any provisions in the trust-settlement, in virtue of which he can hold that the annuities granted or bequeathed by the first Marquis must, contrary to the ordinary rule, be debited, not to the revenue, but to the capital of the trust-estate.

"3. The sums expended on permanent improvements on the lands in the hands of the trustees were paid out of the trust-funds, under an arrangement with Lady Elizabeth Pringle, who had right to the rents, that she should pay 7½ per cent per annum for eighteen and a quarter years on the sums so expended, 4 per cent of which was to be accumulated for the purpose of replacing the capital advanced, and the remaining 3½ per cent of which was to be dealt with as interest. This was an act of beneficial management, and within the powers conferred upon the trustees by the trust-settlement. Further, the Lord Ordinary is of opinion that the claim of the judicial factor that the whole 7½ per cent per annum paid by the liferentrix, under the above mentioned arrangement, should be credited to income, is altogether untenable, and that the judicial factor is not entitled to have a larger sum credited than that stated in the trust-accounts."

No. 150.

July 16, 1873.
Breadalbane's Trustees v. Jamieson, &c.

resignation, or other legal deed as shall be advised, to and in favour of the said John Viscount Glenorchy, my son," &c. That settlement was not allowed to take effect, because at a later period the Marquis executed a codicil of date 26th August 1829, and that codicil is thus expressed—"In virtue of the power hereinbefore reserved to alter and innovate these presents I hereby direct that my said trustees, instead of investing the free rents of my unentailed lands and estates in manner before mentioned, shall annually pay over the whole free proceeds of the same to my two daughters, Lady Elizabeth Campbell and Mary Marchioness of Chandos, equally between them, while both shall be in life, and to the survivor, and shall continue to do the same as long as both or either of them shall be alive; but that always without prejudice to the obligations and provisions granted by me in favour of Mary Countess of Breadalbane, or to the obligations contained in the contract of marriage between John Viscount Glenorchy, and Eliza Baillie, his spouse. Now, so far as relates to the unentailed property of the Marquis, this operated a complete alteration of the fifth purpose of the trust; for that fifth purpose directed that after the lapse of twenty years those unentailed lands, together with the produce of the accumulation, should be vested in the heir of entail. But by this codicil that was entirely defeated during the lives of the one or other of his two daughters. They were to enjoy the liferent of these lands during their lives and during the life of the survivor, who was to take the whole upon the death of the predeceaser. Now, these two clauses have given rise to several litigations, both in this Court and in the House of Lords, for the Duchess of Buckingham, who had not in her marriage-settlement given up her right to legitim, chose to demand her legitim, and as her sister, Lady Elizabeth, had discharged her right to legitim by her marriage-contract, the result was that the Duchess of Buckingham got the whole legitim, viz., one-third of the free proceeds of the moveable estate; and in this way she defeated the general intentions of her father, and consequently has been held to have forfeited her right to a liferent of the half of the unentailed property. With regard to that half which she had forfeited it has been finally determined that that forfeiture operated not in favour either of the sister or of any other party except the trustees of the Marquis, who had been deprived of a very large sum of money by the demand of legitim by the Duchess, contrary to the intentions of her father; and she having thus deranged the settlement intended by her father it was held that this half of the liferent of the unentailed lands went as a surrogatum to the trustees of the Marquis, and came in place of the large sum of money which the Duchess chose to take instead of the provisions made to her by her father. Now, the first point decided by the Lord Ordinary is, "that the trustees of the first Marquis of Breadalbane are bound to retain the whole of the said rents for the period between Whitsunday 1854 and 28th June 1862, the date of the Duchess of Buckingham's death, as a surrogatum for the sums taken from the capital of the trust-estate, and paid as legitim to the Duchess of Buckingham, and to apply the same accordingly." It was contended by the judicial factor, who supports the interests of the second Marquis, that these rents belong to him; but the Lord Ordinary finds that the judicial factor "is not entitled to the one-half of the rents of the unentailed lands left by the truster, the first Marquis of Breadalbane, for the period from Whitsunday 1854 to 8th November 1862; and to that extent repels the claim of the said judicial factor." Now, the result of repelling that claim was just to affirm, as the Lord Ordinary goes on to do in the subsequent clause, that instead of this forfeiture operating in favour of the estate of the second Marquis, and in that way in favour of the judicial factor, these forfeited rents were to go as a surrogatum for the large sum of money of which the estate of the first Marquis had been deprived by the choice of the Duchess of Buckingham. That is the first question in this case, and I confess that upon that question, important as it is, I have never been able to see that there is any reasonable doubt, because the codicil, which is later in date than the trust-deed with its fifth purpose, must prevail against that fifth purpose, as indicating a totally different destination of the unentailed lands from that which he had originally intended. And the result is that during the lives of both or of either of those two daughters, the

No. 150.

July 16, 1873.

Breadalbane's Trustees v. Jamieson, &c.

ents of the whole of the unentailed lands which belonged to the Marquis, including an estate which he had purchased but had not taken possession of, must, during the lives of either of these ladies, be paid away from the destination that was originally intended, and the Duchess of Buckingham having died in 1862, from that date her sister became entitled to the whole rents. Now, that is the first question in this case, and I have no doubt that the Lord Ordinary has decided that question rightly. It is just this, that the subsequent codicil must, so far as it goes, alter the destination which the Marquis had intended as to the unentailed rents, one-half of which is left to go to Lady Elizabeth during the life of her sister, and the whole after her sister's death, and the other half during the Duchess's lifetime whilst the forfeiture operated; these rents are to go as a surrogatum, and be applied to the general purposes of the trust, which were liable to be defeated by the claim of the Duchess to her legitim.

The second question which the Lord Ordinary has decided is set forth in the second claim for the judicial factor:—"The claimant claims that in ascertaining the amount of the said income to which he is entitled the annuities bequeathed and granted by the first Marquis shall, for the period subsequent to Whitsunday 1854, be debited not to the revenue, but to the capital of the trust-estate." That seems to raise a pretty general question, viz., whether heritable debts of the nature of annuities are liable to be paid out of the heritable or moveable succession of a testator. The general rule of law, as to the application of which to this case I cannot see any difficulty, is that annuities, being heritable, should be paid out of the rents of the heritable estate. I am not aware that there is any good exception to this rule, but it has been suggested that there are cases, and especially one, to which I shall refer, that seem to throw some doubt upon this general rule. The case is that of Mackintosh v. Mackintosh and Others, in which the House of Lords reversed the judgment of the First Division of the Court here (May 19, 1873, ante, H. of L. 28). The question arose in this way: Mackintosh had executed a contract of marriage which imposed upon his entailed estate an annuity in favour of his widow. He had previously bound himself and his heirs and successors to relieve his entailed estate of La Mancha of all debts and obligations in these terms:—"I oblige myself and my heirs, executors, and representatives whomsoever, to free and relieve my lands of La Mancha of all my debts and obligations." Subsequent to the execution of this entail obligation he had created the burden upon the entailed estate in favour of his wife, who became his widow; and after his death the heir of entail got into controversy with the general representative of Mr Mackintosh, the general representative being of opinion that this burden must remain on the entailed estate, and consequently must burden the rents of the entailed estate as in the hands of the heir of entail, whilst the heir of entail contended that under the obligation that I have read, the general representative was bound to relieve him of that burden. The contention did not go upon the general rule as to the payment of heritable debt in the shape of annuity. I think it went upon the special obligation which the testator here undertook, by which he bound and obliged his heirs, executors, and representatives "to free and relieve my lands of La Mancha of all my debts and obligations." This argument was rendered the more conclusive because the testator had provided the means of clearing off the entailed estate of this burden, for he had rendered it lawful for himself and his heirs of entail to clear it off by purchasing an annuity of an insurance office, in the following words:—"Declaring that it shall be in the option and power of the said James Mackintosh, and his heirs, executors, and successors, to secure the said annuity of £150 and yearly sum of £70 to the said Mary Ann Burn, by purchasing at his and their own expense, from any respectable insurance company to be selected and approved of by her, an annuity payable to the said Mary Ann Burn in the terms before mentioned, and upon the purchase being effected and completed to her satisfaction, and the writs securing the same being delivered to her, she binds herself and the trustees after named, but at the expense of the said James Mackintosh and his foresaids, to discharge and disburden the several subjects before mentioned and described of the provisions secured to her." Here was a very special provision by which the testator had given the means of clearing off the burden, and indicated his intention that whether during his own lifetime the thing was done, for he had obliged himself as well as his heirs, that could be done by just purchasing an annuity, and the widow was to be bound to clear the burden off the entailed estate in consequence of obtaining as a surrogatum this obligation from the insurance company. In these circumstances I cannot help thinking that this was a tolerably clear point when it was duly considered; that the general representatives, as coming in place of the testator himself, were liable to clear off this obligation, and they had the means of doing so provided by the testator himself, viz., by purchasing an annuity from an insurance company to come in place of it. This was a very special case, and from the judgment of Lord Colonsay it is quite clear that the House of Lords considered it to be a specialty based upon the positive obligation to clear off this burden upon the entailed estate. I need not say that there is no such obligation here. There is a general obligation by the trustees to pay the debts and obligations, but there is no such special injunction upon them to clear off any burden upon an entailed estate such as gives a character to that case. In these circumstances, I cannot help thinking that the Lord Ordinary's view of this question is perfectly correct. He says,—"The Lord Ordinary has been unable to find any provisions in the trust-settlement, in virtue of which he can hold that the annuities granted or bequeathed by the first Marquis must, contrary to the ordinary rule, be debited, not to the revenue, but to the capital of the trust-estate."

No. 150.

July 16, 1873.
Breadalbane's Trustees v. Jamieson, &c.

The third point arises in this way, that the trustees advanced to Lady Elizabeth Pringle a considerable sum of money, to be laid out in improving the unentailed lands, and the way in which that money was to be obtained was that her Ladyship should pay 7½ per cent for eighteen and a quarter years. It was calculated, and I believe upon perfectly just grounds, that allowing that 3½ per cent was to answer for the interest of that money, the remaining 4 per cent for eighteen and a quarter years would just be sufficient to clear off and repay the capital, because so many payments of 4 per cent, together with the interest which would be accumulating by the successive payments from year to year, would at the end of that period amount to the capital. That is a very reasonable arrangement, and it brings out in the clearest way that the payment of 4 per cent was in respect of the capital alone, and that the whole interest to which the heir of entail was entitled was the 3½ per cent, which was the true interest of the money. The Lord Ordinary has, I think, decided this point also correctly. The judicial factor claims that the whole 7½ per cent should go to the estate of the second Marquis, that is to say, he claims that the second Marquis's estate should not only draw the interest of the money, but also the whole capital of that advance, for by demanding the whole 7½ per cent he not only gets the interest during that time, but he has at the end of the period obtained payment of the capital too. Now, on this point it is quite plain that the demand of the judicial factor is quite inconsistent with his position, and consequently I agree with the Lord Ordinary's observations.

Lord Cowan.—I concur in the opinion of Lord Benholme on all the three questions which the Court have to decide. The first question is the more material, and as to it I would only add, that in my view the codicil made provision as regards the rents of the unentailed lands in favour of the two ladies and the survivor which must be held to come in place of the provision as to the application of these rents for twenty years declared by the third purpose of the deed. The deed is to be read and construed on the footing of its having contained the codicil provision, and not that for which it is substituted.

Lord Justice-Clerk.—I entirely concur in all that has fallen from Lord Benholme. There are three questions which were mainly argued, the first of them being whether the right to the interests bequeathed by the codicil of 1829 terminated at the end of the twenty years. I am quite clear that it did not, but that it could only terminate at the death of Lady Elizabeth. In regard to the second question, whether the annuities should be capitalised and charged against capital, or charged against income, I am of opinion that it must follow the nature of the right itself, which is a right essentially chargeable upon revenue, and I see no element in this case to lead to an opposite conclusion. No. 150. July 16, 1873 Breadalbane's Trustees v. Jamieson, &c

In regard to the question about the 7½ per cent, the argument seems to me to proceed on an entire fallacy. It was put in a double way. It was said, in the first place, that it is interest, and therefore must be considered as income, or there must be an allowance given. Now, it is not interest at all. It is a payment by instalments of interest and capital, and the demand to have that allowance made, as if it were the income of the estate, is out of the question. The other argument was that the trustees had no power to make advances at 3½ per cent. But it was an advantageous arrangement for the estate, and I think the trustees had ample power. Therefore, without any further observation, I can only express my concurrence in what Lord Benholme has stated. We adhere to the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor.

LORD NEAVES absent.

THE COURT adhered.

DAVIDSON & SYME, W.S.—J. J. & A. FORMAN, W.S.—ADAM, KIRK, & ROBERTSON, W.S. —Agents.

SIR JAMES COLQUHOUN, Bart., Condescender.—Watson—Hall.
REV. JOHN LAWRIE FOGO, Objector.—Millar—Kinnear.

No. 151. July 18, 1873 Colquhoun v. Fogo.

Teinds—Valuation and Approbation—Prescription—Derelinquishment—Surrender.—1. For more than forty years payments of stipend in excess of subvaluations of teinds had been made under final decrees of locality. Held that the minister had acquired a prescriptive right to have these payments continued, which was not affected by a subsequent decree of approbation.

2. For more than forty years payments of stipend in excess of the value of teinds fixed by previous subvaluation and decree of approbation had been made under a decree of locality. Held that the minister had not acquired right to have these payments continued.

3. Payments of stipend in excess of a subvaluation of teinds had been made for more than forty years under a final decree of locality, and the subvaluation had been abandoned, and a decree of valuation of the High Court obtained. Held (dub. Lord Deas) that the decree of the High Court fixed the amount of the teind, and that the minister had no right to have overpayments continued out of stock.

4. Where a minister had acquired a right to overpayments of teind in excess of the value of teinds fixed by decrees of approbation, held that the heritor could not surrender his teinds.

Observations on the case of Maderty, 9th July 1817, F. C.

Ante, vol. vi. 105.

1ST DIVISION Lord Gifford. Ld. Mackenzie Teind Clerk.

In 1815 the minister of the parish of Row obtained an augmentation of stipend, which was modified at 15 chalders, and £10 for communion elements.

In the locality Sir James Colquhoun of Luss, one of the heritors, lodged a condescendence and surrender of the teinds of his lands as valued at various times. The minister, the Rev. John Lawrie Fogo, objected to the surrender, in so far as regarded the lands of Faslane, Durling, Gairlochhead, Stucknaduff, Auchinvennelwilling, East Kilbride, and West Kilbride, on the ground that he had acquired a prescriptive right to certain overpayments of stipend in excess of the valuations. The teinds of the whole of these lands (which at that time belonged to the parish of Cardross) were valued by subcommissioners in 1629 and 1630, but certain lands stood in a different position in regard to the overpayments.

1. As regarded the lands of (1) Faslane, (2) Stucknaduff, (3) Auchinvennelwilling, and (4) West Kilbride,—

No. 151.

July 18, 1873. Colquhoun v. Fogo.

There were subvaluations of the teinds of these lands in 1630, but in a final locality in 1748 these subvaluations were disregarded, and the teinds were localled on for stipend in excess of the valued teind. For forty years thereafter stipend was paid in conformity with this decree.

Thereafter approbations were obtained of the subvaluations (dated respectively in 1794, 1813, 1800, and 1813).

The minister maintained, in regard to these lands, that his prescriptive right under the decree of locality was not affected by the subsequent approbation.

2. As regarded the lands of (5) East Kilbride, (6) Durling,—

There were subvaluations of these lands in 1630. As in the former case, overpayments were made under the decree of locality of 1748, and in so far they were in the same position as the lands above mentioned; but other overpayments had been made for forty years under a final decree of locality in 1803, which was subsequent to the decrees of approbation (dated respectively 1793 and 1794).

The minister maintained that he had a prescriptive right to these overpayments also.

3. As regarded (7) the lands of Gairlochhead,—

There was a subvaluation of Gairlochhead in 1630, but it was never acted on, and under the decree of locality in 1748 payments of stipend greatly in excess of the subvaluation were made, and were continued down to a recent period. The proprietor of Gairlochhead had raised a summons, concluding alternatively for approbation of the subvaluation of 1630 or for a valuation by the High Court, and in 1794 he obtained a decree of valuation by the High Court.

The minister maintained that he had a prescriptive right to payments of stipend from these lands in excess of the valuation by the High Court.

A further question arose as to the payments out of East and West Kilbride. The minister maintained that, as the stipend had been allocated on these two lands and paid out of them under the localities of 1748 and 1803, the teinds of these lands were still liable for the full amount then paid, and that the lands of Middle Kilbride (the surrender of which he was prepared to accept) were not liable for any part thereof. The teind of East and West Kilbride, as valued in the subvaluation, was paid to the minister of Cardross, but payments in excess had been made to the minister of Row under the localities of 1748 and 1803. It appeared, however, from the documents produced that the lands of Kilbrides, East, West, and Middle, were a 9 merk land, and had all been valued in a subvaluation in 1630 at 9 bolls meal and 1 merk for each merk land. The proprietors of East and West Kilbride in 1793 and 1813 had carried through approbations of the subvaluation, and in doing so had divided the 9 bolls meal and 9 merks between these two lands, ignoring Middle Kilbride. A subsequent approbation of the subvaluation of all the Kilbrides was carried through in 1839, when they were all then valued at 9 bolls meal and 10s. money sterling, but this approbation was afterwards reduced at the instance of the minister. Sir James Colquhoun in 1870 had also obtained a separate High Court valuation of Middle Kilbride or Balemenoch. It was, however, clear, from the rentals and titles produced that all these lands had been valued, and had paid the stipend in equal proportions.

The Lord Ordinary (Gifford) pronounced the following interlocutors:—

"Edinburgh, 4th July 1871.—The Lord Ordinary having heard parties' procurators, and having considered the condescendence and surrender for Sir James Colquhoun of Luss, Bart., and the answers thereto for the Reverend John Lawrie Fogo, minister of Row, Nos. 65 and 66 of process, with the old localities and proceedings, Finds that, for a period greatly

No. 151.

July 18, 1873.
Colquhoun v. Fogo.

ceeding forty years, the condescender, the said Sir James Colquhoun, d his predecessors and authors, have, under final decrees of locality, id to the successive ministers of the parish of Row amounts of stipend nsiderably exceeding the amount of the value of the teinds contained the decrees of valuation held by the said Sir James Colquhoun and his edecessors and authors, and now proposed to be surrendered: Finds in int of law that the minister of Row for himself, and his successors in ice, has by such prescriptive overpayments acquired a right to insist at said payments shall be continued, notwithstanding the decrees of luation: Finds that the said Sir James Colquhoun is not entitled, by rrendering his teinds, to free himself from the obligation to continue to ake the overpayments in the same way as has been done during the pre-iptive period, and decerns: And before further answer appoints the cause be enrolled, with the view of ascertaining the precise amount of the pre-iptive overpayments, reserving meantime all questions of expenses." *

---

* "NOTE.—It was quite fairly and candidly admitted by the counsel for Sir mes Colquhoun that his object in insisting in a surrender, in terms of his con-scendence and surrender, No. 65 of process, was to free himself in future from overpayments of stipend, and that notwithstanding that such overpayments had en made under final decrees of locality for a period greatly exceeding forty years.

"It was not disputed that such overpayments had been made for more than ty years, although their precise amount was disputed, and thus the question law was fairly raised whether Sir James Colquhoun, by now surrendering the act amount of his valuations, can now get rid of such overpayments in all ne coming.

"There was a subordinate question, whether, even supposing that the over-yments are still to continue, Sir James Colquhoun may still notwithstanding rrender his valued teind, subject to the continuance of the overpayments. is question, however, is of little importance, being rather a question of form an of substance, and at most only affecting Sir James' liability for a share of e expenses of future localities.

"The Lord Ordinary is of opinion that, by reason of the prescriptive over-yments under final decrees of locality, the minister has acquired a right thereto, d that the heritor is not entitled to shake himself free of his liability by sur-ndering the mere amount of his valued teind. The Lord Ordinary has thought better to decide this important point of law by substantive findings rather an by sustaining the surrender under a declaration or qualification. This urse is the more expedient, as the exact amount of the prescriptive overpay-nts is in dispute.

"It is now finally fixed that a decree of valuation of the High Court cannot derelinquished even by prescriptive overpayment, but the precise effect of ch overpayments has perhaps not been fully determined by the decided cases. ne leading cases are:—Locality of Fearn (Munro), Nov. 21, 1810, F. C. 38; axwell v. Blair (Eastwood Locality), July 3, 1816, F. C. 182; Locality of aderty (Moray), July 9, 1817, F. C. 371. Reference may also be made, as aring upon the question of surrender, to Connell, i. 521, and sub, and cases oted; Buchanan on Teinds, p. 216 and sub; Locality of Lamington, May 24, 98, F. C.; Tawse v. Earl of Glasgow (Paisley Locality), June 20, 1821, Shaw, Cases, 8; Cuthbert v. Waldie (Ednam Parish), Nov. 24, 1824, Shaw, T. C. ; Baird v. Minister of Polmont, July 3, 1832, 10 Shaw, 752; Richmond v. mmon Agent in Orwell, March 8, 1866, 4 M. 554.

"It appears to the Lord Ordinary to be finally decided by the case of Maderty, ove cited, that a minister may acquire a right to overpayments by prescription, twithstanding a High Court decree of valuation. This case was very fully gued, and decided upon informations to the Court, and it seems to determine e substantial question raised in the present case. The Lord Ordinary feels nself bound by this decision, which he does not think is inconsistent with the evious cases of Fearn and Maxwell, and which he cannot hold to be overruled

No. 151.

July 18, 1873. Colquhoun v. Fogo.

"Edinburgh, 24th July 1872.—The Lord Ordinary having heard parties' procurators on the condescendence and surrender by Sir James Colquhoun, and answers thereto for the minister, with special reference to the teinds of the lands of Kilbrides, finds that the subvaluation of the teinds of the lands of Kilbrides, dated 7th January 1629, approved of by final decrees of approbation dated 20th February 1793 and 10th March 1813, by the case of Baird v. Minister of Polmont. No doubt in this last case Lord Moncreiff remarks upon the case of Maderty as a special case, and the ground of the decision in Polmont case was that the decree of locality on which the alleged overpayments proceeded had been tempestive reduced, so that the overpayments were really without a title.

---

"In the present case the old decrees of locality, in virtue of which the prescriptive payments have been made, have never been reduced, and it is impossible to reduce them, because they are long ago protected by prescription. It is vain to say, as was ingeniously urged by the counsel for Sir James Colquhoun, that every new augmentation operates eo ipso as a decree of reduction of all the old localities, however long they may have stood, or although they have been pronounced in litigated causes. This is not so. The old localities and res judicatæ therein are all final, either as res judicatæ, or as decrees unchallengeable after the prescriptive period, and all that can be settled in such locality is how the augmentation is to be localled, otherwise there would be no finality at all in teind causes. It is quite fixed that judgments in one locality are final in all subsequent ones, and there is no different rule for decrees protected by prescription.

"The minister's right to prescriptive overpayment seems also to rest on sound reason. His title to the benefice, and his decree in the locality, constitute a good title on which to found prescription, and where the heritor under such a title pays the amount decerned for forty years without challenge, there seems no ground for allowing him after that to open it up. He is barred, both by the positive prescription in respect of possession by the minister, and by the negative prescription which cuts off the heritor's right, to challenge the old decree. The decree of valuation will protect the heritor from all future augmentations, for it has not been derelinquished; but it will not protect him from the law of prescription, which prevents him from challenging a decree which he has implemented without objection for more than forty years.

"As to the subordinate question, or question of form, the Lord Ordinary is inclined to think that, notwithstanding the prescriptive overpayment, the heritor may still surrender, provided it is made clear that, besides the surrendered teind, the heritor is still to pay the fixed and prescriptive overpayment. In this way the Lord Ordinary reconciles the cases of Fearn and Maxwell with that of Maderty, but the overpayments must be fixed, and with this view the Lord Ordinary has appointed the case to be enrolled.

"The Lord Ordinary was referred to an unreported decision of Lord Barcaple in the case of Auchterlony, 22d December 1866, which was acquiesced in, and in which Lord Barcaple refused to sustain a surrender where there had been overpayments. In that case, however, it was only a portion of the valued teind which was proposed to be surrendered, and there had been no apportionment fixing its amount. This by itself would support Lord Barcaple's judgment, and his note shews that it was rather the form of the surrender than its substance which was considered objectionable.

"Surrenders were introduced by the Court in the case of Lamington,—see Connell, i., 521. Their primary object was to save heritors from overpayments in a new locality by reason of increased value of victual, when the valuation of the teinds was in money. Their practical effect was to save the heritors, whose payment was fixed and unalterable, from taking part in localities, and from the expenses of a process in which he had no interest. If, in the present case, Sir James' constant payment is fixed and unalterable, there seems nothing in principle to prevent him from giving up that payment so as to save him from the trouble and expense of taking part in future processes of locality."

No. 151.

July 18, 1873.
Colquhoun v. Fogo.

must be held to apply only to the teinds of the lands of Easter Kilbride, and to the teinds of the lands of Wester Kilbride, and not to the teinds of the lands of Middle Kilbride: Finds that the teinds of the lands of Middle Kilbride have been separately valued by decree of valuation dated 3d June 1870: Finds that the amount of the valued teinds of Easter Kilbride and of Wester Kilbride, as contained in the said subvaluation and decrees of approbation, has always been paid by the proprietors of these lands to the minister of Cardross, under the original arrangement, when the present parish of Row was disjoined therefrom: Finds that, in considering and fixing the overpayments to which the minister of Row is entitled by reason of prescriptive possession thereof, the payments of the valued teind to the minister of Cardross must be held to have been solely in respect of the lands of Easter Kilbride and Wester Kilbride, to the teinds of which lands alone the final decrees of approbation apply; and finds that all sums paid to the minister of Row for the full prescriptive period, in respect of the lands of Easter Kilbride, Wester Kilbride, or Middle Kilbride, must be held to be overpayments over and above the valued teinds of Easter Kilbride and Wester Kilbride; and finds that the said payments made to the minister of Row for the full prescriptive period must continue to be paid without deducting therefrom any part of the valued teind paid during the same period to the minister of Cardross; and, with these findings, appoints the case to be enrolled, that the amount of the prescriptive overpayments may be fixed and adjusted, reserving all questions of expenses." *

* "NOTE.—The condescendence and surrender by Sir James Colquhoun of Luss, Bart., and the answers thereto for the minister of Row, raise a great many questions of much difficulty, both in point of principle and in matters of detail.

"The Lord Ordinary, by his interlocutor of 4th July 1871, disposed of the chief question of principle as to which the parties were at issue. He found that an heritor who, notwithstanding old decrees of valuation, has for forty years and upwards, under final localities, paid more than the amount of the valued teind, is bound to continue such overpayments, although the decrees of valuation are not thereby derelinquished, and that such heritor cannot get quit of such overpayments merely by surrendering his valued teind. This judgment has in the meanwhile been acquiesced in, and parties were further heard upon the questions of details as to what the amounts of the prescriptive overpayments really were.

"There are a great many lands, and the facts as to some of them are rather intricate, but ultimately both parties explained to the Lord Ordinary that they thought they could adjust all mere questions of amount, excepting as to the lands of Kilbrides, of which there are three parcels, Easter Kilbride, Wester Kilbride, and Middle Kilbride. The ascertainment of the amount of overpayments for these lands depends upon questions of principle, which were argued before the Lord Ordinary, and he has now endeavoured to dispose thereof.

"The question chiefly turns upon the effect of the old subvaluation of 1629, as explained or affected by the two decrees of approbation thereof of 1793 and 1813. It may be quite true that the subvaluation of 1629 was originally intended to apply to the whole three Kilbrides, and not merely to two of them. The Lord Ordinary is of opinion, however, that it is too late now to maintain this, but that it is finally fixed by the two decrees of approbation of 1793 and 1813, both of which are now unchallengeable, that the old subvaluation only applies to Easter and Wester Kilbride, and thus leaves the teinds of Middle Kilbride unvalued. This conclusion is confirmed, if confirmation were necessary, by the fact that in 1870 Sir James Colquhoun led before the High Court a new and independent valuation of the teinds of Middle Kilbride.

"The incidence and application of the different valuations being thus fixed, the next question is, from the teinds of what lands was stipend paid to the minister of Cardross? Now, the stipend paid to the minister of Cardross for

No. 151.

July 18, 1873. Colquhoun v. Fogo.

On 19th March 1873 the Lord Ordinary (Mackenzie) pronounced the following interlocutor:—"Sustains the surrender in so far as concerns the teinds, parsonage and vicarage, of the following lands, viz. Faslane, Deorling, East Kilbride, Wester Kilbride, Auchenvennelvoulin, and Middle Kilbride or Ballemeanoch, amounting in whole to 115 bolls 2 firlots 1 peck 2 lippies and 13-15ths of a lippy of meal, at 9 stones per boll, 25 bolls 2 firlots 3 pecks 2 lippies and 1-5th of a lippy bear, and £89, 18s. 2⅙d. sterling, under deduction of the teind or stipend of the said lands of Faslane, Deorling, Auchenvennelvoulin, and Easter and Wester Kilbrides, payable to the minister of Cardross, amounting in whole to 72 bolls 2 pecks and 2 lippies of meal, and 3 bolls 1 firlot of bear, and £3, 7s. 2$\frac{8}{12}$d. sterling, leaving as the amount of the surrendered teinds 43 bolls 1 firlot 3 pecks and 13-15ths of a lippy of meal, 22 bolls 1 firlot 3 pecks 2 lippies and 1-5th of a lippy of bear, and £86, 10s. 11½d. sterling of money: Also sustains the surrender of the teinds of the said lands of Gairlochhead and Stucknaduff, but without prejudice in any respect to, and under reservation of, the prescriptive right of the minister of Row to a stipend of 6 bolls of meal and 5s. 1$\frac{6}{12}$d. sterling of money out of Gairlochhead, and 5 bolls of meal and 7s. 5d. sterling out of Stucknaduff, which stipend is hereby reserved entire to him: Further, finds and declares that the surrender of the said teinds of Faslane, Deorling, East Kilbride, Wester Kilbride, Auchenvennelvoulin, and Ballecknock is not to prejudice or in any way affect the prescriptive right of the minister of Row to a stipend in excess of what is paid to the minister of Cardross, of 8s. 4d. sterling out of Faslane, 1 firlot of meal and 7s. 9$\frac{6}{12}$d. out of Deorling, 3 firlots 3 pecks and 1 lippy and 4-5ths of a lippy of meal and 4s. 2d. sterling out of East Kilbride, 2 bolls 1 firlot and 1 lippy and 8s. 11$\frac{9}{12}$d. sterling out of West Kilbride, amounting in all to 3 bolls 1 firlot 3 pecks 2 lippies and 4-5ths of a lippy of meal, whereof 1 boll 1 firlot 1 peck 2 lippies and 4-5ths of a more than a century is the exact amount, even to a fraction, of the valued teind contained in the subvaluation and two decrees of approbation. The Lord Ordinary thinks that the inference is irresistible, that it was the valued teinds of the lands of Easter and Wester Kilbrides that have always been paid, and are now payable to the minister of Cardross. It would be a very forced and violent conclusion to hold that although the exact valuation is paid, it is not paid in respect of the teinds valued, but in respect of certain other teinds which are not valued. Possibly this might be made out by evidence, but certainly there is every presumption against it, and not a particle of evidence was adduced or referred to by Sir James. The Lord Ordinary was not asked to grant any proof, and indeed proof could hardly be otherwise than by documents, and the parties had none to produce. Viewing the matter as one of presumption, the Lord Ordinary can come to no other conclusion than that the valued teind paid in Cardross was the valued teind of Easter and Wester Kilbrides, and that no part of it was the unvalued teind of Middle Kilbride.

---

"It follows that all the prescriptive payments made in Row, in respect of Easter and Wester Kilbrides, are overpayments which must continue to be made to the exact amount fixed by prescription.

"In this view, there is no question about Middle Kilbride. The teind thereof is fixed by the valuation of 1870, and the whole amount of that valuation is now to be unconditionally surrendered, but no deduction can be made therefrom in respect of the payments made in Cardross, for these payments were made not for Middle Kilbride at all, but for Easter and Wester Kilbride alone.

"In like manner the exact overpayments for Easter and Wester Kilbride must be fixed upon the evidence, and, as prescriptive overpayments, must continue to be made notwithstanding the old valuations.

"The Lord Ordinary trusts the parties will now by joint minute apply the above findings, and exhaust the matters of detail connected with the surrender."

No. 151.

July 18, 1873
Colquhoun v. Fogo.

lippy at 8 stones per boll, the rest being 9 stones, and £1, 9s. $3\frac{3}{4}$d. sterling money: Remits to the clerk to prepare a rectified locality and state of arrears of stipend," &c.

Sir James Colquhoun reclaimed, and argued;—Overpayments could only be sustained when they were made under a locality dated prior to the approbation of a subvaluation. The effect of that was, as in Maderty, to make these payments come out of surplus teind, and not out of stock, which would be the case if the overpayments out of Durling and East Kilbride under the locality of 1803 were sustained. In a question between heritors as to localling on teinds, the minister had no interest; he was only entitled to get his stipend, not to insist upon the stipend coming out of a particular heritor's teind, as long as there was free teind available. He could not insist on payments out of stock being continued, merely because these payments had gone on for upwards of forty years, especially when there was teind still to local on. By taking these payments out of stock he managed to leave more free teind available for subsequent augmentation.

The lands of Gairlochhead were in a different position. The teinds were valued by a valuation of the High Court, not by an approbation of a subvaluation, and a valuation of the High Court fixed finally the amount of the teind. A decree of the High Court never could be derelinquished. The payments made in excess of the valuation must have been out of stock, and could not be continued; and the valuation having finally fixed the amount of the teind, it was impossible here, as in the case of Maderty, to hold that the overpayments were out of surplus teind.

As regarded the question of the three Kilbrides, the documents produced shewed clearly that the stipend had really been paid out of all three lands in point of fact, and that was all the heritor had to make out to succeed in his contention. No mistakes in the approbations in 1793 and 1813 could affect the matter of fact.

Finally, the surrender as proposed, including overpayments, was quite competent, and the minute as tendered ought to be sustained.[1]

LORD PRESIDENT.—Three interlocutors of the Lord Ordinary on Teinds are brought under review by this reclaiming note. The first is dated 4th July 1871, and in it Lord Gifford "finds that for a period greatly exceeding forty years the condescender, the said Sir James Colquhoun, and his predecessors and authors, have, under final decrees of locality, paid to the successive ministers of the parish of Row amounts of stipend considerably exceeding the amount of the value of the teinds contained in the decrees of valuation held by the said Sir James Colquhoun and his predecessors and authors, and now proposed to be surrendered: Finds in point of law that the minister of Row, for himself, and his successors in office, has by such prescriptive overpayments acquired a right to insist that said payments shall be continued, notwithstanding the decrees of valuation: Finds that the said Sir James Colquhoun is not entitled by sur-

[1] Authorities.—Locality of Fearn (Munro), Nov. 21, 1810, F. C. 38; Maxwell v. Blair (Eastwood Locality), July 3, 1816, F. C. 182; Locality of Maderty (Moray), July 9, 1817, F. C. 371; Locality of Lamington, Jan. 24, 1798, F. C.; Tawse v. Earl of Glasgow (Locality of Paisley), June 20, 1821, Shaw's T. C. 8; Cuthbert v. Waldie (Ednam), Nov. 24, 1824, Shaw's T. C. 75; Baird v. Minister of Polmont, July 3, 1832, 10 S. 752; Richmond v. Common Agent in Orwell, March 8, 1866, ante, vol. iv. 554; Robertson v. Macknight (Locality of Fettercairn), Feb. 6, 1873, supra, p. 389; Chisholm-Batten v. Cameron, Jan. 16, 1873, supra, p. 292; Forbes on Teinds, 863; Connell, i. 521, et sub.; Buchanan, p. 216, et sub.

No. 151.

July 18, 1873. Colquhoun v. Fogo.

rendering his teinds to free himself from the obligation to continue to make the overpayments in the same way as has been done during the prescriptive period, and decerns: And before further answer appoints the cause to be enrolled with the view of ascertaining the precise amount of the prescriptive overpayments, reserving meantime all questions of expenses." The Lord Ordinary has not specified to what particular lands these findings apply, but we find them in a subsequent interlocutor of Lord Mackenzie, dated 19th March 1873, and in a minute for Sir James Colquhoun in page 14 of the reclaiming note. It appears there are seven portions of lands to which the findings relate, viz.. Faslane, Durling, Gairlochhead, Stucknaduff, Auchinvennelwilling, East Kilbride, and West Kilbride. These lands are not all in the same position, Faslane, Stucknaduff, Auchenvennelwilling, and West Kilbride, are all similarly situated, that is, the valuations of these lands were subvaluations by the subcommissioners in 1630, which were afterwards approved by decrees of approbation in the High Court 1794, 1800, and 1813, but payments in excess of the subvaluations had been made under a final decree of locality in 1748, for a period beyond the years of prescription, before the approbations were carried through. The subvaluations were not acted upon, but disregarded, and if dereliction had been pleaded in the processes of approbation that plea must have been successful. It appears to me that, as regards these lands, the case of Maderty, which has been referred to both by the Lord Ordinary and in argument, is a direct authority in point, and we have no choice but to give effect to that decision.

The lands of Durling and East Kilbride stand in the same position as regards overpayments made under the final decree of locality in 1748, and if there had been no other locality they would have fallen to be dealt with in the same way. It so happens, however, that part of the overpayments from these lands was made under a final decree of locality in 1803, and although that makes no difference as regards the other lands, it does as regards Durling and East Kilbride. The decree of approbation of subvaluation of Durling was pronounced in 1794, and that of East Kilbride in 1793. The overpayments made under the decree of locality in 1803 being necessarily subsequent to these dates, the case of Maderty is not directly applicable, because the overpayments there were under a decree of locality long antecedent to the decree of approbation. I am of opinion that while the authority of that case does not apply to lands which were localled on under the decree of locality of 1803, no more can the principle of the decision be held to apply. A final decree of locality pronounced after and in the face of a subvaluation shews the true amount of the teind, and a decree of approbation following after the period of prescription must fix the value at that amount. That was the case of Maderty, but there can be no reason for saying, that, after the value of the teind is fixed by a final decree of approbation, the minister can insist upon overpayments being made to him, not out of teind but out of stock, because a final decree of locality of date later than the decree of approbation has burdened him with such overpayments, and these overpayments have been made for more than forty years. I am therefore of opinion that the small overpayments of 1 firlot meal and 7s. 9d. and 5-12ths of a penny from Durling, and 3 firlots 3 pecks and 4-5ths of a lippy and 4s. 2d. from East Kilbride, should not be continued, and to that extent I differ from the interlocutor of 4th July 1871.

There remains the case of Gairlochhead, which is in a different position from any of the others. There was a subvaluation of Gairlochhead, but it was never approved of, and has been completely derelinquished, and is entirely out of the case. Certain payments of stipend have been made from these lands under the decree of locality in 1748 greatly in excess of the subvaluation, and these payments have been continued up to the present day. But there was in this case a decree of valuation by the High Court in 1794, not a decree of approbation, and it is contended that a decree of valuation by the High Court never can be derelinquished, that it fixes, absolutely, the amount of the teind, and no overpayments of stipend afterwards can be allowed in excess of it. The Lord Ordinary seems to be of opinion that a decree of valuation by the High Court stands in the same position as a decree of approbation of subvaluation, because he states

No. 151.

July 18, 1873.

Colquhoun v. Fogo.

in his note—"It appears to the Lord Ordinary to be finally decided by the case of Maderty, above cited, that a minister may acquire a right to overpayments by prescription, notwithstanding a High Court decree of valuation."

The case of Maderty does not decide that. In that case the teinds of Ballyclone were surrendered, or proposed to be surrendered, by the heritor as of the value shewn in a subvaluation in 1629, and an approbation thereof by the High Court in 1760. The common agent objected, on the ground that the subvaluation had not been acted upon, and that the heritor had, by a decree of locality in 1650, been localled on for a greater stipend than was contained in the subvaluation, and had paid without challenge. In these circumstances, if Lord Ordinary Robertson's interlocutor had been a final interlocutor, there would have been something to be said for the Lord Ordinary's view here, because Lord Robertson found that the decree of the High Commission of 1760 could not be challenged on account of overpayments of stipend alleged to have been made prior to its date, and that it could not be derelinquished by any overpayments; but then, he added, "although when overpayments of stipend have been made, and continued during the years of the long prescription, the minister will have right to such surplus payment in time coming." That looks very much as if Lord Robertson intended to hold that there might be overpayments fortified by prescription, although a High Court valuation had been obtained. But that was not the view of the Court in the final judgment. They found that the subvaluation had never been acted upon, and, on the contrary, that a decree of locality had been pronounced in 1650, whereby the teinds of Ballyclone were rated higher than in the subvaluation, and that the heritor had continued to pay stipend according to that locality down to 1760, when he obtained approbation of the subvaluation by the High Court in absence. The interlocutor then proceeds:—"Find that by the possession following on the decreet of 1650 the minister acquired a prescriptive right to the surplus teind beyond the subvaluation 1629, and that the approbation 1760 must be limited and qualified by said prescriptive right, and that the minister has right to the teinds as modified to him by decreet 1650, without prejudice to the valuation in other respects; and find that this seems to have been the understanding of Abercairney himself, who, from the year 1760 downwards, has continued to pay stipend according to the decreet 1650, and not according to the subvaluation 1629."

It is obvious that the view of the Court was, that the amount of teind was to be taken, not as it appeared in the subvaluation, but as it appeared in the final decree of locality in 1650, and the subvaluation could only be approved on the footing of the amount of teind fixed, not by the subvaluation, but by the final decree of locality. The Court thus avoided giving decree for payment out of stock; the payments were to be out of teind, and the teind was to be held to be of a certain fixed amount. That is not the case here; we have a decree of valuation of the High Court in 1794, and that is in a very different position in many respects from an approbation of a subvaluation. First, I would observe, the amount of the teind is not necessarily the same at all times, and unless there be a valuation, the amount will vary according to the value and produce of the land at the time, until a valuation be obtained. Where there is valuation the teind is generally taken as one-fifth part of the rent, if the lands be let, but after decree of valuation has been obtained there is no longer room for inquiry; the amount is then fixed, and all increase or decrease necessarily stopped. Subvaluations, again, which are reports of subcommissioners appointed by the High Commission, required to be ratified and approved by the High Commission. These subcommissions were first appointed in or about 1628, and continued at intervals from that time, valuing teind and issuing reports until 1660, after which time no subcommissions were appointed or subvaluations made. These subvaluations, although effectual when approved of by the High Court, are not effectual if not acted upon. If there be contrary actings for a certain period they are lost, and cease to have any effect. Decrees of valuation of the High Court are in a very different position; it was not necessary to obtain them at a particular date in the 17th century; they can be obtained at any time, and indeed cannot be refused to a heritor, but of course the teind is valued as at the date when the process is brought, and according to the value at that time. An old valuation is better, of course, but still every heritor is entitled to get a valuation; he may get it whenever he chooses to ask for it, and when he has once obtained it, it cannot be derelinquished; no amount of overpayments will put an end to such a valuation. What is proposed here is that payments in excess of teind as fixed by a decree of valuation of the High Court should be continued, because such overpayments have been made for a period beyond the period of prescription. There are two points to be considered in connection with this contention—(1) The payments before the High Court valuation, but after the subvaluation, which was derelinquished, were made in good faith, and cannot now be gone on. They were made on the supposition that the teinds had never been valued. (2) As regards the payments after the High Court valuation, it is impossible to resist the conclusion that so far as they were in excess of teind they were out of stock. That cannot be continued. The case of Maderty was decided on the footing that the overpayments were out of teind, and on no other ground, so it is no authority for such a proposition. I am accordingly of opinion that the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor of 4th July 1871 is erroneous, in so far as it is intended to apply to the lands of Gairlochhead.

No. 151.

July 18, 1873. Colquhoun v. Fogo.

The second interlocutor under review is that of 24th July 1872, also pronounced by Lord Gifford. This interlocutor applies to a wholly different matter. The Lord Ordinary "finds that the subvaluation of the teinds of the lands of Kilbrides, dated 7th January 1629, approved of by final decrees of approbation dated 20th February 1793 and 10th March 1813, must be held to apply only to the teinds of the lands of Easter Kilbride, and to the teinds of the lands of Wester Kilbride, and not to the teinds of the lands of Middle Kilbride." Then he finds further, "that the amount of the valued teinds of Easter Kilbride and of Wester Kilbride, as contained in the said subvaluation and decrees of approbation, has always been paid by the proprietors of these lands to the minister of Cardross, under the original arrangement, when the present parish of Row was disjoined therefrom: Finds that, in considering and fixing the overpayments to which the minister of Row is entitled by reason of prescriptive possession thereof, the payments of the valued teind to the minister of Cardross must be held to have been solely in respect of the lands of Easter Kilbride and Wester Kilbride, to the teinds of which lands alone the final decrees of approbation apply; and finds that all sums paid to the minister of Row for the full prescriptive period, in respect of the lands of Easter Kilbride, Wester Kilbride, or Middle Kilbride, must be held to be overpayments over and above the valued teinds of Easter Kilbride and Wester Kilbride; and finds that the said payments made to the minister of Row for the full prescriptive period must continue to be paid without deducting therefrom any part of the valued teind paid during the same period to the minister of Cardross."

The history of these lands is certainly peculiar; the subvaluation of the lands is stated in this way: "And for the parsonage teyndis of the saidis landis of Kilbryddis 9 bollis meill with ane merk also for the merkland thairof of viccarage." That is understood to mean, and does mean, that the 9 bolls are payable from the whole lands, and one merk is payable from each merkland; and we see from the titles that the whole lands of Kilbride, East, West, and Middle, are a 9 merkland, so that the value of the teind of the whole three lands, according to the subvaluation, is 9 bolls meal, and 9 merks money, being 1 boll and 1 merk on each merkland. It appears, therefore, from the subvaluation by the subcommissioners that the Lord Ordinary is wrong in his finding. But then the difficulty arises, which seems to have influenced his Lordship, namely, that a mistake was made. One of the Kilbrides—East Kilbride—in 1793 belonged to Herbert Buchanan of Arden, and at the same period West Kilbride belonged to Andrew Buchanan of Ardenconnel. Herbert Buchanan of Arden, in carrying through an approbation of the subvaluation as regarded his lands of East Kilbride, proceeded on the supposition that East Kilbride was one-half of the whole Kilbrides valued in the subvaluation, and libelled his summons accordingly. In 1813 the proprietor of West Kilbride fell into the same mistake, and stated that the teind of his lands was 4½ bolls meal and "one merk for ilk merk thereof

No. 151.

July 18, 1873.
Colquhoun v. Fogo.

of vicarage;" whereas in point of fact the subvaluation really put only 3 bolls of meal on West Kilbride and one merk for each merkland. Undoubtedly this valuation went on the principle of dividing the whole payments equally between these two parcels of land. But that is not conclusive of the question. The question is, whether in point of fact the payments to the minister of Cardross were made for two Kilbrides or for all three. The mistake made cannot be taken into account when there are facts to decide the point. Is the Lord Ordinary right in finding that the "payments of the valued teind to the minister of Cardross must be held to have been solely in respect of the lands of Easter and Wester Kilbride?" In order to ascertain whether he is or not it is necessary to look at the locality of Cardross and the other documents before us. These throw some light upon the matter. First, we have the scheme of rental of the parish of Row in 1748, which shews the payments in use to be made to the minister of Cardross. This is necessary, because it shews the value of the lands at that time. From it we find that the lands of West Kilbride pay to the minister of Cardross 3 bolls meal and £2 money (Scots), and the lands of East Kilbride pay exactly the same. The only conclusion from this is that West Kilbride pays one-third of the whole valued teind of the Kilbrides, and East Kilbride another one-third. In the same rental we find the lands of Balemenoch included among other lands, but they are proved to be identical with the lands of Middle Kilbride. So it is apparent that a portion of the stipend was necessarily allocated on these lands. If the statement in that rental be correct in point of fact the Lord Ordinary must be wrong. That this is the true state of affairs is further confirmed by the report of the common agent in the locality of Cardross in 1836. In it again, it is made clear that the whole three Kilbrides contributed to pay that amount of stipend, viz.—9 bolls meal and 9 merks money. Again, in the rectified locality of the stipend of the parish of Cardross made up in 1815, and made final in 1859, we have the Kilbrides entered at 9 bolls meal and 10s. sterling as surrendered teinds. That surrender was on a decree of approbation in 1839 of the subvaluation of 1630, which contained the whole three Kilbrides. The three subjects thus evidently paid jointly. It is true this decree of approbation of 1839 was subsequently reduced, but from that time it had been adopted as the statement of what was paid to the minister, and so it is clear that the minister was paid not out of two, but out of three Kilbrides. The Lord Ordinary's interlocutor is therefore not well founded. I do not think that it matters much that the heritor in 1870 obtained a separate valuation of the teind of Middle Kilbride. That cannot affect the question of fact as to the teinds out of which the stipend was paid.

The result of the whole matter is, in my opinion, that, while a great part of the surrender by Sir James Colquhoun may be sustained, part cannot be sustained, in consequence of prescription—i.e., the surrender of those lands, which, I agree with the Lord Ordinary, have overpaid under the locality of 1748. As regards East Kilbride and Durling, I differ as regards the overpayments upon the locality of 1803, and hold that they cannot be insisted in; and as regards Gairlochhead, there can be no payments sustained in excess of the valuation of 1794. Lord Mackenzie, in his interlocutor of 19th March 1873, while he sustains the surrender to a certain extent, also sustains the surrender in respect of lands out of which overpayments are to be continued. That, I confess, is a new form of interlocutor to me. A surrender must either be sustained or not. The effect of a surrender is to make the minister titular of the teinds quoad the surrendered teinds. It is impossible to make him parson of what is not surrendered. We should, I think, refuse to sustain the surrender of these lands. The best course perhaps will be to recall all the interlocutors, and make one new interlocutor disposing of the whole case.

LORD DEAS—The only point of difficulty is with reference to the stipend payable out of the lands of Gairlochhead. I entirely concur with your Lordship that payments of stipend must not be out of stock, but out of teind, and unless it be held that there is teind sufficient to meet the prescriptive overpayments

No. 151.

July 18, 1873. Colquhoun v. Fogo.

these overpayments cannot continue to receive effect. In the case of Maderty the Court held that the overpayments to which they gave effect were just so much teind over and above the teind as valued in the decree of subvaluation, which had been approved of by the High Court. The subvaluation had been made in 1629, and the interlocutor bears that "by the possession following on the decreet" (of locality) "of 1650, the minister acquired a prescriptive right to the surplus teind beyond the subvaluation 1629, and that the approbation 1760 must be limited and qualified by said prescriptive right, and that the minister has right to the teinds as modified to him by decreet 1650, without prejudice to the valuation in other respects."

Now, the difficulty here is, whether the same principle does not apply (as the Lord Ordinary has held it to do) to the decree of valuation obtained in 1794 of the teind of Gairlochhead. No doubt there are some differences, which your Lordship has pointed out, between decrees of valuation of the High Court and decrees of approbation of subvaluations. But the question is whether these differences are sufficient to warrant a different result. It is very true that a subvaluation may be derelinquished, and a decree of valuation of the High Court cannot be derelinquished. But in the case of Maderty the subvaluation was not held to be derelinquished. On the contrary, the subvaluation was approved of, and yet the Court held it must be read as limited and qualified by the prescriptive right to the teinds as modified to the minister by the decreet of 1650. The summons of 1794 concluded alternatively, either to have the subvaluation of the lands of Gairlochhead approved of, or to have a new valuation. It looks somewhat anomalous that the heritor, by taking decree in the one form, could get free from liability for overpayments which, on the authority of the case of Maderty, he would have been under if he had taken decree in the other form.

Overpayments were made for upwards of forty years on each side of 1794. Why should we not hold that these payments were made out of surplus teind, as in the case of Maderty? If your Lordships had taken that view, it would not have occurred to me to be objectionable. My difficulty is that if we sanction the proposed distinction we may seem to shake the authority of the case of Maderty altogether. I do not say so, however, with any confidence, in the face of your Lordship's decided opinion.

LORD ARDMILLAN and LORD JERVISWOODE concurred with the Lord President.

THE COURT pronounced the following interlocutor:—"The Lords having considered the reclaiming note for Sir James Colquhoun, No. 108 of process, and heard counsel for him and the minister, recall the interlocutors of 4th July 1871, 24th July 1872, and 19th March 1873: Sustain the surrender, in so far as concerns the teinds, parsonage and vicarage, of the following lands, viz. . . . Gairlochhead, Auchenvennelmore, East Kilbride, Middle Kilbride or Ballemeanoch, amounting in whole to 92 bolls, 0 firlots, 1 peck, and $3\frac{7}{16}$ths lippies meal, 23 bolls 2 firlots 3 pecks $2\frac{1}{16}$ths lippies bear, and £93, 18s. $4\frac{8}{12}$d. money sterling, under deduction of the teind or stipend of the said lands of Auchenvennelmore, East Kilbride, and Middle Kilbride, payable to the minister of Cardross, amounting in whole to 37 bolls 1 firlot 2 pecks 2 lippies meal, 1 boll 1 firlot bear, and £18, 0s. $7\frac{7}{12}$d. money, leaving as the amount of the surrendered teinds 54 bolls 2 firlots 3 pecks $1\frac{7}{16}$ths lippies meal, 22 bolls 1 firlot 3 pecks $2\frac{1}{16}$ths lippies bear, and £75, 17s. $8\frac{1}{12}$d. money sterling: Refuse the surrender in so far as regards the teinds of the lands of Faslane, Durlin, Stucknaduff, West Kilbride, Auchenvennelwilling, and find that the minister has acquired right by prescription following on the locality of 1748 to the undermentioned payments from these lands, viz., from Faslane, 8s. 4d., Durling, 7s. $9\frac{8}{12}$d., Stucknaduff, 5 bolls meal and 7s. 5d., West Kilbride 1 boll 3 firlots 2 pecks meal, and 8s. 11$\frac{9}{12}$d., and Auchenvennelwilling and Ballecknock 19s., and has also acquired right by prescription following on the locality of 1803 to a further payment from West Kilbride of 1 firlot 2 pecks and 1 lippy meal at 8 stones to the boll: Find neither party entitled to expenses: Remit of new to the Teind Clerk to prepare a rectified locality and state of arrears of stipend, and remit to the Lord Ordinary to proceed with the cause."

No. 151.
July 18, 1873.
Colquhoun v. Fogo.

TAWSE & BONAR, W.S.—W. H. & W. J. SANDS, W.S.—Agents.

TANNETT, WALKER, AND CO., Pursuers.—Sol.-Gen. Clark—Blair.
HANNAY AND SONS, Defenders.—Watson—Balfour.
Et e contra.

No. 152.
July 18, 1873.
Tannett, Walker, & Co. v. Hannay & Sons.

Process—Proof—Confidentiality.—In counter actions arising out of a contract to construct machinery the Court refused to grant diligence for the recovery of letters between the partners of the contractor's firm, but granted diligence to recover letters written to them by their foreman or other workmen employed in the construction of the machinery.

1ST DIVISION. B.

TANNETT, WALKER, AND CO., engineers, Leeds, raised an action against Hannay and Sons, of Blochairn Malleable Iron Works, Glasgow, for the balance of an account incurred for iron rolling machinery and reversing apparatus. The defenders refused payment, on the ground that the machinery was disconform to contract and incapable of doing useful work, and that the great part of the account charged had been incurred owing to defects in the original construction of the machinery.

Messrs Hannay and Sons raised a counter action for damages said to have been caused by the bad working of the machinery. The two actions were conjoined and issues adjusted. It appeared that during the whole time the machinery was being worked or experimented with Tannett, Walker, and Company had a gang of men at Glasgow to look after it, who first erected the machinery, and subsequently executed repairs and improvements as required. These men were under the charge at first of Thomas Harrison, and then of Matthew Duncan, whose names occur below.

Mr Walker, one of the pursuers, was also frequently at Glasgow for considerable periods, and, it was believed, had communications with his partners both as to the repairs on the machinery and the question as to who was to bear the expense of these. In these circumstances Messrs Hannay and Sons asked for a commission and diligence to recover certain documents.

Among other articles of their specification were the following:—"(2) All letters and memoranda, telegrams, reports, or written communications sent or made to Tannett, Walker, and Co., or to any of the partners of that firm, or to any one on their behalf, by Thomas Harrison, or Matthew Duncan, their foreman, or other person or persons employed by them in connection with the machinery on record, relating or referring to said machinery, or to the articles or things supplied by Hannay and Sons to Tannett, Walker, and Co., or to any matter mentioned or referred to on record in either action prior to 19th April 1872." "(4) All letters, memoranda, telegrams, or written communications between Mr Benjamin Walker, of the firm of T., W., and Co., to his other copartners in the firm, or to the firm or by the firm, or any one or more of the copartners thereof, to him, relating to the machinery mentioned on record, or to the furnishing or fitting of the same prior to April 19, 1872."

No. 152.

July 18, 1873. Tannett, Walker, & Co. v. Hannay & Sons.

The pursuers objected to these two articles, and maintained that the letters were confidential, and could not be put in evidence. If they could not be made evidence they ought not to be recovered.[1]

The defenders argued that the letters were written at the time the work was going on, and so were the best evidence. It would be very useful at the trial to have the letters in order to put them into the witness's hands in order to refresh their memory. The letters to the workmen were the information on which they proceeded in executing the work, and even if they could not be evidence per se they might be useful in refreshing the memory of the witnesses.

At advising,—

LORD PRESIDENT.—The decision in the case of Livingstone v. Dinwoodie is very important, because it was pronounced by the Second Division after deliberate consideration, and after consultation with the other Judges. It decided that letters can be recovered only if they can be made evidence in the case. Here the letters from the workmen may be evidence, and possibly important evidence in the case.

I am not inclined to allow the fourth article. I do not think that letters between partners of a firm can be allowed to be recovered unless under very exceptional circumstances, and unless specific grounds are stated for their recovery. If one partner had been sent to another country to act for the firm in a particular transaction there might be a reason for recovering the letters to him, to shew what his transactions were. But very special cause would be required, and we have none such here.

LORD DEAS.—I am of opinion that the letters from the workmen may be recovered, and may possibly afford important evidence in the case. It would be strange if it were not so. Suppose a building contract takes years to complete, the workmen employed might not remember everything which took place during that period, and it would be unreasonable to hold that letters written by them to their employer at the time could not be recovered in aid of defective memory. The case here is quite different from the case of Livingstone v. Dinwoodie.

With regard to communications said to have passed between the partners, something very special would be requisite to authorise these being recovered.

LORD ARDMILLAN and LORD JERVISWOODE concurred.

THE COURT pronounced the following interlocutor:—"Grant diligence at the instance of Hannay and Sons, defenders in the issues, against havers for recovery of the writings in the specification annexed to notice of motion, No. 54 of process, as amended at the bar."

HUNTER, BLAIR, & COWAN, W.S.—WEBSTER & WILL, S.S.C.—Agents.

No. 153.

July 19, 1873. Millar's Trustees, &c. v. Leith Police Commissioners.

MILLAR'S TRUSTEES AND ANOTHER, Pursuers.—Adam—Kinnear.
LEITH POLICE COMMISSIONERS, Defenders.—Sol.-Gen. Clark—Harper.

Road—Statute 25 and 26 Vict. c. 101 (General Police and Improvements (Scotland) Act, 1862), secs. 3, 150, 396, 397—Private Street.—A piece of ground within a burgh, which had been originally intended to form a continuation of a street, and had been enclosed by walls marking out the line of the intended street, was held by three joint proprietors, whose titles conferred right on any one of their number at any time to insist upon it being thrown open as a public thoroughfare. It was used as an access to workshops and yards belonging to the several joint proprietors, and occupied by various tenants. For a long time it was shut off from the street of which it formed a continuation, by a wall

[1] Livingstone v. Dinwoodie, June 28, 1860, 22 D. 1333.

No. 153.

July 19, 1873.

Millar's Trustees, &c. v Leith Police Commissioners.

ı a locked gate therein; the wall was, however, broken down and the gate oved about fourteen years before the present action, but the ground was ır thrown open as a public thoroughfare. The General Police and Improve- t Act having been adopted in the burgh, the Police Commissioners, after ng the statutory notice, caused a portion of the ground to be paved. Held, ın action at the instance of two of the joint proprietors against the ce· Commissioners, that the ground was a private street in the sense of 3 of the Act, and as such fell under the regulations of the Act applicable rivate streets, and that consequently the pursuers, who had failed to object ıe execution of the work in the manner prescribed by the Act, were barred ı complaining thereof.

2D DIVISION. Lord Jerviswoode. R.

HIS was an action of declarator at the instance of the trustees under marriage-contract between Christian Hoyer Millar, merchant, Mon- e and Miss Marion Marshall Watson, and James Hay, manager of the nburgh Roperie and Sail-cloth Company, against William Henderson per, town-clerk of Leith, clerk to and as representing the Provost, ıistrates, and Council of the burgh of Leith, commissioners acting ıin the burgh under the General Police and Improvement (Scotland) , 1862.

he summons concluded for declarator "that All and Whole that e of ground lying within the lines of Pattison Street, Leith, which been intended to form a continuation of that street towards lar Lane, extending in length from a line drawn at right angles ss Pattison Street at the eastern gable of the tenement of houses he north side of that street onward to Poplar Lane, pertains herit- to the pursuers, but jointly and in common with the successors of n Hutton, merchant in Leith; and the defender ought and should be ırned and ordained to cede possession of a portion of the said piece of ınd extending from the foresaid line a distance of eighty-five feet or eby onward towards Poplar lane, taken possession of by the said commis- ers, and formed or attempted to be formed into a continuation of Pat- ı Street, and to restore the same to the condition in which it was pre- ıs to its having been taken possession of as aforesaid: And, further, the nder ought and should be decerned and ordained, by decree foresaid, to e payment to the pursuers of the sum of £200, or such other sum as be found to be the loss and damage occasioned to them by the ng possession of and forming or attempting to form the foresaid portion round into a street as aforesaid, with the legal interest thereof from date of citation till payment."

he pursuers were proprietors of certain subjects in and near Pattison et, Leith, and, inter alia (along with the successors of John Hutton, chant, Leith, who were not parties to this action), were infeft as joint prietors of "All and Whole that piece of ground lying within the lines attison Street, and which had been intended to form a continuation of street towards Poplar Lane, extending in length from a line drawn at t angles across Pattison Street at the eastern gable of the tenement ouses on the north side of that street onward to Poplar Lane."

t was provided in their titles that the joint proprietors should have ll right and liberty to use the said pieces of ground either as a private osure or as a private road communicating to their own properties, to ch no one else should have right, or to throw it open as a public oughfare communicating between Poplar Lane and Elbe Street, their ıg it in one way by no means precluding them from afterwards using it in other way they may choose, and their having thrown it open as a public oughfare not even precluding them from resuming close and private ession thereof; but declaring that any one of their number should e at any time right to insist upon the said piece of ground being thrown open as a public thoroughfare and continuation of Pattison Street in the manner originally intended."

No. 153. July 19, 1873. Millar's Trustees, &c. v. Leith Police Commissioners.

The General Police and Improvement (Scotland) Act, 1862, was adopted in whole by the Provost, Magistrates, and Council of the burgh of Leith in October 1862.

On 13th April 1872 the Commissioners advertised the following notice in the "Daily Scotsman," "Leith Herald," and "Leith Burghs Pilot" newspapers:—"Burgh of Leith.—Whereas Hope Street, North Leith, and Pattison Street, being private streets as defined in 'General Police and Improvement (Scotland) Act, 1862,' formed or laid out at or before the adoption of the said Act by the Magistrates and Council of the said burgh, are not, together with the footways thereof, sufficiently levelled, paved, or causewayed, and flagged to the satisfaction of the Commissioners for the purposes of the said Act acting in and for the said burgh, notice is hereby given that it is the intention of the said Commissioners to cause said streets and the footways thereof to be freed from obstructions, and to be properly levelled, paved, or causewayed, and flagged, and channelled, according to plans thereof, to which reference is hereby made, and which may be seen within the Town-Hall, Charlotte Street, Leith. (Signed) W. H. COUPER, Clerk of the Commissioners.—Town-Clerk's Office, Leith, 11th April 1872."

On 13th May 1872 the clerk laid before a meeting of the Commissioners a copy of each of the newspapers in which the foresaid notice had been advertised, and certified that no person had appeared to object or be heard thereanent. The meeting therefore resolved to proceed with the intended works, and ordered the execution thereof. The works were accordingly forthwith begun, and on or about 5th August 1872 the burgh surveyor reported that the same had been completed. Notice was thereafter sent to the pursuers of the assessment imposed upon them, to defray the expense of paving.

The pursuers were not aware of these operations until the beginning of July 1872. On 5th July a letter was addressed by the agents of Millar's trustees to Mr Couper—"5th July 1872. Sir,—We beg leave to call your attention to certain operations now being carried on at Pattison Street. This street was never opened further than a distance of about 128 feet from Elbe Street, and a little further on there existed, until removed a day or two ago, a stone wall which cut off the formed part of the street from the private property beyond. At one time there was a gate upon this wall, but it was removed a good many years ago. When we were down at the place yesterday we saw the remains of the wall, and part of one of the gate posts, and we found workmen engaged apparently in lowering the level of this private property and adding it to the public street. On behalf of our clients, the marriage-contract trustees of Mr and Mrs Millar, joint owners of this property, we shall be obliged by your informing us upon what authority their private property is being encroached on, and we beg leave to intimate that we shall hold the Commissioners responsible for the consequences.—We are," &c., "ADAM, KIRK, and ROBERTSON." To which the following reply was returned:—"10th July 1872. Dear Sirs,—I submitted your letter as to Pattison Street to the Paving Committee of Police yesterday, and am directed to inform you that having made inquiry they find that the wall mentioned by you was not interfered with by them or their servants or contractor, and that the street, so far as the Commissioners propose to deal with it, was open to and used by the public before the Commissioners gave notice of their intention to pave it in terms of the Police Act.—I remain," &c. "W. H. COUPER."

No. — July 1 Millar' Truste Leith Comm sioner

The pursuers accordingly raised the present action. They averred— (Cond. 3) "At a distance of about nine feet east from the eastern gable [referred to in the titles] a wall was built across the intended line of Pattison Street, having a gate for the convenience of those having right of access. This gate was removed some years ago, but the piece of ground was never thrown open to the public. It remains the private property of the joint proprietors, none of whom have ever consented or wished that it should be thrown open as a public thoroughfare." (Cond. 4) "Sometime about the end of June or beginning of July last the Police and Improvement Commissioners of Leith, or others acting by their orders or for whom they are responsible, entered upon the said piece of ground and removed the wall. They have in part lowered the level of the said piece of ground, and have causewayed it for a distance of about 85 feet in the direction of Poplar Lane, and they have attempted to throw that portion of the pursuers' joint property into a public thoroughfare. By lowering the level of the said piece of ground the Commissioners have interfered with the access to the pursuers' properties, and have caused damage thereto."

The pursuers pleaded;—(1) The pursuers, jointly with the successors of the said John Hutton, were, in terms of their titles, the sole proprietors of said piece of ground. (2) The Police Commissioners had no right to enter upon the said piece of ground, or to interfere with it in the manner condescended on, without the consent of the proprietors. (3) The Commissioners were bound to restore the said piece of ground to the condition it was in previous to their operations. (4) They were liable in reparation for the damage caused by these operations.

The defenders founded on the provisions of the General Police and Improvement (Scotland) Act, 1862, relative to private streets. Sec. 150 provides—"Where any private street or part of a street is at the adoption of this Act formed or laid out, or shall at any time thereafter be formed or laid out, and is not together with the footways thereof sufficiently levelled, paved, or causewayed, and flagged to the satisfaction of the Commissioners, it shall be lawful for the Commissioners to cause any such street or part of a street and the footways thereof, to be freed from obstructions, and to be properly levelled, paved or causewayed, and flagged and channelled in such a way and with such materials as to them shall seem most expedient." By the interpretation clause (sec. 3) of the statute, "The expression 'private street' shall mean any road, street, or place within the burgh (not being or forming part of any harbour, railway or canal station, depot, wharf, towing-path, or bank), used by carts, and either accessible to the public from a public street, or forming a common access to lands and premises separately occupied, and which has not been before the adoption of this Act well and sufficiently paved and flagged by the owners of premises fronting or abutting on said street, and which has not been maintained as a public street." By the immediately preceding definition, "the word 'street,' shall mean a public street, and shall extend to and include any road, bridge, quay, lane, square, court, alley, close, wynd, vennel, thoroughfare, and public passage or other place within the burgh, used either by carts or footpassengers, not being a 'private street,' and not being or forming part of any harbour, railway or canal station, depot, wharf, towing-path or bank." Sec. 151 provides that the expenses incurred by the Commissioners in respect of private streets shall be repaid to them by the owners of lands or premises fronting or abutting on such street, in proportion to their frontage. Sec. 157—"That as regards the paving or causewaying and maintaining streets, public or private, including the footways thereof, it shall be lawful for any person whose property may be affected, and who thinks himself thereby aggrieved, to appeal to the Sheriff in manner after provided." Sec. 396—"Any person liable to pay or to contribute towards the expense of any of the works aforesaid, or otherwise aggrieved by any order of the Commissioners relating thereto, may, at any time within seven days next after the making of any such order, give notice in writing to the Commissioners that he intends to appeal against such order to the Sheriff, and along with such notice he shall give a statement in writing of the grounds of the appeal; and if within four days next after giving such notice the party grant bond to the Sheriff, with two sufficient cautioners to the satisfaction of the Sheriff, to abide the order of the Sheriff, and pay such costs as shall be awarded by the Sheriff thereupon, the work so appealed against shall not be begun until after the judgment of the Sheriff upon such appeal; and the Sheriff, upon due proof of such notice, and upon such caution being found, shall hear and determine the matter of the appeal, and shall make such order thereon, either confirming, quashing, or varying the same, and shall award such costs to either of the parties as the Sheriff in his discretion thinks fit; provided always, that the appellant shall not be heard in support of such appeal unless such notice and statement have been given, and such caution found as aforesaid, nor on the hearing of such appeal shall he go into evidence of any other grounds of appeal than those set forth in such statement as aforesaid." Sec. 397—"And in respect to appeal as to all other matters and things which the Commissioners are by the police provisions of this Act empowered to do or perform, or to authorise to be done or performed, and the cost attending which falls by this Act to be provided for by way of private improvement assessment, the Commissioners shall, where not otherwise hereby directed, give notice of their intention to do or perform, or to authorise to be done or performed, such matter or thing, either by public advertisement in some newspaper circulating in the burgh or in the county in which the burgh is situated, or by posting handbills in conspicuous places in the burgh, or by notice in writing to be transmitted through the post-office, or delivered personally, or at their dwelling-houses, to the individuals having interest, as the Commissioners shall think proper; and it shall be lawful for any person whose property shall be taken or affected, and who shall consider himself injured or aggrieved in respect of such other matters and things by this Act so directed to be done or performed and provided for, to appeal to the Sheriff from any order made or notice given by the Commissioners in respect of such matters or things in the manner and to the effect herein last before provided and directed; and if such matter or thing shall not be made the subject of appeal to the Sheriff, or being appealed shall be allowed by him, the Commissioners may proceed with the same, and levy the assessments in reference thereto authorised by this Act; provided always that all such appeals provided for in this and the immediately preceding clause, and all other appeals to the Sheriff allowed by this Act not otherwise provided for, shall be disposed of summarily, and the decision of the Sheriff shall in all cases be final and conclusive, and not subject to review by suspension, reduction, or advocation, or in any manner of way."

No. 153.

July 19, 1873. Millar's Trustees, &c. v. Leith Police Commissioners.

The defenders stated;—(2) The place or piece of ground forming the continuation of Pattison Street, situated within the burgh of Leith, has for many years formed part of and been known as Pattison Street, and has been known by no other name. (3) Pattison Street extends at least from Elbe Street to the wood-yard at the end thereof, entering from Poplar Lane. For many years it was accessible both from Poplar Lane and Elbe Street, from and to which it formed a common thoroughfare. It is a private street within the meaning of clause 3 of the Act foresaid. It is

No. 153.

July 19, 1873.
Millar's Trustees, &c. v. Leith Police Commissioners.

ted within the burgh of Leith, and does not form part of any harbour, ray or canal station, depot, wharf, towing-path or bank. It has for s been used by carts, and been accessible to the public from a public t, and has formed a common access to lands and premises separately pied. It had not, before the adoption of said Act, been well and suf- ntly paved and flagged by the owners of premises fronting or abutting he same, and had not been maintained as a public street; and at the of the adoption of said Act by the said Commissioners the said street formed or laid out, but was not, together with the footways thereof, ciently levelled, paved, or causewayed, and flagged to the satisfaction ie said Commissioners. (8) The pursuers did not make any objections nst the said intended works, nor did they seek to be heard before the Commissioners upon any objections; and they did not appeal against foresaid order for the execution of said works, nor did they take any s competent to them under the said Act or otherwise against the said r, or the execution of the said works; and the proceedings of the said missioners have now become final, and are not subject to review in manner of way.

he defenders pleaded;—(1) The action is incompetent, and should lismissed; alternatively, the action is irrelevant, and should be dis- ed. (4) The pursuers having failed to object to the execution of the works in manner provided by the Act, the whole proceedings of the missioners are now final, and not subject to review, and the pur- s are barred from complaining of or objecting thereto. (5) The e of ground claimed by the pursuers being a private street within the ning of "The General Police and Improvement (Scotland) Act, 1872," Police Commissioners were entitled to execute the works complained (6) The Police Commissioners having given statutory notice of their nded operations, and the pursuers having made no opposition thereto, Commissioners were entitled to proceed with and to execute the said ations.

he Lord Ordinary (Jerviswoode), on 3d December 1872, pronounced following interlocutor:—"The Lord Ordinary, having heard counsel he procedure roll, and made avizandum, and considered the debate whole process, sustains the fourth plea in law stated on behalf of the nder, and therefore dismisses the action, and decerns: Finds the pur- s liable to the defenders in expenses," &c.*

he pursuers reclaimed, and argued;—The Lord Ordinary's interlocu- proceeded on the assumption that the piece of ground in question was private street" in the sense of the Act. But this was the de quo ritur. The pursuers averred that it was not a "private street," but ate property with which the Police Commissioners had no title to in- ere. The pursuers should be allowed a proof.[1] rgued for the defenders;—To make a place within a burgh a private et in the sense of the Act it was not necessary that it should be acces- e to the public. It was sufficient that it be used by carts and form a mon access to premises separately occupied. According to the pur- s' own shewing, this place communicated with their several properties, it was not disputed that it was used by carts. It was therefore a ate street.

---

* NOTE.—The Lord Ordinary has here come to the conclusion, after having the fit of a full argument on the whole cause, that the plea which he has sus- ed as above is well founded; and if this be so, it follows that there is no to go, and indeed no propriety in going, further."

[1] Lord Advocate v. Police Commissioners of Perth, 7th December 1869, ante, viii. p. 244—Scot. Jur., vol. xlii. p. 106.

No. 153.

July 19, 1873. Millar's Trustees, &c. v. Leith Police Commissioners.

The Court allowed the pursuers a proof before answer.

A proof was accordingly taken, the import of which was as follows:—Pattison Street was laid out towards the close of last century, and was intended to run eastwards from a street named Elbe Street to a lane named Poplar Lane. In point of fact, the houses terminated at a distance of 128 feet from Elbe Street. The continuation of the street eastwards was from an early period enclosed by walls marking out the line of the intended street. Down to about the year 1858 this piece of ground was shut off from the rest of Pattison Street by a wall which ran across the street at right angles, a few feet east from the eastmost house, which was long occupied by a Mrs Munnoch, and subsequently by her daughter. To the piece of ground so enclosed access was obtained by a locked gate, the key of which was kept at Mrs Munnoch's for the convenience of the persons entitled to have access. The eastmost part of the ground was occupied as a wood-yard, and shut off from Poplar Lane by a paling. The ground between the wall and the wood-yard, extending to 85 feet in length, was what the Commissioners paved in 1872. Previous to that time it did not appear to have been put to any special use; it formed a common access both for carts and persons on foot to several yards and workshops; it was covered with litter of various kinds, and was always in an untidy condition. About the year 1858 the wall on the west side of the ground in question was broken down and the gate removed. Footpassengers occasionally passed through the ground from Elbe Street to Poplar Lane, but it was not a recognised thoroughfare. A few years before this action was raised a public lamp was placed on the east side of the remains of the wall.

The pursuers argued;—This piece of ground was never occupied as a street, or public thoroughfare, but was private property, used as a yard by the tradesmen who resided there. The Commissioners, therefore, had no right to interfere. Then as to the pursuers not having taken objection upon the defenders' advertisement, that could only be read as applying to Pattison Street proper, and could not be taken to apply to the yards. By the titles under which the ground was held it could not be opened up as a street without the consent of one or more of the co-proprietors, and no such consent had been given.

The defenders argued;—When there is a private street, the Commissioners can go on irrespective of the property in the street, and in this case the proof went to shew that it was a private street within the meaning of the Act.[1]

The argument that the advertisement could not be taken to apply to the ground in question was not tenable, for in documents having reference to the property, and in the receipts to tenants, it was always called Pattison Street.

At advising,—

LORD COWAN.—There is a considerable difficulty in arriving at the true grounds on which the judgment of the Court in this case ought to proceed,—not less from the obscure terms in which the provisions of the Police and Improvement Act founded on by the defenders are expressed than from the peculiar circumstances in which the ground alleged to form part of Pattison Street is placed, having regard to the recent possession of it as appearing from the evidence.

In the month of April 1872 a notice was duly advertised in terms of the 397th clause of the Act, that "Pattison Street," with two other private streets which were mentioned, was to be made free from obstruction, and to be properly levelled and paved by the Commissioners acting under the Police and Improvement Act, 1862. No party appeared, as required by the statute in every case where private property might be affected, and where any one might think himself aggrieved by the proposed operations; and in this situation the Commissioners proceeded with the execution of the works, and these were reported by the surveyor to have been completed on 5th August 1872.

[1] Campbell v. Leith Police Commissioners, June 21, 1866, ante, vol. iv. p. 853.

The pursuers do not seem to have been aware of these operations until the beginning of July, when a communication was addressed by their agents to the Town-Clerk of Leith, remonstrating against the ground being operated on as part of Pattison Street, inasmuch as it was alleged to be private property, and, being such, illegally encroached upon by the Commissioners. On this remonstrance a report was required from the burgh surveyor, who reported "that the street was lighted with a public lamp beyond the point where the wall (alleged to be the west boundary of the ground in question) stood, thus shewing that it was open and used by the public," to a line shewn on the plan, up to which the operations of the Commissioners were intended to be carried. And in a letter addressed to the agents of the pursuers on 10th July 1872, it was intimated by the burgh clerk "that the street, so far as the Commissioners proposed to deal with it, was open to and used by the public before they gave notice of their intention to pave it in terms of the Police Act." This led to the action of declarator now before the Court at the instance of the pursuers. It concluded that "the piece of ground lying within the line of Pattison Street, Leith, and which had been intended to form a continuation of that street towards Poplar Lane," extending as therein described, "pertains heritably to the pursuers, but jointly and in common to the successors of John Hutton, merchant in Leith;" and this conclusion is followed by other relative conclusions, to the effect of having the ground restored to the condition in which it was before the operations complained of. The defences to this action on its merits were,—first, that the pursuers ought to have objected to the proceedings of the Commissioners in the manner pointed out by the Police Act for parties to obtain redress whose property is affected and who are aggrieved by their proceedings, and that, not having been objected to, what was done was final, and could not be made the subject of review in this Court; and second, that the piece of ground in question was part of a "private street" within the meaning of the Police Act, with which the Commissioners were entitled to deal under the Act by execution of the works complained of.

The Lord Ordinary found, on 3d December 1872, that the first of these pleas was well founded, and dismissed the action, because, as stated in his Lordship's note, the statutory remedy not having been adopted, "it follows that there is no call to go, and indeed no propriety in going further."

Under the reclaiming note presented against this interlocutor the Court, on hearing parties, considered that the question of jurisdiction, and the finality of the proceedings by the defenders, depended upon the result of an inquiry into the fact of the ground, when interfered with by the Commissioners, being truly 'private street," or private property belonging exclusively to the pursuers. For, on the one hand, if the ground was possessed by the pursuers as their private exclusive property, and not street at all in any proper sense, it was manifest that the Commissioners, by interfering with it, might justly be held to have exceeded their statutory power, and in that case to have no defence to this action, on the principle of construction recognised by this Division of the Court in the case of the Perth Commissioners v. The Lord Advocate, 7th December 1869, 8 Macpherson, 244. And, on the other hand, it was considered that if the ground, having regard to the condition in which it was at the date of the operations, came within the description of "private street," the defence in that view of it must be sustained, and this action dismissed, as found by the interlocutor under review. A proof "before answer" was accordingly allowed, and the recent argument had regard to the import of the evidence in its bearing upon the two views of the case now stated.

To understand fully the effect of the evidence on the question at issue it is proper to have in view the definition of "private street" contained in the interpretation clause of the statute.

There is first given a definition of the word "street," as used in the statute,

No. 153.

July 19, 1873. Millar's Trustees, &c. v. Leith Police Commissioners.

which is declared to mean a public street, and to extend to and include "an road," &c., and so forth, "thoroughfare and public passage, or other place withi the burgh, used either by carts or footpassengers, not being a 'private street.' Then there is given the definition of "private street" in these terms: "Th expression 'private street' shall mean any road, street, or place within the burg (not being or forming part of any harbour, railway or canal station, depot, whar towing-path or bank), used by carts, and either accessible to the public from public street, or forming a common access to lands and premises separately occ pied."

There is no doubt that the ground in question is a place within a burgh, an that it does not form part of any of the subjects described in the parenthetic portion of the clause, so that the inquiry resolves into the applicability of th other descriptive terms,—i.e., whether the ground is "used by carts," and wheth it is accessible to the public from a public street, or forms a common access t lands and premises separately occupied. There is no mention in this definitio of the place being "thoroughfare and public passage," as in the description of public street. All that is required is that the ground is used by carts, and alte natively either accessible to the public or forming a common access. Ther having reference to this definition, the 150th section, "for the convenience o the inhabitants and for the public advantage," empowers the Commissioners t take such measures as were here resolved on, "where any private street or pa of a street is at the adoption of this Act formed or laid out, or shall at any tim hereafter be formed or laid out," and has not been "levelled, paved, or caus wayed and flagged to their satisfaction." The question is, whether the evidenc that has been led brings the ground within the definition of private street thu given.

Now (1) one thing is clear from the terms of the titles of the pursuers, tha Pattison Street was intended to be continued through the ground in question eas ward to Poplar Lane, and that any one of the proprietors might and may at an time insist on it being opened as a thoroughfare or public passage from Elbe Stre on the west to Poplar Lane on the east, and that from an early date there wer walls built on the north and south sides of the ground all through, marking i out as the intended continuation of Pattison Street. Unfortunately the origin feuing plan has fallen aside, and the precise date when this took place has n been ascertained. The side walls, however, north and south, in continuation what is certainly Pattison Street, have existed from the earliest times. To th extent, although there was no proper formation of the street, the ground may b considered to have been laid out as part of Pattison Street, and to be so appr priated and used whenever any of the proprietors should choose to insist on i being opened up as a thoroughfare; and it will be observed that the wor "formed or laid out" are not conjunctive but alternative.

Again (2) as to the state of the ground—There is no doubt that it was at on time enclosed by means of a wall running from the east end of Mrs Munnoch house, on the north, across the roadway or line of street to the south, as describ by the witnesses, and delineated on the plan, between the letters S T in "street This is proved beyond question, and at that time access was obtained to th ground thus enclosed by a gateway in the wall,—the gate being always ke locked, and the key obtained at Mrs Munnoch's by all parties entitled to ha entrance. But while this was the state of matters at an earlier period it is l less certain on the proof that from and after 1858, or at all events for ten twelve years prior to 1872, this wall, except at the north side of it, was brok down and the gateway removed, so as to form no obstruction to access into th previously enclosed ground, whether by footpassengers or by carts having occ sion to go to the premises, the entrance to which was on the one side or other this piece of ground. Such lands and "premises" are "severally occupied There are at least five or six such subjects,—an "asphalter's yard," a "coa yard," a wood-yard," a "stable," besides other yards, &c., within what was e closed ground. A public lamp has been in recent times placed for the co venience of the public resorting to this place or street. Then it is clear beyon controversy that this ground, in its now open condition, forms a common acce to those separately occupied premises. I hold these facts to be established by the proof, and it is for determination whether they are not sufficient to bring the ground within the statutory description of private street.

No. 153.

July 19, 1873.

Millar's Trustees, &c. v. Leith Police Commissioners.

No thoroughfare or public passage from Elbe Street to Poplar Lane is proved to exist, but that is not required in the case of a private street as defined by the statute. The ground is used by carts, in so far as the occupiers of the several subjects require for the purposes of their possession to have carts to and from their premises. The ground as a continuation of the west end of Pattison Street is accessible from a public street, and it is a common access of the description set forth in the definition. The object contemplated by the statute appears to have been that such common accesses should be brought into such a state of repair as to allow them to be used, by those of the public having occasion to resort to them, with safety and convenience. And it cannot be doubted that this object will be fully served by the operations resolved on by the Commissioners in reference to this ground.

It was strongly pressed on us that by these titles this ground could not be opened up as a street without the express consent of one or more of the co-proprietors. But consent to the effect stated may be inferred from their acts and deeds, or from their allowing the ground to fall into that condition and to be used in such a manner as, having regard to its proximity to the west portion of the private street, to bring the ground in its present state within the statutory definition.

On the whole, therefore, although the question is not unattended with difficulty, I hold that the definition of private street does apply to this common access to the several premises entering from the ground in question. And I do not think that the pursuers have any good ground to complain of the general terms of the notice given by the Commissioners. It is in evidence that the several premises belonging to them entering from the ground in question have all along been described as situated in Pattison Street. Both in their own receipts to their tenants and in their rental books, as also in the public assessment receipts for the rates paid by them for these premises, they are so described. Notice of operations being intended to be done on the private street called Pattison Street, therefore, was due statutory notice, on the assumption always that the ground is to be regarded as part of a private street, and that the reasoning I have stated is sound. The result is that, in the state of the facts established by the proof, the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor is well founded.

The other Judges concurred.

THE COURT adhered to the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor.

[ADAM, KIRK, & ROBERTSON, W.S.—J. C. IRONS, S.S.C.—Agents.

No. 154.

July 19, 1873.*

Pirie v. Pirie.

ALEXANDER GEORGE PIRIE, Pursuer.—Watson.
FRANCIS LOGIE PIRIE, Defender.—Shand—Asher.

Condition—Testament.—When a bequest is made subject to a condition in favour of a third party the condition is held to be fulfilled when the third party voluntarily renders its fulfilment impossible.

Condition—Testament.—A father in his testament gave a direction that a sum of money due to him by one of his sons should be allowed to remain in his hands for eight years, on condition that the executor and residuary legatee should remain a director of the company in which the sum was invested. The executor voluntarily resigned his office as director. Held that the condition must be held to have been satisfied, and that the son was entitled to retain the loan.

2D DIVISION. Lord Gifford. I.

MESSRS ALEXANDER GEORGE PIRIE and FRANCIS L. PIRIE were, along with their father, the late Mr Francis Pirie, partners in the firm of Alexander Pirie and Sons, paper-makers in Aberdeen. That firm was re-

* Decided 10th December 1872.

No. 154. July 19, 1873. Pirie v. Pirie.

modelled in the year 1868 with a view of being registered as a limited liability company. Under the articles of association then adopted by the existing partners of the old firm the capital of the company was declared to consist of £360,000 in 7200 shares of £50 each. Of these the late Mr Francis Pirie held 1500, the pursuer 1200, and the defender 900, the book-value of which, £41, 13s. 4d. per share, being held as paid up, was respectively £62,500, £50,000, and £37,500. The company never was registered as limited, but its business continued to be carried on in terms of the articles of association then entered into, the existing partners of the old firm being constituted directors of the new company.

In order to pay up to the company the value of his 900 shares the defender, Francis Logie Pirie, borrowed from his father in 1864 the sum of £21,000, and in 1868 a further sum of £3000, in respect of which sums, amounting together to £24,000, he on 13th March 1868 granted a bond to his father. The interest stipulated in the bond was at the rate of six per cent per annum. Of even date with the bond a separate agreement was entered into between the defender and his father, Francis Pirie, containing the following clauses, modifying the absolute terms of the bond, to the effect,—"Second, That the said Francis Logie Pirie, notwithstanding the terms of the said articles of agreement, shall, until the year ending the 31st day of December 1871, on drawing his share of the profits of the said copartnery or company, yearly hand over one just and equal half thereof to the said Francis Pirie, for his, the said Francis Pirie's sole and absolute use and behoof; and that, on and after the said 31st day of December 1871, or at the death of the said Francis Pirie at any time before the said 31st day of December 1871, the said Francis Logie Pirie shall have the sole and absolute property and control of all the parts, business, or shares standing in his name in the books of the said copartnery or company of Alexander Pirie and Sons, or of Alexander Pirie and Sons (Limited), as the case may be, for his own absolute use and behoof: Third, That till the 31st day of December 1871 the said Francis Logie Pirie shall annually, on the 31st day of December in each year, commencing on the 31st day of December 1868 for the year then ended, while any part of the said sum of £24,000 sterling remains unpaid, apply one-fourth part of the profits of three twenty-fourth parts, or of 900 shares, as the case may be, of the said business of the said copartnery or company, towards payment thereof, if and when required to do so in writing by the said Francis Pirie, until the whole sums in said bond, principal, interest, and penalties, if incurred, are paid: Fourth, That so long as the said Francis Logie Pirie shall regularly apply one-fourth of the share of the profits of the said copartnery or company standing in his name in the books of the said firm annually at the 31st day of December as aforesaid towards payment of the sums in said bond due to the said Francis Pirie, or others in right of said bond for the time, if and when required as aforesaid, and also regularly pay the whole interest due thereon in terms of said bond, it shall not be lawful for the said Francis Pirie, or others in his right, notwithstanding the terms of said bond, until the said 31st day of December 1871, to demand payment of any further sums under the same from the said Francis Logie Pirie."

Interest was regularly paid by the defender, but no requisition was made in terms of clause 4 of this agreement that he should apply a fourth part of his profits from the business towards the extinction of the debt. Accordingly at 31st August 1870, when his father died, the whole sum of £24,000 remained due.

Mr Francis Pirie by his trust-disposition and settlement left his elder son, the pursuer, his sole executor and residuary legatee. He had pre-

No. 154.

July 19, 1873.
Pirie v. Pirie.

iously transferred to him 1200 of his own 1500 shares in the company n return for a bond of annuity for £3350 per annum, which fell by his leath a few days after it was granted. Besides what he had thus received luring his father's lifetime, the pursuer, in terms of his father's settlement, succeeded, inter alia, to a bond granted by himself to his father for £44,000, and to his brother's bond for £24,000. To the defender, on the ther hand, his father bequeathed his remaining 300 shares in the company, the value of which in the books of the company was £12,500, but burdened by the condition that he should grant to his mother a bond of annuity for £750 per annum (a like bond of annuity for £750 being to be granted by the pursuer), and with regard to his debt of £24,000 he conferred on him the privilege contained in the following clause:—"Farther, n reference to £15,000 sterling of the capital contained in the said Francis Logie Pirie's personal bond to me, dated 13th and registered 21st March 1868 for £24,000, I hereby direct that on interest being paid regularly, and in the event of my eldest son, the said Alexander George Pirie, while alive, being throughout a director of the said firm of Alexander Pirie and Sons, or Alexander Pirie and Sons (Limited), the said Francis Logie Pirie may and shall have right to refrain from paying up the said sum of £15,000, and that for the period of eight years after my death, and until the arrival of 31st December 1879, if that be later; and I also direct that the rate of interest on said bond from the date of my death shall be five per cent per annum.

Alexander George Pirie was at his father's death a director of the firm of Alexander Pirie and Sons, which office he held till 12th May 1871, when, in virtue of article 97 of the articles of association of the company, he sent in written notice of his resignation, with the avowed intention of voiding the condition in his father's will, and calling up the defender's bond for £24,000 at 31st December 1871, being the earliest date at which, n terms of the separate agreement between the defender and his father, t could be demanded. Francis L. Pirie admitted his obligation to pay £9000 at that date, but declined to pay the remaining £15,000, founding n the clause in his favour in his father's settlement. Alexander George Pirie accordingly raised this action for payment of the sum due under the bond.

He pleaded;—(1) The defender having intimated that he disputed his right to enforce payment of the bond libelled on, quoad £15,000 of the capital sum therein contained, till 31st December 1879, he was entitled o raise the present action. (2) The terms of the clause in the deed of settlement of his late father, as to £15,000 of the sum in the defender's bond, did not in the circumstances entitle the defender to withhold payment or preclude him from enforcing payment, later than 31st December 871. (3) According to the construction of the deeds he, as executor-ominate of his father, was entitled to enforce payment of the bond as oncluded for.

The defender pleaded;—(2) He was entitled to absolvitor, in respect he was entitled under his father's settlement to refrain from paying up the said sum of £15,000 until 31st December 1879. (3) The pursuer having resigned his position as a director of the said company, in the circumstances and for the reasons set forth in his, the defender's statement, he was not entitled to found on said resignation to the effect of claiming payment of the said sum of £15,000 at 31st December 1871. (4) Separatim, n a sound construction of the said settlement the pursuer's resignation f his position as a director of the said company, in the circumstances and or the reasons above set forth, did not deprive him of his right to refrain rom paying up the said sum of £15,000 till 31st December 1879.

No. 154.

July 19, 1873.
Pirie v. Pirie.

The Lord Ordinary (Gifford), on 25th June 1872, pronounced the following interlocutor:—"Finds that, according to the true intent and meaning of the mortis causa settlement of the late Mr Francis Pirie, dated 26th March 1870, the defender is not bound hoc statu, or at present, to pay to the pursuer the sum of £15,000, being part of the principal sum of £24,000 contained in the defender's personal bond to the deceased Francis Pirie, dated 13th March 1868, and to this effect assoilzies the defender from the declaratory conclusion of the action," &c.*

---

* "NOTE.—It is now clearly and conclusively established by the proof that the pursuer voluntarily resigned his directorship in the firm of Alexander Pirie and Sons for the sole purpose of enabling him to enforce payment from the defender of the £15,000 now in question, and to deprive the defender of his right to retain the sum, paying interest thereon till 1879. The pursuer was not compelled to resign; he did it voluntarily. He was not induced to resign by ill health, by any inability to act, or by any unpleasantness arising between him and his partners. His sole purpose in resigning was to compel the defender to pay now the £15,000 which the defender has in the firm, and which the father of the parties contemplated should remain in the firm till 1879, the defender paying interest at 5 per cent thereon. But for this object the pursuer would still have been a director of the firm, and if he gets decree, there is nothing to prevent him becoming next day a director again.

"In the pursuer's own examination as a witness he admitted that his letter to his uncle of 12th May 1871 'correctly sets forth the purpose which I had in resigning my directorship.' . . . . 'The object I had in view in resigning was to obtain money.' . . . . 'It was expressly and exclusively for the purpose of enabling me to raise that money that I sent in my resignation. If I had not been pressed for money at that time I would not have taken such a step.'

"This evidence is quite fair and candid. It was given frankly and without the least hesitation, and it removes all doubt as to the purpose of the resignation, and the circumstances in which it was made, and it raises the pure question in point of law whether by such resignation—the voluntary and arbitrary act of the pursuer himself—the pursuer can bring about the condition which will deprive the defender of the postponement of the term of payment for which the father's settlement provides.

"The Lord Ordinary has again anxiously considered the terms of the settlement, and the argument of the pursuer, which excludes as irrelevant everything about the resignation but the mere fact, and asks the Court to apply the words of the provision, irrespective altogether of equitable construction or of inquiry from the deeds themselves into the purpose and intention of the testator.

"The Lord Ordinary remains of the opinion indicated in his note of 30th ultimo. He thinks there is room for equitable construction. He thinks the Court are entitled and bound to look to the nature of the debt and the surrounding circumstances, so far as these can be gathered from the contracts of copartnery, minutes of agreement, bond, and settlement; and if it appear, as the Lord Ordinary thinks it does, that the condition in question was a condition for the pursuer's security, and not a condition which was to be entirely dependent upon the pursuer's mere pleasure, then he thinks that the pursuer was not entitled by his own arbitrary act to purify the condition as against the defender.

"The argument of the pursuer would lead to obvious injustice in many cases. On the one hand, and as against the pursuer, the Lord Ordinary does not think that the defender would be entitled to sell out his whole interest in the firm of Pirie and Sons, to withdraw his whole funds, and yet to insist upon retaining his brother's money and use it in his own speculations for eight years. This would be to follow the letter of the provision to the destruction of its spirit; and the pursuer would be well entitled to resist such a construction. But then, on the other hand, while the money remains in the firm, and while the pursuer has or may have full control of the affairs, if he choose to remain a director, he is not

No. 154.
July 19, 1873.
Pirie v. Pirie.

The pursuer reclaimed, and argued;—During his father's lifetime disputes existed among the partners of Alexander Pirie and Sons, on points of the partnership business. The pursuer and his father took one side, and the defender another. These disputes still continued, and had his father lived he could and most probably would have called up the bond at 31st December 1871. Being now in his father's place, he had exercised his right under the bond, which it would be conceded was an absolute obligation. He was met with the objection,—"You are not entitled to call up this sum in the bond, so far at least as £15,000 of it is concerned, because you have voluntarily retired from the directorate." This defence was founded on a clause in Mr Francis Pirie's settlement. That clause must be read on the footing that he, the pursuer, was creditor, and the defender debtor, in the bond; and it merely conferred on the defender a right to refrain from paying under certain circumstances. The two circumstances which bestowed this right were (1) the regular payment of interest, and (2) the pursuer's remaining a director. If these two things concurred, the defender would have right to refrain from paying till 31st December 1879. The question was, what is the meaning of these words, "the said Alexander George Pirie, while alive, being throughout a director?"

The defender contended that these words were intended only to apply to the case of his not being elected a director, or being ejected after election, and not to extend to the case of his voluntary resignation. But it was inconceivable that his father, had such been his meaning, would have so expressed himself. He admitted that he could not sue without giving up his seat at the board, but contended that his right to sue depended on the bond, and not on the condition. The condition was one attaching to the defender's defence, not to his, the pursuer's, right of action. His father selected the retention of a seat on the board as a check on his calling up the defender's bond, and he did so because he thought it improbable that he would sacrifice his seat in order to call up the bond, or that the defender would provoke him to do so, by assisting to eject him. But he left his retirement in his own hands, and placed no condition on that. There were various circumstances which might conduce to a partner retiring from the directorate of a company. Were the Court to inquire into every case of resignation and say whether it was warranted in the circum-entitled, for the sole purpose of benefiting himself and of injuring the defender, to decline to be or to act as a director, or to exercise the control which everybody is willing he should have.

---

"The Lord Ordinary looks upon the condition as if the will had provided that the money should not be called up while the defender left it in the firm, and while the pursuer as a partner could look after it till 1879. The obvious purpose was, that the testator's younger son should have a chance or opportunity of paying the sum out of the profits instead of being compelled to sell out the whole or the greater part of his capital in a concern so lucrative. If this purpose can be legitimately looked at it seems to follow that the pursuer cannot arbitrarily defeat it.

"The Lord Ordinary does not rest his judgment upon that portion of the proof in which it was attempted to shew that the pursuer had no very pressing need of money. It seems clear enough that at the utmost he wanted £1000 or £2000, and his accruing profits for a few months greatly exceed this sum. Even if there had been want of funds, however, for the pursuer's private purposes, the Lord Ordinary thinks this would not entitle him to defeat a provision which was intended for the benefit of his younger brother, and which the Lord Ordinary thinks must be construed fairly and equitably, so as to secure to the younger brother the benefit which his father intended to give him."

No. 154.
July 19, 1873.
Pirie v. Pirie.

stances before acknowledging the pursuer's right under the bond? The testator had committed no such function to the Court. He had simply bestowed on the debtor the privilege of postponing payment during the continued existence of two circumstances; one of these was entirely in the debtor's power, the other was not; and the latter having failed, the debtor could no longer plead his right to refrain from payment.

The defender argued;—In referring to the differences which existed among the partners of the firm it must not be forgotten that these were of the pursuer's own making. But the main question was one of construction of the deed. His father, Mr Francis Pirie, by agreeing to postpone any payment of the sums in the bond till 31st December 1871, manifested from the outset his intention of giving him, the defender, an opportunity of paying up the sum out of the profits of the business, in which he had established him, and which he well knew were his only means, otherwise he would not have subserved the object he had in view. He had, moreover, in contemplation the event of his death; and therefore, to carry out his beneficial intention towards him still further, he inserted the clause in question in his settlements. He was not satisfied to leave matters to their natural course in that event, but conferred on him the right to refrain from paying for eight years at least, or till 31st December 1879; his object still being the same—to enable him to provide funds out of the profits of the business. That right depended upon this condition, that the pursuer should continue a director of the company. The question was, could that condition be voided and the right defeated by a voluntary resignation on the pursuer's part? Now, the clause said distinctly that he, the defender, should have right to refrain from paying. That a right was given was contrary to the idea of voluntary defeat on the part of the pursuer. There could be no right at all if its existence lay at the mercy of the obligant. Therefore the pursuer's contention was inconsistent, both with the intention of the testator and with the special words of the settlement. The true meaning of the condition was that the pursuer should be retained in the direction. It was their father's wish to perpetuate the family influence in the firm, as well as to give the pursuer every means of protecting a property in which, on his own account, and through his the defender's debt he had such an interest. He therefore laid on him, the defender, every inducement to assist in retaining the pursuer in the office of director. Such an interpretation gave a meaning to the clause without defeating the right conferred thereby, and was the one which the Court, taking an equitable view, must necessarily adopt.

At advising,—

Lord Justice-Clerk.—This case, which raises some questions of importance, turns on the construction of a clause in the settlement of Mr Francis Pirie, the father of the pursuer and defender in the action. The testator was a partner, and had a very large interest in the firm of Alexander Pirie and Sons, paper-makers in Aberdeen. Before his death, in 1870, he had made over to his two sons, Alexander George Pirie and Francis Logie Pirie, a large share of that interest, so that they were themselves, before that event, partners in the firm. It appears that Alexander Pirie and Sons had in 1868 taken steps to convert their business into a limited liability company, but they had gone no further than to adopt articles of association, and had not registered the new company. Prior to the death of Francis Pirie it appears that some disputes had arisen between the elder son and some of the other partners regarding the affairs of the concern, and particularly about the amount of dividend to be declared, and that the father took the side of his elder son. The trust-deed came into operation in 1870. Prior to that the shares of the two brothers in the firm stood thus:

Alexander Pirie, the elder, had received more than £100,000 worth of stock, and he had granted to his father bonds to the amount of £44,000 as the price. On the other hand, Francis Logie Pirie had received £36,000 worth of stock, and had granted a bond for £24,000 to his father, and come under certain other obligations. On the death of Mr Pirie the settlement came into operation, and the effect was that Alexander Pirie not only retained the amount of stock he held before, but became the creditor in his own bond for £44,000, and in his brother's bond for £24,000. On the other hand, in addition to the nine hundred shares he already held, Francis Logie Pirie acquired, through his father's death, three hundred more, worth about £12,500, but burdened with his mother's life-rent provision for £750 a-year; and he acquired further this benefit, that, in reference to £15,000 sterling of the capital contained in his personal bond to his father for £24,000, he should have right to refrain from paying up the said £15,000 for the period of eight years after his father's death, or until 31st December 1879, if that were later; but this on condition that the interest be regularly paid, and in the event of the truster's elder son, "the said Alexander George Pirie, while alive, being throughout a director of the said firm of Alexander Pirie and Sons." The clause containing this provision is the one we have now to construe.

Now, the dispute that had arisen before the testator's death continued after that date, and seems still to exist. Alexander Pirie was not in the habit of taking an active part in the business of the firm, but he had always been a director. At the end of eight months, however, he wrote resigning his directorship, in terms of the articles of association. In the present position of the firm there are only two other partners besides the pursuer and defender. The pursuer having taken this step forthwith made a demand upon the defender for payment of the principal sum in the bond. And the question is, whether Francis Logie Pirie has lost his right to refrain from paying till the time mentioned by his father, or whether the condition of his right to refrain has failed. The Lord Ordinary thinks that the condition has not failed, and I am disposed to concur with him, though not in all the reasons given for his judgment.

What we have to consider is, whether this condition has been violated? In the view I take of this question I do not suggest any other reading of the words than that which they reasonably and naturally admit of. A strictly literary construction of them is impossible, for so read they would imply that the right would never commence until the period fixed for its termination, seeing that it cannot be known that the interest for these eight years is regularly paid, or that Alexander is a director throughout the whole of that period, until the period has expired. But of course the words, although inaccurate, must receive a construction according to their true meaning. And that meaning, however they may be read, plainly implies that, as long as the interest is regularly paid, and as long as Alexander is also a director, Alexander shall have no right to exact payment of this bond until 1879, and that Francis during the same period shall have right to refrain from paying it. As far as Francis is concerned, the condition is rather resolutive than suspensive. His right to refrain from payment arose instantly on his father's death; but it was liable to be terminated by the failure of either of these conditions. On the other hand, Alexander acquired no right from his father to exact payment of the bond prior to 1879, unless he could shew that the condition had failed.

Conditions of this kind, resolutive of testamentary gifts or bequests, which truly partake of the nature of a penalty, are, when they are what are called voluntary or potestative conditions, to be construed favourably for the donee, and according to the spirit and direction of the object which the testator had in contemplation. Lord Stair clearly states the distinction between such conditions and those which are casual. He says,—"These uncertain conditions are of two kinds,—voluntary, which depend on the free will of some persons; and casual, which depend on the casual events of that which cannot naturally be foreknown" (i. 3, 8.) Whatever may be the rule in regard to casual conditions, which depend on events indifferent to the subject of the grant, and over which no one concerned has power, in regard to potestative conditions, which depend on the will of the party bound,

No. 154.
July 19, 1873.
Pirie v. Pirie.

or on that of a third party, it is essential to look to the relation of the condition to the subject of the gift, and the effect which it was intended by the testator to operate. Such conditions need not always be performed in terms, or specifically. In some cases equivalents may be sufficient fulfilment. In others fulfilment of part may suffice instead of complete fufilment, and in others, again, the condition need not be performed at all. These results all depend on the substance of the condition more than on the mere words in which it may be expressed. I cannot better explain what I take to be the law in regard to this matter than in the words of a celebrated French jurist on this very subject. Writing on potestative conditions in testaments, Domat says (iii. 8, 24)—"It follows from the preceding rules that where testators have burdened their heirs or legatees with conditions dependent partly on their own act, and partly on that of others, it is impossible to lay down any general rule as to whether the gift is null, if the condition is not strictly performed, or whether the condition will be held as accomplished if it be not the fault of the heir or legatee that it has not been satisfied. For there are cases in which such conditions are held as accomplished, although they have not been fully so, in respect the party bound has done all in his power to fulfil them; and there are others in which it is essential that they should be absolutely performed. But the general rule is, and one common to all these sorts of conditions, that their nature must be judged of by the quality of the acts on which they depend, by the interests of the persons which the testator was providing for, and the motives which he had in view." "And it is by all these views, and others, by which the intention of the testator may be ascertained, that one can judge of the effect of such conditions, giving them such effect as that intention may seem to demand."

Looking, then, at this condition in the light of these views, it appears that there was a voluntary or potestative condition. The right to confer or to withhold this office of director was a matter partly within the power of Francis himself, and partly within that of two or three other persons, partners of the company. I infer from this that the bestowal of this office was the consideration or counterpart which Alexander was to receive in respect of the postponement of his right to realise the bond; and that the testator's object was, by this inducement, and by giving his brother a motive to maintain him in that position, to protect or secure Alexander in the enjoyment of it. About this there can be little doubt.

It might have been doubtful if, contrary to the remonstrances of Francis, the other partners had removed Alexander from the direction, under which of the categories mentioned by Domat the case would have fallen. I incline to think that the election of the pursuer as a director was essential to the condition. The testator, however, knew that if the two brothers were agreed, the exclusion of the pursuer was substantially impossible, because the amount of stock which they held gave them a potential voice in the company. But I am very clearly of opinion that it was no part of the condition, and was not implied in it, that Alexander should accept the consideration. It was enough that he had it in his power. It was open to him to accept or refuse it. The condition being one for his benefit, he might abandon or discharge it as he pleased. In the same way, he might, if he chose, decline to accept the interest. It was enough if payment was offered. The condition about the directorate was not a matter left in Alexander's choice. It was a benefit of which he was to be the recipient at the hands of others. When the others tendered it the condition was performed. Whatever construction, therefore, may be put on the words, it is impossible to spell out of them a merely casual condition. It is by no means necessary to support this view, that we should hold that Alexander was a director when he was not a director. But it is quite reasonable to hold that he has renounced the benefit of the condition by refusing to accept of its fulfilment. If he had agreed with his brother to postpone payment of the interest for a term, it might be quite truly alleged that the interest had not been regularly paid, but it would be equally true that the condition had not failed. As it is, those on whose will the condition depended have exercised it in conformity with the condition, and that is all which the testator, in my opinion, intended. The case, however, may be solved on a simpler and more general rule, applicable to all conditions, whether in obligations or in contracts. The condition has been fulfilled, because the pursuer, who had the sole interest in its not being fulfilled, has, by his voluntary act, and intentionally, made it, as circumstances at present stand, impossible to fulfil it.

No one else had any interest in this condition. The partners had none, for the choice of directors lay absolutely with them; and it signified nothing to them whether the bond was paid up or not. The pursuer admits that his resignation was intended for no other purpose than to make the condition fail.

There can be no higher authority on such a question quoted in this Court than the rules and principles of the civil law. Far more scientific than the law of England, and far more copious than our own, the civil law in this case, as in many others, furnishes the only repository where such difficulties are satisfactorily solved. To this authority I shall shortly refer, and I think it clear and conclusive.

There are three texts in the Digest on this subject. The first is in L. 35, tit. 1, 81, in relation to conditions in testaments—"Tunc demum pro impleta habetur conditio, cum per eum stat qui, si impleta esset, debiturus erat." The second is in L. 45, tit. 1, 85, sec. 7, and relates to conditions in contracts—"Quicunque sub conditione obligatus, curaverat ne conditio existeret nihilominus obligetur." The third is in the 161st law of the last title, De Regulis Juris, and is of general import. It is in these terms—"In jure civili receptum est quotiens per eum cujus interest conditionem non impleri, fiat quominus impleatur, perinde haberi ac si impleta conditio fuisset; quod ad libertatem, et legata, et ad heredum institutionem perducitur."

These texts, for my present purpose, require no comment at all. They are perfectly precise and to the purpose. They have, however, been very fully illustrated by the commentators. The whole body of law contained in the Pandects on this subject will be found in Pothier's methodised work on the Pandects, under the i. 35, tit. 1, secs. 11-20; and a great number of instructive examples are there given. Pothier states the law relative to contracts in the same terms in his treatise on Obligations, part 2, chap. 3, sec. 212; and repeats the doctrine as regards legacies in his work on the customs of Orleans (introduction to tit. 16, sec. 5, 2). Domat thus expresses himself (Civil Law, i. 5, 16)—"If the occurrence or accomplishment of a condition is prevented by that one of the persons contracting who has an interest that it should not arrive, whether it depend on his own act or not, the condition, as far as he is concerned, shall be held as accomplished, and he shall be held to that which he was bound to do, to give, or to suffer, as if the condition had been accomplished."

It is of less moment what the law of England is on this head, for we follow the civil law, and the distinction between law and equity introduces an element perplexing to us, but I imagine the principle to be the same. In the case of Hotham v. E. India Co., in 1778 (Langdell's Cases on Contracts, ed. 1871, p. 789), I find Mr Justice Ashurst thus expressed himself—"It is unnecessary to say whether the clause relative to the certificate be a condition precedent or not; for granting it to be a condition precedent, yet the plaintiff having taken all proper steps to obtain the certificate, and it being rendered impossible to be performed by the neglect and default of the company's agents, which the jury have found to be the case, it is equal to performance. If it were necessary to cite any case for this, which is evident from common sense, it was so held in Rolle's Abridgment, p. 455, and many other books." Story also, in his work on Contracts, holds similar language, and quotes many American cases in support of it.

These authorities appear to me to be conclusive of this case. It is true that the civilians also lay down that it is not every act by the debtor making the condition impossible which will be held as fulfilment; and that if the result be only indirect, or in the assertion or maintenance of a separate right, it may not have that effect. But this cannot avail the pursuer. It is very clearly proved that in resigning his office as director he acted with no object but that of making fulfilment of the condition impossible. I do not even think it proved that he was only acting as a prudent man, for the purpose of obtaining money which was necessary or important to him. I doubt if he was in any urgent need of funds, seeing that his interest in the company is worth more than £100,000. He has the interest of £15,000 at 5 per cent, and he had £9000 paid over to him at his father's death. The impression produced on my mind, and I regret to say it, has been that his primary if not his sole object was to deprive his brother of the benefit his father intended for him. He has failed in this, and, in my opinion, has deservedly failed.

No. 154.
July 19, 1873.
Pirie v. Pirie.

LORD COWAN.—The provision, the true construction of which is for decision of the Court, is contained in the last will and settlement of Francis Pirie, the father of the two parties to this litigation. He died 1st August 1870 possessed of a large fortune. The deed is in the form of a general conveyance to his eldest son, Alexander George, the pursuer of the action, as universal disponee and executor, with directions as to certain provisions settled on his widow, and on the defender, his second son.

The testator and his two brothers, Alexander and Gordon, were partners of the company of Alexander Pirie and Sons, paper-manufacturers, Aberdeen; and subsequently, as appears from the deeds referred to in the contract and agreement of March 1868, the pursuer and defender were assumed as partners. Their respective shares are therein stated to be as follows:—The father of the pursuer and defender 5-24th shares, his brother Alexander 8-24th shares, his brother Gordon 4-24th shares, the pursuer Alexander George 4-24th shares, and the defender Francis Logie 3-24th shares, and the capital stock of the company at £300,000. And it further appears from said deed that the partners had resolved to increase their capital to £360,000, divided into 7200 shares of £50 each, and to form the company into a limited liability concern, as soon as could be effected consistently with the statute as to such companies, under certain articles of agreement which are narrated in the deed. Upon the defender's admission into the concern his father, upon certain terms and conditions, had advanced him in loan £21,000, being the amount of capital effeiring to his 3-24th shares. The resolution of the partners to the effect mentioned made it requisite for the defender, with the aid of his father, to provide for his share of the increased capital; and this led to the contract and agreement in March 1868 and the execution of the new bond by the defender to his father for £24,000, in lieu of the previous bond for £21,000 with the addition of £3000 of further advance. This is the bond for £24,000 of which payment is sought in this action; but it is not immaterial, as bearing upon their father's willingness to aid the defender in the matter of capital, that it is provided that notwithstanding the bond being payable at Whitsunday 1868 neither the father nor any party in his right, in the event of the defender complying with the condition as to payment of interest and certain stipulations as to payment of the principal sum by instalments out of the profits, if enforced, was to exact payment of the amount of the bond until 31st December 1879. That accordingly is the date on which the whole amount would have been payable but for the direction contained in the settlement as to this matter.

The deed of settlement in favour of the pursuer contains various directions with which, by his acceptance of the deed, he was bound to comply in the administration of the large estate left to him by his father. The direction now in question is to this effect:—"Further, in reference to £15,000 stg. of the capital," and so forth, "I hereby direct that on interest being paid regularly, and in the event of my eldest son (the pursuer), while alive, being throughout a director of the said firm of Alexander Pirie and Sons," or of the limited company to be formed, "the said Francis Logie Pirie (defender) may and shall have right to refrain from paying up the said sum of £15,000, and that for the period of eight years after my death and until the arrival of 31st December 1879 if that be later," and it is also directed that the rate of interest from the date of the granter's death should be 5 per cent. That it was the intention of the father, by this direction to his general disponee, to confer a substantial advantage on the defender, is manifest. The capital of which he required to have the command, in order to the retention of his shares in this prosperous company, had been advanced to him by the testator, who was well aware that by no other means

No. 154.

July 19, 1873.

Pirie v. Pirie.

could the necessary capital be raised. For this reason it was that the delay in payment was provided in the bond itself; and for the same reason it evidently was that the father by his settlement conferred upon the defender right to refrain from paying up the bond to the extent of £15,000 for eight years after his death. This was the primary purpose of this latter part of the fourth direction of the settlement, and the advantage thus conferred is subject to certain conditions, with which, so far as within his power or under his control, the defender was bound to comply. One of those conditions was within the defender's power, viz., due and regular payment of the interest of the bond; the other was under his control only to a certain extent, viz., that he should, as far as his share in the concern would enable him to do so, give his aid and vote at the annual election of directors for the pursuer's continuance at the board. And hence had the case occurred of the defender in either of these respects acting otherwise the right conferred on him subject to these conditions might well be held to have fallen. But this is not the construction of his father's declared will for which the pursuer contends. The words "in the event of my eldest son while alive being throughout a director of the said firm" were intended, or, whether intended or not, are capable of no other meaning than one which gives him power at any time to put an end to the right conferred on the defender at his own will and pleasure by simply resigning the office of director, or by refusing to continue in office when re-elected. By his own act, whenever he pleased, after his father's death, it is contended, that the settlement empowers him to remove the restraint under which he was placed, and to exact full payment of the bond—sic volo sic jubeo. Such is the pursuer's contention.

I cannot, any more than the Lord Ordinary, take this view of the pursuer's position, and his relation with the defender under their father's settlement. It seems to me all-material, in the first place, that we are dealing here with the meaning and effect of an express direction by the granter of the deed which constituted the pursuer his father's universal disponee, and carried to him the right to the bond now sought to be enforced. Second, that this being a question affecting the construction of certain provisions in the deed of settlement, intended by the father to regulate the mutual rights of his two sons, the words employed are to be freely and liberally construed, so as to give full effect to what in the circumstances must be regarded to have been his will and intention; and, third, that under the provisional bequest (for that is the true character of the right given to the defender by the will) it cannot be held, consistently with the nature and the words of the deed, that their father intended to confer on the pursuer as universal disponee an absolute and capricious right, by resigning his office of director, to deprive the defender of that advantage which he so anxiously conferred, and which he plainly contemplated as necessary for the defender's continued connection with the company of which he had in his lifetime constituted him a partner. The fourth direction of the settlement is the only provision in favour of the defender which it contains; and that provision and bequest is conferred on certain onerous conditions being implemented by him, viz., (1) that he should grant a personal bond for an annuity of £750 in favour of the granter's widow, payable half-yearly during her lifetime, and this to be executed within two months after the father's death and (2) that he should execute and deliver a deed validly and effectually approving of the father's settlement, and accepting the provisions made in full satisfaction of his whole claims, right, and interest under his mother's marriage-settlement, and also of all rights competent to him in name of legitim or bairn's part of gear or otherwise. Subject to these conditions, which were fulfilled, the right to the three hundred shares in the concern and the right to refrain payment of the bond of £15,000 till 1879 were conferred, and it would be little better than mockery and delusion had the provision contained words so absolute and incapable of construction as to entitle the pursuer at his own hand and by an act of his, over which the defender had no control, so far to destroy the father's declared will. It may be difficult to understand the exact object which the condition had in view. Probably it was to secure that the pursuer by continuing a director, with consent of the other partners, might see the business so conducted as would con-

No. 154.

July 19, 1873.
Pirie v. Pirie.

duce most for his own and the defender's interest. And this, for anything that appears to the contrary, might have been his position now. But he voluntarily abdicates that position, and resigns his office of director, although none of his copartners were otherwise than perfectly willing that he should remain a director, as he had been in his father's lifetime. Certainly the defender has done nothing adverse. He is willing to do all that in him lies to give effect to this condition, and that may be held sufficient for his defence. The condition in one view of it may be held as qualifying the defender's right, and if so then the defence is complete. But whatever may be thought of this, I am very clear that, according to the sound construction and true meaning of the provision, it was not left within the power of the pursuer to act as he has done, and deprive the defender of the benefit secured to him by his father's will.

That conditions of this kind will not be permitted to destroy the rights conferred by the deed is consistent with those rules of construction which have been recognised, so as to secure full effect being given to the enixa voluntas of the testator, to be gathered from the terms in which the provision to be construed is expressed in the deed of settlement. The rules of construction are different with regard to conditions in contracts from those applicable to questions arising under deeds of settlement. Yet even in cases of that kind principles have been acted on very analogous to those here applicable,—the case of Lord Hopetoun v. Hunter's Trustees, House of Lords, 13th June 1865, ante, vol. iii. p. 50. This distinction bears very directly on the question of the testator's meaning, on which I have already dwelt. But apart from this view, as matter of general law, Pothier, in his work on Obligations, states—"It is a rule common to all conditions and obligations that they be taken to be accomplished when the debtor, who is obliged under such conditions, has prevented its accomplishment," and he refers to various texts in the civil law in support of the proposition. Now, I think it cannot be doubted that the principle applies to this case. The pursuer's right to enforce payment of the bond to its full extent was subject to his continuing a director of the company, and this he would have been at this moment but for his own voluntary resignation. He has prevented the accomplishment of that condition on which he says, in consequence of its non-existence, the defender's right to withhold payment was made dependent. The contest between these parties must be viewed in such circumstances as if the pursuer was still in the direction of the company. One other quotation from the same author, as bearing on the general argument which I have explained, may be here stated viz., "that conditions ought to be accomplished in the manner that was probably intended by the parties, and this serves to decide the question made by the doctors, whether conditions ought to be accomplished literally in forma specifica. The answer is that commonly they ought to be accomplished in forma specifica, but they may nevertheless sometimes be accomplished per equipollens when from the subject-matter it appears that this was probably the intention of the parties." This proposition may not meet the precise case before us, for in many respects it is quite singular, there being conditions attached, not to the debtor only as regards his obligation to pay, but to the creditor as regards his right to enforce the obligation. But the rule appears to me to be clearly applicable in principle, and this all the more from the question being one as to the meaning of a testamentary deed, and the true intention of the father of these parties in stating their relative rights and obligations as to this bond for £24,000.

Lord Benholme.—I concur with your Lordships in regretting that the civil law has not been made matter of more serious inquiry at the bar with regard to its bearing on this case. I regret that that law does not seem to have the same authority at the bar now, and does not now receive the same attention that it did in my younger days. Then, whenever the principles of the civil law could in such cases of equitable construction in equity be applied, they were recognised as the law of Scotland.

My view of this case does not require any detailed examination of the circumstances out of which it has arisen. I think the case is to be solved on a very general principle,—namely, that where a party pleads a condition, which he himself has been the means of defeating, he cannot take any benefit from the failure of that condition.

This is a very general rule repeatedly recognised by the civil law, and nowhere more distinctly than in the sec. 161 of the title De Regulis Juris, referred to by your Lordship. It applies to the case exactly. For here, Alexander, the elder brother, was bound to refrain from exacting this debt so long as two conditions continued to be implemented. The first of these conditions has been regularly fulfilled, while the second has been rendered impossible by Alexander's own act. As he was debtor in the conditional obligation of refraining, I apprehend he has, as so clearly laid down by the civil law in the passages referred to by your Lordship, no right to found upon the failure of that condition which he has himself rendered impossible.

LORD NEAVES.—If this case were to be decided on the special grounds stated by the Lord Ordinary in his interlocutor, or on the particular grounds mainly relied on in support of that interlocutor, I confess I have considerable doubts whether I should have concurred. In particular, I am not satisfied as matter of fact that the intent and meaning of old Mr Pirie's settlement was that which has been contended for. I have a difficulty in arriving at the testator's real meaning where I find it is the case of a father inclined to favour one child at the expense of another. The ground which your Lordship in the chair has explained is, I think, the true ground for deciding this case,—a ground established by the civil law, and which equity will enforce in every country deriving aid from that source. That ground is totally independent of what was in the mind of the testator. This is a legacy by the father to the second son, a legacy of a peculiar kind, of the nature of a legatum liberationis. The eldest son is the debtor in this sense, that he is bound to recognise his younger brother's right to refrain from paying the £15,000 until the expiry of eight years, the right being dependent on two conditions, first, the regular payment of interest by the younger brother, and, second, the continuance of the elder son in the directorship. Both of these conditions must be complied with, or held in law to be complied with. The first has been literally implemented. The second has not. The pursuer has not remained in the directorship. But why? Because he declines to continue. That raises the very point on which the civilians have laid down the principle, that wherever a man for whose benefit a condition is created prevents the fulfilment of the condition he cannot claim as if the condition had failed. The present case appears to be a peculiarly strong example of the principle; for this is a condition not to be performed by strangers and third parties, or to which their concurrence was necessary. The second condition was one to be fulfilled by the joint act of the two brothers, and of them alone, namely their concurrence in continuing the elder brother in the directorship. The civilians illustrate the principle by a great many cases. A testator leaves his property to Titius if he marries Sempronia. Suppose Titius does all he can to implement the condition, but Sempronia declines to have him, the condition does not apply. Or, a property is left to Titius if he marries Sempronia; if he does not it goes to her. Suppose she refuses to marry him, the prætor would not put her in possession of the property because of the non-fulfilment of the condition which she had rendered impossible, the condition being obviously intended for his benefit. The civil law said, "Pro impleta habetur conditio quum per eum steterit qui, si impleta esset, debiturus erat." This is a principle founded on equity, and which we are bound to apply, on grounds of plain justice, independently of the authority which the civil law possesses with us, and which I hope it will long continue to enjoy.

THE COURT accordingly pronounced the following interlocutor:—

"Find that, as the pursuer has voluntarily renounced and resigned his position as a director of the company of Alexander Pirie and Sons, he is not thereby entitled to demand present payment of the bond libelled, but that, in respect that specific implement of the condition expressed in the settlement of Francis Pirie has been prevented by his own act, it must be held as accomplished;

No. 154.
July 19, 1873.
Pirie v. Pirie.

and to that extent and effect adhere to the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor: Find the defender entitled to additional expenses, and remit," &c.

WEBSTER & WILL, S.S.C.—STUART & CHEYNE, W.S.—Agents.

No. 155.

JAMES FORBES BEATTIE AND ANOTHER, Compearers.—Birnie.

July 19, 1873.
Beattie, &c.

Judicial Referee—Fee—Expenses.—A judicial referee and the clerk to the reference are entitled to decree for their fees and expenses against both parties conjunctly and severally.

1st DIVISION.
Ld. Ormidale.
M.

IN an action (Steuart v. Bremer) the parties entered into a judicial reference, with power also to the referee to dispose of the question of expenses, to which the authority of the Lord Ordinary was interponed.

After some procedure the clerk to the reference intimated to the parties that the award, which was in favour of the pursuer and awarded expenses against the defender, was ready to be issued, on payment of the fees and expenses of referee and clerk.

The defender tendered one-half of the sum.

The pursuer refused to pay any part.

The referee and clerk compeared, and moved the Lord Ordinary for decree against the parties conjunctly and severally.

Lord Ormidale reported the case to the First Division.[1]

LORD PRESIDENT.—I do not entertain any doubt. The general principle is that wherever a person of skill or a professional man is appointed or authorised to do anything under the orders of the Court the Court will enforce payment of his remuneration or expenses against both parties conjunctly and severally, and this applies to the case of a judicial referee. I am not surprised that there is no reported decision directly in point, because in practice there is no doubt entertained that a judicial referee is entitled to decree for his fee, and the clerk to the reference for his remuneration and expenses against the parties conjunctly and severally. The reason is very clear, and the principle runs through a number of cases. An illustration of the general principle is to be found in the case of the Common Agent in the Locality of the Barony Parish of Glasgow, 11th Feb. 1871, 9 Macph. 520.

The other Judges concurred.

THE following interlocutor was pronounced on 6th December 1872:—"The Lord Ordinary having heard the counsel for Mr James Forbes Beattie, the judicial referee in this case, and for Mr Arthur David Morice, advocate in Aberdeen, the clerk to the said reference, and no appearance being made on the part of either the pursuer or the defender, and having advised with the Lords of the First Division of the Court, approves of the

[1] The following cases were cited for the compearers:—Fraser v. Johnston's Trustees, 13th December 1833, 12 S. 209; Baxter, 1st June 1838, 16 S. 1805; Brodie, 7th July 1836, 14 S. 1095.

Reference may also be made to the case of Mackintosh and Others v. M'Arthur Moir, in which the Court, of consent of both parties, made a remit to Mr James Peddie, civil engineer, and thereafter, 4th July 1872, pronounced the following interlocutor in regard to the expenses incurred to him:—"Find the pursuers and the defender liable each in one-half of the expenses incurred to the said James Peddie junior, conform to note thereof, No. 158 of process, and decern against the pursuers and defender, conjunctly and severally, for payment to him of the sum of £89, 16s. 4d. sterling, the amount of said expenses."

Auditor's report on the amount of the fee to be paid to the judicial referee, being £36, 15s. sterling, No. 26 of process: Finds the pursuer and defender conjunctly and severally liable in payment to the said James Forbes Beattie of said sum of £36, 15s., reserving to the said parties their relief inter se, and decerns against them accordingly: Further, approves of the Auditor's report on the account of expenses incurred to the said Arthur David Morice, as clerk aforesaid, No. 27 of process, amounting as taxed to the sum of £23, 16s. sterling: Finds the pursuer and defender conjunctly and severally liable in payment to the said Arthur David Morice of the said sum of £23, 16s. sterling, reserving to the said parties their relief inter se, and decerns against them accordingly."

No. 155.

July 19, 1873.
Beattie, &c.

HENRY & SHIRESS, S.S.C.—Agents.

MRS MARIA ANSTRUTHER OR SMITH CUNINGHAME AND HUSBAND, Pursuers.—Shand.
MRS ANNABELLA AGNES ANSTRUTHER AND OTHERS (Anstruther's Trustees), Defenders.—Balfour.

No. 156.

July 19, 1873.
Anstruther, &c. v. Anstruther's Trustees

Appeal to House of Lords.—After a judgment had been pronounced by the House of Lords containing a remit to the Court of Session the parties compromised the case, and the Court, upon a joint minute in manuscript, applied the judgment, and assoilzied the defenders.

Appeal to House of Lords.—Observed, that when after or in consequence of a judgment of the House of Lords, anything remains to be done in the case in the Court of Session, the proper mode of bringing the case before the Court is by petition.

IN the House of Lords, ante vol. x. H.L. p. 39. In the Court of Session, ante, vol. vii. p. 689, vol. viii. p. 1013, and vol. ix. p. 619.

1st DIVISION. M.

In this case the House of Lords remitted back the cause to the Court of Session "to do therein as shall be just and consistent" with certain declarations, findings, and directions.

The case was subsequently compromised, and the parties presented a joint minute in manuscript craving the Court to apply the judgment and assoilzie the defenders.

LORD PRESIDENT.—In all ordinary cases where anything remains to be done, after or in consequence of the judgment of the House of Lords, the proceeding in this Court must begin by a petition. But this case is peculiar. Although there is a remit from the House of Lords we are not called upon to carry out that remit nor to apply our minds judicially to the remit at all. I am of opinion therefore that in respect of the joint minute we may apply the judgment and assoilzie the defenders.

THE COURT, in respect of the joint minute, "apply the judgment of the House of Lords, and assoilzie the defenders from the conclusions of the action, and find neither party entitled to expenses."

The same course was followed in a claim at the instance of Mrs Mercer and husband.

HAMILTON, KINNEAR, & BEATSON, W.S.—A. & A. CAMPBELL, W.S.—Agents.

No. 157.

July 19, 1873.
Walker v. Bathgate.

WILLIAM WALKER, Respondent and Appellant.—Watson—W. A. Brown.
JAMES DUNCAN BATHGATE, Complainer and Respondent.—Asher—A. J. Young.

Expenses—Procurator-Fiscal—Statutes 20 and 21 Vict. c. 148 (Local) (Tweed Fisheries Act, 1857), sec. 82; 31 and 32 Vict. c. 123 (Tweed Fisheries (Scotland) Act, 1868), secs. 18, 38, and 41; 27 and 28 Vict. c. 53 (Summary Procedure (Scotland) Act, 1864), sec. 22.

The Tweed Fisheries Act, 1857, authorises an award of expenses against a person convicted of an offence under the Act.

The Summary Procedure Act, 1864, provides that expenses shall not be awarded to or against any public procurator or party prosecuting under the authority of any Act of Parliament for the public interest, unless such award of expenses is authorised by such Act.

Held that the former Act by implication authorised an award of expenses against a procurator-fiscal when the person accused was acquitted, and therefore that the provision of the Summary Procedure Act did not prohibit it.

High Court of Justiciary.
Lord Justice-Clerk.
Lord Cowan.
Lord Neaves.
Justiciary Clerk.

THIS appeal from the Sheriff-substitute of Peebles to the Circuit Court of Justiciary at Jedburgh was certified to the High Court of Justiciary.

In the month of November 1872 William Walker, the appellant, was served with a complaint at the instance of the respondent, the procurator-fiscal of the county of Peebles, and designed in the complaint "procurator-fiscal of Court," charging him with a contravention of section 18 of the Salmon Fisheries Act of 1868, in respect, on the occasion libelled in the complaint, he was guilty of fishing with salmon-roe in the river Tweed. Section 18 of the Salmon Fisheries Act of 1868 is by section 41 thereof made applicable, along with three other sections, viz., the 13th, 20th, and 33d, to the river Tweed, and is declared to form a part of and to be incorporated with the Tweed Fisheries Act of 1857 and the Tweed Fisheries Amendment Act of 1859. The complaint was brought under the Summary Procedure Act, 1864.

Three witnesses were examined in support of the complaint, after which the procurator-fiscal withdrew the case. The appellant's agent thereupon moved for expenses against the procurator-fiscal, but the motion was refused by the Sheriff-substitute (Orphoot), who pronounced the following interlocutor:—"In respect the procurator-fiscal gave up the case, finds the said William Walker not guilty, and assoilzies him from the foregoing complaint."

Against this judgment Walker appealed to the next Circuit Court of Justiciary to be held at Jedburgh, and in his appeal craved the Court "to sustain the said appeal, to recall the said decree in so far as it does not find the appellant entitled to expenses in the Sheriff-court, but not otherwise; to find the appellant entitled to said expenses, and to the further expense of the appeal, and to decern against the said James Duncan Bathgate for the same."

The appellant made the following statement:—"The said James Duncan Bathgate, the complainer against the appellant, is procurator-fiscal of the county of Peebles for the public interest, but he is also the agent of the Tweed Commissioners. He is paid by the Tweed Commissioners for prosecutions under the said Acts and relative statutes, and he is responsible and accounts to them only for his actings in these respects. The said complaint against the appellant was prosecuted by the said James Duncan Bathgate in his capacity of agent of the Tweed Commissioners. The said complaint against the appellant was not a prosecution for the public interest, and does not bear to be such. The said complaint might have been competently prosecuted by any of the several persons possessing a title in respect of the above recited Acts, and any penalty or penalties recovered under said complaint would have been applied for the purposes of the said recited Acts, and not otherwise, for the public interest. The Tweed Fisheries Acts of 1857 and 1859 are local Acts."

By section 22 of the Act 27 and 28 Vict. cap. 53 (Summary Procedure Act), it is provided as follows:—"In all cases of complaint under this Act for the recovery of any penalty it shall be lawful for the Court to make an award of expenses without the same being prayed for in such complaint, but expenses shall not be awarded to or against any public procurator or party prosecuting under the authority of any Act of Parliament for the public interest, unless such award of expenses is authorised by such Act: Provided that in all cases where a complaint for the recovery of a penalty is at the instance of a private complainer it shall be lawful for the Court before which such complaint is brought to award expenses to the successful party, if the Court shall think fit, and such expenses may be recovered, and imprisonment awarded in default of payment or recovery thereof, in the manner and form specified in the said schedule (K) in connection with the several forms of convictions and judgments therein contained, or, if necessary, by separate judgment for expenses in such form as may be appropriate."

By section 82 of the Tweed Fisheries Act of 1857 it is provided as follows:—"Every penalty imposed by this Act may be recovered by action of debt in any County Court, or by summary proceeding before the Sheriff or a Justice or Justices having jurisdiction in the place where the offence is committed, or where the offender resides or is found; and on complaint being made at the instance of the procurator-fiscal or other public prosecutor of the county, district, or place where the offence may have been committed, or where the offender or offenders shall reside or may be found, or at the instance of any one or more of the Commissioners, or of their clerk, to any such Sheriff or Justice or Justices, he or they shall issue a summons or warrant requiring the person complained against to appear before the Sheriff or any Justice or Justices at a time not less than six free days after service, and at a place to be named in such summons or warrant, and every such summons or warrant, with a copy of the complaint, shall be served on the person complained against either personally or by leaving the same with some inmate at his usual place of abode, and upon the appearance of the person complained against, or in his absence, after proof of the due service of such summons or warrant, it shall be lawful for the Sheriff or Justice or Justices to proceed to the hearing of the complaint, and upon proof of the offence either by the confession of the person complained against or upon the oath of one credible witness or more, or in default of appearance of such person, it shall be lawful for such Sheriff or Justice or Justices to convict the offender, and upon such conviction to adjudge the offender to pay the penalty incurred, as well as such costs attending the conviction as such Sheriff or Justice or Justices shall think fit."

Argued for the appellant;—The Sheriff-substitute refused expenses to the appellant on the ground that the complaint in question was at the instance of the public prosecutor, and was a proceeding in the public interest; and further, that although the Tweed Act of 1857 authorised expenses to be given to the public prosecutor, in the event of a conviction, it did not authorise expenses to the party complained upon in the event of absolvitor. In both respects the Sheriff-substitute was wrong. The complaint was not a proceeding in the public interest, and the respondent, although convicting on it as procurator-fiscal of Court, was only in the position of a private complainer. The title to prosecute under the Tweed

No. 157.

July 19, 1873. Walker v. Bathgate.

Acts was conferred on four different parties—(1) the procurator-fiscal of Court, (2) the clerk of the Tweed Commissioners, (3) any one of the Commissioners, (4) the superintendent of water bailiffs; and the Act created no difference or distinction in the title. It would not seem to be doubtful that a prosecution at the instance of the superintendent of water bailiffs would not be a proceeding in the public interest, and if a complaint at the instance of the procurator-fiscal were held to be so, the result would follow that a prosecution under the Tweed Acts might be a proceeding in the public interest one day, and another day in the same Court a mere private proceeding. Further, the procurator-fiscal of Court in these cases represented no public interest; he was not prosecuting ad vindictam publicam. He was the mere servant of the Tweed Commissioners; he was paid by them, and under sections 81 and 87 of the Act of 1857 he accounted to the Commissioners for all the penalties recovered under the Acts. The alternative ground on which the judgment of the Sheriff failed was that expenses were authorised by the Act. By section 82 of the Act of 1857 the Sheriff had authority to deal with costs, which without authority he could not do; but after questions as to costs must be governed by the ordinary rule that they were awarded to the party with whom success lay. No doubt section 82 enacted per expressum only what was to be done in the case of conviction, but the contention of the appellant that expenses should follow on absolvitor was the necessary counterpart of the provision in the statute, and was by necessary implication contained in it. If this were not the sound construction, it would follow that nothing but conviction with costs could result under the statute, because nothing was said as to absolvitor at all; but that would be absurd. Further, section 38 of the Salmon Fisheries Act of 1868 provided for giving expenses to a party complained upon, who obtained absolvitor, and although that section was not made applicable to the river Tweed, it would be a strange anomaly to hold that a prosecution under section 18 of the Act of 1868 was to have one result in the Tweed, and a different one in every other river in Scotland. Looking to the terms of section 38 in the Act of 1868, it would require express excluding words in the Act of 1857 to establish the contention of the respondent. Moreover, it was evident, from the terms of section 98 of the Act of 1857, that the Act contemplated an award of expenses against the prosecutor both in the adjudication and the appeal in the case of absolvitor, and it would be a strong thing to say that expenses followed when proceedings were taken before the Justices, but did not follow when they were instituted before the Sheriff. If the appellant was right in his construction of the statute there was no difficulty in awarding expenses against a public prosecutor.[1]

Argued for the respondent;—Taking it to be a condition of the argument that the procurator-fiscal under this complaint was prosecuting in the public interest, the question standing for judgment lay within a very narrow compass. The 22d section of the Summary Procedure Act distinctly said that in such proceedings no expenses were to be awarded to or against the public prosecutor, unless these were authorised by the particular Act under which the complaint was brought. The question therefore was narrowed to this point, were expenses authorised to the person complained upon on getting absolvitor by the Tweed Fisheries Act of 1857, which turned on a construction of section 82 of that Act? The case of Ross v. Stirling, 1 Couper, 366, where expenses had been refused

[1] Prentice and Newbigging v. Bathgate, June 19, 1843, 1 Brown, 561; Wilson v. Morrison, June 15, 1844, 2 Brown, 231; Christie v. Adamson, Oct. 1, 1853, 1 Irvine, 293.

No. 157.
July 19, 1873.
Walker v. Bathgate.

altogether, in respect of a want of authority in the Act, laid down the principle by which the present question must be ruled. The provision of the statute was the authority for dealing with expenses, and the measure of its authority was the express terms of the statute, from which alone it could be deduced. The 82d section of the Act of 1857 did not satisfy this test, for it was altogether silent as to costs in the case where the public prosecutor did not succeed in obtaining a conviction. The provision in the 98th section of the Act of 1857 regulating expenses in proceedings before the Justices could not avail the appellant. The fact that they were dealt with in one clause of the statute, and excluded from the other, shewed that the mind of the Legislature had been applied to the question, and the failure to award expenses in cases of absolvitor under the 82d section must therefore be taken to be deliberate and intentional. A similar answer applied to the appellant's argument upon the 38th clause of the Salmon Fisheries Act of 1868. It was a later statute than the Tweed Fisheries Acts, and the fact that the 38th section was not incorporated into these Acts as other sections, including the one libelled in the complaint, were, must be taken as conclusive evidence that the Legislature intended the 82d section of the Act of 1857 to stand on its own proper construction; and it being silent as to expenses, except where a conviction followed, could not be pleaded as an authority for giving expenses where there was absolvitor. In any view expenses could not be awarded against a public prosecutor proceeding as the procurator-fiscal did under this complaint ad vindictam publicam.

At advising,—

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—I certified this case from the Circuit Court, not so much because I had any doubt as to what the decision ought to be, but because I thought it important that the case should be decided as authoritatively as possible, in order to afford a rule in similar cases.

The first question here is, whether the Act of 1857 does or does not authorise the Sheriff to deal with a matter of expenses under a complaint of this sort in the way of awarding them to the accused. The contention in support of the Sheriff-substitute's judgment is, that although the Act authorises the awarding expenses in favour of the prosecutor, it does not authorise any expenses being awarded to the successful accused. Now, I cannot understand on what ground this somewhat unjust and anomalous effect is supported. In my opinion, if a statute indicates that a Court is to deal with the matter of expenses at all, then, unless there is the clearest possible exclusion of it, the presumption in law and in ordinary justice is that justice is to be done to both parties. I am the more assured that this is the principle to be applied here from the fact that the reason why expenses are mentioned in the 82d section of the Act of 1857 is clearly to shew that the judge may impose expenses over and above the penalty. That leads to the implication that where the respondent is successful he is entitled to his expenses against the prosecutor. I think further that this view is strengthened by the provisions of the 98th section of the Act in regard to the Quarter Sessions.

Thus I do not think that the 22d section of the Summary Procedure Act applies in this case, for it does not take away power to award expenses, which formerly existed, but only applies to cases where there was no such authority, and in this case, as I have already shewn, authority to award expenses is given by the Act of 1857.

In these circumstances I do not think it necessary to go into the question as to what would be the presumption at common law if nothing were said about expenses in the statute. Nor do I think it necessary to inquire whether or not the procurator-fiscal was acting in this case as a public prosecutor.

I am therefore of opinion that we should sustain this appeal.

LORD COWAN.—The 22d section of the Summary Procedure Act rules the procedure in regard to expenses in all cases of complaint brought under that Act.

No. 157.

July 19, 1873. Walker v. Bathgate.

The section provides, inter alia, that "expenses shall not be awarded to or against any public prosecutor or party prosecuting under the authority of any Act of Parliament for the public interest, unless such award of expenses is authorised by such Act." This provision leaves for consideration the question whether the Act under which this complaint is brought authorises expenses to be awarded against the public prosecutor. No such power is expressly given by the Tweed Fisheries Act of 1857, under which this prosecution is brought, but it is provided that the accused may be subjected in expenses; and in the argument it was contended that although in any particular statute there may be no express authority to give expenses against the prosecutor, yet if there is authority to give them in his favour justice necessarily leads to the inference that when the respondent is successful the Court are entitled to award expenses in his favour. This principle appears to be well founded, and has on two occasions been recognised and given effect to by me on Circuit,—once along with Lord Ivory, and again with my brother Lord Neaves. These cases were referred to in the discussion, and I see no ground to depart from the principle of construction applied to a statute expressed in very similar terms to the present as regards the matter of expenses. Applying this principle to the present case, it follows that the accused party having been successful the Sheriff was authorised to award them, if he considered them justly due in the circumstances of the case. That being so, this case does not come under that part of the 22d section of the Summary Procedure Act which provides that expenses shall not be awarded against the prosecutor.

I therefore concur with your Lordship.

LORD NEAVES concurred.

THE COURT, on 4th June, sustained the appeal.

GILLESPIE & PATERSON, W.S.—MACKENZIE, INNES, & LOGAN, W.S.—Agents.

No. 158.

July 19, 1873.* Watt v. Ligertwood and Another.

JOHN WATT, Pursuer.—Scott.

JOHN LIGERTWOOD AND ANOTHER, Defenders.—Sol.-Gen. Clark—Shand.

Process-caption—Sheriff-clerk—Sheriff-clerk-depute—Contempt of Court—Damage.—A procurator presented a petition to the Sheriff for interdict, and after the Sheriff had pronounced an adverse judgment, carried off the petition, so as to prevent the Sheriff-clerk-depute writing the Sheriff's interlocutor thereon, notwithstanding the Sheriff's intimation that he desired the petition to remain with the clerk. The Sheriff-clerk-depute thereupon carried into execution a warrant in the form of an ordinary process-caption, without any notice or special warning to the procurator, and incarcerated him thereon. In an action for reduction of the said caption, and damages, at the procurator's instance, held (1) (diss. Lord Justice-Clerk) that the course taken by the Sheriff-clerk-depute was inappropriate and irregular; (2) that it was unnecessary to reduce the caption, as no further action could be taken upon it; (3) that the pursuer was not entitled to damages, in respect that it was by his own culpable conduct and contempt of the Sheriff's authority that any warrant against him had been necessary.

2D DIVISION. Ld. Mackenzie. R.

THE previous stages of this litigation are fully reported ante, vol. vi. p. 1112, and vol. viii. H. L. p. 77. By the judgment of the House of Lords Mr Comrie Thomson, the Sheriff-substitute, was found entitled to have the action dismissed as against him. The proceedings were continued against Messrs Ligertwood and Daniel.

The pursuer concluded in his summons for reduction of a process-caption, obtained and executed against him by the defender Mr Daniel, Sheriff-clerk-depute, and for damages, on the ground that Mr Daniel wrongfully and illegally applied for and obtained that process-caption,

* Decided October 27, 1871.

No. 158.
July 19, 1873.
Watt v. Ligertwood and Another.

and incarcerated the pursuer thereon, and that the other defender, Mr Ligertwood, the Sheriff-clerk, was liable for the acts of Mr Daniel, who was his depute.

The facts which the Court, after allowing proof, held proved were these :—" On the occasion in question, upon a petition praying for interdict and interim interdict at the instance of Mrs Jane Mouat, presented to the Sheriff of Aberdeenshire by the pursuer as agent for the said petitioner, and upon a caveat presented for the respondent in that petition, the Sheriff-substitute, after hearing parties' procurators, pronounced his judgment that the prayer for interim interdict should be refused; that when the Sheriff was proceeding to have his judgment to that effect written out, the pursuer, at his own hand, took possession of the petition, then in manibus curiæ; and, notwithstanding the intimation of the Sheriff-substitute that he desired the petition to remain with the clerk, in order that the interlocutor might be written upon it, carried off the petition, and prevented the interlocutor from being written thereon, and thereafter, as it appeared, destroyed the said petition in his own place of business. Thereupon the Sheriff-clerk-depute obtained and carried into execution a warrant in form of an ordinary process-caption, without any notice or special warning to the pursuer that such was to be issued or executed, and the pursuer was incarcerated thereon."

The pursuer maintained that the process-caption was illegally and incompetently granted, because, " (1st) the petition, for recovery of which the caption was issued, was not a process, but was withdrawn by him before any procedure took place upon it, and was thereupon the private property of the pursuer, or of his client, and not under the control of the Sheriff-clerk, who was in no way responsible for it; (2d) the pursuer never borrowed or granted a borrowing receipt for the petition referred to; and (3d) the process-caption was obtained without any notice having been given to the pursuer that a complaint craving the issue of such a writ had been or was to be presented."

The defenders maintained, inter alia;—(1) The pursuer's averments were not relevant or sufficient in law to support the conclusions of the action. (2) The defenders ought to be assoilzied from the conclusions of the action, in respect the proceedings complained of were in all respects lawful and regular. (3) The pursuer having illegally and unwarrantably taken away the said petition from the control and custody of the Court, or of the clerk thereof, the defender Mr Daniel, was bound, and at least was entitled, to take the steps which were adopted to enforce the return thereof.

The Lord Ordinary (Mackenzie) pronounced the following interlocutor: —" Sustains the first plea in law stated for the defenders: Dismisses the action, and decerns: Finds the pursuer liable in expenses." *

* " NOTE.— . . . . 1. The Lord Ordinary is of opinion that the petition was, at the time that the pursuer took it away, not the property of pursuer, or of his client, and not within their control. The petition prayed for an interdict against Mr Alexander Edmond, the respondent therein, and also that immediate interdict should be granted. It is stated by the pursuer that a caveat having been lodged for Mr Edmond, the pursuer and Mr Edmond's agent met in the Sheriff-clerk's office, that they went with Mr Daniel, the Sheriff-clerk-depute, before the Sheriff-substitute of Aberdeenshire, who perused the petition, heard him and Mr Edmond's agent thereon, and stated that he would not grant the interim interdict. The Lord Ordinary considers that there was, according to the pursuer's own statement, a judicial application laid before and considered by the Judge Ordinary of the bounds, a competent judge, who heard the parties, and pronounced a judicial decision on the application for interim interdict. Mr

No. 158. The pursuer reclaimed. At advising,—

July 19, 1873. Watt v. Ligertwood and Another.

LORD BENHOLME.—In this case we have had some very interesting discussion, and some of a novel kind. The result, in my opinion, is that neither party can Edmond, the respondent, was entitled to have that decision refusing interim interdict written out and signed by the Sheriff-substitute; and if the pursuer declined to proceed further with the application Mr Edmond had right to move that an interlocutor should be pronounced, dismissing the application, and finding him entitled to the expenses to which he had been put in opposing it. It is said that by immemorial practice in Aberdeenshire such a petition was the property of the petitioner, and might be disposed of by him as he pleased. Even supposing this averment to be true, it cannot affect the disposal of the present case, because such a practice, if it should exist, is, the Lord Ordinary thinks, contrary to law. The Lord Ordinary is therefore of opinion that the petition was a depending process, when the pursuer, contrary to the order of the Sheriff-substitute, given on the motion, or, as the pursuer calls it, the instigation of Mr Edmond's agent, carried it away—that the pursuer acted illegally and improperly in doing so—and that the Sheriff-clerk, who was the proper custodier of the petition, or his depute, was entitled to apply to the Sheriff for caption in order to its recovery from the pursuer.

---

"2. The pursuer further maintains that the process-caption was illegally and incompetently granted for recovery of the petition, because he had never borrowed it or granted a borrowing receipt for it. It cannot surely be maintained, that although a warrant or caption for the recovery of a process may be issued against an agent who has legally, and in ordinary form, borrowed it from the Sheriff-clerk, and granted the usual receipt for its return, and has failed to return it when required, yet that a warrant or caption cannot be issued against an agent for recovery of a process which he has illegally and improperly carried away. Such a proposition is, it is thought, wholly untenable. The ordinary warrant for recovery of a process is a caption, until the process be returned. If such a warrant can be issued for the recovery of a process from an agent who is in lawful possession of it, it can certainly be issued for the recovery of a process, or any step of or production in a process from an agent, or any other person, who has not only illegally and improperly, but in contempt of Court, as was the case in the present instance, taken it from the table on which it had been laid by the Judge, in presence of the parties, after he had perused it and heard them thereon, and pronounced his decision.

"3. The only other ground on which the illegality and incompetency of the process-caption are maintained is that no notice was given to the pursuer that a complaint craving the issue of such a writ had been or was to be presented. When an agent is lawfully in possession of a process by having borrowed it from, and granted a receipt for it to, the clerk of the process, such agent is entitled to retain it until he shall receive notice for its return; and before a caption is issued intimation of the application for caption is, according to practice, given to the agent, in order that he may return the process within a specified time. Such practice depends, not upon the provisions of any statute or Act of Sederunt, but solely upon the reasonableness and propriety of giving notice to an agent lawfully in possession of a process on a borrowing receipt, that he must return it to the Clerk of Court, otherwise it will be recovered by the caption or warrant of the Court. But such a notice was, the Lord Ordinary thinks, not required in the case of the pursuer. He had no right to take or retain possession of the process. He was a wrong-doer, who had not only illegally and improperly taken the petition out of the custody of the Court, but had, in contempt of Court, refused to return it when required by the Sheriff-substitute to do so, and carried it away. He had, the Lord Ordinary is of opinion, got all the notice that he was entitled to when the Judge, as he himself avers, desired him to return the petition to the Clerk of Court. The process-caption was the legal and competent warrant for the recovery of the petition. In the ordinary case, practice, based upon sense and reason, requires, before caption is issued, that

No. 158.
July 19, 1873.
Watt v. Ligertwood and Another.

be considered as quite successful in the proceedings. I think it is perfectly clear that Mr Watt, the pursuer of this case, acted in an irregular manner in carrying off the petition, especially after he had been requested in open Court by the Sheriff to leave it. I think the carrying off of the petition was a contempt of Court on his part, and I further think that his conduct was aggravated by his afterwards burning that petition. I am clearly of opinion that the Sheriff would have been well entitled to have, by summary warrant, brought him into Court, and, in case of his not giving up the petition, to have committed him to prison, and I think that was clearly the appropriate remedy for the wrong that he did. The course that was adopted was, I think, irregular. I do not think that a process-caption was the proper instrument in such a case. According to the practice which has prevailed, I think that a process-caption is a proceeding of this kind, that when an agent has granted his written receipt for a process or part of a process, and is under an obligation to return it whenever it is demanded, a process-caption is the mode of enforcing that obligation, but the issuing of the process-caption is always preceded by a certain intimation to him to perform the obligation, otherwise he will be incarcerated. Twenty-four hours is the regular inducie appropriate to that form. The result of the intimation is just this, that if he does not within the inducie perform the obligation, then he goes to jail. The messenger who is intrusted with the execution of the caption takes him and incarcerates him. It will at once be seen that it makes a material difference in the agent's position if such an instrument is not preceded by the usual notice. He has not the warning which invariably attends that summary mode of incarceration; he has not the warning that if he does not within a certain time perform his written obligation he will be incarcerated; but where there is no such notice the officer goes and incarcerates him without it. Now, in this case, when I look to the whole circumstances, and see what took place, and endeavour to ascertain whether Mr Watt—irregular as the process against him, in my opinion, was—is entitled to claim damages, I arrive at the conclusion that he is not. I think, in point of fact, what he has suffered already in the way of outlay, incarceration, and distress of feeling has been brought upon himself, and it cannot be considered as substantially more than he might have suffered had the more regular form of process been adopted. I am therefore of opinion that he is not entitled to damages. But while the defender is to be relieved, or at least, in my opinion, ought to be relieved, from damages, I think we should not do our duty —at least I should not conceive that I had done my duty to the law of the country, if I did not prefix that absolvitor from damages with a solemn declaration that the mode of procedure here adopted by the Sheriff-clerk was irregular, and contrary to practice, in the issuing of a process-caption and executing it in the way in which it was done. I have therefore to propose an interlocutor by which, whilst we intimate what the proper and regular mode of procedure would notice should be given to an agent, who has legally and properly borrowed, on a receipt, such a petition from the clerk. But such practice cannot apply to the pursuer's case, seeing that he had illegally and improperly carried away the process, in contempt of the order of the Court.

---

"It is further averred by the pursuer that he was not informed by the Sheriff-officer who executed the warrant that he was in possession of a process-caption against him. He does not say that the officer was not in possession of the warrant, which gave him authority to act, or that the pursuer asked to see it, and was refused. There was nothing illegal, so far as the pursuer avers, done by the officer in the execution of the warrant—Erskine, iv. 4, 33.

"The Lord Ordinary, after careful consideration of the pursuer's statements, is of opinion that these statements are not relevant or sufficient in law to support the conclusions of the summons. These averments do not set forth any grounds on which it can be held that the proceedings complained of were incompetent or illegal and wrongful, or on which the process-caption can be reduced, and the defenders found liable in damages. On the contrary, the application for and execution of the process-caption were fully justified by the circumstances disclosed in the pursuer's condescendence."

No. 158.

July 19, 1873. Watt v. Ligertwood and Another.

be in the circumstances of this singular case—and it is a most singular one, for it is not within my recollection that I have seen any such contempt of Court—whilst we must, I think, intimate what our opinion is as to the proper mode of procedure, we must also make a finding as to the irregularity of that caption which was issued. Then, as to the conclusion for reduction, I think the law would be vindicated with a mere declaration. I think the reduction of a warrant which is at an end is useless, and therefore I would dismiss the conclusion for reduction, and find no damages due to the pursuer, and no expenses to the defender.

Lord Neaves.—I concur in the opinion just delivered, and have only a few remarks to make in connection with my view of the case. I concur in pronouncing the conduct of Mr Watt, whatever personal excuses there may be in connection with it, or however he may have acted under mistake, to have been highly irregular, improper, and a contempt of judicial authority. I cannot doubt that for that conduct the Sheriff, who witnessed these proceedings, and against whose authority and orders this contempt was committed, was entitled, from the cognisance he had of the whole matter, to issue a warrant in such special form as would have compelled this party to bring back the document he had improperly taken away, and failing his instantly doing so to commit him to jail. That appears to me to be a clear proposition. At the same time I think the mode followed by the Sheriff-clerk, in the difficult circumstances in which he was placed, was irregular and inappropriate, for this reason that it could not be followed out in the usual way without presupposing a notice, while any lengthened notice in the case would have been out of the question. Therefore it is that I think proceedings should have been taken of another kind. At the same time I do not say that if this process-caption—a proceeding which itself, I think, originates as much in the idea of contempt as of obligation—had been accompanied by something like a warning, and not immediately carried into effect as was done, it might not in the circumstances have been a right thing to do. But as it was conducted we have the proceeding exposed to this remark, that it is not a special warrant requiring the party to deliver up the paper, and immediately on his failing to do so, ordering that he should be carried to prison, but it is a mixing up of the warrant of imprisonment with a form that presupposes previous notice, and yet is not itself accompanied by any warning as to the consequences. But while I therefore think that this was an irregular and inappropriate proceeding in the mode in which it was immediately used and carried into execution, I must also say that the position which Mr Watt took up is one which precludes him from insisting on his claim for damages. The Sheriff-clerk-depute was called upon to vindicate the authority of the Sheriff in some way or other. The situation was an unprecedented one, owing to the unprecedented irregularity of a procurator carrying off a process in the face of a judgment of the Court. Although, therefore, the Sheriff-clerk-depute fell into this error in point of form, which was not much of an error in substance, I think that the individual procurator who caused all this difficulty, who led to the difficulty, who exposed himself to a proceeding which might have been adopted, and would in substance be the same as that which has taken place, and who acted in all respects and ways in the wrong-headed manner that we see, either through ignorance, or from a disregard of his duty as a procurator,—I think that this party is not in a situation to make Mr Ligertwood pay damages for an error of that description. I agree with your Lordship that there is no need to reduce the warrant. Warrants do not require to be reduced, especially when they have been executed. A warrant is not a decree of any kind. On the whole matter, I think the pursuer is not entitled to any damages, but, in respect of the irregularity that has taken place, that no expenses should be given to the defender.

Lord Justice-Clerk.—In the result of the judgment proposed, by which the action stands dismissed, and neither party is found entitled to expenses, I am inclined to concur. Even assuming that the warrant in question was regular, which I think it was, it is impossible to read the proof before us without seeing

No. 158.
July 19, 1873.
Watt v. Ligertwood and Another.

that in the execution of it there was a certain amount of precipitance and harshness which might well have been avoided. If the Sheriff-clerk, having obtained his warrant, had informed his brother practitioner that he held it, and requested him to save the necessity of having it executed by returning the process, he would have acted a more judicious part, and probably would have prevented the scandal which occurred. That both sides should bear their own costs is probably a just result, and is certainly one in which I am prepared to acquiesce. But in the views which have been expressed as to the regularity of the procedure I cannot concur. I think it was quite regular; and holding that opinion, it is only fair to those concerned that I should explain the grounds of it. It must be kept in mind what the occasion and the object of the procedure were. The occasion was the abstraction of the process in open Court, pending the discussion of the case, and in spite of the orders of the Judge, by the procurator who presented the petition, and that for the purpose of obstructing the administration of justice by preventing the Judge from writing his judgment upon it. The object of the procedure on the part of the clerk was, in obedience to the direction of the Judge, to compel the immediate return of the process. I am of opinion that for this purpose the procedure was entirely appropriate. No doubt the Judge might at once have granted a warrant to apprehend Mr Watt for contempt. He might also, had he chosen, have granted a process-caption, or, what is the same thing, a warrant to imprison Mr Watt until the process was restored, without the intervention of the clerk. But he was also entitled to do what he did—to leave the responsibility of recovering the process in these circumstances on the clerk, and to grant his warrant on his application. The right of the clerk to apply at all times for a process-caption when a process is unduly withheld cannot be doubted. He is responsible to the Court for it, and cannot part with it excepting under their regulations. But the supposed irregularity is said to consist in the want of notice to Mr Watt, and this is founded on the practice which is followed when a process has been regularly borrowed, and the agent's receipt has been granted for it in the clerk's books. I think the analogy entirely inapplicable and misleading, and consider the evidence led on this subject wholly irrelevant. The practice in this Court of lending the process on a borrowing receipt rests on the Act of Sederunt of the 20th November 1711, sec. 8, by which the clerks were discharged to part with processes except on receipt. Under this regulation the borrower is legally in possession of the process, and the twenty-four hours' notice which practice has introduced before a caption can be granted is not only reasonable, but essential to the conduct of business. But the power of the Court to grant a caption for a process improperly detained by the clerk, and of the clerk to apply for it, does not depend on or originate in the borrowing receipt. This procedure was certainly in practice long before 1711. The power of the Court to grant a process-caption rests on the principle laid down by Lord Stair (iv. 47, 23), in a passage in which he explains the power of the Court to issue caption without a charge on "contempt or disorders in process," and the right of the clerk to apply for it rests on his obligation to have the process in his hands. The borrowing receipt, no doubt, judicially ascertains the fact of the process being in the borrower's hands, and there may be cases in which it would be necessary for the clerk to state the special circumstances in which he had been deprived of the process, and for the Court to inquire how the warrant was issued. But we have no such case here. Mr Watt had acquired the process illegally. The Court were cognisant of the circumstances, and had already decided that his possession of it was illegal from the first, and that it was his duty instantly to restore it. There was nothing for the clerk to explain to the Court, or for the Court to inquire into, and the application being one incidental to a cause which was in the course of adjudication, and its object being instant restoration of the process, notice would have been entirely inappropriate, and would simply have enabled the wrong-doer to succeed in obstructing the course of justice.

LORD COWAN was absent.

THIS interlocutor was pronounced on 27th October 1871:—"Find that,

No. 158.

July 19, 1873. Watt v. Ligertwood and Another.

on the occasion in question, upon a petition praying for interdict and interim interdict at the instance of Mrs Jane Mouat, presented to the Sheriff of Aberdeenshire by the pursuer as agent for the said petitioner, and upon a caveat presented for the respondent in that petition, the Sheriff-substitute, after hearing parties' procurators, pronounced his judgment that the prayer for interim interdict should be refused: Find that when the Sheriff was proceeding to have his judgment to that effect written out, the pursuer at his own hand took possession of the petition, then in manibus curiæ, and notwithstanding the intimation of the Sheriff-substitute that he desired the petition to remain with the clerk, in order that the interlocutor might be written upon it, carried off the petition, and prevented the interlocutor from being written thereon, and thereafter, as it appeared, destroyed the said petition in his own place of business: Find that the conduct of the pursuer in so acting was illegal and culpable, and amounted to a contempt of the Sheriff's jurisdiction and authority: Find that, in these circumstances, when the said petition had been so carried away, it was competent to the Sheriff, within whose cognisance and in whose presence the pursuer's proceedings took place, to have issued a summary order or warrant ordering the pursuer to restore the petition of which he so took possession, and failing his immediately restoring the same, for his immediate imprisonment till that order was implemented: But find that the conduct of the Sheriff-clerk-depute, in obtaining and carrying into execution a warrant in the form of an ordinary process-caption, without any notice or special warning to the pursuer that such was to be issued or executed, was an inappropriate and irrgular proceeding: Find, at the same time, that as no further action can be taken on the said process-caption or warrant, it is unnecessary to reduce or set aside the same: And further, find that as it was the pursuer's own illegal and culpable conduct and contempt of the Sheriff's authority which led to the necessity of a proceeding or warrant against him, and as he was in any view liable to be proceeded against in a summary manner, the pursuer is not entitled to damages as against either the principal Sheriff-clerk or against the Sheriff-clerk-depute for the error in point of form committed by the Sheriff-clerk-depute in the discharge of his official duty: Therefore, in the whole circumstances, dismiss the action, and decern, and to that extent adhere to the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary: But find no expenses due to either party."

W. Officer, S.S.C.—Tods, Murray, & Jamieson, W.S.—Agents.

No. 159.

July 19, 1873.* Milne's Trustees v. Lord Advocate.

Alexander Nicol and Others (Dr Milne's Trustees), Pursuers.—Clark—Hall.

The Lord Advocate (for Commissioners of Woods and Forests), Defender.—Lord-Adv. Moncreiff—T. Ivory.

Salmon-fishing—Barony Title—Prescriptive Possession.—Prescriptive possession of salmon-fishings in the sea will not confer a right of salmon-fishing on the proprietor of a barony bounded by the sea, when such possession cannot be ascribed to the barony title.

1st Division. B.

Ante, vol. vi., p. 972, and vol. vii., p. 26.

In this action, raised by Dr Milne's trustees against the Commissioners * Decided on January 10, 1869.

No. 159.

July 19, 1873.

Milne's Trustees v. Lord Advocate.

of Woods and Forests, the pursuers concluded for declarator, that the pursuers had the sole and exclusive right to the salmon-fishings in the sea and sea-coast ex adverso of the pursuers' lands and barony of Muchalls in the county of Kincardine.

The pursuers founded upon a crown charter of resignation dated in 1806, containing a grant of the lands and barony "cum decimis rectoriis et vicariis earundem et piscationibus alborum piscium et cymbis piscariis lie fisherboats cum molendino de Muchalls," &c., and they averred prescriptive possession of the salmon-fishings on this title.

The Lord Ordinary (Barcaple) found that the barony title founded on was a sufficient title to the salmon-fishings if followed by prescriptive possession of such fishings. The First Division, on July 1, 1868, adhered to this interlocutor, and subsequently the following issue was adjusted and sent to trial:—"It being admitted that the pursuers are proprietors of the lands and barony of Muchalls, excepting the parts and portions of the said lands and barony undermentioned, viz., . . . Whether for forty years prior to 16th April 1862, or for time immemorial, the pursuers and their predecessors and authors have, as proprietors of the said lands and barony of Muchalls, possessed the salmon-fishing in the sea and sea-coast opposite to the said lands and barony of Muchalls, belonging to the pursuers."

At the trial it was proved that in 1824 Mr Silver of Netherley, then proprietor of the barony, had presented a petition to the Treasury, praying for a grant of salmon-fishings. It was not proved that there was any fishing of salmon other than going out with a feith-net, and that few salmon had ever been caught.

It was then arranged between the parties, on the suggestion of the Court, that as the true question was whether the possession had by the pursuers and their predecessors was in law sufficient possession for forty years within the meaning of the issue a verdict should be taken for the pursuer, subject to the opinion of the Court on the said question, and with power to the Court to enter up a verdict for the defenders if they should be of opinion, on a consideration of the notes of evidence and of the documents put in evidence, that the possession proved to have been enjoyed by the pursuers and their predecessors during forty years preceding the 16th of April 1862, is not in law sufficient possession within the meaning of the issue.

A verdict for the pursuers was accordingly found by the jury.

When the case came before the First Division the Court held that for some portion of the prescriptive period the possession by the pursuers could not be ascribed to their barony title. In 1821 the proprietor of the barony had applied for a crown grant of salmon-fishings, which he would not have done if he had supposed that he had in his barony title a sufficient title to the fishings. Again, in 1824, and lastly, in 1859, the possession was not ascribed to the barony title, and therefore the possession had by the pursuers not being in law sufficient possession the verdict must be entered up for the defenders.

TODS, MURRAY, & JAMIESON, W.S.—ANDREW MURRAY, W.S.—Agents.

No. 160.

July 19, 1873.

Lord Advocate v. Hall.

THE LORD ADVOCATE (for the Commissioners of Woods and Forests), Pursuer.—Lord-Adv. Moncreiff— Sol.-Gen. Young—T. Ivory.
SIR JAMES HALL, Baronet, Defender.—D.-F. Gordon—Macdonald.

Salmon-fishing—Possession.—Held that the proprietor of a barony who had not an express grant of salmon-fishings had not instructed a right thereto by proving that the tenants of cottages on his estate had been in use to fish for salmon in the sea for their own behoof without paying rent therefor.

No. 160.

July 19, 1873.
Lord Advocate v. Hall.

1st Division. B.

THIS action was raised in 1869 by the Lord Advocate, on behalf of the Commissioners of Woods and Forests, against Sir James Hall of Dunglass, Baronet, for declarator "that the salmon-fishings in the sea and other waters ex adverso of the lands and estates in the counties of Haddington and Berwick, the property of the said Sir James Hall, or of any part thereof, belong to the Crown, and form part of the hereditary revenues of the Crown in Scotland, falling under the management, administration, and control of the said Commissioners of our Woods, Forests, and Land Revenues, and that the said James Hall has no right or title to fish for salmon, grilse, or salmon trout in the sea and other waters ex adverso of any part of his said lands and estates in the counties of Haddington and Berwick by means of stake-nets or bag-nets, or by net and coble, or in any other manner of way."

The estates of the defender consisted of two baronies, the barony of Dunglass and the barony of Cockburnspath, but he had no express grant of salmon-fishings.

The following issues were sent to trial:—"It being admitted that the pursuer in the issue, Sir James Hall, is proprietor of the lands and barony of Dunglass, and it being also admitted that he is also proprietor of the barony of Cockburnspath: (1) Whether, for forty years prior to 3d March 1869, or for time immemorial, the pursuer and his predecessors and authors have, as proprietors of the said lands and barony of Dunglass, possessed the salmom-fishings in the sea and other waters opposite to the said lands and barony of Dunglass belonging to the pursuer? (2) Whether for forty years," &c. The issue in regard to the barony of Cockburnspath, was in the same terms.

The nature of the evidence appears from the charge of the presiding Judge.

LORD ARDMILLAN.—Gentlemen of the jury, the case before you is partly a case involving principles of law, and partly a case involving considerations of equity. The pursuer of the action is the Lord Advocate on behalf of the Crown, and on behalf of the public; the defender in the action is Sir James Hall, proprietor of the estates of Dunglass and Cockburnspath; and the question is, whether Sir James Hall is entitled, as under his title from the Crown, to the salmon-fishing ex adverso of his properties. In order to establish that, he must instruct possession. It is not in dispute before you that Sir James Hall does not hold a title from the Crown, conferring on him a property in the salmon-fishings, but only a title conferring on him a general right of fishings in salt water and in fresh water, which is not construed in law as including a right to salmon-fishings. It is necessary for the proprietor who produces a title with right to fishings generally to instruct his possession for the purpose of explaining his right, and erecting it into a right to salmon-fishing. Therefore the pursuer in the issue is Sir James Hall, who undertakes to shew to you that he and his predecessors have, as proprietors of the baronies of Dunglass and Cockburnspath, possessed the salmon-fishings in the sea and other waters opposite these baronies for more than forty years. Now, it is quite true that a barony title is a very favourable title, and that it forms a very favourable foundation for a proof of possession in order to create or rear up into a title to salmon-fishing a general title to fishings in salt and fresh waters. But, notwithstanding that, the holder of the barony title must instruct his possession, as proprietor, of the salmon-fishings.

Now, it is very obvious to you, and I need not dwell upon it, that what shall be sufficient possession to instruct such a title must depend very much upon the nature of the subject and the circumstances of the case. In this case, the subject is confessedly of very little value; and in this case also the possession is of a somewhat unusual kind. It is important to bear in mind that from beginning to end no lease for any rent payable in money, or any rent whatever, has ever been granted by Sir James Hall or his predecessors. That is the first important matter which cannot be omitted. The second is, that while there has never been any such lease with a return of rent for possession, there never has been, if I remember right—and I have gone over the evidence very carefully—there never has been any money rent paid at all. Not only has there never been a lease for a money rent, but there never has been a money rent at all. But then, the pursuer of the issues maintains—first, that the whole possession of this fishing has been by tenants upon his estate; and I think that is clear. I think it is proved by every witness who spoke on the subject that, with the exception of two occasions, nobody has ever attempted to exercise the right, or to pursue the vocation of fishing for salmon or grilse in these waters except the persons who dwell as tenants upon the Dunglass estate. The two exceptions are—first, a night expedition from Burnmouth, of which we hear on one solitary occasion. Whether or not the Burnmouth fishermen caught any fish on that occasion is not proved, but it is proved that they did not come back, which I think shews that they did not find it was very encouraging or remunerative. But they did try it once, and no more. The other occasion was when Pike and Johnstone, who were both salmon-fishers, were sent from Northumberland by Mr Bell to make an attempt or inquiry with regard to settling a fishery at Dunglass. These two persons proceeded in this manner. They went to Sir John Hall as the proprietor, and they asked for his leave; that is important. They agreed to send Sir John the first fish they caught; they came and they sent Sir John the first and the last fish they caught, for they caught only one, and then they went back to the place where they came from, and there was an end of them. That was the only other occasion,—and that was in 1846,—on which any person fished who was not a tenant of Sir John Hall's. Well that does not go very far, because it is not likely, if the fishing was so bad as it was represented to be, you would have anybody but the tenants on the estate to try it. The tenants on the estate are people living in cottages at £3 of rent, which was lowered to £2 because of their being so poor, and because of the kindness of the proprietor. They are just the kind of people who are likely to put their nets across the mouth of a burn, and to attempt to assist themselves by taking a fish in that way; but when you are told by the people themselves that they are in the practice of doing a thing of that kind, without a lease, and without direct authority as in the exercise of a right, that is hardly possession in the legal sense. The proprietor, in order to instruct his right, must have open possession and the assertion of a right. He must either grant a lease as the proprietor of the right, or he must set up a fishery as occupant and user of the right himself. Or, to take the most favourable case that can be put for the pursuer of the issue,—it is said that instead of a lease with a money rent he gives a lease, or something of the character of a lease, the return for which is that the fisherman shall give up the first fish he catches to the proprietor for nothing, and that that is equivalent to a rent for the value of the fishery at the moment, and that it is such a rent as to constitute an exercise of the right of salmon-fishing by the proprietor, the first fish being the remuneration. His Lordship then read the evidence of Robert Gordon and Mrs Rodger with regard to the first fish, and proceeded:—You will observe from this evidence that the practice was, not that one fish was brought by each fisher or each tenant, but that one fish only was brought out of the whole fishing. Now, if there was a lease—if the first fish was given by any man as tenant instead of rent, then every man who was a tenant there should have given his first fish. But one single fish for the whole is not in lieu of rent. It is absurd to speak of it in that way; and therefore you are obliged to take some other view.

No. 160.
July 19, 1878.
Lord Advocate v. Hall.

Mr Gordon.—Your Lordship will allow me to say that you have omitted to refer to the evidence of Grieve (taken on commission) who speaks to that point.

LORD ARDMILLAN read the evidence of Grieve as to the practice of giving the first fish,* remarking that the jury would also take that into consideration, and

* Grieve deponed,—"In the years 1817 or 1818 I applied to Sir James Hall's factor, Mr Bell, for leave to fish for salmon and fish of the salmon kind opposite Sir

No. 160.

July 19, 1873.
Lord Advocate v. Hall.

proceeded:—Now, if there had been a written lease in which the landlord, after stating that the tenant was poor, had commuted the rent to the rendering of a single fish in name of rent without payment, that would have been an intelligible thing. Whether that would have been an equivalent to the payment of rent may be doubted; still it would have been a strong circumstance; but you have no lease, written or understood, of any kind, with the exception of this statement by a man so very old that he could not be brought here. You will judge whether that is evidence of a contract or bargain for rent. You and not I have to judge upon that point. It does not appear to me that it was so; but you can judge. If you think that that one fish was truly a rent, and that the proprietor in taking it was asserting his right to the salmon-fishings, you will give that fact your consideration in judging of the case; but if you think it was a polite acknowledgment—a piece of ordinary politeness to a kindly landlord, and did not infer rent, you will come to a different conclusion. This at least is certain, that after 1860 the present Sir James Hall did, for the first time,—so far as I can make out, except from that statement of Grieve, demand a rent. The question was asked in these words at the witness, James Fairbairn, and was answered,—"The first salmon ever sent to Sir James as rent was after the Tweed Act in 1860. I cannot say that it was for more than two years that it was paid to him. I had never sent it for rent before." Now, the very fact of asking for James's ground, both in East Lothian and in Berwickshire. The laird then was the present Sir James's grandfather. The factor gave me leave provided I would give to him one fish every season we so fished. He made me agree to give that before he gave me leave. I understood that Sir James had the right to these fishings. I understood the factor to mean that we gave the fish as rent. I had a partner at the fishing at that time of the name of William Anderson, an old man long since dead. After I got liberty from the factor, Anderson and I commenced the fishing for salmon and fish of that kind. We began to fish at the foot of the Pease Burn, Berwickshire. That was the place we fished most at, and where we got most. We also used to fish opposite the Cove here, also at Gutcher's Hole and Robin's Loch in East Lothian. I think we have also tried Bilsdean Burn. We mostly fished with what they call bob-nets. We used to fish pretty regularly during the season, viz., May, June, and July, but we tried whenever we could get a chance. We generally kept at it until the herring-fishing came on in August, when we stopped it. Anderson and I kept fishing in this way for about eighteen years. We generally, as near as I could state, made from one pound to two pounds a year out of said fishing. The nets we used were put out to catch salmon and nothing else, though they occasionally caught flukes, but they were of no value. It was only for the salmon that we set them. They were about sixty or seventy yards long. We just had one net each at a time, but they were of great length. When our nets went done of course we got new ones, but we never used more than one each at a time. When Anderson and I stopped none of the other tenants fished for a long time. Mr Hood was tenant of the Cove Farm at that time. He sometimes fished, but he only fished for pleasure. Mr Hood, I think, began to fish when we stopped fishing as above mentioned. When I said that none of the other tenants fished I meant that I understood none of them fished for rent. Mr Hood fished with a net about one-half the size of ours. My daughter, who was in Mr Hood's employment at the farm, oftentimes took the fish out of the net for him, and laid it down again. The fishermen of Cove are all tenants of Dunglass. None of these fishermen fished for salmon from the time we stopped until James Fairbairn began to fish. I could not say there was a long time between our stopping and Fairbairn beginning. My memory does not serve me to tell me how long. I had no personal interest after we stopped. When I was fishing I paid a salmon regularly every year. That was just what I and the factor agreed upon. We took it up to the mansion-house of Dunglass. I remember on one occasion when Anderson and I took it up that the butler gave us too much beer, and we got tipsy. I never got any money for any of the fish that we took up for rent. The woman that served the house sometimes bought other fish for the house from us."

---

No. 160.

July 19, 1873.
Lord Advocate v. Hall.

it then as an acknowledgment of rent shewed that it was a new thing. You will judge whether there would be any possible use in taking that for an acknowledgment of rent then. If you think that the rent was substantially fixed by agreement in that way, you will then have to consider whether there is sufficient to support this averment of possession. The exclusion of others is a matter of universal testimony. There can be no doubt that no other persons but the tenants on the estate fished there, except on the two occasions I have mentioned; but that is very natural. The place was remote, and the fishing was not very remunerative. The mode of fishing was this. The net was laid down when the tide was low, and as the tide rose the net floated, and it was visible from the shore if any one chanced to be walking there. But there would be no one walking on the shore in all human probability, except those who lived in the neighbourhood, and who had the greatest interest and desire to keep the net there. Who was there to challenge it? It occurs to me that possession can hardly be instructed by acts, not within the family, but certainly within the proprietorship of the person claiming the right. However, that is also for your consideration. You have it proved in point of fact that there was a fishing by this hang-net by old Grieve, by old Anderson, by old Fairbairn, and others. There is a great deal of evidence to the fact of such fishing, and all by tenants on the estate, from about 1809 down till very lately. That is the character of the fishing which has been carried on. Whether it is sufficient to establish possession on the point of the proprietor is a thing which I leave to you. I have nothing to state to you in point of law except that the possession must be open possession, and possession in the assertion of a right; and that where there is no fishery or exercise of right by the proprietor or his servants in an open manner, it requires very strong evidence before you can substitute for a lease which has never existed an arrangement of this kind without written evidence, and resting on testimony which, although deserving of all consideration, appears to me to be only to the effect that the first fish of the season was to be delivered to the proprietor.

The Jury returned a unanimous verdict for the Crown on both issues.

On a motion for a new trial, on the ground that the verdict was against evidence, the Court held that as the only possession of salmon-fishings was by servants and cottagers of Sir James, who did not pay any rent therefor, the jury were right in holding that this was not possession by Sir James himself. The Judges reserved their opinion on the question whether a right of salmon-fishing could have been established by the taking of salmon with nets not of the ordinary kind, but of the only kind suitable for the purpose in the locality of the tenants of Sir James, who paid him a rent for the privilege.

TODS, MURRAY, & JAMIESON, W.S.—ANDREW MURRAY, W.S.—Agents.

No. 161.

July 19, 1873.
Galt v. Ritchie.

WILLIAM GALT, Suspender.—Macdonald—H. J. Moncreiff.
ALEXANDER RITCHIE, Respondent.—J. C. Smith—Strachan.

Suspension—Statute 30 and 31 Vict. cap. 141 (Master and Servant Act, 1867), secs. 4, 9, 13—Fine.—The Master and Servant Act, 1867, empowers the Court before whom a complaint is laid, if the same is found proven, to award compensation to the complainer, or to impose a fine, and if a fine is imposed, they may direct that a part, but not exceeding one-half, be applied to compensate the complainer. In a conviction under the statute, the Justices adjudged the person complained against to pay a fine to the complainer. Held, in a suspension of the sentence, that the conviction was bad, in respect that the entire fine was directed to be paid to the complainer, contrary to the terms of the statute.

No. 161.

July 19, 1873.
Galt v. Ritchie.

Complaint—Alternative penalties.—A complaint simply praying that the employed be summoned and adjudicated upon under sections 4 and 9 of the Master and Servant Act, 1867, is unobjectionable, although various alternative penalties are set forth in section 9.

High Court of Justiciary.
Lord Justice-Clerk.
Lord Cowan.
Lord Neaves.
Justiciary Clerk.

On 10th May 1871, Alexander Ritchie, contractor and quarry-master, Irvine, laid a complaint against William Galt, apprentice mason, under the Master and Servant Act, 1867, before the Justices of Peace for the county of Ayr at Irvine, in the following terms:—"Under the Master and Servant Act, 1867. Unto Her Majesty's Justices of the Peace for the county of Ayr: The complaint of Alexander Ritchie, contractor and quarry-master, Irvine, against William Galt, apprentice mason, now or lately residing in Quarrylane, Irvine. The complainer humbly sheweth,—That the said William Galt, hereafter called the said employed, being the apprentice of the said Alexander Ritchie (hereafter called the said employer) in his trade or business of a dresser and hewer of stones and other kindred services or employment or occupation as carried on by the said employer under a certain contract of apprenticeship for a period now unexpired, did, on the 21st day of January 1871, at Irvine, in the said county, unlawfully neglect or refuse, and has ever since neglected or refused to fulfil the said contract, and has absented himself from the service of the said employer without just cause or lawful excuse: And the said complainant, the employer, further says, that the amount of compensation which he claims for the said breach and non-performance of the said contract is £10 sterling, and he prays that the said employed may be summoned and adjudicated upon under sections 4 and 9 of the Master and Servant Act, 1867. May it therefore please your Honours to grant the said William Galt to appear before you to answer to this complaint, and thereafter to proceed in the matter in terms of the said Act.—According to justice. ALEXR. RITCHIE."

At a Justice of Peace Court held at Irvine on 18th April 1873 Galt appeared, and pleaded not guilty.

Evidence was led, and the following sentence was pronounced:—"The Justices, in respect of the evidence adduced, convict the said William Galt of the contravention charged, and therefore adjudge him to pay the sum of £5 sterling in name of fine to the said Alexander Ritchie; and also find the said William Galt liable in the sum of 25s. of expenses to the said Alexander Ritchie; and in respect it is inexpedient to give a warrant of ponding and sale, ordain instant execution by imprisonment, and grant warrant to officers of Court to apprehend the said William Galt and convey him to the prison of Ayr, and to the keeper thereof to receive and detain him for the period of two months from the date of his imprisonment, unless the said sum of £5 sterling and expenses shall be sooner paid."

Galt having been incarcerated, presented a bill of suspension and liberation, the reasons of suspension being—(1) That the complaint was irrelevant. (2) That it was not in the form required by the Master and Servant Act for proceedings before the Justices. (3) That the Justices refused to take any note of the suspender's objections to the competency or relevancy of the complaint. (4) That the Justices refused to take any note of the evidence. (5) That the deliverance or pretended judgment found a contravention proved, there being no contravention libelled. (6) That by the said deliverance or pretended judgment a fine was inflicted and costs found due, contrary to the statute.

Argued for the suspender;—The suspender was convicted and sentenced under sections 4 and 9 of the Master and Servant Act, 1867. It was objected, in the first place, that the complaint was not in the form prescribed

No. 161.
July 19, 1873.
Galt v. Ritchie.

by that Act, nor was it brought in terms of the Summary Procedure Act, 1864, although it was insisted in under the provisions of the latter Act. The 21st section of the Master and Servant Act directed that the statutes enumerated in schedule 2, among which was the Summary Procedure (Scotland) Act, 1864, should apply to proceedings under the Act, except as far as any provision of the Act was inconsistent therewith. The present complaint did not bear that it was brought under the Summary Procedure Act by having the usual heading "Under the Summary Procedure Act, 1864," prefixed, as required by that Act (sec. 4, schedule A). Notwithstanding that thus no notice was given that it was intended that advantage should be taken of the enactments in the Summary Procedure Act, the procedure taken did take place under its provisions. No notes of the evidence were taken, and expenses were awarded, though no power of awarding expenses was given by the Master and Servant Act. No doubt the Act made it optional to use the forms annexed to it, or to adopt the provisions of the Summary Procedure Act, but if the proceedings were carried through under the provisions of the latter Act its forms should have been adopted and adhered to.

Secondly, if the complaint was intended to be brought under the Summary Procedure Act it ought to have set forth the different alternatives which it was competent to the Justices to have adopted on conviction. The form annexed to the Summary Procedure Act for a complaint under a statute (schedule A, 2), directed that the "penalty and its alternative" be set forth. In the present case all the alternatives open to the Justices on conviction not having been before them at the time of pronouncing sentence, the proceedings were incompetent—Thomson v. Wardlaw, High Court, January 23, 1865, 5 Irvine, p. 45; Baird v. Rose, Ayr, September 7, 1865, 5 Irvine, p. 200.

Further, the sentence was bad by reason of uncertainty. It found the suspender "guilty of the contravention charged," while there were various alternatives in the 4th section of the Master and Servant Act, each of which would warrant a complaint being made.

Lastly, the suspender was sentenced to pay a fine of £5 to his employer, with 25s. of expenses, and instant execution by imprisonment was ordained unless these sums were paid. It was incompetent, in terms of sections 9 and 13 of the Master and Servant Act, to adjudge the whole fine to be paid to the complainer. The Justices could either award compensation to the party complaining or impose a fine (section 9); where a fine was imposed they were empowered to direct that a part not exceeding one-half of such fine, when recovered, should be applied to compensate the employer or employed for any wrong or damage sustained by him by reason of the Act or thing in respect of which the fine was imposed (section 13). A magistrate was bound to adhere strictly to the directions in regard to the disposal of fines contained in the statute by which the power to impose them was conferred—Lamond v. Baker, 9th February 1860, 2 D. 718; see also M'Callum v. M'Lullich, High Court, October 31, 1870, Couper, 486; Ferguson v. Thow, High Court, June 30, 1867, 4 Irvine, 196.

The Court directed the respondent's (Ritchie's) argument to the objections (1) that the alternative penalties were not set forth in the complaint; (2) that the whole fine was awarded to the respondent (Ritchie).

Argued for Ritchie;—The first objection, being one against the form of complaint, was excluded by section 20 of the Master and Servant Act—Holland v. Gauchalland Coal Company, High Court, December 24, 1867, 5 Irvine, 561. The complaint in the present case was in precisely the same form as the complaint in the case of Holland, which was also

No. 161.

July 19, 1873.
Galt v. Ritchie.

under the Master and Servant Act, 1867. The judgment in the case of Thomson, cited for the suspender, proceeded on the ground that the prayer of the complaint was misleading. In regard to the objection on the ground of the fine having been awarded to the employer, the word "fine" was obviously intended by the Justices to mean compensation. Compensation was what was craved in the complaint, and what the Justices intended to give. No notice of this objection was given in the bill of suspension.

At advising,—

LORD COWAN.—As this is a suspension and liberation, and imprisonment has followed upon the sentence, we must see that the sentence is in conformity with the statute which confers the power. There are several alternative penalties which can be imposed,—one of these being that "where no amount of compensation or damage can be assessed, or where pecuniary compensation will not, in the opinion of the Justices, Magistrates, or Sheriff meet the circumstances of the case," a fine may be imposed. Another part of the section refers to the case where compensation is asked by the employer. If compensation is to be assessed to the party, the sentence must bear to be an award of compensation. Where a fine is imposed, it is provided that a part, but not exceeding one-half, may be given to the party. Here we have the whole fine awarded to the party. I am therefore of opinion that the sentence is bad. It is very possible that the Justices meant compensation when they used the word "fine," but we must deal with the sentence as it was pronounced.

LORD NEAVES.—I am of the same opinion. The Summary Procedure Act is one of great value, and facilitates procedure. Complaints have been made that in some cases it screens irregularities; certainly the more that the proceedings are protected from examination the more incumbent is it that the final sentence should be in terms of the statute.

If the Justices did not know the difference between fine and compensation they are not very fit for their office. If they used the wrong word by mistake I do not see how we are to find that out. A fine is a pecuniary punishment, exigible by the Crown. Compensation is the private right of the party for what he has lost. Either course is competent. If a fine be awarded a part may be given to the party, but that part must not exceed one-half. I do not think that this sentence can be justified on the ground of confusion in the minds of the Justices, and I do not think we have any power to rectify the sentence.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—In regard to the objection that all the alternatives competent to the Justices to adopt upon conviction were not set forth in the complaint, I believe your Lordships are of opinion with me that the case of Thomson v. Wardlaw, January 23, 1865, must now be held to have proceeded on the ground that the statement in the conclusion and prayer of the complaint of the alternatives which were open to the magistrates to adopt, was misleading, and that the case of Holland v. Gauchalland Coal Company, December 24, 1867, establishes that a complaint praying, as the present complaint does, that the employed be summoned and adjudicated upon under section 9 of the Master and Servant Act, 1867, is unobjectionable.

With reference to the objection raised regarding the imposition of the fine and awarding the whole to the employer, the 9th section introduces for the first time a provision empowering the Sheriff or Magistrates to award compensation to the party complaining. It leaves it to the Sheriff or Magistrates wherever it shall, in their opinion, best meet the circumstances of the case to award it. If compensation is awarded, it goes, of course, all to the party. There is power given also to impose a fine in like circumstances, and the 13th section of the Act applies to that case only. Under that section, if a fine be imposed, they are empowered to direct that a part, not exceeding one-half of such fine, be applied to compensate the employer or employed for any damage sustained by him. Here a fine of £5 was imposed, and the whole ordained to be paid to the emoyer. In so doing, the Justices exceeded the powers conferred in the statute. No. 161.

agree that we must therefore suspend the sentence.

July 19, 1873.
Galt v. Ritchie.

THE COURT pronounced the following interlocutor:—"In respect that the sentence directs the entire fine to be paid to the complainer in the inferior Court, contrary to the terms of the 13th section of the Master and Servant Act, pass the bill; suspend the sentence complained of simpliciter, and decern: Find the suspender entitled to expenses, which modify to four guineas, and for which, and one guinea as the dues of extract, decern against the respondent."

M'EWEN & CARMENT, W.S.—ANDREW BEVERIDGE, S.S.C.—Agents.

CASES ON APPEALS UNDER THE LANDS VALUATION ACTS (17 & 18 VICT., c. 91, 20 & 21 VICT., c. 58).

For previous cases see vol. iv. p. 1132, et seq.

No. 162. URQUHART FRASER.

Mar. 14, 1867. Fraser. Lord Kinloch. Ld. Ormidale. Case 52.*

Farm—Renewed Lease—Fair Annual Value—Sub-Lease—Surplus Rent.—The appellant's father had a lease of 200 acres of land from the Earl of Aberdeen at a rent of £5. The appellant succeeded to his father in 1848, and in 1849 he got a new lease for 19 years at a rent of £11. He thereafter trenched and reclaimed waste land, and built new buildings and dykes. In 1856 he had reclaimed upwards of 100 acres, and built a steading of offices, expending about £850. He renounced the old lease, and got a new lease from Whitsunday 1856 at the rent of £15, and under this lease he at present holds. Since this lease he has built an additional steading of offices and dwelling-house, and he has sublet a portion of the land, with such additional steading and dwelling-house, as a separate farm.

The assessor entered the Earl of Aberdeen as proprietor of the whole land and subjects, and the appellant as occupier of one portion, estimated as worth £40, and the sub-tenants as occupiers of the other portion, estimated as worth £55.

The assessor maintained that £15, for which the farm was let in 1856, was not the fair annual value, and therefore the farm was to be valued at what it was worth. The Commissioners reduced the valuation to £15, and directed the entry of the sub-tenants to be deleted.

The following opinion was returned by the Judges:—"We are of opinion that the determination of the Commissioners is right, in the special circumstances of the case, and more especially considering that the existing lease was granted on a renunciation of the previous one, which would otherwise be still in subsistence."

No. 163. W. A. SKENE.

Mar. 14, 1867. Skene. Lord Kinloch. Ld. Ormidale. Case 53.

Rent by nineteen years' Lease—Consideration other than Rent—(Tenant bound by lease to erect a dwelling-house, &c., according to plans approved of by Landlord—Claim for part value and other claims postponed to end of lease).—James Glenny was tenant of the farm of Lethenty, Aberdeenshire, under a lease for nineteen years, by which he became bound to erect a dwelling-house and steading of offices, according to plans approved of by landlord, the landlord becoming bound to pay £150 when the buildings were finished, and at the end of the lease to pay the value, exclusive of carriages and deducting the said sum of £150, to the extent of another sum of £150. The claim of the previous tenant, father of the present tenant, for the value of the millhouse, kiln, and machinery, to the extent of £200, was agreed to be postponed until the end of the present lease. The tenant erected the dwelling-house, &c., apparently of greater value than the two sums of £150, and also other buildings for which he had no claim at the end of the lease.

* These cases are quoted from the Abstract printed by the Commissioners of Inland Revenue.

The assessor valued the subjects, irrespective of the lease, at what they were worth to be let one year with another. No. 163.

The proprietor appealed. Mar. 14, 1867. Skene.

The Commissioners held that they should be assessed at the rent stipulated by the lease, £108, and interest at 5 per cent on the sums of £150 and £200, payable at the end of the lease, £17, 10s.—in all, £125, 10s. Held that the Commissioners were right.

ANNANDALE AND SON. No. 164.

Paper Mill—Annual Value—(7½ per cent on cost, or 11s. 1d. per ton of output—Rent).—Messrs Annandale and Son erected a large paper-mill at Beltonford, near Dunbar, and the assessor assessed the annual value of it at £2024, which he brought out by taking 7½ per cent on the cost of the buildings, and other percentages on steam engines, railway, and ponds. Mar. 14. 1867. Annandale and Son. Lord Kinloch. Ld. Ormidale.

The appellants stated that the mill was only partially in operation, and that the annual value should be ascertained according to output. According to valuation of other mills, the value should be 11s. 1d. per ton, and as the out-turn at Beltonford was 1040 tons, the annual value should be £580. Case 54.

The Commissioners found that the value should be according to the productive power or out-turn, and fixed the value at £580.

The Judges returned the following opinion:—"We are of opinion that the determination of the Commissioners is wrong, in respect of its proceeding on the amount of the out-turn, and that the value of the works is not to be ruled exclusively either by the amount of actual out-turn or by a percentage on the cost of erection, but is to be estimated according to the rent at which, one year with another, the premises might in their actual state be reasonably expected to let from year to year, having regard to the rent or annual value as assessed of other works of the like description, and taking into account the peculiar advantages or disadvantages of the Beltonford works."

DRUMGRAY COAL COMPANY. No. 165.

Oil Works—(Retorts—Pipes—Tanks—Sheds—Heritable or Moveable).—The Drumgray Coal Company are entered as proprietors and occupiers of oil works at the yearly value of £450, the amount being fixed on the principle of taking 15 per cent on the original cost, as a rate which would reimburse the proprietor for erecting the works and keeping them in repair. The works consist of retorts erected on a foundation of building, or built in, and these connected by pipes, with tanks for receiving the oil. The tanks are sometimes placed on the ground. In this case they are under ground. The sheds covering the works are on built or iron supports. The lease of the coal-field does not embrace the ground on which the oil works are erected. The entry of the Drumgray Coal Company as proprietors was not objected to before the Commissioners. April 8, 1867. Drumgray Coal Co. Lord Kinloch. Ld. Ormidale. Case 55.

The appellants objected to the assessment, on the ground that the oil works are not of the nature of subjects comprehended under the Valuation Act, that they are part of the coal-field, and the rent paid for it depended on the facilities for working up the minerals in the oil works; that 15 per cent on the original cost is not a proper and fair value, in respect the original cost does not afford a criterion for annual value.

The Commissioners refused the appeal. Held that the Commissioners were right in the circumstances as reported by them.

No. 166. DUKE OF RICHMOND.

April 8, 1867. Duke of Richmond. Lord Kinloch. Ld. Ormidale. Case 56.

Rent—Value—Deductions for Furniture and keeping up Garden.—Huntly Lodge, furnished, and gardens, with shootings in the parish of Huntly and five other parishes, were let for three years at the rent of £435 for the whole.

The portion of the rent applicable to the furnished lodge, gardens, and shootings in Huntly parish was fixed at £305, and deducting £80 as interest on the value of the furniture, left £225, which the assessor entered in the roll as the value of the subjects in Huntly parish. The appellant, the proprietor, claimed to be allowed a further deduction of £90, reducing the value to £135, as the expense of keeping up the gardens, which he undertook to do to a certain extent. Two gardeners were required for this purpose.

The Commissioners held that, as the rent included compensation for the furniture and for keeping up the gardens, it was not in the lease conditioned as the fair annual value of the subjects, and so not to be taken as the measure of value, and they fixed the value at £185. Held that the Commissioners were wrong. The value ought to be set down at £135.

No. 167. DUKE OF RICHMOND.

Feb. 8, 1868. Duke of Richmond. Lord Kinloch. Ld. Ormidale. Case 57.

Croft—Lease—Agreement—House built by Crofter—Rent or Value.—The Duke of Richmond is entered in the roll, 1867, as proprietor, and John Christie as occupier of croft—rent or value, £8. The Duke, or Christie, or either, is entered as proprietor, and Christie as occupier of house and shop, built by Christie on said croft—value, £6. Christie entered into an agreement with the Duke, whereby he was to enter to the croft at Whitsunday 1860, to occupy from year to year, but to have no lease, and to cultivate the croft in a certain manner. There being no house on the croft, Christie proposed to build one according to plan subscribed in reference to the agremeent, the Duke engaging to supply wood, and to pay for the slating and ridge stones. Christie obliged himself to pay £8 of rent. The Commissioners having been informed that the buildings had been erected in the first year of the occupation, and that the lease had been renewed from year to year, held that there was other consideration than the rent the first year, but the sole consideration for the lease annually renewed was the rent. They sustained the appeal, holding the entry of £8 as covering the entire subjects.

Held that the Commissioners were right, in respect no evidence that for the year in question £8 is below an adequate rent for the combined subjects.

No. 168. JOHN BRUCE.

Feb. 8, 1868. Bruce. Lord Kinloch. Ld. Ormidale. Case 58.

Father Proprietor—Son Tenant—Rent—Fair Annual Value.—Mr Bruce of Sumburgh, in Zetland, let to his son his whole estate, consisting of home farm, house, station, and land at Grutness, Station West Voe, and Station Boddam, and upwards of 100 small farms, under sub-tenancy, in 1859, for six years, at the rent of £440. The son was restricted from raising the rents of the sub-tenants. In 1865 the lease was renewed for six years, and the rent increased to £520, with the privilege to the son to raise the rents of the sub-tenants. The son immediately raised the rents of the sub-tenants to a greater extent by £30 than the increased rent. The assessor maintained, the sub-tenant's rents having been so raised above the increase to the landlord shewed that the rent was not the fair annual value. The increased rents of the sub-tenants were entered in the roll, and the home farm and other subjects in the actual occupation of the son, which had been improved since 1859, were entered in the roll at the present value, being an increase over the entry in the rolls of previous years made according to the rent. The son appealed against the entries of the value of the subjects in his own occupation.

The Commissioners held that the rent, and not the value as in their present condition, should be entered in the roll. Held that the Commissioners were right.

No. 168.
Feb. 8, 1868.
Bruce.

THE BURGH OF RENFREW.

No. 169.

Compensation for Injury.—The burgh of Renfrew is proprietor of salmon-fishings in the river Clyde. The Clyde Navigation Trustees injured them by their operations, and agreed to make up to the burgh the difference between the rent the fishings now let for and the average rent received for them previous to the operations. For the year in question the difference was £207, 10s., and a proportion of the sum, £189, 10s., was entered in the county assessment roll, parishes of Inchinnan and Renfrew. The remainder of the sum was applicable to a portion of fishings within the burgh. In the roll the burgh of Renfrew is entered as proprietor, and the Clyde Trustees as occupiers and tenants. The Clyde Trustees maintained they were not occupiers and tenants of fishings. What they paid was in the nature of compensation for injury. The ground taken by the assessor was that the fishings were an existing subject, yielding revenue to the burgh, of which this sum of £207, 10s., formed part.

The Commissioners held the assessment to be right. Held that the Commissioners were wrong.

Feb. 8, 1868.
Burgh of Renfrew.
Lord Kinloch.
Ld. Ormidale.
Case 59.

CLYDE NAVIGATION TRUSTEES.

No. 170.

Bowling Harbour—River Clyde—Annual Value.—The assessor entered the harbour of Bowling at the yearly value of £700. The Clyde Navigation Trustees appealed against this entry, and stated that the gross average annual income of the harbour for the last three years was £637, and this was subject to a charge of 10 per cent for collection. This average was sevenfold more than the average previous to 1865, in consequence of exceptional circumstances.

The Commissioners fixed the valuation at £541, 9s., being the amount of the actual revenue, less 15 per cent for tenants' profits. They considered this a fair and moderate rent.

The Judges returned the following opinion:—"We are of opinion that the determination of the Commissioners is wrong, and that the value of the harbour should be stated at £407, 13s. 7d."*

Mar. 31, 1868.
Clyde Navigation Trustees.
Lord Kinloch.
Ld. Ormidale.
Case 60.

ROBERT ADDIE.

No. 171.

Ironwork—Furnaces out of Blast—Notes on Roll.—The appellant's ironworks of Langloan are entered in the roll at the yearly value of £1800, and in the column for observations the following note is made:—"In blast, £1500; standing, £300;" the meaning of which is, that

Feb. 8, 1868.
Addie.
Lord Kinloch.
Ld. Ormidale.

* "NOTE.—In the absence of satisfactory information we have assumed the income of the year, as originally stated to the Commissioners, at £637, from which we have deducted 20 per cent for charges of maintenance and the expense of collection, and a further deduction from the balance of 20 per cent for tenants' profits,—the percentage allowed by us in the case of Glasgow Harbour." Case 61.

No. 171.
Feb. 8, 1868.
Addie.

five furnaces were in blast, and one out of blast, £300 being the value of each furnace, according to the general practice of the county of Lanark. The appellant claimed that two furnaces should have been marked out of blast, as that number was out of blast the preceding year. The appellant got relief from certain local taxation by means of such notes. These notes do not form part of the information required by law to be given in the roll.

The Commissioners refused the appeal, and were of opinion that such notes should be discontinued. Held that the determination of the Commissioners was right.

No. 172.

CARNBROE IRONWORKS.

Feb. 8, 1868.
Carnbroe Ironworks.

Lord Kinloch.
Ld. Ormidale.

Case 62.

Ironwork—Furnaces out of Blast—Value.—The Carnbroe Ironworks consist of six furnaces, and are entered in the roll of the value of £1800, arrived at by assuming £300 as the value of each furnace. The appellant craved to have the value reduced to £1200, in respect that only four furnaces had been in blast. The assessor stated that he must value the works as a whole, the same as he would value a mill or warehouse.

The Commissioners held that the assessor's valuation was the fair rent or annual value of the works one year with another, and refused to make any abatement. Held that the Commissioners were right.

No. 173.

DUCHESS OF SUTHERLAND.

April 13, 1869.
Duchess of Sutherland.

Lord Kinloch.
Ld. Ormidale.

Case 64.

Mill Multures—Converted or Commuted Multures.—The appellant was assessed for the converted or commuted thirlages of the mills of Milton of Tarbat, £200. The estates of (1) Allan, (2) Drumgillie, (3) Culrossie, (4) Glustullich, and (5) Rhives, were thirled to these mills. The thirlages were converted under the Act 39 Geo. III. c. 55, into an annual payment by the proprietors of these estates to the proprietor of the mills of Milton. The assessor regarded the commutation as part and pertinent of the dominant tenement. The appellant maintained the commuted payment was no longer multures or a pertinent of the mills, but an annual payment by the proprietor of the estates formerly thirled in the nature of a feu-duty or like annual payment; and as the tenants of the estates, the thirlage of which was commuted, were now relieved of the thirlage, they would pay higher rents in consequence, which rents would enter the lands valuation roll, and in this way the roll would comprehend the commutation payments.

The Commissioners were of opinion that the payments in commutation of thirlage were not "lands and heritages" in the meaning of the Lands Valuation Act. Held that the Commissioners were right.

No. 174.

ROBERT BRUCE ÆNEAS M'LEOD.

April 13, 1869.
M'Leod.

Lord Kinloch.
Ld. Ormidale.

Case 65.

Multures (converted into annual payment by private arrangements).—The appellant is charged for multures of Milderg, Bayfield, &c., £60. The estates of Kindeace or Bayfield and Pitcalzeon were thirled to the mill of Morvich or Morrich, which mill does not now exist. The thirlages of these estates were changed into an annual payment. The proprietor of Morvich or Morrich conveyed the thirlages of Bayfield and Pitcalzeon to the proprietors of these estates, and in return got from each of the proprietors of these estates a disposition of an annuity of 40 bolls of victual, secured upon each of the estates. Infeftment followed upon these dispositions.

As in Case No. 64, the Commissioners were of opinion that these commuted annuities were not "lands and heritages" in the meaning of the Lands Valuation Act. Held that the Commissioners were right.

THE DUKE OF RICHMOND. No. 175.

April 13, 1869.
Duke of Richmond.
Lord Kinloch.
Ld. Ormidale.

Occupier (contrary to provisions of lease).—The Duke of Richmond let the wool mill of Rhynie to A. and F. Stephen, expressly excluding assignees, voluntary or legal, and all sub-tenants. The Messrs Stephen sub-let the mill to William and George Donald for five years, and inserted in the agreement of sub-lease a provision, that if the Duke of Richmond objected, the agreement should thereupon cease and determine. The assessor entered in the column for occupier William Donald, and in the column for tenant A. and F. Stephen. The Duke of Richmond maintained that Messrs Stephen were the only legal occupiers, and further, that if the name of Donald was to appear at all, both William and George Donald should be entered. Case 66.

The Commissioners ordered George Donald to be entered along with William Donald as joint occupier of the subjects. Held that the Commissioners were right.

STIRLING AND SONS. No. 176.

July 12, 1869.
Stirling and Sons.
Lord Kinloch.
Ld. Ormidale.

Value—Dye and Print-Works.—The Turkey-red Dye and Calico Printworks at Dalquhurn were valued, 1867-68, at £1100, and at Cordale at £540. The assessor increased the assessment on these works for the year 1868-69, principally on the ground of under-valuation in previous years, but also to some extent in consequence of additions and improvements,—Dalquhurn Works to £2180, and Cordale Works to £590. With the assistance of Mr Donaldson, the assessor for the city of Glasgow, he valued the ground for the works at so much per acre, and estimated the fair and reasonable cost of the works, less depreciation on the older portions, and fixed 7½ per cent on the amount, to bring out the rental at which one year with another the owners could afford to let them to a tenant. The assessor also found that the value he had put on the works brought out as the value of each superficial square yard of flooring of the Dulquhurn Works to be 1s. 3½d., and of the Cordale Works, 11d. That both these ways of valuing brought out results under the rent at which the Ferryfield Printworks were actually let. The appellants explained that the rent of the Ferryfield Printworks was exceptionally high, and the works were abandoned by the tenants as not remunerative. They referred to printworks in other counties of dimensions similar to theirs, which were let, and the rents got did not support the valuation of the assessor. Case 69.

The Commissioners by a majority reduced the assessment to that of 1867-68. The Judges, in the absence of other evidence than that in the case, held that the Commissioners were right, but referred to case 54 for what they thought were the correct principles of assessment in such cases as the present, and stated that, notwithstanding this judgment, it would be open to the assessor to proceed on these principles in making up the assessment in future.

HAY AND CO. No. 177.

July 12, 1869.
Hay & Co.
Lord Kinloch.
Ld. Ormidale.

Tenant—Sub-tenant or Occupier—Principal Tenants' Rent—Sub-tenants' Rent—Voters Act.—Messrs Hay and Co. are extensive fishcurers, and rent the islands of Barra and House, Zetland, under a lease for seven years, at a rent of £325. They sublet the islands in farms and houses from year to year to their fishermen at rents varying from 10s. to £8, 7s., amounting in the whole to £375, being £50 more than the rent they pay. Case 70.

Messrs Hay and Co. are entered in the roll as tenants at the rent of

No. 177.
July 12, 1869.
Hay & Co.

£325. Each fisherman is also entered at the rent he pays. But they maintained that the rent they pay under their lease is the true value of the subjects, and should alone be entered. And the rents of the fishermen are often not realised, from the heads of families being lost at sea, and such rents are not the real value.

The Voters Act, sec. 8, requires the entry in the valuation-roll of the person occupying a subject of the requisite value as the authority for registering the voter. By the Representation of the People Act, 1868, actual personal occupation of the subjects is the title to be registered as a voter.

The Commissioners directed the rent, £325, under the lease, to be entered in the roll, and suggested that the rents paid by the occupiers might also be entered, as a guide to the assessor in making up the roll of voters. Held that the Commissioners were right.

No. 178.
July 2, 1870.
Banffshire District Lunacy Board.
Ld. Ormidale.
Lord Mure.
Case 71.

BANFFSHIRE DISTRICT LUNACY BOARD.

Lunatic Asylum—(Statutory)—Proprietor—Tenant—Occupier—(Board)—Public National Purpose—Beneficial Interest—Liability to Taxation.—The Banffshire District Lunatic Asylum was erected under the compulsory statutory provisions, and is supported by the parishes from assessments or rates. It is alleged that property not liable for any tax ought not to be inserted in roll, and the asylum is not liable for any tax. The assessor stated that all lands and heritages should be in roll, and it was not his province to determine whether such liable to public taxes or not.

"Banffshire Lunacy Board, P. W. Coutts, solicitor, Banff," are entered in the columns of proprietor—tenant—occupier.

The Commissioners ordered entries to be expunged from roll. Held that the Commissioners were wrong.

No. 179.
Dec. 24, 1870.
The University & College of Glasgow.
Ld. Ormidale.
Lord Mure.
Case 72.

THE UNIVERSITY AND COLLEGE OF GLASGOW.

University and College of Glasgow—Exemption from Public and Local Taxation—Object of Act basis for Public Assessments.—The University and College of Glasgow buildings, principal and professors' houses, are entered on the roll. By royal charters, grants, and Acts of Parliament, the University, as a corporation, is exempted from all public and local taxation. The appellants maintained that the object of the Lands Valuation Act was to form a basis for taxation, and therefore subjects not liable to taxation should not be entered.

The assessor maintained that the statute required the valuation-roll to contain all lands and heritages, and sec. 41 specially provided that nothing in the Act should exempt from or render liable to assessment. That the question of exemption from rates should be raised before the different assessing bodies.

The Commissioners refused the appeal. Held that the Commissioners were right.

No. 180.
Jan. 28, 1871.
Graham Brothers.
Ld. Ormidale.
Lord Mure.
Case 73.

GRAHAM BROTHERS.

Shipbuilding Yard—Sawmill and Wood-yard—(Lease twenty-one years of ground, but not of Erections thereon)—Rent of Ground—Value of Erections—If Rent Fair Annual Value.—The city of Perth let ground for shipbuilding yard, and sawmill and wood-yard, many years ago, to appellants' predecessors. These predecessors erected sawmills, sheds, and engines on the premises. In 1860 the current lease was resigned, and city of Perth granted new lease of ground to appellants for twenty-one years, at rent of £63. The appellants acquired right to erections from predecessors, who had right by their lease to dispose of them to successors or remove them. The erections did not belong to the city, and the rent did not include them. The appellants are entered in roll as proprietors and occupiers of erections of the value of £70, against which they appealed, on the ground that they should not be included in the roll. They did not appeal against the entry of the rent of £63 payable to the City of Perth.

No. 180.
Jan. 28, 1871.
Graham Brothers.

This rent did not include the erections which were on the ground when the renewed lease granted, and the rent not fair annual value of whole subjects.

The Commissioners dismissed the appeal. Held that the Commissioners were right.

CITY OF PERTH.

No. 181.

Shipbuilding Yard—(Lease ten years of ground, but not of Erections thereon)—Rent of Ground—Value of Erections—If Rent Fair Annual Value.—The city of Perth let ground for shipbuilding yard many years ago to appellants' predecessors. They erected thereon wood erections, sawmills, shed, and engine. In 1862 appellants' previous firm got lease of ground from city of Perth for ten years at rent of £26. Appellants' previous firm acquired right to erections thereon from predecessors, who had right by lease to dispose of them to city or successors in lease of ground, or remove them. The erections did not belong to the city, and the rent payable by the lease to the city did not include them. The appellants are entered in the valuation-roll as proprietors of the erections, at the value of £41, against which they appealed, on the ground that they should not be included in the roll. They did not appeal against the entry of the rent of £30 payable by the lease to the city of Perth.

Jan. 28, 1871.
City of Perth.
Ld. Ormidale.
Lord Mure.
Case 74.

The Commissioners dismissed the appeal. Held that the Commissioners were right.

WILLIAM CHALMERS.

No. 182.

Mills—Grain—Machinery—(Pairs of Stones—Dust Screen—Elevators, &c.—Fixed or Attached).—The appellant rents from the town of Dumfries wheat, corn, and barley mills, and whole machinery therein, at the rent of £300, and the mills are assessed at this sum. He appealed, and maintained the assessment should be restricted to the buildings, with the water-wheels and shafts, which he alleged were of the value of £100. The rest of the machinery, he maintained, was moveable. It consisted of flour-mill, two pairs of stones, dressing-mill, smut machine; corn-mill, two pairs of stones, dust screen, elevators, &c.; barley-mill, two pairs of stones, barley-mill, dressing-mill. The machinery was fixed, some to the ground by screws and bolts, and some to upright beams and joists, in the same manner. All the machinery could be removed without injury to the buildings. There was no difference between the appellants' mills, as regards the machinery, and the other mills in the district.

Jan. 28, 1871.
Chalmers.
Ld. Ormidale.
Lord Mure.
Case 75.

The Commissioners dismissed the appeal. Held that the Commissioners were right.

TRUSTEES OF ALEXANDER KERR.

No. 183.

Lease—Rent—Fair Annual Value.—The late Alexander Kerr's trustees are proprietors of the farm of Hopehead. In November 1868 the late Mr Kerr granted a lease of the farm for nineteen years, at the rent of £50, to Mr William M'Fegan, who was an old servant, to whose son Mr Kerr, by his will, left the farm. In 1860 a detailed valuation of the farm was made by a practical agriculturist, who made the value £71, and Mr Kerr returned and paid taxes on it at that sum as owner and occupier.

Jan. 28, 1871.
Trustees of Alexander Kerr.
Ld. Ormidale.
Lord Mure.
Case 76.

No. 183.

Jan. 28, 1871.
Trustees of Alexander Kerr.

The assessor entered the farm in the roll at the value of £71, against which Mr Kerr's trustees appealed, and contended that the lease was binding on both parties, and they would not receive more than £50 of rent during its currency, and the Commissioners were bound to enter in the roll the rent in the lease as the annual value.

The Commissioners were of opinion that the rent in the lease was not conditioned as the fair annual value, and dismissed the appeal. Held that the Commissioners were right.

No. 184.

THE BURGH OF DUMFRIES.

Feb. 4, 1871.
The Burgh of Dumfries.

Ld. Ormidale.
Lord Mure.

Case 77.

Bridge over the Nith—Bridge Dues and Market Dues Let on Lease.—The burgh of Dumfries have been, for many centuries, proprietors of the old bridge over the Nith, between the stewartry of Kirkcudbright and the burgh. In the end of last century the new bridge was erected. The titles of the burgh to the bridge are crown charters and other writs from 1591—the last crown charter being dated 1827. The burgh has right to levy dues and customs on certain horses, cattle, sheep, and merchandise passing the bridge, or the river, four miles above, or twelve miles below, the bridge. By the old charters the dues were granted for repairing and maintaining the bridge. The charter of 1827 grants "the whole customs of the bridge," with power to uplift and receive all customs and dues whatever at both ends of the bridge. At the old bridge the collection was made at the middle of the bridge. At the new bridge the collection is made at the end which lies nearest to the burgh of Dumfries.

The burgh let, at last term, the bridge dues and market dues, which are levied at the bridge, at £560, one-third being for bridge dues, and the remainder for market dues.

The assessor, on the ground that the bridge came under "lands and heritages," and the rent paid by the tenant for the bridge dues was the annual value of the subjects, entered one-half of the rent of the bridge dues in the roll for the stewartry of Kirkcudbright as the value of the subjects within the stewartry.

The burgh of Dumfries appealed, and maintained the bridge should not be entered in the roll; the bridge is not let—the right to levy the dues is let. They are levied at the Dumfries end of the bridge, within the burgh, but might be levied anywhere between four miles above the bridge and the sea. There is no pontage, in the proper sense of the word. The dues form a large portion of the revenue of the burgh, the maintenance of the bridge requiring only a small portion of them.

The Commissioners were of opinion that the bridge was correctly entered in the roll. Held that the Commissioners were right.

No. 185.

NISBET THOMSON.

Mar. 11, 1871.
Thomson.

Ld. Ormidale.
Lord Mure.

Case 78.

Mill—Grain—Value—(Price, and comparison with another Mill).—The appellant is proprietor and occupier of the grain-mill, Crossford, which is entered in the roll at the annual value of £100. He purchased the mill for £950, and no additions and repairs have been made since. The mill has three pairs of stones, and a mill in the neighbourhood has five pairs of stones and is entered at the value of £125. The appellant held that the valuation should not exceed £60. The former proprietor returned the mill and was assessed at £100, his son being tenant.

The Commissioners restricted the value to £80, this being 8½ per cent on the price, and the other mill in the neighbourhood, of two-fifths greater grinding power, being valued at £125. Held that the Commissioners were right.

GEORGE HENDERSON. No. 186.

Mar. 11, 1871.
Henderson.
Ld. Ormidale.
Lord Mure.

House, Offices, and Garden, and Farm, separately entered.—The appellant is proprietor and occupier of the farm of Turfhills, which he farms. The assessor made one entry of the farm in the roll at £675, and another entry of the dwelling-house, offices, and garden, at £35. The appellant contended that the house was, like the farm steading, a necessary adjunct to the farm. The house and offices were not unsuitable for a tenant of such a farm, and he held, in terms of the Act, the whole of such farm one entry under the description of "the farm of ——." In the parish of Kinross there is a classification of heritages for poors' rates—higher for dwelling-houses and offices, and lower for agricultural subjects. Case 79.

The assessor held that the statute, sec. 1, required "the specifying in each case the nature of such lands and heritages" in the roll, to enable the rates of the different classes of property to be determined—such as poors' rates, inhabited house duty, &c.; that the separate entry did not necessarily lead to assessment to poors' rates at the higher rate, if a house occupied with lands for farming them was liable at the lower.

The Commissioners sustained the appeal. Held that the Commissioners were right.

DAVID MACFARLANE. No. 187.

Mar. 21, 1872.
Macfarlane.
Ld. Ormidale.
Lord Mure.

Value—Dwelling-house—(Comparison with other houses by floorage).—The proprietor is occupier of a house, west end of Glasgow, which is assessed at £250. He alleged the value at which it would let was £175. The highest rental assessed on houses in the neighbourhood is £150. His house occupies the site of two ordinary houses, and is only two storeys, while the other houses are four, and much of the superficies is taken up with entrance hall, gallery, and well. Case 81.

The assessor stated that houses in the same terrace as appellant's are unusually large, and built for sale, not to let. When houses of the same class are let the rent obtained gave a value from 6d. to 7d. per square foot of flooring. Proportionally the rent of appellant's house would be £300 to £350.

The Commissioners reduced to £200 Held that the Commissioners were right.

UNIVERSITY OF GLASGOW. No. 188.

Mar. 21, 1872.
University of Glasgow.
Ld. Ormidale.
Lord Mure.

Value—(University of Glasgow—Principal and Professors' Houses—Comparison with other houses by floorage).—The principal and Dr Caird's houses assessed at £130, and eleven professors' houses assessed at £120 each. The appellants stated the houses had no back greens, no stabling, and were ineligible in construction and situation and from want of privacy, and were over-valued to the extent of £20 each. Case 82.

The assessor stated that the rents of houses let in the neighbourhood gave 6d. per square foot of floorage as the value, and the assessment on the appellants' houses gave only 4d. per square foot, and it would be an injustice to these others to reduce the value. The amenity of the houses was not inferior to others in the neighbourhood. They are almost entirely shut off from the University, and surrounded by pro indiviso pleasure ground.

The Commissioners reduced the principal and Dr Caird's houses to £110, and other professors to £100 each. Held that the Commissioners were right.

No. 189. HERITORS OF THE PARISH OF NEW MONKLAND.

Mar. 21, 1872. Heritors of the Parish of New Monkland. Ld. Ormidale. Lord Mure.

Church—School.—The parish church and parochial schoolhouse of New Monkland are entered in the roll, and the heritors are entered as proprietors. They appealed, and alleged the parish church and school were not "lands and heritages," did not constitute separate tenementa, but were pertinents of the respective properties of the heritors, and were extra commercium and of no value.

Case 83.

The assessor stated that the statute required all lands and heritages to appear in the roll, without reference to the tenure or the purpose for which used.

The Commissioners ordered the entries not to stand on the roll. Held that the Commissioners were wrong.

No. 190. SIR THOMAS GLADSTONE.

Mar. 21, 1872. Gladstone. Ld. Ormidale. Lord Mure.

Value—Mansion-house (in occupation of owner).—The mansion-house, offices, garden, lawn, and lodges of Fasque, in the occupation of Sir Thomas Gladstone, the proprietor, are assessed at £230, the sum of £200 of which is applicable to the mansion-house. Formerly the mansion-house was assessed at £120.

Case 84.

The appellant maintained that the house would not let, unfurnished, at half the rent assessed, and the statute provided that the estimated yearly value of the subjects was the rent at which, one year with another, they might reasonably be expected to let. The appellant explained as to Ury and Brotherton, houses of the same class and assessed at the same amount as his, and he referred to other houses, although smaller in size, of greater value to let unfurnished, as being better suited for that purpose. He also maintained that the assessor was bound in fairness by his predecessor's valuation, which he had adopted and repeated for years.

The assessor referred to the size of the house and its situation, and to Brigton, one-fourth the size, let unfurnished at £90, and Dunottar, half the size, let at upwards of £100; and he also referred to other houses let with shootings. He maintained that a mansion-house was not to be valued at what the bare house, unfurnished, would let for without shootings or fishings, but what it was worth to the proprietor of the estate.

The Commissioners unanimously sustained the valuation. Held that the Commissioners were right.

No. 191. INVERURIE GASWORKS.

Mar. 21, 1872. Inverurie Gasworks. Ld. Ormidale. Lord Mure.

Gaswork—Value.—The annual value of the Inverurie Gasworks is entered at £171. This was made up from the previous year's accounts of the company. The valuation made up from the accounts for the year at last balance brought out at £118, 2s. 7d., and the assessor consented that the entry should be restricted to this sum. It was brought out thus:—

Case 85.

Gross revenue from works, ...		£710	5 10
Less revenue from meters, ...		41	19 1
		£668	6 9
Less working expenses, including wages and repairs, .		470	3 8
		£198	3 1
Deduct 2 per cent for deterioration on .	£2150 0 0
Value of works, less value of meters, .	312 12 0
	£1837 8 0
At 2 per cent,		36	14 11
Carry forward,		£161	8 2

Brought forward				£161	8	2
Deduct 20 per cent for tenant's profits on £161, 8s. 2d.,	£32	5	7
Deduct manager's house, separately entered,	7	0	0
Pipes in Port Elphinstone, parish of Kintore, separately entered,	4	0	0
				43	5	7
Valuation of works,				£118	2	7

No. 191.

Mar. 21, 1872.
Inverurie Gasworks.

The chairman of the gas company objected to the principle of the valuation, alleging that it was on trade profits and not the rent at which the heritable property would let for; and he further contended that, even supposing some such principle as that proposed by the assessor for ascertaining the rent were adopted, no tenant would take the works and keep up the property for 2 per cent for deterioration on its value, or for a profit of £32, 5s. 7d. The risk of working such undertakings arising from explosions, fire, and other causes, is very great; and such works would not be let to a tenant without a guarantee that the property would not receive damage in his hands. This would involve the necessity of an insurance of the subjects, which would be costly; and no tenant would undertake the responsibilities of such a place for a paltry profit of £32, 5s. 7d. The appellant therefore submitted that, assuming the assessor's principle, the deduction for tenant's profits to cover insurance and risk of explosions, &c., could not be less than 75 per cent, which would bring out a valuation of £29, 7s. 1d. as follows:—

Sum as before,				£161	8	2
Deduct 75 per cent for tenant's profits, &c.	£121	1	1
Manager's house,	7	0	0
Pipes in Port Elphinstone,	4	0	0
				132	1	1
Valuation of works,				£29	7	1

The Commissioners fixed the valuation at £90. The assessor appealed. Held that the Commissioners were right.

JOHN HENRY UDNY.

No. 192.

Mar. 21, 1872.
Udny.

Ld. Ormidale.
Lord Mure.

Case 86.

Rent of Farm by nineteen years' Lease—(Deductions from Rent for eleven years for Drainage).—From the rent of the farm, by the lease for nineteen years, deductions are allowed of £60 for the first year, and £50 yearly for the next ten years, for the drainage of the farm, to be executed by the tenant to the satisfaction of the proprietor. The proprietor maintained that the deduction was allowed for the first period of the lease in order to get the higher rent for the remainder of the nineteen years of the lease, and but for this the higher rent would not have been got. The annual value of the farm should, therefore, be entered at the rent, less the deduction.

The assessor entered the rent in the roll without deduction, on the ground that the annual expenditure of £50 in drainage was a condition of the lease, and was part of the consideration for the use of the subjects.

The Commissioners were of opinion that although £50 of the money did not come into the landlord's pocket it was spent on permanent improvements by the tenant as trustee for the landlord.

The Commissioners confirmed the valuation. Held that the Commissioners were right.

No. 193. ROBERT GLASS.

Mar. 21, 1872. Glass. — Ld. Ormidale. Lord Mure.

Case 87.

Entries in Roll—Lands in one part of Parish—House in another.—The appellant is proprietor of lands near Milnathort, held of Sir Graham Montgomery, and part is in his own occupation, valued at £130; and he is also proprietor of the estate of Arlary, held of the Crown, and occupies the mansion-house, offices, garden, lawn, and lodge and plantations. The lands near Milnathort and the estate of Arlary are in the parish of Orwell, and they are separated by the farm of Burleigh—Sir Graham Montgomery proprietor. The farm of Arlary is let to a tenant at the rent of £502, and has a suitable house on it. The appellant held he was entitled to have the portions of each property, in his own occupation, treated as one holding, and entered in cumulo, so as to give him the benefit of having the house of Arlary valued along with the lands near Milnathort as regards the assessment for the poors' rates.

The assessor made separate entries of the lands and offices at Milnathort, and the mansion-house, garden, and offices at Arlary.

The Commissioners unanimously resolved that the subjects should not be conjoined in the roll, as contended for by the appellant. Held that the Commissioners were right.

N.B.—The Commissioners added a note to the case, to the effect that a case to the Judges was only competent in a matter of valuation, and the question whether certain subjects were to be entered in the valuation-roll in two or more entries, or in one entry, they held was left to the discretion of the Commissioners, and their decision was final.

No. 194. ROBERT BINNING.

May 28, 1872. Binning. — Ld. Ormidale. Lord Mure.

Case 88.

Value—Dwelling-house (Glasgow)—Owner the Occupier—Comparison with other Houses—One House less in size in same Terrace let—Last year's value fixed at £140—This year reduced to £135.—The appellant is owner and occupier of a house in Princes Terrace, Glasgow, which is assessed at the value of £175. Last year it was assessed at £155, and was reduced on appeal to £140. The terrace consists of twelve houses, all of the same size excepting Nos. 6 and 7, which are two-thirds the size of the appellant's, and all occupied by the owners, excepting No. 7, which is let at £125. The appellant referred to the value, as assessed, of other houses in the west end of Glasgow, and stated if his house were valued at the same rate of floorage the assessment would be £115. The assessor alleged the houses referred to were entered at too low a rate, and although houses of the same description were seldom let, yet, where let, the rent obtained bore out his valuation.

The Commissioners reduced the valuation to £135. Held that the Commissioners were wrong, and that the assessable value of appellant's house should be £140.

No. 195. CALEDONIAN RAILWAY COMPANY.

May 28, 1872. Caledonian Railway Co. — Ld. Ormidale. Lord Mure.

Case 89.

Railway (Caledonian)—Dwelling-houses outside the Railway Fence—Occupiers Employees of Railway Company—Whether they should be in Railway Assessment or County Assessment.—Dwelling-houses belonging to the Caledonian Railway Company in the parishes of Dalziel and Bothwell, situated beyond the railway fence, occupied by employees of the railway, are entered in the county lands valuation-roll, the Caledonian Railway Company as proprietors, and the employees as occupiers. The employees occupy the houses only while in the service, and on leaving the service must vacate the houses without formal notice. They pay rent, which is deducted from their wages. They consist of five classes, who are entitled to different periods of warning:—1. Heads of departments, three months; 2. Chief clerks, &c., two months; 3. Other clerks, one month; 4. Guards, &c., two weeks; 5. Porters, &c., one week. They are all liable to immediate dismissal for disobedience, &c.

No. 195.
May 28, 1872.
Caledonian Railway Co.

The appellants alleged that the houses were included in the valuation-roll made up by the assessor of railways, and fell within "stations, wharfs, docks, depots, counting-houses, and other houses and places of business," in sec. 21 of 17 and 18 Vict. cap. 91.

The Commissioners refused the appeal. Held that the Commissioners were right.

THE GLASGOW IRON COMPANY AND SAMUEL H. CAMPBELL. No. 196.

Goodwill or Prestige of a Shop or Store—Rent.—The Glasgow Iron Company let to Samuel H. Campbell store and dwelling-house in connection with their works. In the missive offer by Campbell £90 is offered as the rent of the subjects and £60 for goodwill of the business. The total sum of £150 is entered on the roll. The company and Campbell contended that only £90 should be entered, the £60 paid for goodwill not being of the nature of rent. The company had formed and carried on a successful business for some years in this store, and established connection with their works, and the assessor maintained that locality and connection were important elements in obtaining rent and fixing annual value.

Mar. 24, 1873.
Glasgow Iron Co. and Campbell.
Ld. Ormidale.
Lord Mure.
Case 90.

The Commissioners refused the appeal. Held that the Commissioners were right.

SIR ROBERT MENZIES. No. 197.

Church (Episcopal)—Whether "Lands and Heritages"—The Episcopal Church at Weem, Perthshire, is entered in roll at a valuation of £10, proprietor, trustees, p. Sir Robert Menzies, Bart. It is erected within the policies of Castle Menzies, and is the private property of Sir Robert. He stated that it was about to be consecrated to divine uses in perpetuity, and no revenue was derived from it. Sir Robert maintained that churches were extra commercium, and were not liable to assessments, and as by the Act the roll is to be the basis of assessment churches should not be entered.

Mar. 29, 1873.
Menzies.
Ld. Ormidale.
Lord Mure.
Case 91.

The Commissioners dismissed the appeal. Held that the Commissioners were right.

JOHN GRANT. No. 198.

Tenant—Purchaser—(Tenant became purchaser before expiry of lease)—Rent or Value.—Appellant was tenant of park and house, at rent of £12, on lease of twenty-one years from Whitsunday 1865. He purchased the subjects, and made considerable improvements, and they were then entered at £20, which was admitted to be a fair value; but appellant contended that the rent under the lease should remain in the roll until such time as the lease would have expired.

Mar. 29, 1873.
Grant.
Ld. Ormidale.
Lord Mure.
Case 92.

The Commissioners unanimously refused the appeal. Held that the Commissioners were right.

THE RENTON GAS-LIGHT COMPANY. No. 199.

Gasworks—Value—Tenant's Profits.—The annual value of the Renton Gasworks was entered at £260 by assessor, arrived at thus:—Profits, £279, 15s. 10d., plus rates and taxes, £25, 10s., deducted in ascertaining profits = £305, 5s. Deduct 15 per cent for tenant's profits, £45, 5s., leaves £260. Of the profits there was divided among shareholders the sum of £157, 16s., and carried to reserve fund £121, 9s. 10d.

Mar. 29, 1873.
Renton Gas Light Co.
Ld. Ormidale.
Lord Mure.
Case 93.

No. 199.
Mar. 29, 1873.
Renton Gas Light Co.

The company contended that, in considering what rent a tenant could pay, the profit of £279 would be subject to a deduction for (1) average cost of repairs and renewals of mains and apparatus, and (2) to tenant's remuneration for trouble and risk, which together would amount to not less than £109, leaving £170 as the annual value.

The Commissioners reduced the valuation to £170. Held that the Commissioners were right.

No. 200.

THE LEVEN GAS-LIGHT COMPANY.

Mar. 29, 1873.
Leven Gas Light Co.
Ld. Ormidale.
Lord Mure.
Case 94.

Gasworks—Value—Tenant's Profits.—The annual value of the Leven Gasworks is entered by assessor at £627, arrived at by deducting from the profits £737, 10s. 9d., 15 per cent for tenant's profits, or say £110, 10s. 9d. The company appealed, and claimed to have valuation restricted to £288, 16s., being 7½ per cent on the cost of the works, less 15 per cent on the result for tenant's profits. They contended 7½ per cent on the cost of the works is a fair return, and a higher rent than could be got, the tenant doing repairs, and that what has been divided among the shareholders in excess of that percentage represents their profits as manufacturers and retailers of gas.

The Commissioners restricted the valuation to £440, being the average sum divided among the shareholders for several years past. Held that the Commissioners were right.

No. 201.

JOHN FORBES.

Mar. 20, 1873.
Forbes.
Ld. Ormidale.
Lord Mure.
Case 95.

Moss of an Estate—Lands and Heritages—Value.—Portions of the estates of Crannah, Blacklaw, and Crombie, of which the appellant, John Forbes of Haddo, is proprietor, are moss. His tenants have the privilege of taking fuel therefrom, but portions are disposed of to other parties for annual payments. The revenue derived from the latter source is estimated by assessor at £60, which is entered as the annual value of the moss. The appellant contended that moss was not mentioned in the special enumeration of lands and heritages in the Act. If it should be held to be included, the moss should be valued at £9 as pasture land, or if the income derived from it shall be taken, then the moss-grieve's wages, and the interest of the money expended in making roads, drains, and ditches, should be deducted. The assessor assented to the moss-grieve's wages being deducted, but not the above interest. Such interest was of the nature of the interest on expenditure for farm drainage, which, if paid by the tenant, was added to the rent, and included in the roll.

The appellant's book of drawings was produced to the Commissioners, who went over it.

The Commissioners fixed the sum to be entered in the roll at £53, 4s. Held that the Commissioners were right.

No. 202.

MRS R. URIE.

May 20, 1873.
Urie.
Ld. Ormidale.
Lord Mure.
Case 96.

House and Shop—(Proportion of cumulo rent applicable to house).—The gross rent of the house and shop belonging to the same landlord is £56, and the assessor has entered shop at £36 and house at £20, on the ground that there were dwelling-houses in same tenement, similar in all respects to appellant's, let at £23 and £24 respectively.

The appellant had been tenant of shop since Whitsunday 1865. The rent was first £26, afterwards £30, then £34, and finally, from Whitsunday 1871, £38. She entered as tenant of the dwelling-house on the death of the former tenant, in February 1870, and she produced the landlord's receipts to shew that the rent has continued at £18 since entry.

The Commissioners, on the ground they were satisfied the house was actually let at £18, restricted the valuation to that sum. Held that the Commissioners were right.

THE NITH NAVIGATION COMMISSIONERS. No. 203.

May 29, 1873.

Nith Navigation Commissioners.

Ld. Ormidale.
Lord Mure.

Case 97.

arbour—Quay, &c.—(Wooden Erection at Carsethorn on the Nith, 12 from Dumfries—Goods exported and imported—Rates levied).—The Navigation Commissioners are appointed by statute for the purpose nproving the harbour of Dumfries and the navigation of the river . They are authorised to levy rates on shipping using the river Nith Southerness to the Caul of Dumfries, thirty-six miles, and on goods orted and exported. The river divides Dumfriesshire from the artry of Kirkcudbright. There are four quays on the Dumfriesshire —two entered at a gross valuation of £5, while no value is put upon other two,—and two quays on the other, valued in the roll of the artry at £2 each.

addition to these, there is entered in the roll of the Stewartry, ethorn Harbour—proprietors and occupiers, the Nith Navigation Comioners, value £25. Against this entry they appealed.

wooden erection was put up by the owners of a steamboat between ity and thirty years ago, at Carsethorn, which is twelve miles below nfries. This erection does not belong to the appellants, and is at pre- , and has been for fifteen years, in a state of decay, and almost useless. vessels discharge coals, &c., and take in country produce at Carsethorn. s are levied at Carsethorn; but the rates, the appellants allege, are he entire river, and could not be collected for this or any separate of the river.

he Commissioners dismissed the appeal. Held that the Commissioners wrong.*

THE BANK OF SCOTLAND. No. 204.

June 9, 1873.

Bank of Scotland.

Ld. Ormidale.
Lord Mure.

Case 101.

ank Offices—Value—Mode of stating Case.—The offices of the Bank of land in Dundee, and which belong to the bank, are entered in the at £468. The Bank of Scotland appealed, and submitted that the e should be entered at £280.

vidence was led before the Commissioners, and a printed copy thereof, n by a shorthand writer, was agreed to be held as the proof for both ies, and it and certain documents referred to in the evidence were re- d to, and signed as part of the case.

he Commissioners, by a majority, sustained the valuation. The ges returned the following deliverance:—"The Judges, in respect that is not a special case stated in the terms required by the statute 20 21 Vict. c. 58, sec. 2, cannot entertain it to any effect. It is therefore nissed." Case dismissed not being a special case stated in the terms uired by the statute.†

"NOTE.—There is, in the opinion of the Judges, no evidence in this case to uct that there is any harbour, or quay, or other artificial work, at Carsethorn, nging to or occupied by the Nith Commissioners, in respect of which any or duties are levied or leviable by them, so that the harbour does not, in opinion, fall within the rules laid down as applicable to such subjects in ase of the Bowling Harbour referred to, case 60."

"NOTE.—The counsel for the appellants did not maintain that there was a here such as is required by the statute, but, on the contrary, argued that e was not. In this view the Judges entirely concur, for the reasons which explained by them in the course of the discussion.

The Judges also explained, in the course of the discussion, that it was imible for them to determine what effect ought to be given to the proof, even it been competent for them to review it, considering the manner in which it been presented to them. For example, they observe (p. 10 of the printed

No. 205.

STIRLING AND SONS.

June 9, 1873.
Stirling and Sons.

Ld. Ormidale.
Lord Mure.

Case 104.

Value—Dye and Print-Works—Comparison with similar Works let.—The works at Dalquhurn and Cordale, in Dumbartonshire, belonging to Messrs Stirling and Sons, were entered at £2580 and £600 respectively having been previously entered at £1350 and £560. Other print-works in the county had been similarly increased in value, and the valuations were also appealed against, but the decision in the case as to Messrs Stirling's works was to rule them. The assessor referred to the previous case of Messrs Stirling and Sons, No. 69, and to the case No. 54. Following the principle indicated in these cases, he had again increased the valuation of the appellants' works, on the ground of a comparison of their works with a similar work at Barrhead, Renfrewshire, which was actually let. He had, in estimating the appellants' work, added to the annual value of the ground occupied 7½ per cent for the value of the machinery, and 7½ per cent for the value of the buildings. That the sum thus arrived at for the buildings was equal to 9½d. per square yard of flooring space for the Cordale works, and 1s. 0¾d. for the Dalquhurn works. That the same percentage on the value of the buildings in the other works gave from 10¼d. to 1s. 2¼d. per square yard of flooring space. The same percentage would give for the Barrhead work a gross value of £445, equal to 10½d. per square yard of flooring space, whereas the rent actually paid was £540, or about 1s. 1¼d. per square yard of flooring space; and, in addition, the tenants keep the premises in repair, and pay £100 a-year to another proprietor for an insufficient supply of water.

The Commissioners reduced the valuations to the previous amounts.

The Judges remitted the case to the Commissioners, and requested them to give the appellants an opportunity of proving that the sums at which the buildings, &c., were valued were excessive, and that the percentage of 7½ was too high. The appellants led evidence tending to shew that the rent of certain works produced only the percentage 3⅛, 3¼, 3½. The valuation of the assessor of the buildings, &c., was found to be fair.

Under a further remit and request by the Judges to the Commissioners, the assessor led evidence which went to shew that in the cases of the works to which the appellants' evidence referred the full facts of the cases brought out a larger percentage than 7½.

"Edinburgh, 17th June 1873.—From the manner in which this case has been presented to them, the Judges have found it impossible to form a satisfactory opinion on the question, whether the Commissioners, in the result arrived at by them, are right or not. But as the Judges are unable to find from the case and information laid before them that the Commissioners have not arrived at a right conclusion their determination must for the present stand as it is." evidence) that, in regard to what appears to be an important question—viz, whether the Bank of Scotland had a storey more than the adjacent properties—an answer was not allowed to be given, because the magistrates before whom the proof was taken all knew how the matter stood. But the Judges are not in possession of any such knowledge. The proof is, therefore, to them necessarily defective and unintelligible as a substitute for a special case"

---

INDEX OF MATTERS

IN

VOLUME XI.

[Points decided in the House of Lords are printed in Italics.]

ACQUIESCENCE. See Mora.

ADVOCATE, LORD, CONCURRENCE OF. See Agent and Client—Bankruptcy, 2.

AGENT AND CLIENT. Personal Liability of Agent.

An agent for a private pursuer of an action of declarator of contravention of lawburrows used the name of the Lord Advocate as joint pursuer without his authority. Held that the agent was personally liable in expenses to the defenders. Robertson v. Ross, July 16, 1873, p. 910.

AGENT AND PRINCIPAL. Bankruptcy.

1. A sum of £1000 was sent by clients to a law-agent on 8th June for the purpose of being invested in a heritable security. On 15th June the agent paid it into his own bank account, which shewed a balance in his favour, until the transaction should be formally completed; and he died on the 21st. His estates were thereafter sequestrated, and the trustee claimed the £1000 in bank as part of the bankrupt estate. In a petition at the instance of the clients, under sec. 104 of the Bankruptcy Act, held that the £1000 having been sent to the bankrupt for a specific purpose, and being still distinguishable from his funds, fell to be taken out of the sequestration of his estate and paid to the petitioners. Macadam v. Martin's Trustee, Nov. 5, 1872, p. 33.

Contract—Construction.

2. A commercial traveller agreed to act for a firm of wholesale tea merchants for a commission of one-third of the difference between the price quoted by his employers as the value of the tea, adding the charge for brokerage and other expenses, and the money obtained by the sale of the tea, his employers retaining the right of accepting or rejecting orders. Held that this entitled him to one-third of the profits, if any, on each sale effected through him, without deduction in respect of loss upon other sales. Laurie v. Lloyd and Co., Feb. 20, 1873, p. 413.

Mandate—Bill—Forgery.

3. A firm of merchants, by a letter addressed to a bank, granted authority to their manager "to sign, per procuration of their firm, all bills, cheques, cash-orders, and other documents necessary to the conducting of our business, and all vouchers so subscribed will be equally binding as if signed by any member of our firm." They also delivered to their manager a letter of procuration binding themselves to meet all cheques, orders, drafts, bills, &c., endorsed by the manager, and "to keep the parties dealing with you free and skaithless; and we bind ourselves to ratify, homologate, and confirm the actings and doings of you, the manager, in respect of such cheques," &c. This document was delivered by the manager to the bank. The manager, after forging the names of certain real and fictitious firms as accep-

AGENT AND PRINCIPAL—Continued.
tors of bills to bills drawn by himself as procurator of his principal's firm discounted the bills at the bank, and endorsed them per procuratory, and appropriated the money thus obtained to his own use.

Held that, as it was not proved that the bank had failed to exercise due caution in discounting any of the bills, or that the signatures thereto were manifest forgeries, or presented a suspicious appearance which should have put the bank on their guard, the firm were liable to the bank for the amount of the bills. Union Bank v. Makin, March 7, 1873, p. 499.

AGREEMENT. Pactum de non petendo—Obligation—Conditional Discharge—Process—Sist.

1. In an action by a tenant against the representatives of his landlord for payment of certain bills of exchange granted by the latter, the defenders founded on a letter by the tenant in proof of an alleged agreement by the tenant not to ask payment of the bills in consideration of a renewed lease being granted to the tenant. The pursuer, in reply, stated that the lease was threatened to be reduced by the next heir of entail in possession of the estate as in contravention of the entail. After a proof, held (diss. Lord Benholme) that a pactum de non petendo had been proved, and that the pursuer being still in undisturbed possession of the farm was not in hoc statu entitled to decree, reserving all further questions on the merits. Macvean v. Maclean, June 26, 1873, p. 764.

Proof—Parole Evidence—Competency—Damage—Reparation.

2. In an action of damages the pursuer averred that the defenders had arranged to board certain children with her, and that as both parties had contemplated that the arrangement should continue for a term of years she had incurred certain expenditure which she lost by the guardians suddenly bringing the arrangement to a close. Held (1) that parole evidence of such an arrangement was competent, and (2) that the pursuer was entitled to be reimbursed for actual loss. Dobie v. Lauder's Trustees, June 24, 1873, p. 749.

Superior and Vassal—Feu-Contract.

3. A superior bound his vassal to build and maintain on his feu a house of a certain value, and reserved to himself the minerals, with power to work them at pleasure, and to remove as much stone, &c., as might be necessary for the proper working of the minerals, it being expressly agreed that he should not be liable for any damage to the vassal that might happen through the working of the coal, &c., by longwall workings or otherwise. Held (reversing judgment of the Second Division) that the vassal was not entitled to an interdict against the superior working the minerals under his house on the ground that the workings would probably injure or destroy it. Buchanan, &c. v. Andrew, March 10, 1873, H. L. p. 13.

See Error.

ALIMENT. Alimentary Provision—Discharge—Judicial Factor—Trust.

1. By trust-settlement an annuity was directed to be paid, and was declared to be alimentary and "not assignable for causes onerous or gratuitous, and not subject to arrestment or other legal diligence, and not subject to the debts or deeds" of the donee. A judicial factor, who was appointed on failure of the trustees, carried out all the purposes of the trust except two. These were payment of the annuity and handing over the estate to the residuary legatee. The judicial factor, the annuitant, and the residuary legatee came to an agreement that the residuary legatee should grant a personal bond for payment of the annuity to the annuitant, who was to grant a discharge to the judicial factor, and that the trust-estate should be wound up and the residue paid over to the residuary legatee. The judicial factor presented a petition praying for exoneration and discharge on this arrangement being carried out. Held that the annuitant had not power to grant a discharge of the alimentary provision, and petition refused. Smith and Campbell, May 30, 1873, p. 639.

ALIMENT—Continued.

Annuity—Alimentary—Discharge.

2. A husband burdened certain lands with an annuity to his widow, declaring that it should be alimentary and not assignable, and should be exclusive of the jus mariti of any husband she might marry. He directed his trustees upon the death of his widow to convey the lands to A. The free rents of the lands were insufficient to pay the annuity, and the trustees required to borrow money to pay it on the security of the lands.

The widow and A agreed that she should disburden the lands for a certain sum, and that the trustees should on such payment convey the lands at once to A.

In a special case by A and the trustees, held that the widow could not discharge the annuity, and that the trustees were not authorised to convey the lands to A. Cosens v. Stevenson, &c., June 26, 1873, p. 761.

See Succession.

ANNUITY. Testament—Legacy.

1. A testator appointed his trustees to pay to his widow an annuity of £1000 a-year in lieu of her legal rights and of her claims under an antenuptial marriage-contract, and disposed of the rest of his estate in legacies, some of which he directed to be paid within three months after his death, and others after the death of his widow. The income of the trust-estate was not sufficient to pay the annuity. Held that the annuity was preferable to the legacies of which payment had been postponed, and that the widow was entitled to have it paid in full, whether the revenue of the trust-estate yielded that amount or not. Kinmond's Trustees v. Kinmond, Feb. 5, 1873, p. 381.

Succession—Testament—Statute 33 and 34 Vict. c. 35 (Apportionment Act, 1870).

2. A testator left an annuity of £200 to his sister "during all the days and years of her life," payable in equal portions at Whitsunday and Martinmas, "commencing the first year's payment" at the first term after his death. He died on the 9th November 1866. She survived till 27th October 1871, having received five years' payments of the annuity during the four years and eleven months of her survivance. Her representatives maintained that the testator's direction to make a year's payment at the first term after his death was intended to cover the half year current at the date of his death, and that the annuitant had thus only received four and a half year's payment of the annuity, and was entitled to a proportion for the half year current at the date of her death. Held that the testator's intention was that the sister should receive payment for the period during which she should survive him at the rate of £200 per annum, and that she had received full payment. Cuninghame's Trustees v. Duke et al., March 18, 1873, p. 543.

Succession—Heir and Executor—Tract of future time.

3. A testator conveyed his whole estate of every description to trustees, for the purposes of entailing a certain estate on a series of heirs, of realising his other estate, heritable and moveable, of fulfilling and discharging the obligations contained in his antenuptial marriage-contract, of paying legacies, and, lastly, of paying the residue to certain persons. Held that an annuity payable to the testator's widow under his marriage-contract was due out of the residue, and was not a burden on the entailed estate. Gordon v. Scott, Jan. 22, 1873, p. 334.

Revenue.

4. Held that annuities granted by the proprietor of heritable and moveable estate were after his death payable out of the rents of the heritage. Breadalbane's Trustees v. Jamieson, &c., July 16, 1873, p. 912.

See Aliment.

APPEAL. See Process.

APPEAL TO HOUSE OF LORDS. See Process.

APPORTIONMENT. Illusory Payments—Stat. 11 Geo. IV. and 1 Wm. IV., c. 46.

1. Question, Whether the enactment in the above statute that all apportionments under a power shall be valid, whether illusory or not, applies to Scotland. Smith's Trustees v. Graham and Others, May 29, 1873, p. 630.

Succession—Testament—Statute 33 and 34 Vict. c. 35 (Apportionment Act, 1870).

2. A testator left an annuity of £200 to his sister "during all the days and years of her life," payable in equal portions at Whitsunday and Martinmas, "commencing the first year's payment" at the first term after his death. He died on the 9th November 1866. She survived till 27th October 1871, having received five years' payments of the annuity during the four years and eleven months of her survivance. Her representatives maintained that the testator's direction to make a year's payment at the first term after his death was intended to cover the half year current at the date of his death, and that the annuitant had thus only received four and a half year's payment of the annuity, and was entitled to a proportion for the half year current at the date of her death. Held that the testator's intention was that the sister should receive payment for the period during which she should survive him at the rate of £200 per annum, and that she had received full payment. Cuninghame's Trustees v. Duke et al., March 18, 1873, p. 543.

*Heir and Executor—*33 and 34 Vict. c. 35*—Lease.*

3. Farms on an entailed estate were let in accordance with local custom and the previous usage on the estate, with entry to the houses, grass, and hay lands at Whitsunday, and to the lands under crop at the separation of the crops from the ground. The rents were payable at Martinmas and Whitsunday for the half year preceding. The proprietor died on 18th July 1872. In a question between his executor and the next heir of entail, held that the rents payable at Martinmas 1872 were rents accruing at the date of his death, and fell to be apportioned between heir and executor under the Apportionment Act of 1870. Lord Herries v. Maxwell's Curator, Feb. 6, 1873, p. 396.

See Heir and Executor, 2—Landlord and Tenant, 4.

APPROBATE AND REPROBATE. Marriage-Contract—General Settlement—Negative Prescription.

A father executed a trust-deed for payment of certain debts and regulating his succession in fraudem of his antenuptial marriage-contract, and to the prejudice of the heir of the marriage, and afterwards another trust-deed, the two forming together a complete settlement of his whole estate, heritable and moveable. The heir made up a title under the marriage-contract, and under it possessed the lands contained in the first trust-deed, and took benefit under the second deed, but in ignorance of the existence of the first trust-deed. Held that his trustees and executors were not barred by the negative prescription from challenging the earlier deed, but were entitled to elect either to abide by his approbation of his father's settlement, or to renounce and restore the benefit he had taken, and challenge the first deed. Earl of Glasgow's Trustee v. Earl of Glasgow, &c., Dec. 13, 1872, p. 218.

ARBITER. Process—Defence—Contract—Clause of Reference.

Held that an action raised by a contractor against his employer for payment due under a building contract, and for damages from his employer having, as he alleged, illegally taken possession of machinery and materials, was not excluded by a clause of reference in the contract, in respect (1) that it was not clear that the clause of reference gave the arbiter authority to give decree for payment of money; (2) that certain of the questions raised did not fall within the reference; and (3) that the arbiter could not assess damages.

Observed, that if questions arose in the course of the action falling within the reference, the aid of the arbiter must be invoked. Tough v. Dumbarton Water-Works Commissioners, Dec. 20, 1872, p. 236.

ARRESTMENT. Jurisdictionis fundandæ causa.

1. A person resident in England intromitted with a Scotch executry estate. Held that arrestment of her private funds in Scotland was sufficient to found jurisdiction against her in a question between her and beneficiaries claiming a share of the executry estate. Macadam v. Macadam, July 3, 1873, p. 866.

Preference—Bankruptcy—Act 1696, c. 5—19 and 20 Vict. c. 79 (Bankruptcy (Scotland) Act, 1856), secs. 10, 11, 12, and 108.

2. A person who was insolvent granted a trust-deed for behoof of his creditors to a trustee, who entered into possession of his property. A creditor of the insolvent, who was no party to the trust-deed, used arrestments in the hands of the trustee. Thereafter, within sixty days of granting the trust-deed, the insolvent absconded, and so became notour bankrupt. More than four months after notour bankruptcy he was sequestrated. Held that the creditor, being entitled under the Act 1696 to reduce the trust-deed, had secured an effectual preference by using arrestment in the hands of the trustee, which was not affected by the sequestration. Nicolson v. Johnstone and Wright, Dec. 6, 1872, p. 179.

ASSIGNATION. See Bankruptcy, 5.

BANK. Mandate—Bill—Forgery.

A firm of merchants, by a letter addressed to a bank, granted authority to their manager "to sign, per procuration of their firm, all bills, cheques, cash-orders, and other documents necessary to the conducting of our business, and all vouchers so subscribed will be equally binding as if signed by any member of our firm." They also delivered to their manager a letter of procuration binding themselves to meet all cheques, orders, drafts, bills, &c., endorsed by the manager, and "to keep the parties dealing with you free and skaithless; and we bind ourselves to ratify, homologate, and confirm the actings and doings of you, the manager, in respect of such cheques," &c. This document was delivered by the manager to the bank. The manager, after forging the names of certain real and fictitious firms as acceptors of bills to bills drawn by himself as procurator of his principal's firm, discounted the bills at the bank, and endorsed them per procuratory, and appropriated the money thus obtained to his own use.

Held that, as it was not proved that the bank had failed to exercise due caution in discounting any of the bills, or that the signatures thereto were manifest forgeries, or presented a suspicious appearance which should have put the bank on their guard, the firm were liable to the bank for the amount of the bills. Union Bank v. Makin, March 7, 1873, p. 499.

BANKRUPTCY. Bankrupty (Scotland) Act, 19 and 20 Vict. c. 79, sec. 141—Expenses of Trustee who had resigned office—Composition.

1. The 141st section of the Bankruptcy Act enacts that in a sequestration, before the Lord Ordinary or the Sheriff shall pronounce the deliverance approving of a composition, "the commissioners shall audit the accounts of the trustee, and ascertain the balance due to or by him, and fix the remuneration for his trouble, subject to the review of the Lord Ordinary or the Sheriff, if complained of by the trustee, the bankrupt, or any of the creditors, and that the expenses attending the sequestration and the remuneration of the trustee shall be paid or provided for to the satisfaction of the trustee and commissioners before such deliverance approving of the composition is pronounced." In a sequestration a trustee resigned office before receiving payment of his account. After a new trustee had been appointed the bankrupt offered a composition to his creditors. The Sheriff approved of the composition, after receiving a report by the trustee, in which he stated that the bankrupt and his cautioner had offered to the first trustee a bill for £20 in full of his claim for £60, and that the commissioners and the reporter thought the offer reasonable, and that the reporter was satisfied therewith. In an appeal by the first trustee against the Sheriff's deliverance, held (1) that the first trustee had a sufficient title to appeal, and (2) that he was entitled to have his account audited in terms of the statute. Miller v. Keith, Nov. 30, 1872, p. 164.

BANKRUPTCY—Continued.

Trustee—Petition and Complaint—Competency—Lord Advocate—Statute 19 and 20 Vict. c. 79, secs. 84 and 86.

2. A petition and complaint presented to the Lord Ordinary on the Bills by a creditor on a sequestrated estate set forth that the trustee was employing the trust-funds in an improper way, and had not complied with the provisions of sec. 84 of the above Act as to the sederunt-book to be kept by the trustee. The petitioner craved to have the trustee ordained to cease from using his powers and the funds of the sequestrated estate in the way complained of. There was further a prayer for censure of the trustee.

The Lord Ordinary having dismissed the petition as incompetent, the petitioner reclaimed, and moved the Court to allow him to amend the petition by striking out the prayer for censure. Held (1) that the amendment could not be allowed; (2) that the petition was not authorised by the Bankruptcy Act; (3) that it was not competent at common law, in respect (1) the Bill-Chamber had no jurisdiction, and (2) that, being of a penal character, it had not the concurrence of the Lord Advocate. Paterson v. Robson, Nov. 16, 1872, p. 76.

Bankrupt—Preference—Illegal Agreement for the purpose of obtaining the Bankrupt's Discharge—Statutory Penalty—Bankruptcy Act, 1856, sec. 150.

3. A, one of the creditors on a sequestrated estate, who claimed to have a security for his debt over certain machinery, entered into an arrangement with B, a friend of the bankrupt, without the knowledge of the trustee or of the other creditors, by which he was to receive £500 from B, and to rank on the sequestrated estate for the full amount of his claim, as a condition of his agreeing to a proposed composition-contract. Held that the penalty under the above section had been incurred by A, although he had believed that B was acting for the trustee and creditors, and although B had successfully resisted A's claim for payment of the £500. Thomas v. Sandeman, Nov. 22, 1872, p. 81.

Trustee.

4. Question, Whether a trustee in a sequestration can in litigation make admissions in points of law. Nicolson v. Johnstone and Wright, Dec. 6, 1872, p. 179.

Fraud—Right in Security—Assignation—Discharge.

5. An undischarged bankrupt obtained a loan from an English assurance company, who, out of the sum lent, paid a former debt due by him to a Scotch assurance company, but not having been made aware of the fact of the bankruptcy, instead of getting an assignation of the securities held by the Scotch assurance company, obtained a discharge of the debt, and took from the bankrupt a new bond and assignation in security over the rights disburdened by the discharge. Held, in a competition between the trustee on the bankrupt estate and the second creditor for a sum of money over which the assignation extended, that on grounds of equity the trustee could not be allowed to benefit by the fraud of the bankrupt in concealing from the second creditor the fact of his bankruptcy. Molleson v. Challis, March 11, 1873, p. 510.

Discharge—Bankruptcy (Scotland) Act, 1856, sec. 146.

6. Circumstances in which a discharge was granted to a bankrupt convicted of breach of trust and embezzlement after the expiry of the term of his imprisonment, and after the lapse of a year from the date of his application for discharge. Cooper v. Fraser, Nov. 5, 1872, p. 38.

Agent and Principal.

7. A sum of £1000 was sent by clients to a law-agent on 8th June for the purpose of being invested in a heritable security. On 15th June the agent paid it into his own bank account, which shewed a balance in his favour, until the transaction should be formally completed; and he died on the 21st. His estates were thereafter sequestrated, and the trustee claimed the £1000 in bank as part of the bankrupt estate. In a petition at the instance of the clients, under sec. 104 of the Bankruptcy Act, held that the £1000 having been sent to the bankrupt for a specific purpose, and being still distinguishable from his funds, fell to be taken out of the sequestration of his estate and paid to the petitioners. Macadam v. Martin's Trustee, Nov. 5, 1872, p. 33.

BANKRUPTCY—Continued.

See Diligence, 1.

BILL. See Agent and Principal, 3—Diligence, 4.

BILL-CHAMBER. See Bankruptcy, 2.

BILL OF EXCHANGE. Pactum de non petendo—Process—Sist.

1. In an action by a tenant against the representatives of his landlord for payment of certain bills of exchange granted by the latter, the defenders founded on a letter by the tenant in proof of an alleged agreement by the tenant not to ask payment of the bills in consideration of a renewed lease being granted to the tenant. The pursuer, in reply, stated that the lease was threatened to be reduced by the next heir of entail in possession of the estate as in contravention of the entail. After a proof, held (diss. Lord Benholme) that a pactum de non petendo had been proved, and that the pursuer being still in undisturbed possession of the farm was not in hoc statu entitled to decree, reserving all further questions on the merits. Macvean v. Maclean, June 26, 1873, p. 764.

Inhibition—Vergens ad inopiam.

2. The creditor in a bill of exchange which was dishonoured at maturity received from his debtor two renewal bills in lieu of the original bill, which, however, he retained in his own possession under an agreement whereby, as he alleged, he was to be entitled "to do such dilligence on the original bill as might be necessary for his security, in the event of other creditors doing diligence against the petitioner or his estate, or of circumstances emerging which should make it proper and advisable for the respondent to take steps that the debt due to him should be paid." The creditor presented a bill in the Bill-Chamber during the currency of the renewal bills, setting forth nothing more than that he was in possession of the original bill, and that it had been dishonoured at maturity, and craving letters of inhibition, which he obtained. In a petition for recall of the letters of inhibition, held that the bill upon which they proceeded should have set forth not only the original bill but also the two renewal bills, and a statement that the debtor was vergens ad inopiam, and the letters accordingly recalled. Stevens v. Campbell, June 28, 1873, p. 772.

Proof—Discharge—Parole.

3. A proof before answer allowed to explain documents alleged to instruct discharge of a debt contained in two promissory-notes in possession of the creditor in the obligation. Macvean v. Maclean, March 8, 1873, p. 506.

See Oath.

BURGH. See Property.

CESSIO BONORUM. Husband and Wife.

The pursuer in a process of cessio refused to execute a revocation of a disposition of a property of the value of £50 which he had granted to his wife when he was solvent. Held that his refusal was not a sufficient reason for refusing to grant the cessio. Donaldson v. Thomson, Jan. 25, 1873, p. 347.

CHURCH. Assessment—Manse—Real and Valued Rent—Merksland.

1. Held (dub. Lord Justice-Clerk) that in a landward parish, in Shetland, the assessment for alterations and repairs on a manse fell to be assessed upon the heritors liable, according to the number of merksland held by them respectively, that having been the rule of assessment from time immemorial and there being no special circumstances in the case to render that rule inequitable. Bruce v. Bruce and Another, June 24, 1873, p. 755.

CHURCH—Continued.

Erection of quoad sacra Parish—Statute 8 and 9 Vict. c. 44, sec. 8.

2. The Court of Teinds will not sanction the erection of a quoad sacra parish merely because a manse and stipend have been provided for the minister, but will only do so when it is necessary for the spiritual interests of the district on account of the distance of the parish church, or the growth of population, or some such circumstance. Irvine v. Maxwell, Feb. 17, 1873, p. 409.

Glebe—29 and 30 Vict. c. 71 (Glebe Lands Act, 1866).

3. The lodging of a minute by a conterminous proprietor, under the 17th section of the above statute, intimating his willingness to purchase the glebe or any part of it, does not conclude a personal contract of sale between him and the minister, it being in the power of the Court, at any time before decree of sale is pronounced, to impose conditions for the protection of the benefice. Gloag v. Rutherford, &c., Jan. 6, 1873, p. 251.

Glebe—Glebe Lands (Scotland) Act, 1866, 29 and 30 Vict. c. 71.

4. In an application for authority to feu under the Glebe Lands Act, held (1) that in fixing the minimum feu-duty the building value and not the agricultural value of the land fell to be taken; and (2) that the price to be paid by a conterminous heritor for lands taken under sec. 17 was twenty-five times the amount of the minimum feu-duty. Campbell v. Morison, Nov. 18, 1872, p. 80.

Erection—Endowment—Lease—Feu—Act 7 and 8 Vict. c. 44, sec. 8 (Division of Parishes Act, 1844).

5. The above Act sanctions the erection of quoad sacra parishes only in cases when the title to the site of the proposed church is such that it shall be inalienably secured as the church of the new parish. Held (diss. Lord Justice-Clerk and Lord Ardmillan) that a 999 years' lease of a church site did not satisfy this condition. Donaldson, &c., March 3, 1873, p. 489.

COLLABORATEUR. See Reparation.

COLLATION. See Succession.

COMPANY. See Joint-Stock Company.

CONDITION. Legacy.

1. When a bequest is made subject to a condition in favour of a third party, the condition is held to be fulfilled when the third party voluntarily renders its fulfilment impossible. Pirie v. Pirie, July 19, 1873, p. 941.

Testament.

2. A father in his testament gave a direction that a sum of money due to him by one of his sons should be allowed to remain in his hands for eight years, on condition that the executor and residuary legatee should remain a director of the company in which the sum was invested. The executor voluntarily resigned his office as director. Held that the condition must be held to have been satisfied, and that the son was entitled to retain the loan. Pirie v. Pirie, July 19, 1873, p. 941.

See Insurance, 2.

CONDITIO SI SINE LIBERIS. See Succession.

CONFIRMATION. See Superior and Vassal.

CONSTRUCTION. See Statute—Succession.

CONTRACT. See Agent and Principal, 2—Arbiter—Process—Property, 13.

CONVERSION. See Heritable and Moveable.

CROWN. Property—Foreshore—Regalia.

1. The Crown has a right of property in the foreshore not as being one of the regalia minora, but as a portion of the solum of the country, and may alienate the same, subject to the burden of certain public uses which attach to it, whether held in property by the Crown or by a subject. Agnew v. Lord Advocate, Jan. 21, 1873, p. 309.

Property—Foreshore.

2. The right of the public to use the foreshore for purposes of navigation is vested in the Crown as one of the regalia majora. Agnew v. Lord Advocate, Jan. 21, 1873, p. 309.

See Property—Fishings.

CULPA. See Reparation.

DAMAGES. See Reparation.

DEATHBED. See Minor.

DECREE. See Process.

DEED. See Writ.

DEPOSIT-RECEIPT. Loan—Proof.

In an action brought for payment of a sum of money, "being the amount contained in a deposit-receipt in name of the pursuer uplifted by the defender," the defender stated that he had received the deposit-receipt bearing the pursuer's endorsation from a third party, the true owner of the money, and to whom he had accounted for it. Held (1) that in so far as the action was or might be rested on an alleged loan by the pursuer to the defender such ground of action could not be proved by parole evidence, and that the only writing of the defender founded on in proof of it, being the defender's name written on the back of the deposit-receipt, was not legal proof of such loan, nor sufficient to render parole proof admissible; (2) that, in so far as the action was rested on the defender's alleged intromission with the pursuer's funds, the parole evidence had negatived the pursuer's case. Nimmo v. Nimmo, Feb. 22, 1873, p. 446.

DESTINATION.

1. A deed of entail contained a destination to A and the heirs-male to be procreated of her body, whom failing to the heirs whatsomever descending of her body. The narrative of the deed stated that the entail was to be made in favour of A and the heirs of her body. Held, that the whole class of heirs-male must be exhausted before heirs whatsoever could succeed. Erskine v. Earl of Kellie, July 4, 1873, p. 876.

Succession—Heir of Line—Heir of Conquest—Entail.

2. A person purchased an estate and entailed it upon himself and his heirs-male, and, after various substitutions, on his own heirs whatsoever. Held that, under the destination to his own heirs whatsoever, the heir of line was to be preferred to the heir of conquest. Mackintosh, &c. v. Ross, May 30, 1873, p. 636.

Opinion (per Lord Chancellor) that general words, purporting to dispose of a man's whole property, in a will or mortis causa deed, are (unless there be something in the instrument itself to control that presumption) to be understood as applicable only to property the succession to which, after the death of the testator, is not already regulated by a special destination to a particular class of heirs in a prior instrument, either made by the settlor himself, or under which he holds.

Observations (per Lord Chancellor) on the admissibility of extrinsic evidence by the law of Scotland in the construction of testamentary deeds.

Observed (per Lord Colonsay) that from the cases on the effect of a general disposition in evacuating or superseding prior destinations of heritage

DESTINATION—Continued.

the following inferences are deducible:—(1) That in determining what effect should be given to the words of general disposition the question has always been treated as one of presumption or presumed intention; (2) that a general disposition mortis causa does not derogate from a prior special destination, unless it be made clear that it was intended so to do; (3) that in dealing with such cases the Court has taken into consideration circumstances calculated to throw light on the intention or purpose of the testator, whether found within the deed or collected from external sources.

Question (per Lord Colonsay) whether a letter written by a testator after the date of his settlement may be referred to as extrinsic evidence in its construction. Glendonwyn v. Gordon, &c., May 19, 1873, H. L. p. 33.

3. A deed of strict entail contained a destination to A, "and the heirs-male procreated of the marriage between A and" the entailer's daughter, "and the heirs-male of their bodies respectively; whom failing, to the heirs whatsoever of the bodies of such heirs-male respectively; whom failing, to the heirs-female procreated of the said marriage, and the heirs whatsoever of their bodies respectively, &c. Held (aff. judgment of the Court of Session) that on the succession opening by the death of the eldest son of the said marriage without male issue, his only daughter, as heir whatsoever of his body, was entitled to take in preference to the next heir-male of the said marriage. Forbes v. Trefusis, June 17, 1873, H. L. p. 44.

Conditional Institution—Substitution.

4. A person conveyed a heritable subject to his children "equally among them, and the lawful issue of their bodies, and failing any of them by death, without lawful issue of their bodies, to the survivors equally." Held that this was a conditional institution of the grandchildren, and not a substitution. Stiven v. Brown's Trustees, Jan. 10, 1873, p. 261.

5. The granter of a mortis causa settlement disponed his heritable estate "to the heirs of my own body equally among them, share and share alike, whom failing, to A, B, C, and D, equally among them, share and share alike, and their respective heirs in fee." The granter died without leaving any heirs of his body, and the settlement was found in his repositories after his death. Held that A, B, C, and D were conditional institutes, and not substitutes, and had right to the property as disponees, without service or declarator. Hutchison v. Hutchison, Dec. 20, 1872, p. 229.

Conditional Institute or Substitute—Service.

6. Opinion (per cur.), that when a person by mortis causa conveyance in the ordinary form dispones to the heirs of his body, or the heirs-male of his body, whom failing, to a person named, the person so named (there being no heirs of his body then existing) is conditional institute; and if no heirs of the body of the granter come into existence, or existing, predecease him, the condition is purified, and the person named is, on the death of the granter, without qualification or condition, disponee, and as such is entitled to use the executory clauses of the disposition for the purpose of feudalising his right as disponee without service or declarator.

Observations on the cases of Gordon of Carleton, M. 14,366—14,368, and Peacock v. Glen, 4 S. 742. Hutchison v. Hutchison, Dec. 20, 1872, p. 229.

DILIGENCE. Execution of Search—Notour Bankrupt.

1. Observations on the terms of execution of search by sheriff-officers as affording prima facie evidence of absconding so as to constitute notour bankruptcy. Nicolson v. Johnstone and Wright, Dec. 6, 1872, p. 179.

Inhibition—Bill of Exchange—Vergens ad inopiam.

2. The creditor in a bill of exchange which was dishonoured at maturity received from his debtor two renewal bills in lieu of the original bill, which, however, he retained in his own possession under an agreement whereby, as he alleged, he was to be entitled "to do such diligence on the original bill as might be necessary for his security, in the event of other creditors doing diligence against the petitioner or his estate, or of circumstances emerging which should make it proper and advisable for the respondent to take steps that the debt due to him should be paid." The creditor presented a bill in the Bill-Chamber during the currency of the renewal bills, setting forth nothing more than that he was in possession of the original bill, and that it had been dishonoured at maturity, and craving letters of inhibition, which he obtained. In a petition for recall of the letters of inhibition, held that the bill upon which they proceeded should have set forth not only the original bill but also the two renewal bills, and a statement that the debtor was vergens ad inopiam, and the letters accordingly recalled. Stevens v. Campbell, June 28, 1873, p. 772.

DILIGENCE—Continued.

Inhibition—Titles to Land Act, 1868, 31 and 32 Vict. c. 101, sec. 156, schedule QQ thereof—A.S., 18*th Nov.* 1871.

3. Observed that the above statute had made no change upon the rule that a bill presented in the Bill-Chamber for the purpose of obtaining letters of inhibition must set forth fully and explicitly all the grounds of debt which justify the creditor in craving diligence. Stevens v. Campbell, June 28, 1873, p. 772.

Wrongous Use of Dilgence—Malice—Bill—Issues.

4. In an action of damages for injury alleged to have been caused by the defenders recording a protest for non-payment of a bill, and charging thereon, although the bill had been previously paid eight days after it had become due, held that a charge was a diligence and not a judicial act, and that therefore it was not necessary to put malice in the issue (Lord Benholme diss., on the ground that the circumstances shewed fault on the part of the pursuer, and that therefore it was not sufficient for him to prove merely a legal wrong).

Form of issue adjusted. Gibb v. Edinburgh Brewery Co., June 19, 1873, p. 705.

See Arrestment.

DISCHARGE. Alimentary Provision—Judicial Factor.

1. By trust-settlement an annuity was directed to be paid, and was declared to be alimentary and "not assignable for causes onerous or gratuitous, and not subject to arrestment or other legal diligence, and not subject to the debts or deeds" of the donee. A judicial factor, who was appointed on failure of the trustees, carried out all the purposes of the trust except two. These were payment of the annuity and handing over the estate to the residuary legatee. The judicial factor, the annuitant, and the residuary legatee came to an agreement that the residuary legatee should grant a personal bond for payment of the annuity to the annuitant, who was to grant a discharge to the judicial factor, and that the trust-estate should be wound up and the residue paid over to the residuary legatee. The judicial factor presented a petition praying for exoneration and discharge on this arrangement being carried out. Held that the annuitant had not power to grant a discharge of the alimentary provision, and petition refused. Smith and Campbell, May 30, 1873, p. 639.

Annuity—Alimentary.

2. A husband burdened certain lands with an annuity to his widow, declaring that it should be alimentary and not assignable, and should be exclusive of the jus mariti of any husband she might marry. He directed his trustees upon the death of his widow to convey the lands to A. The free rents of the lands were insufficient to pay the annuity, and the trustees required to borrow money to pay it on the security of the lands.

The widow and A agreed that she should disburden the lands for a certain sum, and that the trustees should on such payment convey the lands at once to A.

DISCHARGE—Continued.

In a special case by A and the trustees, held that the widow could not discharge the annuity, and that the trustees were not authorised to convey the lands to A. Cosens v. Stevenson, &c., June 26, 1873, p. 761.

DISPOSITION. See Destination—Property, 19—Succession.

DIVORCE. See Husband and Wife.

DONATION. See Proof, 4—Husband and Wife.

ENTAIL. Tract of Future Time—Succession—Testament—Relief.

1. A person executed an entail of certain lands, binding himself, his heirs, executors, and successors whomsoever, to free and relieve these lands of all his debts and obligations. Thereafter, by antenuptial contract of marriage, the entailer settled upon his spouse, in the event of her surviving him, an annuity secured over the entailed lands, but with power to himself, his heirs, executors, and successors, to purchase in lieu thereof an annuity from an insurance company, in which case the widow was bound to discharge the entailed estate. Held, on a construction of the two deeds (rev. judgment of the First Division), that the obligation in the first deed to relieve the entailed estate of the granter's debts and obligations applied to the annuity with which the estate was burdened by the second deed, and that the heir of entail was entitled to be relieved of the annuity out of the entailer's general trust-estate. Mackintosh v. Mackintosh's Trustees, May 19, 1873, H. L. p. 28.

Lease.

2. Question, Whether a lease granted by an heir of entail for a longer period than is allowed by the entail is good even for the period allowed. Forbes v. Wilson, Feb. 22, 1873, p. 454.

Heir and Executor—Apportionment—33 and 34 Vict. c. 35—Lease.

3. Farms on an entailed estate were let in accordance with local custom and the previous usage on the estate, with entry to the houses, grass, and hay lands at Whitsunday, and to the lands under crop at the separation of the crops from the ground. The rents were payable at Martinmas and Whitsunday for the half year preceding. The proprietor died on 18th July 1872. In a question between his executor and the next heir of entail, held that the rents payable at Martinmas 1872 were rents accruing at the date of his death, and fell to be apportioned between heir and executor under the Apportionment Act of 1870. Lord Herries v. Maxwell's Curator, Feb. 6, 1873, p. 396.

Destination.

4. A deed of entail contained a destination to A and the heirs-male to be procreate of her body, whom failing to the heirs whatsomever descending of her body. The narrative of the deed set forth that it was granted in implement of an obligation to dispone to A and the heirs of her body. Held that the narrative and the destination were not inconsistent with each other, and the whole class of heirs-male must be exhausted before heirs whatsoever could succeed. Erskine v. Earl of Kellie, July 4, 1873, p. 876.

Destination—Succession—Heir of Line—Heir of Conquest.

5. A person purchased an estate and entailed it upon himself and his heirs-male, and, after various substitutions, on his own heirs whatsoever. Held that, under the destination to his own heirs whatsoever, the heir of line was to be preferred to the heir of conquest. Mackintosh, &c. v. Ross, May 30, 1873, p. 636.

General Disposition—Special Destination—Institute—Presumption.

6. A lady in possession of an entailed estate, to which she had succeeded as institute, executed a disposition and settlement whereby she specially conveyed to her nephew certain lands of which she was the fee-simple proprietrix, and generally her whole estates, heritable and moveable. After her death it was ascertained that the fettering clauses of the entail were directed merely against "the heirs of entail or substitutes" therein mentioned, and an action

ENTAIL—Continued.

was raised by her disponee to have it declared that, as institute, she was not bound by the fetters, but was absolute fiar of the entailed estate, and that the same was carried to him by the general conveyance in her disposition and settlement. Held (aff. judgment of Court of Session) (1) that the fettering clauses of the entail did not include the institute, and that, as fiar, she had power to dispose of the estate; but (2) that the general conveyance in her settlement did not carry the entailed lands.

Opinion (per Lord Chancellor) that general words, purporting to dispose of a man's whole property, in a will or mortis causa deed, are (unless there be something in the instrument itself to control that presumption) to be understood as applicable only to property the succession to which, after the death of the testator, is not already regulated by a special destination to a particular class of heirs in a prior instrument, either made by the settlor himself, or under which he holds.

Observations on the cases of Campbell v. Campbell, H.L., M. 14,855, and 1 Pat. 343; Farquharson v. Farquharson, M. 2290; Thoms v. Thoms, ante, vol. vi. p. 704.

Observations (per Lord Chancellor) on the admissibility of extrinsic evidence by the law of Scotland in the construction of testamentary deeds.

Observed (per Lord Colonsay) that from the cases on the effect of a general disposition in evacuating or superseding prior destinations of heritage the following inferences are deducible:—(1) That in determining what effect should be given to the words of general disposition the question has always been treated as one of presumption or presumed intention; (2) that a general disposition mortis causa does not derogate from a prior special destination, unless it be made clear that it was intended so to do; (3) that in dealing with such cases the Court has taken into consideration circumstances calculated to throw light on the intention or purpose of the testator, whether found within the deed or collected from external sources.

Question (per Lord Colonsay) whether a letter written by a testator after the date of his settlement may be referred to as extrinsic evidence in its construction. Glendonwyn v. Gordon, &c., May 19, 1873, H. L. p. 33.

Destination.

7. A deed of strict entail contained a destination to A, "and the heirs-male procreated of the marriage between A and" the entailer's daughter, "and the heirs-male of their bodies respectively; whom failing, to the heirs whatsoever of the bodies of such heirs-male respectively; whom failing, to the heirs-female procreated of the said marriage, and the heirs whatsoever of their bodies respectively," &c. Held (aff. judgment of the Court of Session) that on the succession opening by the death of the eldest son of the said marriage without male issue, his only daughter, as heir whatsoever of his body, was entitled to take in preference to the next heir-male of the said marriage. Forbes v. Trefusis, June 17, 1873, H. L. p. 44.

Prohibitory and Resolutive Clauses—Reservation—Act 1685, c. 22—11 and 12 Vict. c. 56, sec. 43.

8. A deed of entail containing prohibitions against alienation and contraction of debt, duly fenced by irritant and resolutive clauses, contained also a reservation of power to the heirs of entail to grant provisions to younger children to the extent of two years' rent, with power to sell portions of the estate sufficient to pay the debts thereby contracted. Held (rev. judgment of Lord Mackenzie) (1) that the entail was valid and effectual under the Act 1685, cap. 22; and (2) that being valid, it was not within the provisions of the 43d section of the Act 11 and 12 Vict. c. 36. Malcolm v. Kirk, &c., June 21, 1873, p. 722.

Prohibition—Irritancy.

9. A deed of entail contained prohibitions against alienation, contraction of debt, and altering the order of succession, and declared "all such deeds" null and void, and the person contravening to have lost all right to the estate. Held that the word "deeds" was sufficiently comprehensive to embrace all that was contained in the prohibitory clause, and that the entail was valid. Malcolm v. Kirk, &c., June 21, 1873, p. 722.

ENTAIL—Continued.

Aberdeen Act (5 Geo. IV. c. 87)—Provisions to Younger Children—Deductions from Free Rent.

10. Held that in estimating the free rental on which provisions to younger children are to be fixed, under the Act 5 Geo. IV. c. 87, there falls to be deducted the interest of the provisions to which the younger children of a former proprietor may be entitled. Dunbar and Others v. Dunbar, Dec. 7, 1872, p. 200.

Inventory-Duty—23 and 24 Vict. c. 80—Discharge—Confusion.

11. The proprietrix of an estate under a deed of entail granted a bond of annualrent for improvement outlay under the Montgomery Act in favour of herself, her "heirs, executors, successors, and assignees," on which bond infeftment was taken. It was afterwards discovered that the entail was defective, and that she held the property in fee-simple. She thereupon executed a new deed of strict entail, expressly under burden of the above mentioned bond of annualrent, but with the provision that, in the event of her making no separate conveyance of it, it should accrue to the institute or heir of entail succeeding to the estates. She died without making any such separate conveyance.

Held that the bond of annualrent did not fall to be included in the inventory of the deceased's estate, under the statute 23 and 24 Vict. c. 80, as it was not in bonis of the deceased, there never having existed a proper relation of debit and credit between the entailed estate and her. Lord Advocate v. Marchioness of Lansdowne, Oct. 15, 1872, p. 6.

See Heir and Executor.

ERROR. Agreement—Reduction—Fraud—Fraudulent Concealment.

Residuary legatees under a settlement brought an action to reduce an agreement between them and other legatees under the settlement, averring that the defenders, taking advantage of the pursuers' ignorance of their rights and the amount of the succession, had by fraudulent misrepresentation and concealment induced them, greatly to their prejudice, to enter into the agreement. The defenders objected to an issue of fraudulent concealment, on the ground that there was no duty to disclose. Held that in entering upon the contract there was a duty of disclosure incumbent on the defenders, and that the pursuers were entitled to an issue of faudulent misrepresentation or fraudulent concealment. Dempsters v. Raes, July 1, 1873, p. 843.

See Insurance.

EXPENSES. Divorce—Husband and Wife—Conjugal Rights Act, 1861, sec. 7.

1. In an action of divorce brought by a husband against his wife and a co-defender with whom the principal defender was proved to have committed adultery, the Court found the co-defender liable to the pursuer in his whole expenses, taxed as between agent and client, including any expenses of his wife for which he might be found liable. Andrews v. Andrews, Feb. 7, 1873, p. 401.

Counsels' Fees.

2. In a question of expenses between party and party in a case in which the evidence was voluminous, and involved difficult questions of medical science—(1) fees to counsel for consultation before the debate in the Inner-House allowed; (2) the fees of medical men examined as experts upon the effect of the whole evidence fixed at ten guineas a-day; (3) fees of medical men called as witnesses to matters of fact, but who were also examined upon questions of medical opinion, also fixed at ten guineas a-day. Stewart v. Padwick and Another, Feb. 26, 1873, p. 467.

3. Where no objection was taken to the competency of an appeal in the Single Bills, but an objection taken by the Court at the hearing was argued and sustained, no expenses were allowed to either party. Shirra v. Robertson, June 7, 1873, p. 660.

EXPENSES—Continued.

Procurator-Fiscal—Tweed Fisheries Act, 1857, sec. 82; 31 and 32 Vict. c. 123 (Tweed Fisheries (Scotland) Act, 1868), secs. 18, 38, and 41; 27 and 28 Vict. c. 53—Summary Procedure (Scotland) Act, 1864, sec. 22.

4. The Tweed Fisheries Act, 1857, authorises an award of expenses against a person convicted of an offence under the Act. The Summary Procedure Act, 1864, provides that expenses shall not be awarded. Held that the former Act by implication authorised an award of expenses against a procurator-fiscal when the person accused was acquitted, and that therefore the provision of the Summary Procedure Act did not apply to such cases. Walker v. Bathgate, July 19, 1873, p. 956.

Jury Trial.

5. Circumstances in which the Court found a pursuer in a jury trial, who had failed in four out of five issues, neither entitled to nor liable in expenses.

Observed (per Lord President), that where in a jury trial expenses are to be divided according to the success of parties, the mode of effecting that division is not a merely haphazard division, giving a certain proportion to one party and so much to the other, but it must be ascertained through the Auditor what portion of the expenses is applicable to each point. Dean v. Walker, June 26, 1873, p. 759.

See Process.

FEU-CONTRACT. See Superior and Vassal, 1—Property, 5.

FISHINGS. Prescription—Possession—River—Medium Filum.

1. Held that the right which may be acquired by possession for forty years on a grant of salmon-fishings pertaining to lands situated on one side of a river (1) is not limited to the fishings in that part of the river which is ex adverso of the lands; and (2) may extend to fishings beyond the medium filum of the river. Earl of Zetland v. Tennent's Trustees, Feb. 26, 1873, p. 469.

Property—Possession—Bounding Charter—Medium Filum.

2. Where a proprietor had a right of salmon-fishings pertaining to lands described as lying within a county bounded by a river, which separated that from another county, held that the description applied to the lands and not to an incorporeal right attached to them, and that the possession following upon the title was not limited by the medium filum of the river.

Observed that, even if the title were ambiguous, possession, which was the proper interpreter of its meaning, had made it clear.

Observed that the medium filum is only of importance in determining rights of property in the solum, or making arrangements for the exercise of the right of fishing where opposite proprietors have each rights of fishings, but neither has had exclusive possession. Earl of Zetland v. Tennent's Trustees, Feb. 26, 1873, p. 469.

River—Possession—Prescription.

3. Where the right of salmon-fishing had been exercised from banks on the bed of a river for more than forty years, but, from changes in the river, new banks had been formed, one of which had existed for less than that period, held that the possession of the fishings from this new bank was only an exercise of the right of fishing previously exercised from the former banks, —the substantial right of fishing being the matter to be regarded, and not the particular stations from which the right was exercised. Earl of Zetland v. Tennent's Trustees, Feb. 26, 1873, p. 469.

Salmon-fishing—Prescription—Possession.

4. Circumstances in which held that a proprietor of a barony and of lands held under a crown grant cum piscationibus, had not had such prescriptive possession of salmon-fishings in the sea as to instruct a right of salmon-fishing. Lord Advocate v. M'Douall, June 13, 1873, p. 688.

Salmon-fishings.

5. A barony title which contains no express grant of salmon-fishings in the sea

FISHINGS—Continued.

may become a valid title when followed by prescriptive possession, provided that the possession can be ascribed to the title.

Circumstances in which the proprietor of a barony who had no express grant of salmon-fishing was held not to have had sufficient possession of salmon-fishings in the sea to instruct a right of salmon-fishing. Milne's Trustees v. Lord Advocate, July 19, 1873, p. 966.

Salmon-fishing—Possession.

6. Held that the proprietor of a barony who had not an express grant of salmon-fishings, had not instructed a right thereto by proving that the tenants of cottages on his estate had been in use to fish for salmon in the sea for their own behoof without paying rent therefor. Lord Advocate v. Hall, July 19, 1873, p. 967.

See Property.

FOREIGN. See Arrestment.

FORGERY. See Writ—Agent and Principal, 3.

FRAUD. Agreement—Reduction—Fraudulent Concealment—Essential Error.

Residuary legatees under a settlement brought an action to reduce an agreement between them and other legatees under the settlement, averring that the defenders, taking advantage of the pursuers' ignorance of their rights and the amount of the succession, had by fraudulent misrepresentation and concealment induced them, greatly to their prejudice, to enter into the agreement. The defenders objected to an issue of fraudulent concealment, on the ground that there was no duty to disclose. Held that in entering upon the contract there was a duty of disclosure incumbent on the defenders, and that the pursuers were entitled to an issue of fraudulent misrepresentation or fraudulent concealment. Dempsters v. Raes, July 1, 1873, p. 843.

See Bankruptcy, 5.

FRIENDLY SOCIETY.

By the rules of a friendly society, divided into lodges, a member who sustained an accident disabling him for life was entitled to a provision, on the lodge of which he was a member reporting in favour of his application therefor, and on the same being approved of by a majority of the whole lodges of the society, in which case the central committee of the society were directed to pay over the sum. Held that an action by a member to recover the above provision, directed against the lodge to which he belonged, and not against the society or its central committee, was incompetent.

Question as to the effect of a rule of a friendly society excluding the intervention of Courts of law in questions between the society and its members.

Observed (per Lord Deas) that although the society was by its rules the ultimate judge of any claim, a Court of law, notwithstanding the exclusion in the rules, might compel it to adhere to its rules in arriving at a determination. M'Kernan v. Greenock Lodge of United Operative Masons' Association, March 19, 1873, p. 548.

HEIR. Testament, construction of—Next of Kin.

1. A testatrix directed her trustees to sell certain heritable property particularly described, and her whole other means and estate, heritable and moveable, and after payment of legacies, &c., to pay over the residue "to my heir-at-law, whom failing, to my next of kin."

In a competition between cousins of testatrix claiming as her next of kin and a cousin's child claiming as her heir-at-law, held (rev. judgment of Lord Ormidale), that by the term "heir-at-law" the testatrix did not mean to denote her heirs in mobilibus, but her heir in heritage. Sillar's Trustees v. Stewart and Others, Nov. 29, 1872, p. 160.

Destination—Succession—Heir of Line—Heir of Conquest—Entail.

2. A person purchased an estate, and entailed it upon himself and his heirs-male, and, after various substitutions, on his own heirs whatsoever. Held that, under the destination to his own heirs whatsoever, the heir of line was to be preferred to the heir of conquest. Mackintosh, &c. v. Ross, May 30, 1873, p. 636.

HEIR—Continued.
See Destination—Entail—Property, 9—Succession, 6, 7—Trust, 1.

HEIR AND EXECUTOR. Tract of Future Time—Succession—Testament—Relief.
1. A person properly executed an entail of certain lands, binding himself, his heirs, executors, and successors whomsoever, to free and relieve these lands of all his debts and obligations. Thereafter, by antenuptial contract of marriage, the entailer settled upon his spouse, in the event of her surviving him, an annuity secured over the entailed lands, but with power to himself, his heirs, executors, and successors, to purchase in lieu thereof an annuity from an insurance company, in which case the widow was bound to discharge the entailed estate. Held, on a construction of the two deeds (rev. judgment of the First Division), that the obligation in the first deed to relieve the entailed estate of the granter's debts and obligations applied to the annuity with which the estate was burdened by the second deed, and that the heir of entail was entitled to be relieved of the annuity out of the entailer's general trust-estate. Mackintosh v. Mackintosh's Trustees, May 19, 1873, H. L. p. 28.
Entail—Apportionment—33 and 34 Vict. c. 35—Lease.
2. Farms on an entailed estate were let in accordance with local custom and the previous usage on the estate, with entry to the houses, grass, and hay lands at Whitsunday, and to the lands under crop at the separation of the crops from the ground. The rents were payable at Martinmas and Whitsunday for the half year preceding. The proprietor died on 18th July 1872. In a question between his executor and the next heir of entail, held that the rents payable at Martinmas 1872 were rents accruing at the date of his death, and fell to be apportioned between heir and executor under the Apportionment Act of 1870. Lord Herries v. Maxwell's Curator, Feb. 6, 1873, p. 396.
See Apportionment, 3—Succession, 12.

HERITABLE AND MOVEABLE. Succession—Bequest of Interest—Tract of Future Time.
1. Held that a legacy of the annual interest for a series of years of a capital sum bequeathed to another legatee was a moveable right in the person of the legatee and of his heir in mobilibus, and that, on the death of the latter, his mother was entitled to participate in future payments of interest to the extent of a third under the Moveable Succession Act of 1855. Hill v. Hill, Dec. 21, 1872, p. 247.
Conversion—Trust—Power of Sale.
2. A testator directed his trustees, after certain liferents were satisfied, to divide his estate, which consisted chiefly of house property, into nine equal shares, and to "dispone, assign, and pay over" one of these shares to each of nine persons. The trustees were empowered to sell the whole or such part of the heritable property as they might think proper. Held that as a division of the estate was practically impossible without a sale, conversion took place, and that the shares of the beneficiaries formed part of their moveable succession. Fotheringham's Trustees, &c., July 2, 1873, p. 848.

HOMOLOGATION. See Landlord and Tenant.

HUSBAND AND WIFE. Presumption—Pater est quem nuptiæ demonstrant—Parent and Child.
1. In an action of filiation and aliment brought by a married woman against a man not her husband held that the presumption pater est quem nuptiæ demonstrant had been redargued, although there was possibility of access.
Question, Whether it was competent to call the pursuer's husband as a witness to prove non-access. Brodie v. Dyce, Nov. 29, 1872, p. 142.
Promise subsequente copula.
2. A man gave to a woman with whom he was cohabiting a written promise of marriage in the following terms:—"I, A, do hereby promise to marry B, and provide for her according to my means until circumstances warrant such marriage—always providing that in the interim she continues to lead a virtuous and exemplary life." Held that the subsequent cohabitation did not prove de præsenti matrimonial consent, and that no marriage had been constituted. Surtees v. Wotherspoon, Feb. 6, 1873, p. 384.

HUSBAND AND WIFE—Continued.

Divorce—Mora.

3. Held that a husband who, while resident in Australia, had been cognisant of his wife's adultery at home for ten years before raising an action of divorce, was not barred by mora, since the adultery was continued till close on his return, immediately after which the action was raised.

Mora as a bar to an action of divorce must be such as to infer a remissio injuriæ. Hellon v. Hellon, Jan. 14, 1873, p. 290.

Divorce—Proof—Extrajudicial Confession—Adultery.

4. Circumstances which, coupled with evidence of extrajudicial acknowledgment of the illegitimacy of a child, held (rev. judgment of Lord Shand) sufficient to infer adultery on the part of a wife, and to entitle the husband to decree of divorce. Fullerton v. Fullerton, June 20, 1873, p. 720.

Annuity—Alimentary—Discharge.

5. A husband burdened certain lands with an annuity to his widow, declaring that it should be alimentary and not assignable, and should be exclusive of the jus mariti of any husband she might marry. He directed his trustees upon the death of his widow to convey the lands to A. The free rents of the lands were insufficient to pay the annuity, and the trustees required to borrow money to pay it on the security of the lands.

The widow and A agreed that she should disburden the lands for a certain sum, and that the trustees should on such payment convey the lands at once to A.

In a special case by A and the trustees, held that the widow could not discharge the annuity, and that the trustees were not authorised to convey the lands to A. Cosens v. Stevenson, &c., June 26, 1873, p. 761.

Marriage-Contract.

6. A husband in his antenuptial marriage-contract disponed lands in favour of himself and the heirs to be procreated of his body, and his or their assignees. Held that the heir of the marriage had a protected right of succession, which his father was not entitled to defeat gratuitously. Earl of Glasgow's Trustee v. Earl of Glasgow, &c., Dec. 13, 1872, p. 218.

General Settlement—Approbate and Reprobate—Negative Prescription.

7. A father executed a trust-deed for payment of certain debts and regulating his succession in fraudem of his antenuptial marriage-contract, and to the prejudice of the heir of the marriage, and afterwards another trust-deed, the two forming together a complete settlement of his whole estate, heritable and moveable. The heir made up a title under the marriage-contract, and under it possessed the lands contained in the first trust-deed, and took benefit under the second deed, but in ignorance of the existence of the first trust-deed. Held that his trustees and executors were not barred by the negative prescription from challenging the earlier deed, but were entitled to elect either to abide by his approbation of his father's settlement or to renounce and restore the benefit he had taken, and challenge the first deed. Earl of Glasgow's Trustee v. Earl of Glasgow, &c., Dec. 13 1872, p. 218.

Trust-disposition—Revocation.

8. By mutual trust-disposition and settlement a husband and wife, who had no antenuptial marriage-contract, disponed to trustees the whole property heritable and moveable, which should belong to them or either of them at the death of the first deceaser, with directions that upon that event the trustees should take an inventory of the whole estate, and should hold one-half thereof subject to the liferent of the survivor for behoof of the relatives of the first deceaser. The spouses reserved full power to alter the deed during their joint lives, and the wife declared the provisions in her favour to be in full of her legal claims. Held that the trust-deed was not revocable by the surviving husband, and that the right of the relatives of the wife vested in them at her death. Kerr v. Ure, &c., June 28, 1873, p. 780.

HUSBAND AND WIFE—Continued.

Divorce—Conjugal Rights Act, 1861, sec. 7.

9. In an action of divorce brought by a husband against his wife and a co-defender with whom the principal defender was proved to have committed adultery, the Court found the co-defender liable to the pursuer in his whole expenses, taxed as between agent and client, including any expenses of his wife for which he might be found liable. Andrews v. Andrews, Feb. 7, 1873, p. 401.

Cessio Bonorum.

10. The pursuer in a process of cessio refused to execute a revocation of a disposition of a property of the value of £50 which he had granted to his wife when he was solvent. Held that his refusal was not a sufficient reason for refusing to grant the cessio. Donaldson v. Thomson, Jan. 25, 1873, p. 347.

See Poor—Succession—Writ—Delivery.

INHIBITION. See Diligence, 2.

INSURANCE. Warrandice—Error—Failing to disclose material facts.

1. In a reduction of a policy of life assurance held (1) that a warranty by the assured of the truth of her statements in regard to her health was not a warranty that she had no disease, known or unknown, but merely that, so far as within her own knowledge, she had none; and (2) that the failure to disclose a material fact was not a ground for reduction of the policy, in respect that she did not know it to be material, and that persons without medical knowledge could not be expected to know that it was so. Life Association of Scotland v. Foster, Jan. 31, 1873, p. 351.

Conditions.

2. A and Co., a firm of manufacturing chemists, consisting of A, B, and C, obtained in name of the firm a policy of fire insurance over their works, which contained a condition that the policy should "cease to be in force as to any property hereby insured which shall pass from the insured to any other person otherwise than by will or operation of law, unless notice thereof be given" to the insurance company. After an agreement had been entered into by the partners to transfer the works to B, and after a notice had been published in the "Gazette" that A had retired from the firm, and that the business would in future be carried on by B and C under a different name, but before notice had been given to the insurance company, a fire took place.

In an action raised in name of the old firm against the insurance company under the policy, held that the irritancy had not been incurred, in respect that the main interest under the policy had continued to be from the first in B, and that the conditions on which the right of the new firm to a transfer of the works depended had not yet been purified. Forbes and Co. v. Border Counties Fire Office, Jan. 14, 1873, p. 278.

See Ship, 2.

INTERDICT.

1. In an application for interdict against the use of a trade mark, held that it was not necessary to prove actual injury sustained, but merely reasonable ground for the apprehension of injury. Singer Manufacturing Co. v. Kimball and Morton, Jan. 14, 1873, p. 267.

River—Pollution—Verdict—Declaratory conclusions—Motion for Decree.

2. Riparian proprietors on a private stream brought an action of declarator and interdict against the owners and tenants of paper-mills on the stream to prevent pollution, and upon issues whether the defenders did by discharging refuse into the stream pollute the same to the nuisance of the pursuers obtained a verdict of a jury in 1866. The defenders thereafter, under an agreement with the pursuers, conducted experiments with a view to abate the nuisance. In 1873 the pursuers moved for decree. Held (1) that they were entitled to declarator; and (2) after a statement by the defenders that they had no proposals to make, that the pursuers were entitled to interdict. Duke of Buccleuch, &c. v. Cowan, &c., June 10, 1873, p. 675.

INTERDICT—Continued.

Trade Mark—Maker's name.

3. The manufacturer of a sewing machine of a certain construction, which was not patented, had been in use to sell it, under his own name, for a series of years, and the name had thus obtained an exclusive meaning in the trade as signifying a machine of his manufacture. Held that the name had become the property of the manufacturer as a trade mark, and that no one else was entitled to use it. Singer Manufacturing Co. v. Kimball and Morton, Jan. 14, 1873, p. 267.

INVENTORY. Inventory Duty—23 and 24 Vict. c. 80—Discharge—Confusion—Entail.

The proprietrix of an estate under a deed of entail granted a bond of annualrent for improvement outlay under the Montgomery Act in favour of herself, her "heirs, executors, successors, and assignees," on which bond infeftment was taken. It was afterwards discovered that the entail was defective, and that she held the property in fee-simple. She thereupon executed a new deed of strict entail, expressly under burden of the above mentioned bond of annualrent, but with the provision that, in the event of her making no separate conveyance of it, it should accrue to the institute or heir of entail succeeding to the estates. She died without making any such separate conveyance.

Held that the bond of annualrent did not fall to be included in the inventory of the deceased's estate, under the statute 23 and 24 Vict. c. 80, as it was not in bonis of the deceased, there never having existed a proper relation of debit and credit between the entailed estate and her. Lord Advocate v. Marchioness of Lansdowne, Oct. 15, 1872, p. 6.

ISSUE. Agreement—Reduction—Fraud—Fraudulent Concealment—Essential Error.

1. Residuary legatees under a settlement brought an action to reduce an agreement between them and other legatees under the settlement, averring that the defenders, taking advantage of the pursuers' ignorance of their rights and the amount of the succession, had by fraudulent misrepresentation and concealment induced them, greatly to their prejudice, to enter into the agreement. The defenders objected to an issue of fraudulent concealment, on the ground that there was no duty to disclose. Held that in entering upon the contract there was a duty of disclosure incumbent on the defenders, and that the pursuers were entitled to an issue of fraudulent misrepresentation or fraudulent concealment. Dempsters v. Raes, July 1, 1873, p. 843.

Slander—Counter Issue—Veritas Convicii.

2. Circumstances in which held that it was necessary for a defender in an action of damages for slander who pleaded veritas to put in his counter issue the words used in the libel. Ogilvy v. Paul and Others, June 28, 1873, p. 776.

Process—Slander—Veritas.

3. A visitor at a hotel made an entry in the visitors' book to the effect that he had visited most of the hotels in Scotland, but that he had nowhere "encountered so much drinking or so much squalid untidiness and dirt."

In an action of damages brought by the hotel-keeper against the writer the latter pleaded veritas. In adjusting issues, held that while the pur-

ISSUE—Continued.

suer was entitled to the issue, whether the entry falsely, maliciously, and calumniously, represented that the pursuer kept his hotel in a state of squalid untidiness and dirt, and permitted persons to drink therein to excess, all to such a degree as to distinguish it in these respects from most of the hotels in Scotland, and to cause discomfort and annoyance to visitors to and residents in the hotel, the defender did not require to put in his counter issue more than whether on or about the date of the entry there was an excessive amount of drinking in the hotel, and whether the hotel on said days was in a state of much squalid untidiness and filth. M'Iver v. M'Neill, June 28, 1873, p. 777.

Wrongous Use of Diligence—Malice—Bill.

4. In an action of damages for injury alleged to have been caused by the defenders recording a protest for non-payment of a bill, and charging thereon, although the bill had been previously paid eight days after it had become due, held that a charge was a diligence and not a judicial act, and that therefore it was not necessary to put malice in the issue (Lord Benholme diss., on the ground that the circumstances shewed fault on the part of the pursuer, and that therefore it was not sufficient for him to prove merely a legal wrong).

Form of issue adjusted, Gibb v. Edinburgh Brewery Co., June 19, 1873, p. 705.

JOINT ADVENTURE.

Observed (per Lord Neaves), that when parties are engaged mutually in promoting an object of common interest, and the expenses entailed in furthering that object are thrown on one of the parties, then, when that expenditure fails of obtaining the end aimed at, the party-disburser must be recompensed, as being the disburser for a common object. Dobie v. Lauder's Trustees, June 24, 1873, p. 749.

JOINT STOCK COMPANY. Reparation—Director.

1. By the contract of copartnery of a joint stock banking company it was declared that no shareholder could be legally a director who resided permanently more than ten miles distant from the head office, and that a director ceased to be one if he had not attended a meeting of directors for six months. In an action by the bank and its liquidators against a shareholder who had been elected and occasionally acted as a director for loss said to have been caused by his gross negligence, held that the defender, having assumed the position of a director, and acted as such, could not plead these clauses of the contract in bar of the action. Western Bank v. Baird's Trustees, Nov. 22, 1872, p. 96.

Director—Reparation—Negligence—Personal Bar—Process.

2. In an action brought by a joint stock banking company and its liquidators against a person who had been a director for payment of "the amount of loss and damage due by the defender to the bank" as at the date when he ceased to be a director (five years before the stoppage of the bank) Held (1) that the books of the bank referred to in the summons were to be regarded as part of the pursuer's statement; (2) that with regard to alleged loss by advances on accounts-current which were closed at the time when the defender ceased to be a director the pursuer had set forth a case sufficiently relevant to be admitted to probation; (3) that the defender could not be made liable for loss on advances on accounts-current to those persons to whom the bank had continued to make advances after the defender had left office, and further, that the pursuer had not made a relevant averment of the loss on these earlier advances; (4) that any liability which the defender might have incurred in allowing the advances by way of discounts on bills had been extinguished by the subsequent actings of the bank in renewing the bills and in making new advances; (5) that any liability for loss by insurances on the lives of debtors of the bank had been extinguished by the sale of the policies by the bank, without notice to the defender; (6) that as the summons, with the books referred to in it, disclosed facts which excluded the action quoad certain items the proper form of interlocutor was one dismissing the action to that extent. Western Bank v. Baird's Trustees, Nov. 22, 1872, p. 97.

JOINT STOCK COMPANY—Continued.

JUDICIAL FACTOR. A. S. 13th February 1730—Penalty.

1. Held that under the Act of Sederunt a factor who has failed to lodge accounts annually is liable to a minimum penalty of half a year's salary for each year in which he has so failed. Lowe (Petitioner), Oct. 19, 1872, p. 17.

Process—Petition—Tutor.

2. In an action of giving up tutorial inventories the tutors called as defenders the nearest relatives of the pupil resident in Scotland, and presented a petition to the Court to dispense with the citation of the next of kin who were resident in England. The Court expressed some doubt as to the necessity of the application, but after inquiry, ordered intimation in common form. Buchan, &c., June 7, 1873, p. 662.

JURISDICTION. 25 and 26 Vict. c. 35.

1. When an inferior Court exceeds its power the Court of Session may reduce the decree, although bearing to be under an Act which excludes reduction. Ashley v. Magistrates of Rothesay, June 20, 1873, p. 708.

Administration of Justice—Corruption—Irregularity—Valuation Act.

2. Allegations of private communications between the Judges of the Valuation Appeal Court and the assistant Solicitor of Inland Revenue which held irrelevant to support a conclusion for the reduction of judgments following thereon, it being the duty of the Solicitor of Inland Revenue to lay the special case for appeal before the Judges and get their opinion thereon. Stirling and Sons v. Holm and Others, Feb. 28, 1873, p. 480.

Valuation of Lands (Scotland) Acts—Valuation Appeal Court.

3. The Valuation Appeal Court is a Supreme Court, and its proceedings cannot be set aside by the Court of Session on the ground that they are ultra vires and incompetent. Stirling and Sons v. Holm and Others, Feb. 28, 1873, p. 480.

Title to Sue—Sheriff—Servitude—Thirlage—Petitory and Possessory Actions—Statute 1 and 2 Vict. c. 119, sec. 15.

4. Held that an action by the tenant of a mill for abstracted multures, involving a question as to the extent of the thirl, was competent in the Sheriff-court under the 15th section of the Sheriff-court Act, 1838 (1 and 2 Vict. c. 119), being an action relative to a question touching the constitution of a prædial servitude—Lord Deas dissenting, on the ground that the section did not apply, the action not being raised by a person who had a title to try a question relative to the constitution of a heritable right; but holding that it was competent in the Sheriff-court as a possessory action.

Observations (per Lord Deas) on the distinction between petitory and possessory actions.

Question, whether an action of declarator of the constitution of a right of thirlage is competent in the Sheriff-court. Stobbs v. Caven, March 14, 1873, p. 530.

Reparation—Wrongous Apprehension—Limitation of time for raising Action—Statutes—Summary Procedure Act, 1864, 27 and 28 Vict. c. 53, sec. 35—Day Trespass Act, 2 and 3 Wm. IV. c. 68, sec. 11.

5. A complaint, instituted under the Summary Procedure Act, charged a contravention of the Day Trespass Act (which authorises a Justice of Peace to grant warrant for the apprehension of a person accused, before service of the complaint, "if he shall have reason to suspect from information upon oath that the party is likely to abscond"), and set forth that the two persons accused were found trespassing in search of game and had refused to give their names or addresses. On a deposition on oath by one witness to the truth of these statements a Justice of the Peace, before the complaint had been served, issued a warrant for the apprehension of the accused, and they were accordingly apprehended. Five months after one of the accused raised an action of damages for wrongous apprehension against the complainers' law agent and two officers of police, on the ground that the Justice was not entitled under the Day Trespass Act to issue the warrant of apprehension before the complaint was served, without having information on oath that the accused was likely to abscond. Held that, although the proceedings had been irregular, there had not been such a deviation from the statute as to deprive the defenders of the protection of sec. 35 of the Summary Procedure Act, which requires that all actions arising out of proceedings under it shall be brought within two months, and therefore that the action fell to be dismissed. Murray v. Allan, Nov. 29, 1872, p. 147.

JURISDICTION—Continued.

JUS RELICTÆ. See Mora.

LANDLORD AND TENANT. Lease—Constitution—Rei interventus—Homologation—Removing—A. S. 14th December 1756.

1. Held, in an action of removing, brought on the footing that the tenancy was yearly, that a valid and binding lease for years had been constituted by a written offer from the intending tenant, stating rent and ish, combined with circumstances, both before and after its date, which inferred acceptance by the landlord or his agents, and followed by such outlay on the tenant's part as amounted to rei interventus. Forbes v. Wilson, Feb. 22, 1873, p. 454.

Entail—Lease.

2. Question, Whether a lease granted by an heir of entail for a longer period than is allowed by the entail is good even for the period allowed. Forbes v. Wilson, Feb. 22, 1873, p. 454.

Draft Lease—Rei Interventus.

3. Circumstances in which held that a draft lease of a farm had been validated rei interventu, so as to constitute a valid lease for nineteen years. Bathie v. Lord Wharncliffe, March 6, 1873, p. 490.

*Entail—Heir and Executor—Apportionment—*33 and 34 Vict. c. 35*—Lease.*

4. Farms on an entailed estate were let in accordance with local custom and the previous usage on the estate, with entry to the houses, grass, and hay lands at Whitsunday, and to the lands under crop at the separation of the crops from the ground. The rents were payable at Martinmas and Whitsunday for the half year preceding. The proprietor died on 18th July 1872. In a question between his executor and the next heir of entail, held that the rents payable at Martinmas 1872 were rents accruing at the date of his death, and fell to be apportioned between heir and executor under the Apportionment Act of 1870. Lord Herries v. Maxwell's Curator, Feb. 6, 1873, p. 396.

Subject of Lease—Rent—Retention.

5. A gas company let to a tenant a piece of ground adjoining their works, with right to the whole ammoniacal liquor and tar produced at their gas-work, at a rent of £130. Held that an averment by the tenant that the company had not implemented the contract by supplying the whole tar, &c. was a relevant defence in a petition for sequestration for the stipulated rent. Kilmarnock Gas-Light Co. v. Smith, Nov. 9, 1872, p. 58.

Nuisance.

6. An action was brought by A against B, a neighbouring proprietor, and C, his tenant, for declarator that they were not entitled to carry on at the premises occupied by C a manufacture whereby a nuisance was created to the pursuer. B, in the missives of lease between him and C, had stipulated that C should "not erect any buildings or others at the farina works carried on by him without the express permission of the proprietor in writing, and should not have anything about said premises that should be a nuisance to the property or to the public." Held that as B did not prevent the use of the water and the erection of buildings, &c. by C, and as he had appeared and defended the actions, on grounds implying the assertion of more serious rights than those claimed by the tenant, the findings as to nuisance and expenses must be directed against him as well as the tenant. Robertson v. Stewarts and Livingston, Dec. 6, 1872, p. 189.

LANDLORD AND TENANT—Continued.

Minerals—Reparation—Lease—Relief.

7. By an agreement between a railway contractor and a landed proprietor the former was allowed to take building-stone for a viaduct from any part of certain lands, at a certain rate per superficial yard, of whatever depth, the contractor being bound to make good all surface damages, and fill up the quarry when his contract was completed. The contractor opened a quarry near the bank of a river, and in consequence of his operations water flowed into the quarry and thence into an old coal-waste which communicated with going coal-mines on the estate of the same proprietor. The lessee of the minerals brought a process of suspension and interdict, in which the contractor was ordered to execute certain works, and was found liable in the expenses of process. In an action of relief brought by the contractor against the proprietor, held that the agreement was not a lease, and the pursuer was not entitled to be relieved by the proprietor, either of the sums which he had been obliged to expend for the protection of the coal-mines, or of the expenses of the former process. Brand and Son v. Bell's Trustees, Nov. 6, 1872, p. 42.

Lease—Sterility.

8. Held (in aff. judgment of the Court of Session) that a tenant was not entitled to reduce a lease of minerals on the ground that they could not be worked to profit, even if no rent were to be paid.

Observations on sterility as a ground for reducing agricultural and mineral leases. Gowans v. Christie, Feb. 14, 1873, H. L. p. 1.

Lease—Testament—Titles to Land Act, 1868, 31 and 32 Vict. c. 101, sec. 20.

9. A person who carried on the business of an innkeeper, in premises of which he held a long lease, left testamentary writings in these terms:—"I do hereby bequiath, in event of my death before my wife H. E., the whole of property ether in money, bonds, debets, bussness, and other affects whatsoever, ... and I appoint H. E., my wife, heir and executor of this my last will and testament." Held (diss. Lord Ardmillan) that the words could not be so construed as to include the lease of the inn. Edmond v. Edmond, Jan. 30, 1873, p. 348.

LEASE. See Landlord and Tenant—Church—Entail, 2, 3—Heir and Executor, 2.

LEGITIM. See Parent and Child.

LIFERENT AND FEE. See Trust, 4, 9.

LOAN. Proof—Deposit-Receipt.

1. In an action brought for payment of a sum of money, "being the amount contained in a deposit-receipt in name of the pursuer uplifted by the defender," the defender stated that he had received the deposit-receipt bearing the pursuer's endorsation from a third party, the true owner of the money, and to whom he had accounted for it. Held (1) that in so far as the action was or might be rested on an alleged loan by the pursuer to the defender such ground of action could not be proved by parole evidence, and that the only writing of the defender founded on in proof of it, being the defender's name written on the back of the deposit-receipt, was not legal proof of such loan, nor sufficient to render parole proof admissible; (2) that, in so far as the action was rested on the defender's alleged intromission with the pursuer's funds, the parole evidence had negatived the pursuer's case. Nimmo v. Nimmo, Feb. 22, 1873, p. 446.

LOAN—Continued.

Writ—Resting Owing—Donation.

2. Held that a loan of money was not instructed by letters in which the acknowledgment of the receipt of money was qualified by the statement that it was received in payment of a debt of honour.

Opinion (per Lord Neaves) that proof of the receipt of money by the writ of the receiver only raises a presumption of loan in cases where the acknowledgment is contained in a document delivered to the disburser by the recipient as a record of the transaction. Duncan's Trustees v. Shand, Jan. 7, 1873, p. 254.

MANDATE. See Agent and Principal, 3—Usage.

MARCHES, STRAIGHTENING OF. See Property.

MARRIAGE. See Husband and Wife.

MARRIAGE-CONTRACT. See Husband and Wife—Parent and Child—Approbate and Reprobate.

MASTER AND SERVANT. Statute 30 and 31 Vict. cap. 141 (Master and Servant Act, 1867), secs. 4, 9, 13—Fine.

1. The Master and Servant Act, 1867, empowers the Court before whom a complaint is laid, if the same is found proven, to award compensation to the complainer or to impose a fine, and if a fine is imposed, they may direct that a part, but not exceeding one-half, be applied to compensate the complainer. In a conviction under the statute, the Justices adjudged the person complained against to pay a fine to the complainer. Held, in a suspension of the sentence, that the conviction was bad, in respect that the entire fine was directed to be paid to the complainer, contrary to the terms of the statute. Galt v. Ritchie, July 19, 1873, p. 971.

Complaint—Alternative Penalties.

2. A complaint simply praying that the employed be summoned and adjudicated upon under sections 4 and 9 of the Master and Servant Act, 1867, is unobjectionable, although various alternative penalties are set forth in section 9. Galt v. Ritchie, July 19, 1873, p. 971.

See Reparation.

MEMBER OF PARLIAMENT. Franchise—Parish Schoolmaster—24 and 25 Vict. c. 107 (Parochial and Burgh Schools (Scotland) Act, 1861), sec. 18.

1. By sec. 18 of the above Act it is provided that in any arrangement for the retirement of a schoolmaster the schoolmaster's house, &c. shall be made over "to the person actually discharging the duties of schoolmaster." Held that the proviso did not apply to the case of a schoolmaster who had, on account of bad health, been allowed to employ an assistant for a period of years to discharge his duties, but had not retired. Home v. Paterson, Oct. 21, 1872, p. 1.

Franchise—Valuation-Roll—Proof of Value—Valuation Act, 1856, 17 and 18 Vict. c. 91, sec. 34.

2. Certain subjects were entered on the valuation-roll of 1871-72 as of the annual value of £12, and on the valuation-roll of 1872-73 as of the annual value of £16. The assessor stated that the value for 1871-72 was truly £14, and that it should have been so stated in the valuation-roll. Held that the statement of the assessor that the valuation-roll was wrong could not be admitted to contradict the valuation-roll. Sandilands v. Home, Oct. 21, 1872, p. 3.

Franchise—Tenancy—Precarious Possession.

3. A person occupied a house, garden, and lands belonging to his brother under a verbal agreement that he should pay the taxes and feu-duties, and keep them in repair, with power to sublet. Held that the occupant had right to the franchise as tenant of the subjects. Rutherford v. Dunn, Oct. 21, 1872, p. 4.

MINERALS. Landlord and Tenant—Reparation—Agreement to allow building stone to be taken out of lands at a specified rate—Lease—Relief.

1. By an agreement between a railway contractor and a landed proprietor the former was allowed to take building stone for a viaduct from any part of certain lands, at a certain rate per superficial yard, of whatever depth, the contractor being bound to make good all surface damages, and fill up the quarry when his contract was completed. The contractor opened a quarry near the bank of a river, and in consequence of his operations water flowed into the quarry and thence into an old coal-waste which communicated with going coal-mines on the estate of the same proprietor. The lessee of the minerals brought a process of suspension and interdict, in which the contractor was ordered to execute certain works, and was found liable in the expenses of process. In an action of relief brought by the contractor against the proprietor, held that the agreement was not a lease, and the pursuer was not entitled to be relieved by the proprietor, either of the sums which he had been obliged to expend for the protection of the coal-mines, or of the expenses of the former process. Brand and Son v. Bell's Trustees, Nov. 6, 1872, p. 42.

Landlord and Tenant—Lease—Sterility.

2. Held (in aff. judgment of the Court of Session) that a tenant was not entitled to reduce a lease of minerals on the ground that they could not be worked to profit, even if no rent were to be paid.

Observations on sterility as a ground for reducing agricultural and mineral leases. Gowans v. Christie, Feb. 14, 1873, H. L. p. 1.

Superior and Vassal—Feu-Contract.

3. A superior bound his vassal to build and maintain on his feu a house of a certain value, and reserved to himself the minerals, with power to work them at pleasure, and to remove as much stone, &c., as might be necessary for the proper working of the minerals, it being expressly agreed that he should not be liable for any damage to the vassal that might happen through the working of the coal, &c., by longwall workings or otherwise. Held (reversing judgment of the Second Division) that the vassal was not entitled to an interdict against the superior working the minerals under his house on the ground that the workings would probably injure or destroy it. Buchanan, &c. v. Andrew, March 10, 1873, H. L. p. 13.

Property—Title—Precept of Clare Constat—Reservation.

4. A was infeft upon a feu-contract by which certain lands were conveyed to him without reservation of mines and minerals. Upon A's death his son B was infeft in the lands upon a precept of clare constat, which contained an express exception and reservation of the mines and minerals to the superior. Upon B's death his son C, having been infeft in the said lands, sold them. Subsequently D, having served heir in special in the mines and minerals to A, brought an action of declarator of his right to them against the superior and the proprietors of the dominium utile of the lands, on the ground that they still remained in hæreditate jacente of A. Held that the exception and reservation of mines and minerals in the precept of clare constat was inept, and did not limit the precept as a warrant for infeftment in the fee of the lands, and therefore that there was nothing in hæreditate jacente of A which D by service to him could take up. Boyd v. Bruce and Others, Dec. 20, 1872, p. 243.

MINOR. Tutors and Curators—Statute 1696, c. 8—Deathbed.

A father appointed his testamentary trustees to be tutors and curators to his children, declaring that if the nomination should fall, a prior nomination of tutors and curators should take effect. The second nomination having fallen as regarded the appointment of curators, not having been executed in liege poustie, held that the nomination of tutors subsisted, the nomination of tutors and curators being separate. Greig v. Greig, Oct. 19, 1872, p. 20.

MORA. Taciturnity—Acquiescence—Jus relictæ.

1. A widow was maintained during the eleven years of her viduity by her eldest son, who was her husband's executor, during which time she made no claim for jus relictæ. In an action brought by her representatives fifteen years after her death against the representatives of her son, held (1) that the claim was not barred by mora and acquiescence; but (2) that sums expended by the son in the widow's maintenance fell to be set off against the claim for jus relictæ. Mackenzie v. Mackenzie's Trustees, June 12, 1873, p. 681.

MORA—Continued.

Husband and Wife—Divorce.

2. Held that a husband who, while resident in Australia, had been cognisant of his wife's adultery at home for ten years before raising an action of divorce, was not barred by mora, since the adultery was continued till close on his return, immediately after which the action was raised.

Mora as a bar to an action of divorce must be such as to infer a remissio injuriæ. Hellon v. Hellon, Jan. 14, 1873, p. 290.

NUISANCE. Property.

1. Circumstances in which a farina manufactory was held to be a nuisance to a neighbour, in respect both of the discharges therefrom into a stream bounding his property, and of occasional and temporary annoyance from the smell of the settling tanks. Robertson v. Stewarts and Livingstone, Dec. 6, 1872, p. 189.

Landlord and Tenant.

2. An action was brought by A against B, a neighbouring proprietor, and C, his tenant, for declarator that they were not entitled to carry on at the premises occupied by C a manufacture whereby a nuisance was created to the pursuer. B, in the missives of lease between him and C, had stipulated that C should "not erect any buildings or others at the farina works carried on by him without the express permission of the proprietor in writing, and should not have anything about said premises that should be a nuisance to the property or to the public." Held that as B did not prevent the use of the water and the erection of buildings, &c., by C, and as he had appeared and defended the actions, on grounds implying the assertion of more serious rights than those claimed by the tenant, the findings as to nuisance and expenses must be directed against him as well as the tenant. Robertson v. Stewarts and Livingston, Dec. 6, 1872, p. 189.

OATH. Reference to Oath—Bill of Exchange—Discharge.

In an action on a prescribed bill the defender, on a reference to his oath, deponed that he had received the money and had paid interest for some years, that he offered repayment of the principal sum, but that the creditor told him he did not want it, and that he was to keep it for his own use. The debtor paid no interest after that time, but the bill was not given to him or destroyed. Held that the oath was affirmative of the reference, in so far as regarded the capital sum. Balfour v. Simpson, May 16, 1873, p. 604.

See Proof, 2.

OBLIGATION. See Agreement.

PARENT AND CHILD. Legitim—Discharge—Marriage-Contract—Provisions—Foreign.

1. In an action for legitim brought by the only child of a domiciled Scotsman against the executrix of his father, the defender alleged that the pursuer's claim was excluded by an antenuptial marriage-contract executed by his parents when domiciled in England, averring that by this deed two sums of £5000 and £6000 were conveyed by the spouses respectively in trust for behoof of the children of the marriage, and that, according to the law of England, the provisions made in the marriage-contract in favour of the issue of the marriage operated as a full discharge of all legal and other claims which the issue so provided for could prefer against the succession of their parents, or in respect of the death of either of them, and that the pursuer had accepted of these provisions, and by so doing had discharged all other claims against his father's estate. Held that the defender's averments in regard to the terms of the marriage-contract and its effect by the law of England were not relevant averments of such a deed as by the law of Scotland would exclude a claim for legitim. Trevelyan v. Trevelyan, March 11, 1873, p. 516.

PARENT AND CHILD—Continued.

Collatio inter liberos.

2. Advances made by a father to his child cannot be imputed to account of legitim, except in a question with other children entitled to legitim. Trevelyan v. Trevelyan, March 11, 1873, p. 516.

Presumption—Pater est quem nuptiæ demonstrant.

3. In an action of filiation and aliment brought by a married woman against a man not her husband held that the presumption pater est quem nuptiæ demonstrant had been redargued, although there was possibility of access.

Question, Whether it was competent to call the pursuer's husband as a witness to prove non-access. Brodie v. Dyce, Nov. 29, 1872, p. 142.

Marriage-Contract.

4. A husband in his antenuptial marriage-contract disponed lands in favour of himself and the heirs to be procreated of his body, and his or their assignees. Held that the heir of the marriage had a protected right of succession, which his father was not entitled to defeat gratuitously. Earl of Glasgow's Trustee v. Earl of Glasgow, &c., Dec. 13, 1872, p. 218.

Legacy—Cumulative Provisions.

5. A father in his daughter's antenuptial marriage-contract bound himself to pay at his death a sum of £1000 to her marriage-contract trustees. He afterwards executed a trust-disposition and settlement, by which he directed his trustees to pay his debts, and divide the residue of his estate equally among his children. Held that the provision in the marriage-contract was a debt due by the deceased, and was not to be deducted from the daughter's share of residue. Elliot v. Bowhill, &c., June 21, 1873, p. 735.

PARISH. See Church.

PARTNERSHIP. See Joint Adventure—Joint Stock Company.

PATENT. Provisional Specification—15 and 16 Vict. cap. 83.

1. The title of a patent under the Act 15 and 16 Vict. cap. 83, is explained by the provisional specification, and where it is pleaded that a patent is invalid in consequence of the final specification embracing too much, the final specification is to be compared with the title and the provisional specification read together. Dudgeon v. Thomson, July 4, 1873, p. 863.

Specification—Misrepresentation.

2. A patent was objected to on the ground of misrepresentation in the specification, which set forth that the principle of the invention was expansion of boiler tubes by means of rollers which could be worked by the hand, whereby the use of mauls or sledge hammers could be dispensed with, while, in point of fact, the machine could not be worked without the use of hammers. It was proved that the machine could not be inserted in the tubes without the force of hammers, and that though it was possible to work the machine afterwards without hammers, it could not be used to advantage without the use of small hammers. Held that there was no such misrepresentation as to invalidate the patent. Dudgeon v. Thomson, July 4, 1873, p. 863.

Infringement.

3. Circumstances in which held that a patentee of a machine had infringed upon a prior patent, notwithstanding some minor differences, amounting to improvements in construction. Dudgeon v. Thomson, July 4, 1873, p. 863.

POOR. Settlement—Husband and Wife.

1. An Irishman residing in Scotland, where he had no settlement, deserted his wife, who was a Scotchwoman, and went to reside in another part of Scotland, concealing his place of residence, and contributing nothing to the support of his wife and family. The wife became insane, and she and the family were supported by the parish in which they were found.

POOR—Continued.

Held that the wife's birth parish was bound to relieve that parish of the sums expended, although the husband was able-bodied and resident in Scotland. Johnston v. Wallace, June 13, 1873, p. 699.

Settlement.

2. A pauper born in 1841 in the parish of A removed with his father's family in 1846 to the parish of B, where he lived in family with his father till the death of the latter in 1860. A few weeks after his father's death he enlisted and remained abroad on military service till February 1872, when he returned to Scotland, and became a proper object of parochial relief. Held, in conformity with Craig v. Greig and Macdonald (July 18, 1863, ante, vol. iii. 1172), and M'Lennan v. Waite (June 28, 1872, ante, vol. x. 908), that the parish of his birth was liable for his support, and not the parish of B, in which he had ceased to have a derivative settlement by emancipation at his father's death. Ferrier v. Kennedy, Feb. 8, 1873, p. 402.

PRESCRIPTION, Negative. Approbate and Reprobate—Marriage-Contract—General Settlement.

A father executed a trust-deed for payment of certain debts and regulating his succession in fraudem of his antenuptial marriage-contract, and to the prejudice of the heir of the marriage, and afterwards another trust-deed, the two forming together a complete settlement of his whole estate, heritable and moveable. The heir made up a title under the marriage-contract, and under it possessed the lands contained in the first trust-deed, and took benefit under the second deed, but in ignorance of the existence of the first trust-deed. Held that his trustees and executors were not barred by the negative prescription from challenging the earlier deed, but were entitled to elect either to abide by his approbation of his father's settlement, or to renounce and restore the benefit he had taken, and challenge the first deed. Earl of Glasgow's Trustee v. Earl of Glasgow, &c., Dec. 13, 1872, p. 218.

PRESCRIPTION. See Fishings—Teinds.

PRESUMPTION. See Entail, 6—Husband and Wife, 1—Proof—Teinds.

PROCESS. Jury Trial—All parties not called.

1. Circumstances in which a pursuer was allowed to proceed with an action without transferring the cause against the representatives of a person deceased who had been called as a defender for his interest but had not appeared in the action. West Calder Oil Co. v. Fell, March 18, 1873, p. 546.

Summons—Amendment.

2. At the end of the pursuer's proof in a reduction on the ground of forgery he craved leave to amend the record by adding an averment and plea of invalid attestation. Leave granted, under Court of Session Act, 1868, sec. 29; but expenses found due to the defender down to the date of lodging the minute of amendment. Arnott and Others v. Burt, Nov. 14, 1872, p. 62.

Special Case—Court of Session Act, 1868, sec. 63.

3. Parties are not entitled to bring questions before the Court in the form of a special case when they are not in a position to raise these questions under some other mode of procedure known to the law. Parochial Board of Bothwell v. Pearson, Feb. 6, 1873, p. 399.

Special Case.

4. The local authority in a parish, and a ratepayer in a special drainage district therein, presented a special case for the opinion and judgment of the Court on the question whether the local authority was entitled to charge certain expenses against the special district or the whole parish. Held that the special case was incompetent, in respect that (no assessment having been imposed or charge threatened) the only form in which the question of law could have been raised was an action of declarator, and that in that case it would have been necessary to call more than a single ratepayer. Parochial Board of Bothwell v. Pearson, Feb. 6, 1873, p. 399.

PROCESS—Continued.

Reclaiming Note—Leave of Lord Ordinary—Court of Session Act, 1868 (31 and 32 Vict. cap. 100), secs. 53 and 54.

5. In an action of multiplepoinding the Lord Ordinary pronounced an interlocutor exhausting all the questions of law between the different claimants, settling the shares of the fund in medio (the amount of which had not been ascertained) to which they were respectively entitled, appointing the case to be enrolled for further procedure, and finding no expenses due to or by any of the competing claimants. Held that a reclaiming note without leave of the Lord Ordinary was incompetent. Kennedy v. Taylor, May 14, 1873, p. 603.

Competency—Proof.

6. In counter actions arising out of a contract to construct machinery the Court refused to grant diligence for the recovery of letters between the partners of the contractor's firm, but granted diligence to recover letters written to them by their foreman or other workmen employed in the construction of the machinery. Tannett, Walker, and Co. v. Hannay and Sons, July 18, 1873, p. 931.

Interlocutor—Proof before Answer.

7. Observations as to the import of the words "before answer." Macvean v. Maclean, March 8, 1873, p. 506.

Sheriff—Appeal.

8. An interlocutor by a Sheriff-substitute repelled the defences in an action as irrelevant. The Sheriff on appeal recalled the interlocutor, and allowed the defender a proof before answer of certain averments by the writ or oath of the pursuer. The pursuer having appealed to the Court of Session, held that the Sheriff's interlocutor was not a final judgment within the meaning of the Sheriff-court Act, 1853, section 24, and Court of Session Act, 1868, sections 53, 54, and therefore was not appealable at the instance of the pursuer.

Opinion that the interlocutor was not appealable under the 40th section of the Judicature Act. Shirra v. Robertson, June 7, 1873, p. 660.

Appeal—Competency—50 Geo. III. c. 112—16 and 17 Vict. c. 80.

9. By the 36th section of the Act 50 Geo. III. c. 112, it is enacted that bills of advocation from the Sheriffs and other inferior Judges shall be allowed, inter alia, with respect "to an interim decree for partial payment," "provided that leave is given by the inferior Judge."

By the 24th section of the Act 16 and 17 Vict. c. 80, it is enacted that it shall be competent to take to review of the Court of Session, inter alia, "any interlocutor of a Sheriff giving interim decree for payment of money." By the said section it is also enacted that the provisions of the Act 50 Geo. III. c. 112, "are, in so far as inconsistent with this enactment, hereby repealed."

Held (after consultation with the Judges of the Second Division) that it is competent to appeal against an interlocutor of the Sheriff giving interim decree for payment of money, without obtaining his leave. Erskine v. Lang, Dec. 18, 1872, p. 229.

Proof—Leave to Appeal—48 Geo. III. c. 151, sec. 15.

10. An action was raised by the trustees of a deceased partner of a firm for count and reckoning as to his interest in the firm. The remaining partners averred that by certain letters produced an agreement had been entered into between the firm and the partner, by which he ceased to be a partner, and became entitled only to an annuity from the firm. The Court unanimously held that the letters did not form a concluded agreement, and ordered production of the balance-sheets of the firm, and the deceased partner's account with the firm. The firm presented a petition craving leave to appeal, and offered to secure payment of the annuity to the family of the deceased pending the appeal. Petition (Lord Benholme diss.) refused. Lawson v. Lawson's Trustees, Nov. 30, 1872, p. 168.

PROCESS—Continued.

Appeal to House of Lords.

11. After a judgment had been pronounced by the House of Lords containing a remit to the Court of Session, the parties compromised the case, and the Court, upon a joint minute in manuscript, applied the judgment and assoilzied the defenders. Anstruther, &c. v. Anstruther's Trustees, July 19, 1873, p. 955.

Appeal to House of Lords.

12. Observed that when, after or in consequence of a judgment of the House of Lords, anything remains to be done in the case in the Court of Session, the proper mode of bringing the case before the Court is by petition. Anstruther, &c. v. Anstruther's Trustees, July 19, 1873, p. 955.

Expenses—Appeal to House of Lords.

13. Where an interlocutor of the Inner-House, recalling an interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary, was reversed by the House of Lords, without any affirmance of the latter, and without any finding as to expenses, but with a remit to the Court "to do therein as shall be just and consistent with this judgment," held (diss. Lord Benholme) that, the House of Lords not having exhausted the case, the Court took it up, in applying the judgment, as if the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor had never been recalled, and were entitled to deal with the question of expenses from the date thereof. Sawers' Executors v. Sawers' Trustees, Feb. 22, 1873, p. 451.

Proof—Commission—Criminating Question.

14. Where a criminating question was proposed to be put to a witness to be examined before a foreign commissioner, held that the commissioner should be instructed (1) to intimate to the witness that he was entitled to decline to answer the question; and (2), in the event of the witness electing to answer the question, to allow all competent questions bearing on the matter to be put with a view to test his credibility. Muir v. Muir, March 14, 1873, p. 529.

Reparation—Wrongous apprehension—Limitation of time for raising Action—Statutes—Summary Procedure Act, 1864, 27 and 28 Vict. c. 53, sec. 35—Day Trespass Act, 2 and 3 Wm. IV. c. 68, sec. 11.

15. A complaint, instituted under the Summary Procedure Act, charged a contravention of the Day Trespass Act (which authorises a Justice of Peace to grant warrant for the apprehension of a person accused, before service of the complaint, "if he shall have reason to suspect from information upon oath that the party is likely to abscond"), and set forth that the two persons accused were found trespassing in search of game and had refused to give their names or addresses. On a deposition on oath by one witness to the truth of these statements a Justice of the Peace, before the complaint had been served, issued a warrant for the apprehension of the accused, and they were accordingly apprehended. Five months after one of the accused raised an action of damages for wrongous apprehension against the complainers' law-agent and two officers of police, on the ground that the Justice was not entitled under the Day Trespass Act to issue the warrant of apprehension before the complaint was served, without having information on oath that the accused was likely to abscond. Held that, although the proceedings had been irregular, there had not been such a deviation from the statute as to deprive the defenders of the protection of sec. 35 of the Summary Procedure Act, which requires that all actions arising out of proceedings under it shall be brought within two months, and therefore that the action fell to be dismissed. Murray v. Allan, Nov. 29, 1872, p. 147.

25 and 26 Vict. c. 35, sec. 35—Computation of Time.

16. Under a statute requiring all actions arising from procedure under it to be commenced within two months after the cause of action shall have arisen, held that Magistrates who were sued for damages on account of a decision pronounced on 15th April were timeously cited by a summons executed on

PROCESS—Continued.

15th June following. Ashley v. Magistrates of Rothesay, June 20, 1873, p. 708.

Judicial Referee—Fee—Expenses.

17. A judicial referee and the clerk to the reference are entitled to decree for their fees and expenses against both parties conjunctly and severally. Beattie, &c., July 19, 1873, p. 954.

Jury Trial.

18. In general, questions of pedigree are sent to trial by jury. Mackintosh, &c. v. Ross, May 30, 1873, p. 636.

Jury Trial—Enumerated Causes.

19. Motion by the pursuers for a proof before answer, in lieu of jury trial, granted, although it was resisted by the defenders. Life Association of Scotland v. Foster, Jan. 31, 1873, p. 351.

Pactum de non petendo—Sist.

20. In an action by a tenant against the representatives of his landlord for payment of certain bills of exchange granted by the latter, the defenders founded on a letter by the tenant in proof of an alleged agreement by the tenant not to ask payment of the bills in consideration of a renewed lease being granted to the tenant. The pursuer, in reply, stated that the lease was threatened to be reduced by the next heir of entail in possession of the estate as in contravention of the entail. After a proof, held (diss. Lord Benholme) that a pactum de non petendo had been proved, and that the pursuer being still in undisturbed possession of the farm was not in hoc statu entitled to decree, reserving all further questions on the merits. Macvean v. Maclean, June 26, 1873, p. 764.

Summons—Reference to Account Books—Decree.

21. In an action brought by a joint stock banking company and its liquidators against a person who had been a director for payment of "the amount of loss and damage due by the defender to the bank" as at the date when he ceased to be a director (five years before the stoppage of the bank) held (1) that the books of the bank referred to in the summons were to be regarded as part of the pursuer's statement; (2) that with regard to alleged loss by advances on accounts-current which were closed at the time when the defender ceased to be a director the pursuer had set forth a case sufficiently relevant to be admitted to probation; (3) that the defender could not be made liable for loss on advances on accounts-current to those persons to whom the bank had continued to make advances after the defender had left office, and further, that the pursuer had not made a relevant averment of the loss on these earlier advances; (4) that any liability which the defender might have incurred in allowing the advances by way of discounts on bills had been extinguished by the subsequent actings of the bank in renewing the bills and in making new advances; (5) that any liability for loss by insurances on the lives of debtors of the bank had been extinguished by the sale of the policies by the bank, without notice to the defender; (6) that as the summons, with the books referred to in it, disclosed facts which excluded the action quoad certain items the proper form of interlocutor was one dismissing the action to that extent. Western Bank v. Baird's Trustees, Nov. 22, 1872, p. 97.

Petition—Tutor.

22. In an action of giving up tutorial inventories the tutors called as defenders the nearest relatives of the pupil resident in Scotland, and presented a petition to the Court to dispense with the citation of the next of kin who were resident in England. The Court expressed some doubt as to the necessity of the application, but, after inquiry, ordered intimation in common form. Buchan, &c., June 7, 1873, p. 662.

Arbiter—Defence—Contract—Clause of Reference.

23. Held that an action raised by a contractor against his employer for payment due under a building contract, and for damages for his employer having, as he alleged, illegally taken possession of machinery and materials, was not

PROCESS—Continued.

excluded by a clause of reference in the contract, in respect (1) that it was not clear that the clause of reference gave the arbiter authority to give decree for payment of money; (2) that certain of the questions raised did not fall within the reference; and (3) that the arbiter could not assess damages.

Observed, that if questions arose in the course of the action falling within the reference, the aid of the arbiter must be invoked. Tough v. Dumbarton Water-Works Commissioners, Dec. 20, 1872, p. 236.

Correction of Clerical Error—Judgment.

24. Observations on the incompetency of an inferior Judge, ex proprio motu, correcting an error in an interlocutor after it had been issued and seen by the parties. White v. M'Ewen's Trustees, May 13, 1873, p. 602.

PROCURATOR FISCAL. See Expenses, 4—Issue, 3.

PROOF. Bill of Exchange—Discharge—Parole.

1. A proof before answer allowed to explain documents alleged to instruct discharge of a debt contained in two promissory-notes in possession of the creditor in the obligation. Macvean v. Maclean, March 8, 1873, p. 506.

Oath on Reference.

2. In an oath on reference, a party having deponed that a statement in an article of his condescendence was true, held that the statement was thereby imported into the oath.

Observed, that in order to make documents part of the oath on reference the deponent must be examined specifically on the matters therein contained; but when that is done it is not necessary to engross the whole documents, a reference to them being sufficient. Jackson v. Cochrane, Feb. 27, 1873, p. 475.

Agreement—Parole Evidence—Competency—Damage—Reparation.

3. In an action of damages the pursuer averred that the defenders had arranged to board certain children with her, and that as both parties had contemplated that the arrangement should endure for a term of years she had incurred certain expenditure which she lost by the guardians suddenly bringing the arrangement to a close. Held (1) that parole evidence of such an arrangement was competent, and (2) that the pursuer was entitled to be reimbursed for actual loss.

Observed (per Lord Neaves), that when parties are engaged mutually in promoting an object of common interest, and the expenses entailed in furthering that object are thrown on one of the parties, then, when that expenditure fails of obtaining the end aimed at, the party-disburser must be recompensed, as being the disburser for a common object. Dobie v. Lauder's Trustees, June 24, 1873, p. 749.

Writ—Resting Owing—Loan—Donation.

4. Held that a loan of money was not instructed by letters in which the acknowledgment of the receipt of money was qualified by the statement that it was received in payment of a debt of honour. Duncan's Trustees v. Shand, Jan. 7, 1873, p. 254.

Writ.

5. In a proof by writ, it is competent, in so far as necessary for understanding letters, to look at those to which they are answers.

Opinion (per Lord Neaves) that proof of the receipt of money by the writ of the receiver only raises a presumption of loan in cases where the acknowledgment is contained in a document delivered to the disburser by the recipient as a record of the transaction. Duncan's Trustees v. Shand, Jan. 7, 1873, p. 254.

Presumption—Pater est quem nuptiæ demonstrant—Parent and Child.

6. In an action of filiation and aliment brought by a married woman against a man not her husband held that the presumption pater est quem nuptiæ demonstrant had been redargued, although there was possibility of access.

Question, Whether it was competent to call the pursuer's husband as a witness to prove non-access. Brodie v. Dyce, Nov. 29, 1872, p. 142.

PROOF—Continued.

Divorce—Extrajudicial Confession—Adultery.

7. Circumstances which, coupled with evidence of extrajudicial acknowledgment of the illegitimacy of a child, held (rev. judgment of Lord Shand) sufficient to infer adultery on the part of a wife, and to entitle the husband to decree of divorce. Fullerton v. Fullerton, June 20, 1873, p. 720.

Loan—Deposit-Receipt.

8. In an action brought for payment of a sum of money, "being the amount contained in a deposit-receipt in name of the pursuer uplifted by the defender," the defender stated that he had received the deposit-receipt bearing the pursuer's endorsation from a third party, the true owner of the money, and to whom he had accounted for it. Held (1) that in so far as the action was or might be rested on an alleged loan by the pursuer to the defender such ground of action could not be proved by parole evidence, and that the only writing of the defender founded on in proof of it, being the defender's name written on the back of the deposit-receipt, was not legal proof of such loan, nor sufficient to render parole proof admissible; (2) that, in so far as the action was rested on the defender's alleged intromission with the pursuer's funds, the parole evidence had negatived the pursuer's case. Nimmo v. Nimmo, Feb. 22, 1873, p. 446.

Trustee—Judicial Admissions.

9. Question, Whether a trustee in a sequestration can in litigation make admissions in points of law. Nicolson v. Johnston and Wright, Dec. 6, 1872, p. 179.

See Process.

PROPERTY. Straightening Marches—Act 1669, c. 17.

1. The procedure laid down in Act 1669, c. 17 (anent enclosing of ground), whereby the Sheriff may be required to visit the marches, is imperative, and cannot be supplied by a remit to a man of skill, even of consent. Lord Advocate v. Sinclair, Nov. 26, 1872, p. 137.

2. The Act does not apply, (1) where there is in existence a natural boundary of steep cliffs, involving little danger of trespass; nor (2) where the expense of erecting the fence would be disproportionate to the value of the pieces of ground to be benefited. Lord Advocate v. Sinclair, Nov. 26, 1872, p. 137.

Title—Error in date of Sasine confirmed.

3. In a charter of confirmation an instrument of sasine was described correctly by its date, but an error was made in stating the date of recording. Held that, as the sasine was sufficiently identified otherwise, the error in the date of recording did not invalidate the confirmation of the instrument. Duke of Argyll v. Dalgleish's Trustees, May 23, 1873, p. 616.

Boundary—Proof of Possession—Condition—Singular Successor.

4. In 1858 the owners of a shop, who were tenants of the sunk flat below, obtained, from the owner of the sunk flat, permission to enlarge their shop window by lowering the sill, whereby the window of the sunk flat was diminished in size, on condition that, on demand, the latter window should be restored to its orignal state. The owners of the shop sold their property in 1867.

In an action raised against the purchaser by the owner of the sunk flat to have his window restored to its former condition, held that the purchaser's right did not extend beyond the boundary of his property, and that as the titles of the subjects did not define the boundary between the flats, it fell to be determined by the possession of the defenders' authors under their title as proprietors of the shop. Girdwood v. Paterson, June 3, 1873, p. 647.

Feu-Contract—Real Burden—Mutual Gable—Sequestration—Preference.

5. A and B feued two adjoining stances, both feu-contracts declaring that the gables should be mutual, and should be built to the extent of one-half on the adjoining feus. This provision was declared to be a real burden on the feu. Held that A, having built a mutual gable which was made use of by

PROPERTY—Continued.

B, was entitled to be ranked preferably on B's sequestrated estate for one-half of its price. Rodger v. Russell, June 10, 1873, p. 671.

Foreshore—Regalia.

6. The Crown has a right of property in the foreshore not as being one of the regalia minora, but as a portion of the solum of the country, and may alienate the same, subject to the burden of certain public uses which attach to it, whether held in property by the Crown or by a subject. Agnew v. Lord Advocate, Jan. 21, 1873, p. 309.

Foreshore.

7. The right of the public to use the foreshore for purposes of navigation is vested in the Crown as one of the regalia majora. Agnew v. Lord Advocate, Jan. 21, 1873, p. 309.

Servitude—River.

8. Held that a riparian proprietor, who had, by possession for more than forty years, acquired a right of diverting water from a stream for the use of his mill, was not bound to continue the exercise of this right; but that if he abandoned it, and restored the water to its original channel, he was bound to do so in such a manner as not to expose the servient tenement to injury. Bridges v. Lord Saltoun, March 20, 1873, p. 588.

Trust for Creditors—Radical Right—Conveyance—Service—Heir.

9. An infeftment on a trust-disposition bearing to be for behoof of creditors does not divest the granter of the radical right of property, and his heir cannot complete his title by conveyance from the trustee. Gilmour v. Gilmours, July 3, 1873, p. 853.

Title—Designation of Procurator.

10. Question, Whether in an instrument of resignation ad remanentiam the procurator must be designed. Duke of Argyll v. Dalgleish's Trustees, May 23, 1873, p. 616.

Common Property.

11. Held that the proprietor of the upper floor of a house and under-ground cellars had no right to carry a flue from the cellar to the roof through a staircase in which he had not an exclusive right of property. Taylor v. Dunlop, Nov. 1, 1872, p. 25.

Floor—Roof—Common Interest.

12. The proprietor of a house containing two square storeys and an unoccupied space between the upper storey and the roof sold and conveyed the "upper flat," inserting in his disposition an obligation on the purchaser to maintain the roof, and on the seller to maintain the street pavement. Held (diss the Lord President) that the purchaser had right to the space between the ceiling of his flat and the roof of the house, and was entitled to make rooms in it. Taylor v. Dunlop, Nov. 1, 1872, p. 25.

Implied Contract—Conterminous Proprietors.

13. A, the proprietor of building ground in a burgh held in burgage, disponed in burgage to B, a purchaser, two adjacent lots, No. 3 and No. 4. Lot No. 3 was described as bounded on the north "by the central line of R Street" (an unformed street), "to measure 60 feet in breadth from building line to building line," and lot No. 4 as bounded on the north by other ground belonging to the seller, "on a line coinciding in range with the central line of R Street."

The disposition contained an express obligation on the purchaser as to the completion of the new streets which formed the east and west boundaries of lot 3, but no obligation was expressed with reference to R Street.

Some years after, A and B entered into an agreement that they should mutually furnish the ground for the formation of R Street eastwards along the northern boundary of lot 4, as delineated in a plan which shewed R Street extending along the northern boundary of lot 3; the purchaser subsequently acquired from the seller two additional lots of ground bounded by R Street, one on the east and the other on the west of lot 3, by a disposition which declared that both parties should have right to the whole new streets therein mentioned bounding the subjects disponed.

PROPERTY—Continued.

Held, in a question between persons who represented A and B, that B's representative was under an implied obligation to leave space for the formation of R Street on lot 3.

Free St Mark's v. Taylor's Trustees, Jan. 26, 1869, ante, vol. vii. 415, commented on. Dennistoun v. Thomson, Nov. 22, 1872, p. 121.

Possessory Action—Burgh—Sea-shore.

14. Proprietors in a burgh of barony of ground adjoining the sea-shore, whose titles gave them no right thereto but that of access, and who had assisted in reclaiming from the sea ex adverso of their properties a piece of ground which had remained unenclosed for more than seven years, held in a possessory question to have a sufficient title, without the intervention of the Crown, to object to any part of the said piece of ground being enclosed by another proprietor whose property and titles were in a similar position to theirs, although he was proceeding with the sanction of the Magistrates, who themselves had no title to the sea-shore. Irvine v. Robertson, Jan. 18, 1873, p. 298.

Crown—Foreshore.

15. In a question between the Crown and a vassal, held (1) that when an estate on the sea-shore, whether barony or not, is held under a crown charter which does not, by express grant or specific boundary, extend the right of the vassal beyond the high-water mark, there is no presumption that the foreshore is a pertinent of the land; but (2) that in such a case the charter may be shewn to include the foreshore by such long-continued possession thereof as can only be ascribed to a right of property. Agnew v. Lord Advocate, Jan. 21, 1873, p. 309.

Possession—Crown—Foreshore.

16. Circumstances in which held that crown grants of lands on the sea-shore, with parts and pertinents, had been explained by possession of the foreshore as including a grant thereof. Agnew v. Lord Advocate, Jan. 21, 1873, p. 309.

Servitude—Possession.

17. Observed that the taking of sea-ware for the purpose of making kelp was to be regarded as the exercise of a right of property, and not of servitude. Agnew v. Lord Advocate, Jan. 21, 1873, p. 309.

River—Salmon-Fishing.

18. A and B were owners of salmon-fishings on the north and south sides respectively of a tidal river, the medium filum being the boundary between them. From time immemorial the main stream of the river had flowed in a narrow channel close to the northern bank of the river, in consequence of a gravel bank, partially dry at low water, stretching across the medium filum from the south; and it had been the practice of the proprietor of the northern fishings to repair the bank when injured by extraordinary floods, so as to prevent the main channel of the river from being diverted to the injury of his fishing. In a process of declarator and interdict brought by B to prevent A interfering with the operations of nature upon the alveus of the river, held that the original grant as well as the custom of the river implied a right in each proprietor to keep the stream, so far as practicable, in its normal state, and that A was entitled to restore the alveus to its normal condition when altered by extraordinary floods. Mather, &c. v. Macbraire, &c., March 14, 1873, p. 522.

Disposition.

19. Held that a mortis causa conveyance of heritage executed by a person who died prior to the Titles to Land Consolidation Act, 1868 (31 and 32 Vict. cap. 101) was invalid, in respect that the word "dispone" was not used. Kirkpatrick v. Kirkpatrick's Trustees, March 19, 1873, p. 551.

Minister's Stipend.

20. Held that a proprietor who has a bare superiority over lands, or one who has a security right over lands on which no possession has followed, and who has not intromitted with the fruits, is not liable for minister's stipend.

PROPERTY—Continued.
Opinion that it is not necessary to enable a minister to use his decree of locality against a possessor of lands localled on that the possessor's name should appear in the locality.
Opinion that a proprietor whose name appears in the decree of locality ceases to be liable for stipend when he ceases to be proprietor. Jackson v. Cochrane, Feb. 27, 1873, p. 475.
See Fishings—Minerals—Nuisance—Statute—Superior and Vassal.

PROVING THE TENOR. See Teinds, 14.

PROVISIONS. See Aliment—Husband and Wife—Parent and Child.

PUBLIC HEALTH. Public Health (Scotland) Act, 1867 (30 and 31 Vict. c. 101) —Board of Supervision—Title to Insist—Petition and Complaint.
Held that whenever a local authority "shall refuse or neglect" to construct the necessary system of drainage in the district under their supervision, the Board of Supervision has a right to present a petition to have them compelled to do so. On a petition and complaint by the Board of Supervision the Court sisted procedure to allow a local authority reasonable time to discover the most suitable system of drainage, and to have it executed. Board of Supervision v. Local Authority of Montrose, Dec. 3, 1872, p. 170.

PUBLIC-HOUSE. Certificate—Hours of Opening and Closing—Statutes 9 Geo. IV. c. 58 (Home Drummond Act); 16 and 17 Vict. c. 67 (Forbes Mackenzie Act, 1853), secs. 11, 12; 25 and 26 Vict. c. 35 (Public-Houses Amendment Act, 1862), secs. 4, 2.
The Magistrates of a burgh, at a meeting for renewing certificates for the sale of exciseable liquors within the burgh, came to a resolution that, within a particular district, which included nearly the whole burgh and all the inns and public-houses in the burgh, the hour of closing inns and public-houses should be 10 instead of 11 as required by the above Acts, and they granted certificates accordingly. By sec. 2 of 25 and 26 Vict., the Magistrates are allowed to insert in the certificates a different hour for closing and opening "in any particular locality within any county or burgh requiring other hours for opening and closing." Held that the Magistrates were not entitled to change the hours of closing throughout the whole burgh, and remit made to the clerk to alter the certificates. Ashley v. Magistrates of Rothesay, June 20, 1873, p. 708.

RADICAL RIGHT. See Service.

RAILWAY. See Reparation.

REDUCTION. Agreement—Fraud—Fraudulent Concealment—Essential Error.
Residuary legatees under a settlement brought an action to reduce an agreement between them and other legatees under the settlement, averring that the defenders, taking advantage of the pursuers' ignorance of their rights and the amount of the succession, had by fraudulent misrepresentation and concealment induced them, greatly to their prejudice, to enter into the agreement. The defenders objected to an issue of fraudulent concealment, on the ground that there was no duty to disclose. Held (1) that in entering upon the contract there was a duty of disclosure incumbent on the defenders, and that the pursuers were entitled to an issue of fraudulent misrepresentation or fraudulent concealment. Dempsters v. Raes, July 1, 1873, p. 843.
See Issue—Landord and Tenant—Teinds, 3—University.

REI INTERVENTUS. See Landlord and Tenant.

REPARATION. Contributory Negligence—Railway.
1. In an action of damages against a railway company raised by a passenger for injuries received in alighting from a train at a railway station it was proved that the carriage in which the pursuer was seated had been stopped short of the platform, that in consequence of the darkness of the night and the absence of artificial light the pursuer had not observed this, and in leaving the carriage backwards had fallen and injured himself. The jury returned a verdict for the pursuer.

REPARATION—Continued.

In a motion for a new trial, on the ground that the verdict was against evidence, held (1) that it was the duty of the railway company to have given the passengers some notice or warning of the danger, or assistance in alighting; and (2) that the question of contributory negligence on the part of the pursuer was one for the jury. Potter v. North British Railway Co., June 7, 1873, p. 664.

Damages—Perishable Goods—Railway Company.

2. Goods marked perishable were delivered to a railway company, whose custom it was to forward those so marked in preference to others. The truck in which they were was not marked perishable, and was taken off the train along with others in order to lighten it, while goods not of a perishable nature were forwarded. In an action brought against the company for damage incurred in consequence of the detention of the goods, held that the company had failed to forward the goods with reasonable expedition, in respect, according to ordinary practice, perishable goods were sent on preferably to goods not perishable, whereas, on the occasion in question, goods not perishable had been sent on in preference to the pursuers' goods, and that the company were liable for the damage caused by the delay. Macdonald and Co. v. Highland Railway Co., May 20, 1873, p. 614.

Master and Servant—Collaborateur.

3. In an action of damages for personal injury raised by a workman in a paper-work against his master it was proved that the pursuer had been injured in consequence of the machine at which he was employed being in a defective state through the negligence of the manager and a mechanic employed in the works, and that there had been no personal negligence on the part of the master. Held that the master was not liable for the fault of those employed by him, seeing that he had taken reasonable care to employ competent workmen. Balleny v. Cree, May 23, 1873, p. 626.

Collaborateur.

4. In an action of damages brought by a sailor against his employers, the shipowners, on the ground of personal injury caused by the fault of the captain, held that the captain and he were collaborateurs, and that, consequently, the owners were not responsible. Leddy v. Gibson and Co., Jan. 18, 1873, p. 304.

Railway—Negligence.

5. In an action of damages brought against a railway company by a passenger who had been injured by a fall from a train in consequence of the carriage door against which he was leaning flying open it was proved that neither the injured party nor any one else in the compartment opened the door. Held that the accident had been caused by the fault of the servants of the defenders in failing to fasten the door, and that the defenders were liable in damages. Cassidy v. North British Railway Company, Jan. 23, 1873, p. 341.

Slander.

6. In an action of damages for slander held that the words "damned puppy" were not actionable. Jameson v. Bonthrone, June 13, 1873, p. 703.

Slander—Counter Issue—Veritas Convicii.

7. Circumstances in which held that it was necessary for a defender in an action of damages for slander who pleaded veritas to put in his counter issue the words used in the libel. Ogilvy v. Paul and Others, June 28, 1873, p. 776.

Process—Issues—Slander—Veritas.

A visitor at a hotel made an entry in the visitors' book to the effect that he had visited most of the hotels in Scotland, but that he had nowhere "encountered so much drinking or so much squalid untidiness and dirt."

In an action of damages brought by the hotel-keeper against the writer the latter pleaded veritas. In adjusting issues, held that while the pur-

REPARATION—Continued.

suer was entitled to the issue, whether the entry falsely, maliciously, and calumniously, represented that the pursuer kept his hotel in a state of squalid untidiness and dirt, and permitted persons to drink therein to excess, all to such a degree as to distinguish it in these respects from most of the hotels in Scotland, and to cause discomfort and annoyance to visitors to and residents in the hotel, the defender did not require to put in his counter issue more than whether on or about the date of the entry there was an excessive amount of drinking in the hotel, and whether the hotel on said days was in a state of much squalid untidiness and filth. M'Iver v. M'Neill, June 28, 1873, p. 777.

Wrongous Use of Diligence—Malice—Bill—Issues.

9. In an action of damages for injury alleged to have been caused by the defenders recording a protest for non-payment of a bill, and charging thereon, although the bill had been previously paid, eight days after it had become due, held that a charge was a diligence and not a judicial act, and that therefore it was not necessary to put malice in the issue (Lord Benholme diss., on the ground that the circumstances shewed fault on the part of the pursuer, and that therefore it was not sufficient for him to prove merely a legal wrong).

Form of issue adjusted. Gibb v. Edinburgh Brewery Co., June 19, 1873, p. 705.

Proof—Agreement—Parole Evidence—Competency—Damage.

10. In an action of damages the pursuer averred that the defenders had arranged to board certain children with her, and that as both parties had contemplated that the arrangement should continue for a term of years she had incurred certain expenditure which she lost by the guardians suddenly bringing the arrangement to a close. Held (1) that parole evidence of such an arrangement was competent, and (2) that the pursuer was entitled to be reimbursed for actual loss. Dobie v. Lauder's Trustees, June 24, 1873, p. 749.

Joint Stock Company—Director.

11. By the contract of copartnery of a joint stock banking company it was declared that no shareholder could be legally a director who resided permanently more than ten miles distant from the head office, and that a director ceased to be one if he had not attended a meeting of directors for six months. In an action by the bank and its liquidators against a shareholder who had been elected and occasionally acted as a director, for loss said to have been caused by his gross negligence, held that the defender, having assumed the position of a director, and acted as such, could not plead these clauses of the contract in bar of the action. Western Bank v. Baird's Trustees, Nov. 22, 1872, p. 96.

Director—Negligence—Personal Bar—Process.

12. In an action brought by a joint stock banking company and its liquidators against a person who had been a director for payment of "the amount of loss and damage due by the defender to the bank" as at the date when he ceased to be a director (five years before the stoppage of the bank) held (1) that the books of the bank referred to in the summons were to be regarded as part of the pursuer's statement; (2) that with regard to alleged loss by advances on accounts-current which were closed at the time when the defender ceased to be a director the pursuer had set forth a case sufficiently relevant to be admitted to probation; (3) that the defender could not be made liable for loss on advances on accounts-current to those persons to whom the bank had continued to make advances after the defender had left office, and further, that the pursuer had not made a relevant averment of the loss on these earlier advances; (4) that any liability which the defender might have incurred in allowing the advances by way of discounts on bills had been extinguished by the subsequent actings of the bank in renewing the bills and in making new advances; (5) that any liability for loss by insurances on the lives of debtors of the bank had been extinguished by the sale of the policies by the bank, without notice to the defender; (6) that as the summons, with the books referred to in it, disclosed facts which excluded the action quoad certain items the proper form of interlocutor was one dismissing the action to that extent. Western Bank v. Baird's Trustees, Nov. 22, 1872, p. 97.

REPARATION—Continued.

Minerals—Landlord and Tenant—Lease—Relief.

13. By an agreement between a railway contractor and a landed proprietor the former was allowed to take building stone for a viaduct from any part of certain lands, at a certain rate per superficial yard, of whatever depth, the contractor being bound to make good all surface damages, and fill up the quarry when his contract was completed. The contractor opened a quarry near the bank of a river, and in consequence of his operations water flowed into the quarry and thence into an old coal-waste which communicated with going coal-mines on the estate of the same proprietor. The lessee of the minerals brought a process of suspension and interdict, in which the contractor was ordered to execute certain works, and was found liable in the expenses of process. In an action of relief brought by the contractor against the proprietor, held that the agreement was not a lease, and the pursuer was not entitled to be relieved by the proprietor, either of the sums which he had been obliged to expend for the protection of the coal-mines, or of the expenses of the former process. Brand and Son v. Bell's Trustees, Nov. 6, 1872, p. 42.

See Jurisdiction, 5—Process—Statute, 2.

RES JUDICATA. See Teinds, 9.

RETENTION. Payment by Instalments.

Where work was contracted to be done for a price payable by instalments during its progress, and at the sight of an architect, who was appointed arbiter in case of dispute between employer and contractors, and an instalment had been sent, for behoof of a contractor, to the architect, who returned it to the employer, with a request that he would send it direct to the contractor, held that the employer had no right to retain the instalment so sent in extinction of a claim of damages for non-fulfilment of the work, and that it was liable to arrestment in his hands by a creditor of the contractor. Field and Allan v. Gordon, Nov. 23, 1872, p. 132.

See Ship—Arrestment.

REVOCATION. See Husband and Wife, 8—Succession, 4, 18, 24.

RIVER. Pollution—Verdict—Declaratory conclusions—Motion for Decree.

1. Riparian proprietors on a private stream brought an action of declarator and interdict against the owners and tenants of paper-mills on the stream to prevent pollution, and upon issues whether the defenders did by discharging refuse into the stream pollute the same to the nuisance of the pursuers obtained a verdict of a jury in 1866. The defenders thereafter, under an agreement with the pursuers, conducted experiments with a view to abate the nuisance. In 1873 the pursuers moved for decree. Held (1) that they were entitled to declarator; and (2) after a statement by the defenders that they had no proposals to make, that the pursuers were entitled to interdict. Duke of Buccleuch, &c. v. Cowan, &c., June 10, 1873, p. 675.

Servitude.

2. Held that a riparian proprietor, who had, by possession for more than forty years, acquired a right of diverting water from a stream for the use of his mill, was not bound to continue the exercise of this right; but that if he abandoned it and restored the water to its original channel, he was bound to do so in such a manner as not to expose the servient tenement to injury. Bridges v. Lord Saltoun, March 20, 1873, p. 588.

Salmon-Fishing.

3. A and B were owners of salmon-fishings on the north and south sides respectively of a tidal river, the medium filum being the boundary between them. From time immemorial the main stream of the river had flowed in a narrow channel close to the northern bank of the river, in consequence of a gravel bank, partially dry at low water, stretching across the medium filum from the south; and it had been the practice of the proprietor of the northern fishings to repair the bank when injured by extraordinary floods so as to prevent the main channel of the river from being diverted to the injury of his fishing. In a process of declarator and interdict brought by B to prevent A interfering with the operations of nature upon the alveus of the river, held that the original grant as well as the custom of the river implied a right in each proprietor to keep the stream, so far as practicable in its normal state, and that A was entitled to restore the alveus to its normal condition when altered by extraordinary floods. Mather, &c. v. Macbraire, &c., March 14, 1873, p. 522.

RIVER—Continued.

See Fishings.

ROAD. See Statute.

SALE. Delivery—Risk.

1. A person sold a number of carcases of whales in Shetland at a price per ton, to be delivered at the buyers' wharf at Newcastle. The carcases became unfit for use on the voyage. Held that the risk was with the seller, as (1) neither the quantity sold nor the price could be ascertained till delivery; and (2) as the seller had undertaken to deliver at the buyers' wharf. Walker v. Langdales Chemical Company, July 16, 1873, p. 906.

Agreement—Reduction—Fraud—Fraudulent Concealment—Essential Error.

2. Residuary legatees under a settlement brought an action to reduce an agreement between them and other legatees under the settlement, averring that the defenders, taking advantage of the pursuers' ignorance of their rights and the amount of the succession, had by fraudulent misrepresentation and concealment induced the pursuers to agree to give the defenders shares of the residue for a very inadequate consideration. The defenders objected to an issue of fraudulent concealment, on the ground that there was no duty to disclose. Held that in entering upon the contract there was a duty of disclosure incumbent on the defenders, and that the pursuers were entitled to an issue of fraudulent misrepresentation or fraudulent concealment. Dempsters v. Raes, July 1, 1873, p. 843.

SCHOOL. Schoolmaster—Dismissal—24 and 25 Vict. c. 107, sec. 19—1 and 2 Vict. c. 87.

Held that the 19th section of the Parochial and Burgh Schoolmasters (Scotland) Act, 1861, providing for the removal or dismissal of "the schoolmaster of any parish," was not applicable to the case of a schoolmaster of a parliamentary school appointed under 1 and 2 Vict. cap. 87 (1838). Macpherson v. Minister and Heritors of Kilmallie, Jan. 21, 1873, p. 309.

SEA. Crown—Property—Foreshore—Regalia.

1. The crown has a right of property in the foreshore not as being one of the regalia minora, but as a portion of the solum of the country, and may alienate the same, subject to the burden of certain public uses which attach to it, whether held in property by the Crown or by a subject. Agnew v. Lord Advocate, Jan 21, 1873, p. 309.

Property—Foreshore.

2. The right of the public to use the foreshore for purposes of navigation is vested in the Crown as one of the regalia majora. Agnew v. Lord Advocate, Jan. 21, 1873, p. 309.

See Property, 14.

SERVICE. Trust—Trust for Creditors—Radical Right—Conveyance—Heir.

An infeftment on a trust-disposition, bearing to be for behoof of creditors, does not divest the granter of the radical right in the reversion, and his heir cannot complete his title by conveyance from the trustee. Gilmour v. Gilmours, July 3, 1873, p. 853.

See Destination, 6.

SERVITUDE. Thirlage—Usage.

1. In the titles of lands which were thirled to a barony mill the thirl was described as of "the whole grindable corn growing on the said lands except teind and seed corn," or "except teind and horse corn." In a decree-arbitral pronounced in 1787, in a submission entered into between the proprietor of the mill and the proprietors of the lands it was found that the lands were astricted for their whole growing corns, seed and horse corn excepted. Held, upon consideration of the terms of the titles, and of the decree-arbitral and other evidence of usage, that the ambiguous terms "grindable corn" had been construed by usage to mean omnia grana crescentia. Stobbs v. Caven, March 14, 1873, p. 530.

Title to Sue—Jurisdiction—Sheriff—Thirlage—Petitory and Possessory Actions—Statute 1 and 2 Vict. c. 119, sec. 15.

2. Held that an action by the tenant of a mill for abstracted multures, involving a question as to the extent of the thirl, was competent in the Sheriff-court under the 15th section of the Sheriff-court Act, 1838 (1 and 2 Vict. c. 119), being an action relative to a question touching the constitution of a prædial servitude—Lord Deas dissenting, on the ground that the section did not apply, the action not being raised by a person who had a title to try a question relative to the constitution of a heritable right; but holding that it was competent in the Sheriff-court as a possessory action.

Observations (per Lord Deas) on the distinction between petitory and possessory actions.

Question, whether an action of declarator of the constitution of a right of thirlage is competent in the Sheriff-court. Stobbs v. Caven, March 14, 1873, p. 530.

River.

3. Held that a riparian proprietor, who had, by possession for more than forty years, acquired a right of diverting water from a stream for the use of his mill, was not bound to continue the exercise of this right; but that if he abandoned it, and restored the water to its original channel, he was bound to do so in such a manner as not to expose the servient tenement to injury. Bridges v. Lord Saltoun, March 20, 1873, p. 588.

Possession.

4. Observed that the taking of sea-ware for the purpose of making kelp was to be regarded as the exercise of a right of property, and not of servitude. Agnew v. Lord Advocate, Jan. 21, 1873, p. 309.

SETTLEMENT. See Poor.

SHERIFF. Jurisdiction—Servitude—Thirlage—Petitory and Possessory Actions—Title to Sue—Statute 1 and 2 Vict. c. 119, sec. 15.

1. Held that an action by the tenant of a mill for abstracted multures, involving a question as to the extent of the thirl, was competent in the Sheriff-court under the 15th section of the Sheriff-court Act, 1838 (1 and 2 Vict. c. 119), being an action relative to a question touching the constitution of a prædial servitude—Lord Deas dissenting, on the ground that the section did not apply, the action not being raised by a person who had a title to try a question relative to the constitution of a heritable right but holding that it was competent in the Sheriff-court as a possessory action.

Observations (per Lord Deas) on the distinction between petitory and possessory actions.

Question, whether an action of declarator of the constitution of a right of thirlage is competent in the Sheriff-court. Stobbs v. Caven, March 14, 1873, p. 530.

Clerk of Court.

2. Held that it was incompetent for a Sheriff-clerk, or his depute, who was his partner in business, to act as clerk in a process to which the Sheriff clerk was a party.

Observed, that the proper course was to apply to the Sheriff to appoint a clerk to act in his stead for that process. Macbeth v. Innes, Feb. 8, 1873, p. 404.

SHERIFF—Continued.

Appeal—Competency—50 Geo. III. c. 112—16 and 17 Vict. c. 80.

3. By the 36th section of the Act 50 Geo. III. c. 112, it is enacted that bills of advocation from the Sheriffs and other inferior Judges shall be allowed, inter alia, with respect "to an interim decree for partial payment," "provided that leave is given by the inferior Judge."

By the 24th section of the Act 16 and 17 Vict. c. 80, it is enacted that it shall be competent to take to review of the Court of Session, inter alia, "any interlocutor of a Sheriff giving interim decree for payment of money." By the said section it is also enacted that the provisions of the Act 50 Geo. III. c. 112, "are, in so far as inconsistent with this enactment, hereby repealed."

Held (after consultation with the Judges of the Second Division) that it is competent to appeal against an interlocutor of the Sheriff giving interim decree for payment of money, without obtaining his leave. Erskine v. Lang, Dec. 18, 1872, p. 229.

Appeal.

4. An interlocutor by a Sheriff-substitute repelled the defences in an action as irrelevant. The Sheriff on appeal recalled the interlocutor, and allowed the defender a proof before answer of certain averments by the writ or oath of the pursuer. The pursuer having appealed to the Court of Session, held that the Sheriff's interlocutor was not a final judgment within the meaning of the Sheriff-court Act, 1853, section 24, and Court of Session Act, 1868, sections 53, 54, and therefore was not appealable at the instance of the pursuer.

Opinion that the interlocutor was not appealable under the 40th section of the Judicature Act. Shirra v. Robertson, June 7, 1873, p. 660.

Process-Caption—Sheriff-clerk—Sheriff-clerk-depute—Contempt of Court—Damage.

5. A procurator presented a petition to the Sheriff for interdict, and after the Sheriff had pronounced an adverse judgment, carried off the petition, so as to prevent the Sheriff-clerk-depute writing the Sheriff's interlocutor thereon, notwithstanding the Sheriff's intimation that he desired the petition to remain with the clerk. The Sheriff-clerk-depute thereupon carried into execution a warrant in the form of an ordinary process-caption, without any notice or special warning to the procurator, and incarcerated him thereon. In an action for reduction of the said caption, and damages, at the procurator's instance, held (1) (diss. Lord Justice-Clerk) that the course taken by the Sheriff-clerk-depute was inappropriate and irregular; (2) that it was unnecessary to reduce the caption, as no further action could be taken upon it; (3) that the pursuer was not entitled to damages, in respect that it was by his own culpable conduct and contempt of the Sheriff's authority that any warrant against him had been necessary. Watt v. Ligertwood and Another, July 19, 1873, p. 960.

Property—Straightening Marches—Act 1669, c. 17.

6. The procedure laid down in Act 1669, c. 17 (anent enclosing of ground), whereby the Sheriff may be required to visit the marches, is imperative, and cannot be supplied by a remit to a man of skill, even of consent. Lord Advocate v. Sinclair, Nov. 26, 1872, p. 137.

SHIP. Liability of Owners for Master—Merchant Shipping Act, 1854 (17 and 18 Vict. c. 104), sec. 246.

1. Section 246 of the Merchant Shipping Act, 1854, confers on "the master, or any mate, or the owner, ship's-husband, or consignee" of a vessel power to apprehend a seaman who deserts; and provides that, if the apprehension is made on improper or insufficient grounds, the person who makes the same, or causes it to be made, should incur a penalty, which, if inflicted, should "be a bar to any action for false imprisonment in respect of such apprehension." Held that the powers conferred by this section upon masters, &c., were conferred upon them in their individual capacity, and not as acting for the owners, and consequently that the owners were not responsible for any misuse of these powers. O'Neil v. Rankin and Sons, March 18, 1873, p. 538.

SHIP—Continued.

Advance against freight—Charter-party—Insurance.

2. A charter-party contained this clause—"Sufficient cash for ship's ordinary disbursements to be advanced to the master against freight, subject to interest, insurance, and 2½ per cent commission." The charterer made advances to the master, but did not insure the freight, and the vessel was lost on the voyage. In an action raised by the charterer against the owners held (affirming judgment of the Court of Session) that the charterer, having stipulated that he should be entitled to insure freight at the owners' expense to an amount corresponding to the amount of his advances, must be held to have made such insurance a part of his security, and not having effected any such insurance must be held to have relinquished, in the event of the ship being lost, any claim against the owners for repayment.

Question (per Lord Chancellor), whether in ordinary cases advances against freight are recoverable in the event of a loss of the ship and cargo. Watson and Co. v. Shankland et al., May 16, 1873, H. L. p. 51.

Lien for Repairs—Possession.

3. A vessel was placed in a patent slip belonging to a firm of shipbuilders for repair. When certain outside repairs were completed she was removed into a public wet dock, into which the patent slip opened, and the repairs were there completed, the vessel being attached to pawls situated within the premises of the shipbuilders, and lying close to their slip. From time to time she was moved for the convenience of those using the slip and an adjacent crane, this being done at the order of the harbour-master, but chiefly by the shipbuilders' men. During the whole time the master was present in the ship during the day, and at night a ship-keeper. Held (rev. judgment of Lord Gifford) that the lien which the shipbuilders had for the cost of the repairs while the vessel was in their slip ceased when she was removed into the public wet dock, and became subject to the orders of the harbour-master, the power of detention being absolutely necessary to the right of lien. Cooper v. Barr and Shearer, June 6, 1873, p. 651.

Ship-Measurement—Merchant Shipping Act, 1854, sub-sections 4 and 5 of section 21.

4. A ship was constructed with an awning deck above the main or tonnage deck, and separated from the forecastle and poop by two gaps or cuttings extending completely across the vessel, the cuttings being closed by moveable planks or hatches not fastened down or rendered water-tight. Held (1) that the space between the awning deck and main deck was not "a permanent closed-in space on the upper deck available for cargo or stores, or for the berthing or accommodation of passengers or crew," in terms of sub-section 4 of section 21 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1854 (17 and 18 Vict. c. 104); and (2) that the vessel had not "a third deck, commonly called a spar deck," within the meaning of the provisions of sub-section 5 of section 21 of the said Act. Lord Advocate v. The Clyde Steam Navigation Co. Feb. 22, 1873, p. 440.

Ship-Measurement—Merchant Shipping Act, 1854 (17 and 18 Vict. c. 104), sec. 21, sub-sec. 4—Hurricane Deck—Permanent closed-in space.

5. A steamship was constructed with a bridge extending across the vessel and connected with the bulwarks on either side, and below the bridge at its centre there was a small round house. A hurricane deck or covering was subsequently added, extending from the forecastle to the bridge. The space below this covering was not entirely closed in, there being a passage on either side of the round house, and no means for closing these passages in. It being proved that this hurricane deck did not prevent the shipment of seas, and that the working of the ship was almost entirely conducted on the main deck, held (by Lord Gifford) that the space below the hurricane deck was not "a closed-in space on the upper deck available for cargo or stores, or for the berthing or accommodation of passengers or crew," within the meaning of sub-section 4 of section 21 of the Merchant Shipping Act, 1854, and therefore did not fall to be included in the measurement of the ship. Leith, Hull, and Hamburg Steam-Packet Co. v. Lord Advocate, March 20, 1873, p. 597.

SHIP—Continued.

SLANDER. See Issue—Reparation.

SPECIAL CASE. See Process, 3, 4.

STATUTE. Expenses—Procurator-Fiscal—Statutes 20 and 21 Vict. c. 148 (Local) (Tweed Fisheries Act, 1857), sec. 82; 31 and 32 Vict. c. 123 (Tweed Fisheries (Scotland) Act, 1868), secs. 18, 38, and 41; 27 and 28 Vict. c. 53 (Summary Procedure (Scotland) Act, 1864, sec. 22.

1. The Tweed Fisheries Act, 1857, authorises an award of expenses against a person convicted of an offence under the Act.

The Summary Procedure Act, 1864, provides that expenses shall not be awarded to or against any public procurator or party prosecuting under the authority of any Act of Parliament for the public interest, unless such award of expenses is authorised by such Act.

Held that the former Act by implication authorised an award of expenses against a procurator-fiscal when the person accused was acquitted, and therefore that the provision of the Summary Procedure Act did not prohibit it. Walker v. Bathgate, July 19, 1873, p. 956.

Reparation—Culpa—Machinery—Factory Acts, 7 and 8 Vict. c. 15, sec. 21; 19 and 20 Vict. c. 38, sec. 4.

2. The Act 7 and 8 Vict. c. 15, requires all parts of the mill gearing in a factory to be securely fenced.

The Act 19 and 20 Vict. c. 38, limits the obligation to fencing those parts of the mill gearing "with which children and young persons and women are liable to come in contact, either in passing or in their ordinary occupations in the factory."

Held that there is still an obligation to fence such mill gearing as is accessible to women and children, and not merely such as they are liable to come in contact with in the regular course of their employment.

Question as to the age at which a person can be guilty of contributory negligence. Traills v. Small and Boase, July 4, 1873, p. 888.

Glasgow Police Act, 1866 (29 and 30 Vict. c. cclxxxiii)—Dean of Guild.

3. By the Glasgow Police Act, 1866, sec. 384, the Master of Works may by notice require any proprietor of lands and heritages to fence the same, and a form of notice is provided to which the proprietors may lodge objections, to be disposed of by the Dean of Guild or Magistrate. Upon failure to comply with the notice, or with the order of the Dean of Guild or Magistrate, the Procurator-Fiscal in the Dean of Guild Court may by sec. 325 enforce the same by applying to the Dean of Guild for a warrant to execute the work therein specified . . . . and the Dean of Guild may grant a warrant to execute such work, and shall thereafter ascertain and fix the cost thereof, and decern against the proprietor or proprietors to whom notice was given for the proportion of such cost due by them. Held, in an application requiring the owner of a mill-lade to fence it, (1) that it was irrelevant to allege as a defence that the mill-lade ran alongside of a public road, the trustees vested with which were bound and had been in use to fence it; and (2) that, after the failure of the defenders to comply with the notice, the Dean of Guild had erred in ordaining the proprietor to fence the mill-lade, and that a warrant ought to have been granted to the Master of Works to fence the mill-lade, after which the Dean of Guild should fix and decern for the cost thereof. Lang v. Bruce, Feb. 5, 1873, p. 377.

STATUTE—Continued.

Police Commissioners—Property—Improvement of Street—Solum of Street.

4. The Aberdeen Police and Water-Works Act, 1862, authorised the commissioners under it to "allow, upon such terms as they think fit, any building within the limits of this Act to be set forward for improving the line of the street in which such building or any building adjacent thereto is situated." Held, in a question between two neighbouring proprietors in a street, that this clause authorised the police commissioners, within reasonable limits, to allow proprietors to build beyond the limits of their property upon the solum of the street. Michie's Trustees v. Grant and Others, Nov. 8, 1872, p. 51.

Police—General Police Act—Statute 25 and 26 Vict. c. 101 (General Police and Improvements (Scotland) Act, 1862), secs. 3, 150, 396, 397—Private Street.

5. A piece of ground within a burgh, which had been originally intended to form a continuation of a street, and had been enclosed by walls marking out the line of the intended street, was held by three joint proprietors, whose titles conferred right on any one of their number at any time to insist upon it being thrown open as a public thoroughfare. It was used as an access to workshops and yards belonging to the several joint proprietors, and occupied by various tenants. For a long time it was shut off from the street of which it formed a continuation by a wall with a locked gate therein; the wall was, however, broken down and the gate removed about fourteen years before the present action, but the ground was never thrown open as a public thoroughfare. The General Police and Improvement Act having been adopted in the burgh, the Police Commissioners, after giving the statutory notice, caused a portion of the ground to be paved. Held, in an action at the instance of two of the joint proprietors against the Police Commissioners, that the ground was a private street in the sense of sec. 3 of the Act, and as such fell under the regulations of the Act applicable to private streets, and that consequently the pursuers, who had failed to object to the execution of the work in the manner prescribed by the Act, were barred from complaining thereof. Millar's Trustees, &c. v. Leith Police Commissioners, July 19, 1873, p. 932.

Edinburgh and Leith Sewerage Act, 1864, sec. 47—General Police and Improvement (Scotland) Act, 1862, sec. 3—Supplementary Assessment—Owner—Sequestration.

6. The 47th section of the Edinburgh and Leith Sewerage Act, 1864, enacts that "the owners of all lands, &c. any sewer, outfall, or drain from which shall, after construction of the said main and branch sewers and works, be connected with the same, shall be liable in payment to the commissioners of a reasonable sum of money for the use of the said main or branch sewers;" and the 3d section of the General Police (Scotland) Act, 1862, incorporated therewith, declares that the word "owner" shall include joint owner, &c., "or other person in the actual possession or receipt of the rents of tenements," &c. Held that a trustee in a sequestration was "owner" of the bankrupt's property in the sense of the 47th section, and that the commissioners were not bound to claim in the sequestration an assessment, which had been imposed before the bankruptcy, the trustee being bound to pay it as a condition of his taking possession of the property, or drawing the rents. Macknight v. Oman's Trustees, Nov. 29, 1872, p. 154.

Edinburgh Tramways Act, 1871, 34 and 35 Vict. c. lxxxix.—General Tramways Act, 1870, 33 and 34 Vict. c. 78, sec. 9—Provisional Order.

7. The Edinburgh Tramways Company were authorised by their special Act and relative plans to lay a double line of tramways in a certain street which at its widest part was not broad enough to afford a clear space of 9 feet 6 inches between the footpath on each side and the nearest rail. By an agreement incorporated with the special Act the whole provisions of the General Tramways Act, 1870, were made to apply as fully as if the special Act had been a provisional order obtained under the General Act. The General Act autho- rised the Board of Trade to grant provisional orders, which should only become effectual when confirmed by an Act of Parliament, and provided (sec. 9)—"No tramway shall be authorised by any provisional order to be so laid that for a distance of 30 feet or upwards a less space than 9 feet and 6 inches shall intervene between the outside of the footpath on either side of the road and the nearest rail of the tramway, if one-third of the owners, or one-third of the occupiers of the houses, shops, or warehouses abutting upon the part of the road where such less space shall intervene as aforesaid shall, in the prescribed manner, and at the prescribed time, express their dissent from any tramway being so laid."

STATUTE—Continued.

One-third of the occupiers of houses in the said street having applied for interdict against the formation of any line of tramway within 9 feet 6 inches of the footpath, as specified in sec. 9, held (rev. judgment of the First Division) that the objection was incompetent, on the ground that the special Act was to be regarded as a provisional order confirmed by Parliament, and that sec. 9 applied merely to the granting of orders by the Board of Trade, and not to their construction when granted and confirmed by Parliament. Edinburgh Tramways Co. v. Black, &c. (in Court of Session Feb. 21, 1873, p. 418), July 8, 1873, H. L. p. 57.

Plans—Sections.

8. When an Act of Parliament authorises works to be constructed in accordance with deposited plans and sections, these are incorporated with the Act. Edinburgh Tramways Co. v. Black, &c., July 8, 1873, H. L. p. 57.

SUCCESSION. Collation between Heir and Executor.

1. Held that when an heir who is also one of the next of kin of an intestate dies without having collated the heritage with the other next of kin his representatives are not entitled to a share of the moveable estate when they cannot collate the heritage. Newbigging's Trustees v. Steel's Trustees, Feb. 20, 1873, p. 411.

Vesting—Collation between Heir and Executor.

2. Opinion (per Lord Ardmillan), that the right of an heir, being one of the next of kin, is not that of a person primarily entitled to both moveable and heritable estate, but is a primary right to heritage which he may extend by collation so as to obtain a share of the moveables. Newbigging's Trustees v. Steel's Trustees, Feb. 20, 1873, p. 411.

Legacy—Liferent and Fee—Trust.

3. A trust-settlement directed the trustees "to pay" a legacy to a lady, "to be settled by my said trustees on herself and her issue, with power to her of disposal in case of no issue, and failing issue and disposal by her, to return to her own heirs, excluding those of her husband." Held, at a date when the legatee was forty-two years of age, and had been for several years married and had no children (1) that the legatee was not entitled to have the legacy paid to herself absolutely; and (2) in order to give effect to the expressed intention of the truster, the trustees were bound to invest the money and to take the securities in the name of the legatee in fee, exclusive of the jus mariti of her husband, and after her death to any children she might have also in fee, subject to the condition that the children's right of succession should not be defeated by any gratuitous act of the legatee, and failing children, to the heirs of the legatee, excluding those of her husband. Massy v. Scott's Trustees, Dec. 5, 1872, p. 173.

Mutual Disposition—Revocation.

4. A person having purchased certain subjects took the disposition to himself and his wife in conjunct fee and liferent, for her liferent use allenarly, and to himself and his heirs and assignees in fee. Thereafter the husband and wife executed a mortis causa disposition containing the following clause:—"Reserving always to us during our joint lives our own liferent right and use of the premises, with full power to us at any period during our joint lives to alter, innovate, or revoke these presents in whole or in part." Held that the husband, being absolute fiar under the first deed, was entitled to revoke the mutual disposition after his wife's death. Stiven v. Brown's Trustees, Jan. 10, 1873, p. 261.

SUCCESSION—Continued.

Conditional Institution—Substitution.

5. A person conveyed a heritable subject to his children "equally among them, and the lawful issue of their bodies, and failing any of them by death, without lawful issue of their bodies, to the survivors equally." Held that this was a conditional institution of the grandchildren, and not a substitution. Stiven v. Brown's Trustees, Jan. 10, 1873, p. 261.

Testament—Construction—Heir-at-law—Next of Kin.

6. A testatrix directed her trustees to sell certain heritable property particularly described, and her whole other means and estate, heritable and moveable, and after payment of legacies, &c., to pay over the residue "to my heir-at-law, whom failing, to my next of kin."

In a competition between cousins of testatrix claiming as her next of kin and a cousin's child claiming as her heir-at-law, held (rev. judgment of Lord Ormidale), that by the term "heir-at-law" the testatrix did not mean to denote her heirs in mobilibus, but her heir in heritage. Sillars' Trustees v. Stewart and Others, Nov. 29, 1872, p. 160.

Testament—Universitas—Heir.

7. A truster left his property "to my own nearest heirs and assignees whomsoever in and through my mother, hereby excluding the relations by my father, and all others except through my said mother." Held (1) that the estate was not intended to pass as a universitas to his mother's next of kin, but that his mother's heir-at-law succeeded to the heritage and her heirs in moveables to the moveables; and (2) that although part of the property was conquest in the truster the mother's heir of line, not her heir of conquest, succeeded. Mitchell's Trustees v. Waddell, &c., Dec. 7, 1872, p. 206.

Testament—Titles to Land Act, 1868, 31 and 32 Vict. c. 101, sec. 20.

8. A person who carried on the business of an innkeeper, in premises of which he held a long lease, left testamentary writings in these terms:—"I do hereby bequiath, in event of my death before my wife H. E., the whole of property ether in money, bonds, debets, bussness, and other affects whatsoever, ... and I appoint H. E., my wife, heir and executor of this my last will and testament." Held (diss. Lord Ardmillan) that the words could not be so construed as to include the lease of the inn. Edmond v. Edmond, Jan. 30, 1873, p. 348.

Testament—Confusion.

9. The proprietrix of lands held of the Crown, subject to certain duties payable in kind to a donatary of the Crown, executed a mortis causa trust-settlement, in which she directed her trustees to hold the said lands for certain charitable purposes, and to convey to certain persons named "all such lands, houses, or other heritable subjects, of whatever nature or denomination the same may be, which I may acquire or succeed to after the date of these presents." The testatrix subsequently obtained by purchase a disposition from the crown donatary of the said duties, on which she was infeft. Held that the duties thus acquired were not to be regarded as a separate heritable subject from the land in the sense of the trust-deed. Dennison v. Fea's Trustees, Feb. 6, 1873, p. 392.

Testament—Legacy—Annuity.

10. A testator appointed his trustees to pay to his widow an annuity of £1000 a-year in lieu of her legal rights and of her claims under an antenuptial marriage-contract, and disposed of the rest of his estate in legacies, some of which he directed to be paid within three months after his death, and others after the death of his widow. The income of the trust-estate was not sufficient to pay the annuity. Held that the annuity was preferable to the legacies of which payment had been postponed, and that the widow was entitled to have it paid in full, whether the revenue of the trust-estate yielded that amount or not. Kinmond's Trustees v. Kinmond, Feb. 5, 1873, p. 381.

SUCCESSION—Continued.

Testament—Annuity—Statute 33 and 34 Vict. c. 35 (Apportionment Act, 1870).

11. A testator left an annuity of £200 to his sister "during all the days and years of her life," payable in equal portions at Whitsunday and Martinmas, "commencing the first year's payment" at the first term after his death. He died on 9th November 1866. She survived till 27th October 1871, having received five years' payments of the annuity during the four years and eleven months of her survivance. Her representatives maintained that the testator's direction to make a year's payment at the first term after his death was intended to cover the half year current at the date of his death, and that the annuitant had thus only received four and a half years' payment of the annuity, and was entitled to a proportion for the half year current at the date of her death. Held that the testator's intention was that the sister should receive payment for the period during which she should survive him at the rate of £200 per annum, and that she had received full payment. Cuninghame's Trustees v. Duke et al., March 18, 1873, p. 543.

Heir and Executor—Annuity—Tract of Future Time.

12. A testator conveyed his whole estate of every description to trustees, for the purposes of entailing a certain estate on a series of heirs, of realising his other estate, heritable and moveable, of fulfilling and discharging the obligations contained in his antenuptial marriage-contract, of paying legacies, and, lastly, of paying the residue to certain persons. Held that an annuity payable to the testator's widow under his marriage-contract was due out of the residue, and was not a burden on the entailed estate. Gordon v. Scott, Jan. 22, 1873, p. 334.

Testament—Vesting—Power.

13. A truster directed his trustees to pay the free yearly interest of the residue of his estate to his widow, and on her death to make over the fee to his two sisters and three nephews, and the heirs of their bodies, in such proportions as his widow should appoint, failing such appointment, to the beneficiaries equally, the share of any nephew dying without issue, or of either sister who should die without settling, or should predecease, the same to be divided equally among the survivors and their issue. One of the sisters survived the testator but predeceased the widow, leaving a settlement of, inter alia, her share of the fee of her brother's estate. Held (1) that the fee did not vest till the death of the truster's widow; and (2) that the terms of the trust-deed did not authorise the truster's sister to settle her share of the fee until it had vested. Smith's Trustees v. Graham and Others, May 29, 1873, p. 630.

Legacy—Trust.

14. A testator, in his settlement, directed his trustees to divide and pay over the fee of the residue of his estate to and among his whole children, including his daughters, "declaring that the provisions therein made in favour of females shall be purely alimentary to them, and not alienable or assignable, and shall be exclusive of the jus mariti and right of administration" of husbands, and not affectable by their own or such husbands' debts or deeds. Held that as there was a clear direction to the trustees to pay to the beneficiaries who were alone interested, and as the Court could not consistently therewith create a trust, which was the only mode of rendering the daughters' provisions inalienable, the daughters were entitled to receive payment on their own receipts; but that the receipts should bear exclusion of the jus mariti and right of administration. Allan's Trustees v. Allan and Others, Dec. 12, 1872, p. 216.

*Inventory-Duty—*23 and 24 Vict. c. 80*—Discharge—Confusion—Entail.*

15. The proprietrix of an estate under a deed of entail granted a bond of annualrent for improvement outlay under the Montgomery Act in favour of herself, her "heirs, executors, successors, and assignees," on which bond

SUCCESSION—Continued.

Vesting—Alimentary Provision.

22. By trust-disposition and settlement a father conveyed his whole property to trustees, and in particular he assigned to them the leases of four farms, which leases had different periods of endurance. He directed them to carry on the management of these farms, and, after payment of his debts, to divide yearly the annual profits of the farms among his children, and on the expiry of the respective leases to realise and divide the crop and stocking in the same way; declaring also that the annual profits should not be assignable or attachable for the debts of the children, and that the issue of children predeceasing should succeed to their deceased parents' shares. Held (1) that the provisions in favour of the children vested a morte testatoris both as regarded the crop and stocking of the farms and the annual profits; and (2) that the children's shares in the annual profits, though inalienable and unassignable during their lives, might be assigned by deeds to take effect after death. Elliot v. Bowhill, &c., June 21, 1873, p. 735.

Legacy—Cumulative Provisions.

23. A father in his daughter's antenuptial marriage-contract bound himself to pay at his death a sum of £1000 to her marriage-contract trustees. He afterwards executed a trust-disposition and settlement, by which he directed his trustees to pay his debts, and divide the residue of his estate equally among his children. Held that the provision in the marriage-contract was a debt due by the deceased, and was not to be deducted from the daughter's share of residue. Elliot v. Bowhill, &c., June 21, 1873, p. 735.

Testament—Revocation.

24. A testator left a holograph testament containing a nomination of executors and a disposal of his whole means among certain legatees, along with another signed holograph writing of subsequent date, commencing "I desire to bequeath as follows," and containing bequests and annuities to nearly the same parties as were mentioned in the first writing. It concluded, "balance left for further disposal;" but no other deed was discovered. Both writings were found in the testator's travelling bag. Held (1) that the second writing was a testamentary writing; and (2) that it did not revoke the first writing, but that both must be read as one writing. Low's Executors and Others, June 21, 1873, p. 744.

Legacy—Uncertainty.

25. Bequests to "charities in Glasgow, £1000. Do. Abdn., £1000"—held void from uncertainty. Low's Executors and Others, June 21, 1873, p. 744.

Heir and Executor—Tract of Future Time—Testament—Relief.

26. A person properly executed an entail of certain lands, binding himself, his heirs, executors, and successors whomsoever, to free and relieve these lands of all his debts and obligations. Thereafter, by antenuptial contract of marriage, the entailer settled upon his spouse, in the event of her surviving him, an annuity secured over the entailed lands, but with power to himself, his heirs, executors, and successors, to purchase in lieu thereof an annuity from an insurance company, in which case the widow was bound to discharge the entailed estate. Held, on a construction of the two deeds (rev. judgment of the First Division), that the obligation in the first deed to relieve the entailed estate of the granter's debts and obligations applied to the annuity with which the estate was burdened by the second deed, and that the heir of entail was entitled to be relieved of the annuity out of the entailer's general trust-estate. Mackintosh v. Mackintosh's Trustees, May 19, 1873, H. L. p. 28.

Heritable and Moveable—Bequest of Interest—Tract of Future Time.

27. Held that a legacy of the annual interest for a series of years of a capital sum bequeathed to another legatee was a moveable right in the person of the legatee and of his heir in mobilibus, and that, on the death of the latter, his mother was entitled to participate in future payments of interest to the extent of a third under the Moveable Succession Act of 1855. Hill v. Hill, Dec. 21, 1872, p. 247.

SUCCESSION—Continued.

Husband and Wife—Trust-disposition—Revocation.

28. By mutual trust-disposition and settlement a husband and wife, who had no antenuptial marriage-contract, disponed to trustees the whole property, heritable and moveable, which should belong to them or either of them at the death of the first deceaser, with directions that upon that event the trustees should take an inventory of the whole estate, and should hold one-half thereof subject to the liferent of the survivor for behoof of the relatives of the first deceaser. The spouses reserved full power to alter the deed during their joint lives, and the wife declared the provisions in her favour to be in full of her legal claims. Held that the trust-deed was not revocable by the surviving husband, and that the right of the relatives of the wife vested in them at her death. Kerr v. Ure, &c., June 28, 1873, p. 780.

General Settlement—Approbate and Reprobate—Negative Prescription.

29. A father executed a trust-deed for payment of certain debts and regulating his succession in fraudem of his antenuptial marriage-contract, and to the prejudice of the heir of the marriage, and afterwards another trust-deed, the two forming together a complete settlement of his whole estate, heritable and moveable. The heir made up a title under the marriage-contract, and under it possessed the lands contained in the first trust-deed, and took benefit under the second deed, but in ignorance of the existence of the first trust-deed. Held that his trustees and executors were not barred by the negative prescription from challenging the earlier deed, but were entitled to elect either to abide by his approbation of his father's settlement or to renounce and restore the benefit he had taken, and challenge the first deed. Earl of Glasgow's Trustee v. Earl of Glasgow, &c., Dec. 13, 1872, p. 218.

Trust-Settlement—Codicil—Construction.

30. A truster conveyed his unentailed lands and property, heritable and moveable, to trustees, and directed them, in the third place, for the period of twenty years after his death, to invest and accumulate the whole free rents and proceeds of the trust-estate, and to employ the funds so invested in the purchase of lands. In the fifth place, the truster directed the trustees, at the termination of the twenty years, to settle the estates conveyed by the trust-deed, and the lands purchased by them, in strict entail upon the truster's son and his heirs-male, whom failing, upon the heirs entitled to succeed to the truster's entailed estate. In a codicil the truster directed that the trustees, "instead of investing the free rents of my unentailed estate in manner before mentioned, shall annually pay over the whole free proceeds of the same to my two daughters, equally between them, while both shall be in life, and to the survivor, and shall continue to do the same as long as both or either of them shall be alive." Held that provisions in the codicil in favour of the truster's daughters were not limited to the period of twenty years after the truster's death. Breadalbane's Trustees v. Jamieson, &c., July 16, 1873, p. 912.

See Destination—Entail, 5, 6, 7—Heir.

SUMMARY PROCEDURE ACT. See Process.

SUPERIOR AND VASSAL. Feu-Contract.

1. A superior bound his vassal to build and maintain on his feu a house of a certain value, and reserved to himself the minerals, with power to work them at pleasure, and to remove as much stone, &c., as might be necessary for the proper working of the minerals, it being expressly agreed that he should not be liable for any damage to the vassal that might happen through the working of the coal, &c., by longwall workings or otherwise. Held (reversing judgment of the Second Division) that the vassal was not entitled to an interdict against the superior working the minerals under his house on the ground that the workings would probably injure or destroy it. Buchanan, &c. v. Andrew, March 10, 1873, H. L. p. 13.

SUPERIOR AND VASSAL—Continued.

Property—Title—Precept of Clare Constat—Minerals—Reservation.

2. A was infeft upon a feu-contract by which certain lands were conveyed to him without reservation of mines and minerals. Upon A's death his son B was infeft in the lands upon a precept of clare constat, which contained an express exception and reservation of the mines and minerals to the superior. Upon B's death his son C, having been infeft in the said lands, sold them. Subsequently D, having served heir in special in the mines and minerals to A, brought an action of declarator of his right to them against the superior and the proprietors of the dominium utile of the lands, on the ground that they still remained in hæreditate jacente of A. Held that the exception and reservation of mines and minerals in the precept of clare constat was inept, and did not limit the precept as a warrant for infeftment in the fee of the lands, and therefore that there was nothing in hæreditate jacente of A which D by service to him could take up. Boyd v. Bruce and Others, Dec. 20, 1872, p. 243.

Writ of Confirmation—(Titles to Land Consolidation Act, 1868), secs. 10, 98, 100—Private Act, 6 Geo. IV., c. xxviii.

3. By a private Act of Parliament the proprietor of an entailed estate had power, under certain conditions, to feu the estate, the Act providing that the conditions should be inserted in all subsequent investitures, and that the heir omitting to do so should incur an irritancy. Held (diss. Lord Deas, aff. judgment of Lord Mure) that notwithstanding the provisions of the 10th, 98th, and 100th sections of the Titles to Land Consolidation Act, 1868, a feuar was not entitled to object to a writ of confirmation which deviated from the statutory form by the insertion of a clause declaring that the writ was granted under the conditions specified in the Act of Parliament. Lauder v. Shiels, May 17, 1873, p. 605.

Mid-superiority.

4. A, who was mid-superior of certain lands, conveyed the mid-superiority to B, the proprietor of the dominium utile, by a disposition containing an a me manner of holding, and B was infeft thereon. Thereafter A granted to B another disposition of the mid-superiority, bearing to be in supplement of the former disposition, and containing an a me vel de me manner of holding, and B was infeft on this also. The over-superior granted a deed confirming both these dispositions, and the infeftments following upon them. Held that the two dispositions were to be read together as one conveyance of the mid-superiority, and were both confirmed as one estate. Duke of Argyll v. Dalgleish's Trustees, May 23, 1873, p. 616.

TEINDS. Valuation—Rental Bolls—Consent of Titular and Heritors.

1. A sub-commission for the valuation of the teinds in a parish authorised the sub-commissioners to give effect to the practice of payments by rental bolls when the parties consented thereto. In 1629 a report by the sub-commissioners set forth that the parson, who was titular of three-fourths of the teinds of the parish, and tacksman of the remaining fourth, and all the heritors, had consented to the valuation by rental bolls, except the proprietor of the lands of A. The bishop, who was titular of the said remaining fourth, was not directly represented.

In an approbation, brought after the lapse of two hundred years, by the proprietor of A, the titular objected to the valuation as having proceeded without the consent of all the titulars and heritors. Held (1) that the titularity had been sufficiently represented by the parson, as titular and tacksman; (2) that the silence of the proprietor of A was not a valid objection to the valuation. Ainslie and Co. v. The Officers of State, Jan. 7, 1873, p. 260.

Locality—Valuation—Surrender—Prescription.

2. By a final decree of locality in 1817 the lands of a heritor were localled on for stipend to the extent of £40, being the full amount of the teinds taken at one-fifth of the proven rental. In 1863 the heritor obtained a decree of valuation of his teinds, which fixed them at £32, and subsequently obtained a decree of reduction of the decree of locality, qualified by the condition that it should subsist as the interim rule of payment of stipend until a new decree of locality was obtained.

TEINDS—Continued.

In a subsequent locality, held, in a question between the heritor and the minister, that the former was not precluded by the forty years' payments of £40 from surrendering his teind at the sum fixed by the decree of valuation.

Question, whether the reduction of the former decree of locality was necessary.

Observations on the Locality of Maderty, July 9, 1817, F. C. Chisholm-Batten v. Cameron, Jan. 16, 1873, p. 292.

Sub-valuation—Approbation—Reduction—Decree in Absence.

3. Held that it was competent for a heritor who had in absence obtained decree of approbation of a sub-valuation of the teinds of his lands to bring a reduction of the same, on the ground of its being disconform to the sub-commissioners' report, on which it bore to proceed. M'Neill's Trustees v. Campbell, Dec. 9, 1872, p. 211.

Locality—Valuation.

4. In two successive localities the teinds of certain lands were localled on for more than the just proportion of each augmentation, in consequence of a previous decree of valuation not being produced; and the stipend so localled was paid by the heritor. In a subsequent locality the decree of valuation was produced. Held that as under the previous decrees of locality the heritor must continue to pay more of the old stipend than was justly due in localling the augmentation, she should be localled on for so much less of the augmentation. Robertson v. Macknight, Feb. 6, 1873, p. 389.

Valuation—Prescription.

5. Held (aff. judgment of the Teind-Court) that a decree of valuation of teinds was not a title under which a proprietor could by prescriptive possession acquire a right to teinds of lands not originally included in the valuation. Paterson v. Macleod, July 10, 1873, H. L., p. 62.

Valuation—Presumption.

6. Circumstances in which held that terms of a report of sub-commissioners of teinds in 1629, decree of approbation thereof in 1785 and 1786, and relative scheme of division, and the proceedings in a process of augmentation in 1800, raised the presumption that the whole lands in a parish had been valued in 1629, but that this presumption had been overcome by proof that certain lands were not included in the valuation. Paterson v. Macleod, July 10, 1873, H. L., p. 62.

Minister's Stipend.

7. Held that a proprietor who has a bare superiority over lands, or one who has a security right over lands on which no possession has followed, and who has not intromitted with the fruits, is not liable for minister's stipend.

Opinion that it is not necessary to enable a minister to use his decree of locality against a possessor of lands localled on that the possessor's name should appear in the locality.

Opinion that a proprietor whose name appears in the decree of locality ceases to be liable for stipend when he ceases to be proprietor. Jackson v. Cochrane, Feb. 27, 1873, p. 475.

Valuation and Approbation—Prescription—Derelinquishment—Surrender.

8. (1) When for more than forty years payments of stipend in excess of sub-valuations of lands had been made under final decrees of locality, pronounced prior to decree of approbation, held that the minister had acquired right to have these payments continued.

(2) When under a decree of locality payments of stipend in excess of the value of teinds fixed by previous sub-valuation and decree of approbation had been made for more than forty years, held that the minister had not acquired right to have these payments continued.

TEINDS—Continued.

(3) Where payments of stipend in excess of a subvaluation of lands had been made for more than forty years under a final decree of locality, and the sub-valuation had been abandoned, and a decree of valuation of the High Court obtained, held (dub. Lord Deas) that the decree of the High Court fixed the amount of the teind, and that the minister had no right to have the overpayments continued.

(4) Where a minister has acquired a right to overpayments of teind in excess of decrees of approbation of sub-valuation, held that the heritor could not surrender his teinds.

Observations on the case of Maderty, 9th July 1817, F. C. Colquhoun v. Fogo, July 18, 1873, p. 919.

Locality—Res Judicata.

9. Held that a judgment in a question between two heritors given effect to by a final locality was res judicata in a subsequent locality in a question between the common agent and one of these heritors. City of Edinburgh v. Montgomery, Oct. 16, 1872, p. 14.

Locality—Old Stipend.

10. Opinion (per Lord Cowan) that when an augmentation of stipend is granted, the allocation of the old stipend remains fixed, and falls to be taken as the first step in the new locality. City of Edinburgh v. Montgomery, Oct. 16, 1872, p. 14.

Locality.

11. In a process of locality, a heritor whose teinds were not valued for stipend was localled upon an admitted rental of £409. In a subsequent locality he alleged that the rental was now less, and that the teinds were exhausted. The Court held that the heritor was entitled to a proof of his averment that the rental was diminished. City of Edinburgh v. Montgomery, Oct. 16, 1872, p. 14.

Locality.

12. Teinds had belonged to a priory before the Reformation, had never been erected into a temporal lordship, but after the Reformation were held in commendam by laymen until 1612, when they were regularly united to a bishopric. They were inalienable in the hands of the bishop before the submissions to King Charles I. in 1627 and 1628, and fell to the Crown on the abolition of Episcopacy in 1689. Held, in a locality, that these were bishops' teinds in the hands of the Crown and entitled to be postponed to teinds held on heritable right. Lord Advocate v. Earl of Galloway, and Hathorn, July 11, 1873, p. 896.

Valuation.

13. A parson who was titular of three-fourths of the whole teinds of his parish, and tacksman of the other fourth, called the bishop's fourth, appeared and consented to a subvaluation according to the whole rental bolls. Held that the titularity had been sufficiently represented, and that it was not a valid objection to the valuation that the bishop had not been called. M'Neill's Trustees v. Campbell, Dec. 9, 1872, p. 211.

Proving the Tenor.

14. A report of the sub-commissoners appointed for the valuation of the stock and teind of the lands within the presbytery of Argyll, dated in 1629, had been repeatedly given effect to in approbations and localities. Part of the original document had become illegible, apparently from damp, and part appeared to have been worn away. A copy of the entire document, supposed to be made about 1720, was preserved in the teind office, but the writer was not known. From this copy, which was not in all respects a faithful transcript, the deficiencies in the original could be supplied. In an action of proving the tenor of a portion of that part of the report which had been destroyed, held (1) that in the circumstances no special casus amissionis need be proved, and (2) that the tenor had been sufficiently instructed by the proceedings in the localities, &c., together with the copy produced. Duke of Argyll v. Campbell, May 17, 1873, p. 611.

TESTAMENT. See Succession, 10.

TITLE TO SUE. See Jurisdiction.

TRACT OF FUTURE TIME. Heir and Executor.

1. A testator conveyed his whole estate of every description to trustees, for the purposes of entailing a certain estate on a series of heirs, of realising his other estate, heritable and moveable, of fulfilling and discharging the obligations contained in his antenuptial marriage-contract, of paying legacies, and, lastly, of paying the residue to certain persons. Held that an annuity payable to the testator's widow under his marriage-contract was due out of the residue, and was not a burden on the entailed estate. Gordon v. Scott, Jan. 22, 1873, p. 334.

Heritable and Moveable—Bequest of Interest.

2. Held that a legacy of the annual interest for a series of years of a capital sum bequeathed to another legatee was a moveable right in the person of the legatee and of his heir in mobilibus, and that, on the death of the latter, his mother was entitled to participate in future payments of interest to the extent of a third under the Moveable Succession Act of 1855. Hill v. Hill, Dec. 21, 1872, p. 247.

TRADE MARK. Maker's name.

The manufacturer of a sewing machine of a certain construction, which was not patented, had been in use to sell it, under his own name, for a series of years, and the name had thus obtained an exclusive meaning in the trade as signifying a machine of his manufacture. Held that the name had become the property of the manufacturer as a trade mark, and that no one else was entitled to use it. Singer Manufacturing Co. v. Kimball and Morton, Jan. 14, 1873, p. 267.

TRUST. Trust for Creditors—Radical Right—Conveyance—Service—Heir.

1. An infeftment on a trust-disposition, bearing to be for behoof of creditors, does not divest the granter of the radical right in the reversion. His heir cannot complete his title by conveyance from the trustee. Gilmour v. Gilmours, July 3, 1873, p. 853.

Legacy—Discretion of Trustees.

2. A testator left legacies to each of his nieces, to be paid "when my trustees shall find it suitable and convenient to pay the same, and which shall be so secured to said children as my trustees may consider best for their welfare and benefit . . . . which . . . . legacies . . . . are hereby specially provided and given for the liferent alimentary use of my . . . . legatees, exclusive of the jus mariti of their husbands;" "and further declaring that the simple receipt and discharge of my said legatees, without the consent or concurrence of their respective husbands, shall be a sufficient exoneration, acquittance, and discharge to my trustees for said . . . . . legacies." Held that although the trust-estate was in a condition conveniently to pay the legacies the trustees were not bound to make immediate payment to the daughters of the sums bequeathed. Cuninghame's Trustees v. Duke et al., March 18, 1873, p. 543.

Sale of Trust-estate—Trusts (Scotland) Act, 1867 (30 and 31 Vict. cap. 97, sec. 3).

3. The Trusts Act, 1867, sec. 3, empowers the Court of Session to grant authority to trustees to sell the trust-estate, or part thereof, "on being satisfied that the same is expedient for the execution of the trust, and not inconsistent with the intention thereof." A truster directed his trustees to hold certain estates for payment of his debts, and in any event for twenty-one years, and for payment of an annuity, also secured by a separate bond, to his nephew, upon whom, and a series of heirs, they were directed to entail the estates when the debt should all be paid off. The trustees were expressly forbidden to sell any part of the landed estates in question. At the truster's death the annual burdens and interest of debts exceeded the rental by £106. Held (rev. judgment of Lord Gifford) that the Act did not authorise the Court to grant authority to sell any part of the estate. Hay's Trustees v. Hay Miln, June 13, 1873, p. 694.

TRUST—Continued.

Fee and Liferent—Residue—Advances to Children.

4. A testator directed his trustees to hold the residue of his estate for his son in liferent and his children in fee, the children's shares to be paid to them, if under age, at their father's death, or on attaining majority, and, in the case of daughters, on attaining majority or marriage. It was further provided in the trust-deed "that until the respective terms of payment of the said shares, the said trustees, after the death of both parents," should have full power to pay the interest of the trust-estate to the children, or to make advances to them out of the capital for furthering their prospects in life. The son, on his death, left a widow and two pupil children. Held (1) that the son's widow was not entitled to a liferent of the residue of the testator's estate; and (2) that the trustees were entitled, but not bound, to make advances from the annual proceeds of the trust-estate for the maintenance and support of the children while their mother survived. Spears' Trustees v. Spears, &c., June 21, 1873, p. 731.

Trust-Settlement—Codicil—Construction.

5. A truster conveyed his unentailed lands and property, heritable and moveable, to trustees, and directed them, in the third place, to invest and accumulate the whole free rents and proceeds of the trust-estate, and to employ the funds so invested in the purchase of lands for the period of twenty years after his death. In the fifth place, the truster directed the trustees, at the termination of the twenty years, to settle the estates conveyed by the trust-deed, and the lands purchased by them, in strict entail upon the truster's son, and his heirs-male. In a codicil the truster directed that the trustees, "instead of investing the free rents of my unentailed estate in manner before mentioned, shall annually pay over the whole free proceeds of the same to my two daughters, equally between them, while both shall be in life, and to the survivor, and shall continue to do the same as long as both or either of them shall be alive. Held that provisions in the codicil in favour of the truster's daughters were not limited to the period of twenty years after the truster's death. Breadalbane's Trustees v. Jamieson, &c., July 16, 1873, p. 912.

Agent and Principal—Bankruptcy.

6. A sum of £1000 was sent by clients to a law-agent on 8th June for the purpose of being invested in a heritable security. On 15th June the agent paid it into his own bank account, which shewed a balance in his favour, until the transaction should be formally completed; and he died on the 21st. His estates were thereafter sequestrated, and the trustee claimed the £1000 in bank as part of the bankrupt estate. In a petition at the instance of the clients, under sec. 104 of the Bankruptcy Act, held that the £1000 having been sent to the bankrupt for a specific purpose, and being still distinguishable from his funds, fell to be taken out of the sequestration of his estate and paid to the petitioners. Macadam v. Martin's Trustee, Nov. 5, 1872, p. 33.

Aliment—Alimentary Provision—Judicial Factor.

7. By trust-settlement an annuity was directed to be paid, and was declared to be alimentary and "not assignable for causes onerous or gratuitous, and not subject to arrestment or other legal diligence, and not subject to the debts or deeds" of the donee. A judicial factor, who was appointed on failure of the trustees, carried out all the purposes of the trust except two. These were payment of the annuity and handing over the estate to the residuary legatee. The judicial factor, the annuitant, and the residuary legatee came to an agreement that the residuary legatee should grant a personal bond for payment of the annuity to the annuitant, who was to grant a discharge to the judicial factor, and that the trust-estate should be wound up and the residue paid over to the residuary legatee. The judicial factor presented a petition praying for exoneration and discharge on this arrangement being carried out. Held that the annuitant had not power to grant a discharge of the alimentary provision, and petition refused. Smith and Campbell, May 30, 1873, p. 639.

TRUST—Continued.

Annuity—Alimentary—Discharge.

8. A husband burdened certain lands with an annuity to his widow, declaring that it should be alimentary and not assignable, and should be exclusive of the jus mariti of any husband she might marry. He directed his trustees upon the death of his widow to convey the lands to A. The free rents of the lands were insufficient to pay the annuity, and the trustees required to borrow money to pay it on the security of the lands.

The widow and A agreed that she should disburden the lands for a certain sum, and that the trustees should on such payment convey the lands at once to A.

In a special case by A and the trustees, held that the widow could not discharge the annuity, and that the trustees were not authorised to convey the lands to A. Cosens v. Stevenson, &c., June 26, 1873, p. 761.

Legacy—Liferent and Fee.

9. A trust-settlement directed the trustees "to pay" a legacy to a lady, "to be settled by my said trustees on herself and her issue, with power to her of disposal in case of no issue, and failing issue and disposal by her, to return to her own heirs, excluding those of her husband." Held, at a date when the legatee was forty-two years of age, and had been for several years married and had no children (1) that the legatee was not entitled to have the legacy paid to herself absolutely; and (2) in order to give effect to the expressed intention of the truster, the trustees were bound to invest the money and to take the securities in the name of the legatee in fee, exclusive of the jus mariti of her husband, and after her death to any children she might have also in fee, subject to the condition that the children's right of succession should not be defeated by any gratuitous act of the legatee, and failing children, to the heirs of the legatee, excluding those of her husband. Massy v. Scott's Trustees, Dec. 5, 1872, p. 173.

Legacy.

10. A testator in his settlement directed his trustees to divide and pay over the fee of the residue of his estate to and among his whole children, including his daughters, "declaring that the provisions therein made in favour of females shall be purely alimentary to them, and not alienable or assignable, and shall be exclusive of the jus mariti and right of administration" of husbands, and not affectable by their own or such husbands' debts or deeds. Held that as there was a clear direction to the trustees to pay to the beneficiaries who were alone interested, and as the Court could not consistently therewith create a trust, which was the only mode of rendering the daughters' provisions inalienable, the daughters were entitled to receive payment on their own receipts; but that the receipts should bear exclusion of the jus mariti and right of administration. Allan's Trustees v. Allan and Others, Dec. 12, 1872, p. 216.

UNIVERSITY. Right of Women to Study and Graduate.

Held that in respect of the language of the deeds of foundation of Edinburgh University, and the contemporaneous interpretation by usage, female students were not entitled to study or to graduate in the University, and that regulations made for their admission were ultra vires of the University Court; and (2) (diss. Lord Justice-Clerk and Lord Gifford) that a reduction of the regulations was unnecessary. Jex-Blake v. Senatus of University of Edinburgh, June 28, 1873, p. 784.

USAGE. Corporation — Membership — Copartnery — Mandate — Joint Contributors.

1. In a suspension and interdict brought to try the validity of an election of certain persons as managers of the Edinburgh Royal Infirmary, held, in respect of the terms of its charter and Act of Parliament and the usage which had followed thereon, (1) that firms contributing the necessary amount were entitled to be represented at the meeting of the general court by one, but only one, of their partners, and that no written mandate from the firm was required by such partner; and (2) that votes which were given in respect of joint contributions were valid in cases in which the amount of the contributions when divided by the number of contributors would have been sufficient to have qualified each such contributor, but in no other case. Walker v. Law, Dec. 7, 1872, p. 199.

USAGE—Continued.

See University.

Servitude—Thirlage.

2. In the titles of lands which were thirled to a barony mill the thirl was described as of "the whole grindable corn growing on the said lands except teind and seed corn," or "except teind and horse corn." In a decree-arbitral pronounced in 1787, in a submission entered into between the proprietor of the mill and the proprietors of the lands it was found that the lands were astricted for their whole growing corns, seed and horse corn excepted. Held, upon consideration of the terms of the titles, and of the decree-arbitral and other evidence of usage, that the ambiguous terms "grindable corn" had been construed by usage to mean omnia grana crescentia. Stobbs v. Caven, March 14, 1873, p. 530.

VALUATION. See Teinds.

VALUATION ACTS. Administration of Justice—Corruption—Irregularity.

1. Allegations of private communications between the Judges of the Valuation Appeal Court and the assistant Solicitor of Inland Revenue which held irrelevant to support a conclusion for the reduction of judgments following thereon, it being the duty of the Solicitor of Inland Revenue to lay the special case for appeal before the Judges and get their opinion thereon. Stirling and Sons v. Holm and Others, Feb. 28, 1873, p. 480.

Valuation of Lands (Scotland) Acts—Valuation Appeal Court.

2. The Valuation Appeal Court is a Supreme Court, and its proceedings cannot be set aside by the Court of Session on the ground that they are ultra vires and incompetent. Stirling and Sons v. Holm and Others, Feb. 28, 1873, p. 480.

VALUATION APPEALS UNDER THE LANDS VALUATION ACTS. See separate Index, page 1052.

VESTING. See Succession.

WRIT. Authentication.

1. In a reduction of a testament, ex facie probative, on the ground that it had been signed by the witnesses ex intervallo and after the testator's death, held, after a proof, that the deed was not intended by the granter to be completed, and had not been completed.

Question, Whether a deed can be subscribed by the instrumentary witnesses after the death of the granter. Arnott and Others v. Burt, Nov. 14, 1872, p. 62.

Forgery.

2. Observations on the amount of evidence required to prove an averment of forgery in a civil action. Arnott and Others v. Burt, Nov. 14, 1872, p. 62.

Mandate—Forgery.

3. A firm of merchants, by a letter addressed to a bank, granted authority to their manager "to sign, per procuration of their firm, all bills, cheques, cash-orders, and other documents necessary to the conducting of our business, and all vouchers so subscribed will be equally binding as if signed by any member of our firm." They also delivered to their manager a letter of procuration binding themselves to meet all cheques, orders, drafts, bills, &c., endorsed by the manager, and "to keep the parties dealing with you free and skaithless; and we bind ourselves to ratify, homologate, and confirm the actings and doings of you, the manager, in respect of such cheques," &c. This document was delivered by the manager to the bank. The manager, after forging the names of certain real and fictitious firms as acceptors of bills to bills drawn by himself as procurator of his principal's firm, discounted the bills at the bank, and endorsed them per procuratory, and appropriated the money thus obtained to his own use.

WRIT—Continued.

Held that, as it was not proved that the bank had failed to exercise due caution in discounting any of the bills, or that the signatures thereto were manifest forgeries, or presented a suspicious appearance which should have put the bank on their guard, the firm were liable to the bank for the amount of the bills. Union Bank v. Makin, March 7, 1873, p. 499.

Delivery.

4. Observations (per Lord Deas) on the delivery necessary in the case of gratuitous inter vivos deeds granted by a wife in favour of her husband. Kirkpatrick v. Kirkpatrick's Trustees, March, 19, 1873, p. 551.

See Loan, 2—Proof—University.

INDEX OF CASES UNDER THE LANDS VALUATION ACTS

(17 & 18 VICT., c. 91, 20 & 21 VICT., c. 58).

Annual Payment—Annual Compensation for injury to Fishings.

1. Held that an annual payment as compensation for injury to fishings did not fall to be entered on the valuation-roll. Burgh of Renfrew, Case 59, p. 979.

Bridge Dues.

2. Held that a bridge was properly entered in the valuation-roll in respect that it yielded a revenue from bridge dues. Burgh of Dumfries, Case 77, p. 984.

3. Buildings by Crofter. Duke of Richmond, Case 57, p. 978.

Church and School.

4. Held that a parish church and schoolhouse should be entered in the valuation-roll. Heritors of New Monkland, Case 83, p. 986.

Church—Private Chapel.

5. Held that a private chapel yielding no revenue was rightly entered in the valuation-roll. Menzies, Case 91, p. 989.

Exemption from Taxation—College.

6. Held that the exemption of a college from taxation was not a ground for not entering the college buildings in the valuation-roll. University of Glasgow, Case 72, p. 982.

Farm-House.

7. Held that the dwelling-house attached to a farm should not be separately entered in the valuation. Henderson, Case 79, p. 985.

Farm—Conjunct and Confident Person.

8. Held that the value of a farm let by a father to his son should be entered at the rent stated in the lease. Bruce, Case 58, p. 978.

Farm—Deductions from Rent.

9. Held that deductions from the rent of a farm allowed to the tenant to be spent in drainage fell to be included as part of the rent in the valuation-roll. Udny, Case 86, p. 987.

Farm—Lease—Conjunct and Confident.

10. A proprietor granted a lease of a farm to an old servant at a rent of £50. After the proprietor's death the assessor entered the farm in the valuation-roll at its true value, £70. The trustees of the proprietor appealed, on the ground that they only received £50 under the lease. Held that the entry was right. Kerr's Trustees, Case 75, p. 983.

LANDS VALUATION ACTS—Continued.

Farm—Sublease.
11. The rent of a farm let on an improving lease was fixed at £15. A subtenant of part of the farm was entered as occupier at £55. Held that the name of the subtenant should not be entered on the roll. Fraser, Case 52, p. 976.

Farm—Dwelling.
12. Value of farm fixed at rent on lease with the addition of interest at 5 per cent on £150 expended by tenant on house and offices for which he had a claim of repetition from the landlord at the end of the lease. Skene, Case 53, p. 976.

Farm—Renewal of Lease—Improving Lease.
13. Before the expiry of an improving lease, at which the rent of a farm was fixed at £11, a renewed lease was taken at £15. Held, in the circumstances, that the farm was properly entered in the valuation-roll at £15, the period of the original lease not having expired. Fraser, Case 52, p. 976.

14. Gasworks—Valuation of Gasworks when occupied by the proprietor. Inverurie Gasworks, Case 85, p. 986.

15. Gasworks—Valuation of Gasworks at probable rent to be got for premises. Renton Gas-Light Co., Case 93, p. 989.

Gasworks.
16. Valuation of gasworks fixed at average sum divided among shareholders for several years. Leven Gas-Light Co., Case 94, p. 990.

Goodwill of a Store.
17. A store kept by an iron company in connection with their works was let at a rent of £90, with an additional annual payment of £60 for goodwill. Held that both sums fell to be included in the valuation as rent. The Glasgow Iron Co., Case 90, p. 989.

Harbour.
18. Value of harbour fixed at gross revenue, less 20 per cent for collection and maintenance, and 20 per cent for tenants' profits. Clyde Navigation Trustees, Case 60, p. 979.

19. House—Mansion-house—Valuation of Mansion-house in the occupation of the Proprietor. Sir Thomas Gladstone, Case 84, p. 986.

20. Houses in College Buildings—Valuation of Professors' Houses in College Buildings. University of Glasgow, Case 82, p. 985.

21. House—Valuation of Houses in Glasgow. Binning, Case 88, p. 988.

22. House—Valuation of Houses in Glasgow. Macfarlane, Case 81, p. 985.

23. House—Mansion—Deductions for Furniture and keeping up of Garden. Duke of Richmond, Case 56, p. 978.

Ironworks—Entry of Notes on Valuation-roll.
24. Notes on valuation-roll stating the number of furnaces of an ironwork which were out of blast objected to. Addie, Case 61, p. 979.

25. Ironworks—Furnaces out of Blast. Carnbroe Ironworks, Case 62, p. 980.

Mill.
26. Held that a mill was rightly entered in the valuation-roll at 8½ per cent on the price. Thomson, Case 78, p. 984.

Mill—Multures.
27. Held that an annuity of 40 bolls of victual, secured on lands in lieu of multures did not fall within the description of "lands and heritages" in the sense of the Valuation Act. M'Leod, Case 65, p. 980.

LANDS VALUATION ACTS—Continued.

Mill—Multures.

28. Held that payments in commutation of multures were not "lands ar heritages" in the sense of the Valuation Act. Duchess of Sutherlan Case 64, p. 980.

Mill—Machinery.

29. Held that the annual value of machinery in a corn mill fell to be includ in the valuation. Chalmers, Case 73, p. 982.

Moss—Fuel.

30. Held that the revenue derived from moss lands for fuel should be includ as rent in the valuation-roll. Forbes, Case 95, p. 990.

Oil-Works.

31. Held that oil-works connected with a coalfield were properly entered in tl valuation-roll. Drumgray Coal Co., Case 55, p. 977.

Paper-Mill.

32. Held that a paper-mill in possession of the proprietor should be valued the probable rent, and not according to output or cost of erection. Anna dale and Son, Case 54, p. 977.

Parish—Farm-House.

33. Held that the occupant of lands and a house in different parishes was e titled to have them entered together as one holding, with a view to the being jointly assessed for poor-rates. Glass, Case 87, p. 988.

34. Print-Works, Valuation of. Stirling and Sons, Case 69, p. 981, and Ca 104, p. 992.

Public Lunatic Asylum.

35. Held that a lunatic asylum supported by public rates should be entered i the valuation-roll. Banffshire District Lunacy Board, Case 71, p. 982.

Shipbuilding Yard.

36. Held that saw-mills and sheds erected by the tenant of a shipbuilding yar should be entered in the valuation-roll. Graham Brothers, Case 72, p. 98

37. Shipbuilding Yard, Valuation of Erections on. City of Perth, Case 74, 983.

Subtenants—Cottages Sublet.

38. Held that a number of cottages held in lease by a firm of fish-curers, ar sublet to fishermen, should be valued at the original rent, but that tl names of the occupiers, with the rents paid by them, should also be entere as a guide to the assessor in making up the roll of voters. Hay and Cc Case 70, p. 981.

39. Subtenancy under Lease where Subtenants are excluded. Duke of Richmon Case 66, p. 981.

Tenant.

40. Held that when a tenant becomes proprietor of the subjects let, and improv them, the rent stated in the lease cannot be taken as the annual valu Grant, Case 92, p. 989.

Valuation—Appeal Case—21 Vict. c. 58, sec. 2.

41. Observations on the form of special case. Bank of Scotland, Case 101, 991.

repaired 2/62